In the same way the string of examples given in the Theophania throughout presupposes the string of authorities from which they are taken, and which are quoted at length in the Praeparatio. The case as regards the Demonstratio is not quite so clear, but where there is a variation, it points to the priority of the Demonstratio. Compare for instance the quotations from heathen writers given in full in Dem. Ev. iii. 3. 9-12, with the summary of their contents in Theoph. v. 5. So again, when he is speaking of the early bishops of Jerusalem before the foundation of Aelia Capitolina, the addition of their number "fifteen" in Theoph. v. 45, which is not found in Dem. Ev. iii. 5. 109, seems to point to a time subsequent to his studies in ecclesiastical history, which furnished him with more definite knowledge on the subject (H. E. iv. 5). (2) The relation of the Theophania to the Oration in Praise of Constantine presents itself in a different way. This oration was delivered, as we have seen, A.D. 335 or 336. The latter part, comprising about one half of the whole, appears almost verbatim in different parts of the Theophania, besides close coincidences of thought and expression scattered throughout the rest. Is it conceivable that Eusebius would have dared to deliver page after page of a published theological work as if it were written for the occasion? Would not such a procedure have been regarded as an insult alike to the emperor and to the hearers? On the other hand, if we suppose that he had partially written the Theophania at this time, but had not given it to the public, then he might fairly utilise as much of it as served his immediate purpose. In fact, the relation of this panegyric to the Theophania seems to be the same as to the Life of Constantine. The theological portion of the speech is taken mainly from the former, the historical portion from the latter. Neither was published at the time, though both were perhaps begun, or at least contemplated, and therefore he could plagiarise from them with impunity. If this view be true, the Theophania was one of his latest works. Indeed I am almost disposed to think that it was left unfinished when he died. It ends with a passage out of the Demonstratio, from which nearly the whole of the last book is taken. This passage breaks off in the middle of a sentence in its original place (D. E. iii. 7. 38), but it is slightly modified here, so as to make a possible ending for the Theophania. Still it is somewhat abrupt, and the subject wants rounding off. The late date of the Theophania would account for the fact that Eusebius does not refer to it in his other extant writings, notwithstanding its importance. This view is quite consistent with the statement (ii. 14) that the immoral rites of Baalbec still survived; for, though Constantine took measures to suppress them (V. C. iii. 58), it is clear from later writers that the attempt was altogether ineffective. Lee seems to think that because the Theophania contains a popular treatment of subjects which Eusebius discusses more elaborately in the Praeparatio and Demonstratio, therefore it must have preceded them in time. But it happens more often than not that the more recondite work is followed by the more popular exposition by the same author. The reputation of the former creates the demand for the latter.

(15) On the Numerous Progeny of the Ancients (περὶ τῆς τῶν παλαιῶν ἀνδρῶν πολυπαιδίας). The title of this lost treatise is taken from Praep. Ev. vii. 8. 29, where Eusebius mentions it. It is doubtless the same work to which St. Basil refers (de Spir. Sanct. 29, Op. iii. p. 61) as Difficulties respecting the Polygamy of the Ancients (ἐν τοῖς ἐπαπορήμασι περὶ τῆς τῶν ἀρχαίων πολυγαμίας). The right place for this treatise would seem to be among the apologetic works, since it appears to have aimed at accounting for the normal type of life among the patriarchs and the Jews generally, as seen in polygamy, and reconciling it with the ascetic type, which in his own time was regarded as the true ideal of Christian teaching. This practical contradiction starts up again and again in his extant apologetic writings, as a difficulty to be explained. In the reference in the Praeparatio he speaks of having discussed in this work the notices of the lives of the patriarchs and "their philosophic endurance and self-discipline" (τῆς φιλοσόφου καρτερίας τε αὐτῶν καὶ ἀσκήσεως), whether by way of direct narrative or of allegorical suggestion. The quotation in Basil does not aid us.

C. CRITICAL AND EXEGETICAL.

Under this head will be ranged all works directed primarily to the criticism and elucidation of the Scriptures.

(16) Biblical Texts. We have seen already (p. 310) how in his earlier years Eusebius was occupied in conjunction with his friend Pamphilus in the production of correct texts of Old Testament Scriptures. A notice connected with his later years exhibits him engaged in a similar work (V. C. iv. 36, 37). The emperor writes to Eusebius, asking him to provide fifty copies of the Scriptures for use in the churches of his new capital Constantinople, where the Christian population had largely multiplied. The manuscripts must be easily legible and handy for use; they must be written on carefully prepared parchment; and they must be transcribed by skilful calligraphers. He has already written, he adds, to the procurator-general (καθολικός) of the district (τῆς διοικήσεως), charging him to furnish Eusebius with the necessary appliances, and has placed at his disposal two public waggons in order to convey the manuscripts, when complete, to the new metropolis. Eusebius executes the commission. The manuscripts were arranged, he tells us, in ternions and quaternions (τρισσὰ καὶ τετρασσὰ), and were carefully prepared at great cost. The emperor wrote again, expressing his satisfaction at the manner in which the commission had been executed.

It has been a question whether we have not among our extant MSS some of these very copies which Eusebius supplied to the churches of Constantinople. The only two which can possibly fall within the age of Eusebius are the Vaticanus and the Sinaiticus. The former however does not answer to the description, for it is folded not in ternions or quaternions, but in quinternions or quires of five sheets (see Scrivener's Introduction to the Criticism of the New Testament p. 96, ed. 2). The latter does indeed satisfy this condition (see ib. p. 88), and Dr. Scrivener (Collation of Codex Sinaiticus, p. xxxvii) thinks it "very credible" that we have here one of the copies prepared by Eusebius for Constantinople, but the locality in which it was found is at all events not favourable to the supposition, and the text in many respects differs too widely from the readings found in Eusebius to encourage this opinion (see Burgon, Last Twelve Verses of St. Mark p. 293). The library of Caesarea however was for many generations the resort of transcribers and correctors who were anxious to secure accurate texts of the Scriptures: see e.g. a later hand in a copy of the LXX, instanced by Scrivener (Introduction, p. 51); the original corrector of H of St. Paul's Epistles (ib. p. 159); and the Greek text from which the Harclean Syriac, or part of it, was translated (St. Clement of Rome p. 234, Appendix).

(17) Sections and Canons, with the Letter to Carpianus prefixed [Op. iv. 1273]. Eusebius explains the origin and method of these sections and canons in the prefatory letter. Ammonius of Alexandria (about A.D. 220) had constructed a Harmony or Diatessaron of the Gospels. He took St. Matthew as his standard, and placed side by side with the paragraphs in this evangelist the parallel passages in the other three gospels. The work of Ammonius suggested to Eusebius the plan which he adopted. It was however somewhat different in principle. The great inconvenience of Ammonius's work was that St. Matthew alone could be read continuously, while the sequence of the other evangelists was interrupted. On the other hand, Eusebius desired to preserve the continuity of all the narratives. He therefore divided each gospel separately into sections, which he numbered continuously. At the same time he constructed a table of ten canons, each containing a list of passages, as follows: canon i, common to all the four evangelists; canon ii, common to Matthew, Mark, Luke; canon iii, common to Matthew, Luke, John; canon iv, common to Matthew, Mark, John; canon v, common to Matthew and Luke; canon vi, common to Matthew and Mark; canon vii, common to Matthew and John; canon viii, common to Luke and Mark; canon ix, common to Luke and John; canon x, passages peculiar to a single evangelist, so that this last canon contains four separate lists. The sections of the several gospels were numbered in black, and beneath each such number was a second number in vermilion, specifying the canon to which the section belonged. By turning to the canon so specified, the reader would see the numbers of the parallel sections in the other evangelists. Thus at Matt. xiii. 54 sq. he finds PMA. This 141st section of St. Matthew therefore belongs to the first canon. Turning accordingly to the first canon, he finds

MT	MP	Λ	ΙΩ
PMA	N	ΙΘ	ΝΘ

This shews him that the 141st section of St. Matthew corresponds to the 50th of St. Mark, to the 19th of St. Luke, and to the 59th of St. John; and he accordingly turns to these sections in the gospels, and finds the parallel passages, Mark vi. 1 sq., Luke iv. 22, John vi. 41, 42.

It will be seen from this account that the numbering of the sections was entirely dependent on the arrangement in canons. A section did not necessarily comprise a single subject complete in itself, as a chapter or a paragraph might do. Its length was regulated altogether by the matter which it had in common with one or more of the other gospels. Thus the 1st section of St. Luke extends over eighty-five verses (Luke i. 1-ii. 5), comprising the preface at one end and the account of the taxing with the journey to Bethlehem at the other, because the whole of this part has no parallel in the other evangelists. On the other hand, elsewhere a single verse will frequently be bisected, because its different parts stand in different relations to the other gospels.

This fact decides a critical question of some importance. It is common to speak of the arrangement which has been described as Ammonian Sections and Eusebian Canons, as though Eusebius had derived the former from Ammonius and had himself only added the latter. This however is not the natural inference from his own language. He does not say that he borrowed anything from Ammonius, but that his general scheme was suggested by the work of that critic (ἐκ τοῦ πνεύματος τοῦ προειρημένου ἀνδρὸς ἀλλοῦ ἀπορρέει), though he himself adopted a different method (καθ' ἑτέραν μέθοδον). The foregoing account shews that the canons and sections were intimately connected, and that the latter were determined altogether by the former. The principle of Ammonius was different, and the numbering of the sections, even so far as regards St. Matthew's Gospel, would not be suggested by his plan, or indeed have been compatible with it. The other gospels he would not be required to divide into sections at all. Mill however (Proleg. p. lxiii sq.) falls into the error of ascribing the sections to Ammonius, and he is followed by not a few more recent critics. The case is correctly stated by Wetstein (Proleg. pp. 68, 69 sq.), by Lloyd (Nov. Test. p. vii sq., Oxon. 1828), and by Westcott (Dict. of the Bible, i. c. "New Testament," p. 512); and the reasons for this view are more fully given by Burgon, Last Twelve Verses of St. Mark p. 295 sq.

The primary object of this scheme was to lay the basis of a Harmony of the Gospels, or at least to furnish materials for the investigation of questions bearing on the mutual relations of the several evangelical narratives. The fact that it was suggested by the Diatessaron of Ammonius shews this. The interest which such investigations had for Eusebius is evident moreover from his own Questions ad Stephanum and ad Marcellinum. But Eusebius would find, as later harmonists have found, that it is not easy to draw the line between divergent narratives of the same event or discourse, and narratives of similar events or discourses. Hence, the only safe principle which he could lay down for himself was sufficient close resemblance (τὰ παραπλήσια). Any narrower rule would have obliged him to judge numberless doubtful cases, and this apparently he had no desire of doing. This principle however, once adopted, obliged him to admit as parallels references to similar incidents or sayings which no one could regard as different representations of the same thing; e.g. corresponding to the mention of the last passover in Matt. xvi. 1, 2 (§ 274), we have references not only to Mark xiv. 1 (§ 156), Luke xxii. 1 (§ 260), John xi. 55 (§ 96), which are strictly parallel, but also to the two previous passovers mentioned by St. John, ii. 13 (§ 20) and vi. 4 (§ 48). In such cases the parallels serve very much the same purpose as our marginal references and good service has been done by calling attention to these phenomena (Burgon, l. c. p. 298 sq.). But it seems to be an entire misconception to suppose that the sections "are only rightly understood when they are regarded as marginal references," and that the system "is nothing else but a clumsy substitute for what is achieved by an ordinary reference Bible." The main object of Eusebius was to exhibit the mutual relations of the four evangelical narratives; the main object of a reference Bible is to furnish illustrations to individual passages from other sources. The arrangement of the several canons was quite superfluous for this latter purpose; and a far less intelligent man than Eusebius might have seen that, by precluding any references to other parts of the same gospel, his system was very ill conceived for the attainment of such an aim. For the purpose which he had in view, it is very fairly adequate, though not perfect, and it has never yet been superseded.

Dean Burgon has pointed out (p. 308 sq.) that in the Syriac MSS generally, even in those of ancient date (e.g. the Medicean MS, written A.D. 586), though the principle of the Eusebian sections and canons is preserved, yet the subdivisions themselves are not the same (e.g. in St. John there are two hundred and seventy-one sections instead of two hundred and thirty-two); and he even raises the question whether this larger number of sections found in the Syriac MSS may not represent the original arrangement of Eusebius (p. 310). For this latter suspicion there is no ground. The Syriac subdivision was doubtless some later, but comparatively early, readjustment of the Eusebian sections. The Latin sections, which must be as old as Jerome's time, and therefore can be traced farther back than the Syriac, are the same as the Greek. In the Coptic MSS also, so far as I have noticed, the sections correspond to those of the Greek.

The letter to Carpianus was translated into most, if not all, languages in which versions of the gospels were anciently made. For the history of the sections and canons in the MSS see Scrivener's Introd. to the Criticism of the N. T. p. 54 sq. and passim. The sections and canons are marked in many editions of the Greek Testament, e.g. those of Tischendorf and Tregelles.

(18) Under the head of Biblical exegesis may be ranged several topographical works which were undertaken at the instance of Paulinus, bishop of Tyre.

(a) Interpretation of the Ethnological Terms in the Hebrew Scriptures (τῶν ἀνὰ τὴν οἰκουμένην ἔθνων ἐπὶ τὴν Ἑλλάδα φωνὴν μεταβαλὼν τὰς ἐν τῇ θείᾳ γραφῇ κείμενας Ἑβραίοις ὀνόμασι προσήσεις).

(b) Chorography of Ancient Judaea, with the Inheritances of the Ten Tribes (τῆς παλαιᾶς Ἰουδαίας ἀπὸ πάσης βίβλου καταγραφὴν πεποιημένος κατὰ τὰς ἐν αὐτῇ τῶν δώδεκα φυλῶν διαιρῶν κλήρους).

(c) A Plan of Jerusalem and of the Temple (ὡς ἐν γραφῇς τύπῳ τῆς παλαιᾶς διαβοήτου μητροπόλεως αὐτῶν, λέγω δὲ τὴν Ἱερουσαλήμ, τοῦ τε ἐν αὐτῇ ἱεροῦ τὴν εἰκόνα διαχαράξας). It was accompanied with memoirs relating to the different localities (μετὰ παραθέσεως τῶν εἰς τοὺς τόπους ὑπομνημάτων).

(d) On the Names of Places in Holy Scripture (περὶ τῶν τοπικῶν ὀνομάτων τῶν ἐν τῇ θείᾳ γραφῇ), entitled in the head of Jerome's version de Situ et Nominibus Locorum Hebraicorum, but elsewhere (Vir. Ill. 81) Topica.

The first three works (or perhaps they should be regarded as parts of the same work) are mentioned in the preface to the fourth, which alone is extant. The second is probably intended by Ebedjesu (Assem. Bibl. Orient. iii. p. 18) in his catalogue, where he mentions among the writings of Eusebius a book de Figura Mundi, the Greek being mistranslated.

The treatise, On the Names of Places, like the three which preceded it, was written at the instance of Paulinus, to whom it is dedicated. It professes to give alphabetically "the designations of the cities and villages mentioned in Holy Scripture in their original language" (πατρίῳ γλώττῃ), together with a description of the locality and the modern names in each case. There is no indication of date; but from its relation to Paulinus, as well as for other reasons, we may conjecture that it was a somewhat early work. Jerome indeed in his preface says otherwise; he describes it as written "post decem ecclesiasticos historiae libros . . . post temporum canones etc."; but his recklessness of language deprives this statement of any value. Eusebius himself names other works (the topographical treatises already mentioned) which he had written already, but not the History and the Chronicon. Jerome interpolates these in his manipulation of Eusebius's preface.

The names of the places are not taken from the LXX, but transliterated with various success from the Hebrew. The letters are given in order, A, B, Γ, etc.; but in each several letter the words are arranged under the successive books in which they occur, so that the order is not strictly alphabetical. The great value of the treatise consists in the acquaintance which Eusebius had with the geography of Palestine in his own day.

This work had already been translated into Latin by some unskilful hand before Jerome's time, "quidam vix imbutus literis . . . ausus est in Latinam linguam non Latine vertere." The result was so unsatisfactory that he himself undertook a new version. Jerome's however was not a mere translation; he omitted some important notices, and he made several changes. His personal knowledge of Palestine enabled him to do this with effect.

The Topica was first edited by Bonfrère (Paris, 1631), then by Martianay in his edition of Jerome's works (ii. p. 386 sq., Paris, 1699), among which it is generally included along with his translation (e.g. by Vallarsi, Op. iii. p. 122 sq.). The two most recent and most critical editions are those of Larsow and Parthey (Euseb. Pamph. Episc. Caesar. Onomasticon, etc., Berolini, 1862) and of Lagarde (Onomastica Sacra, p. 207 sq., Gottingae, 1870). For the sake of convenience Larsow and Parthey have departed from the arrangement of Eusebius and Jerome according to the books of the Bible, and have substituted a strictly alphabetical order throughout. The original order is preserved by Lagarde, who has also given Jerome's version in the same volume.

(19) On the Nomenclature of the Book of the Prophets (περὶ τῆς τοῦ βιβλίου τῶν προφητῶν ὀνομασίας) [Op. iv. 1261 sq.]. This work contains a brief account of the several prophets and the subjects of their prophecies, beginning with the minor prophets and following the order of the LXX. It was first published by T. Curetius in his edition of Procopius on Isaiah (Paris, 1580). For an account of the MS (now in the Vatican) which contains it, see Mai Bibl. Nov. Patr. iv. p. 66.

(20) In Psalmos (εἰς τοὺς Ψαλμοὺς), a continuous commentary on the Psalms [Op. v. 65 sq., vi. 9]. This commentary was first published by Montfaucon, Coll. Nov. Patr. i (Paris, 1707), with a translation, very meagre notes, and good "praeliminaria." The manuscripts which he used however did not enable him to carry the work beyond the 118th Psalm; and as he did not observe any extracts from Eusebius in the Catena beyond this point, he supposed that the end of the work was irrecoverably lost. Mai however Bibl. Nov. Patr. iv. p. 65 sq., Romae, 1847) discovered among the Vatican MSS three Catena, which contain fairly continuous extracts from the latter part of the work, and thus was enabled to supply the missing end of this commentary in part. The whole of the extant remains will be found in Migne.

This work contains some references which enable us to fix its date roughly. (1) On Ps. xxxvi. 12 (v. p. 329, Migne) Eusebius alludes in general terms to the persecution of his own time (τοῖς καθ' ἡμᾶς διωγμοῖς) and the vengeance which overtook the persecutors; and again on Ps. xlvii. 4 sq. (v. p. 424) he sees a fulfilment of the Psalmist's words in the fate which overtook Galerius and Maximinus (whose names however are not mentioned), in the "palinode" of the persecutors, and in the rebuilding of the churches. (2) A more important indication of date is the comment on Ps. lxxxvii. 10 sq. (v. p. 1064). Eusebius explains the words, "Wilt thou do wonders among the dead," etc., as a prophetic announcement, and he sees a fulfilment in "the wonderful things which have been accomplished in our own day (καθ' ἡμᾶς) respecting the sepulchre and the confession (τὸ μαρτύριον, i.e. the church; comp. V. C. iii. 28, 30, iv. 46, etc.) of our Saviour." This evidently refers to the discovery of the site of the Holy Sepulchre and the building of Constantine's basilica thereupon, as related in V. C. iii. 20 sq., iv. 45 sq.; comp. Laud. Const. 9, § 16 sq. But it is not necessary with Montfaucon to suppose that in "the wonderful things" (τὰ θαυμάσια) Eusebius here alludes to the miracles believed in the next generation to have attended the invention of the Cross by the empress Helena; for in his Life of Constantine he betrays no knowledge of any such invention or miracles. The discovery of the hidden cave and the erection of the magnificent buildings would amply justify the term; and in fact Eusebius himself elsewhere gives a letter of Constantine in which similar expressions are used to describe these events (V. C. iii. 30 τοῦ θαύματος τούτου, καινοτέροις θαύμασιν, &c. 31 τὸν τοῦ κόσμου θαυμασιώτερον τόπον). Here then is a valuable note of time. The interest in the holy places began with the visit of the emperor's mother, A.D. 326. The discovery of the site of the Sepulchre may have been made then, and the buildings, which occupied some years in the erection, may have been begun soon after; but the basilica was not dedicated till A.D. 335 (see above, p. 318). The date of this commentary therefore can hardly be placed much earlier than A.D. 330, and may have been some years later.

This work stands in the first rank of patristic commentaries in point of importance, owing to its superior antiquity and its intrinsic merits. The historical bearing of the several psalms is generally treated sensibly; the theological and mystical interpretations betray the extravagance common to patristic exegesis. The value of the work to ourselves is largely increased by the frequent extracts from the Hexaplaric versions and by other occasional notices respecting the text and history of the Psalter. The author has this advantage over most patristic commentators, that he possessed some acquaintance with Hebrew, though not sufficient to prevent him from falling into mistakes. It is not certain however (as Montfaucon assumes) that he is guilty of a gross blunder when on Ps. cix. (xl. 3, ex utero), his present text has τὸ ἱερὸν ἔχει Μαρίας, and he connects it with the name of the Virgin. There is obviously some critical error in the context, and it is not at all clear that he himself adopts the view here mentioned. Even if he does, we must not hastily assume that he misunderstood the meaning of the Hebrew מִבְטֶן "from the womb." In this case he would merely imply that there was a prophetic suggestion of the Virgin's name (מִבְטֶן) in these Hebrew words, just as Philo is constantly seeing metaphysical and ethical meanings in homonyms. Prefixed to the commentary, besides its own proper preface (p. 72 sq.) and a note on διδασκαλία (p. 76), are two other prefatory notices (p. 66 sq.), the one on the "inscriptions" (εἰς τὰς ἐπιγραφὰς) of the Psalms, and the other containing the "arguments" (πρότερος), i.e. a summary of their contents theologically interpreted. These would seem to belong to some other work. They may have been included in the Elementary Introduction, if the view taken of this work below be correct. Eusebius had been preceded by Origen as a commentator on the Psalms (Hieron. Epist. lii, Op. i. p. 754, "Psalmorum quos apud Graecos interpretati sunt multis voluminibus, prius Origenes, secundus Eusebius Caesariensis.") To him doubtless he was greatly indebted in this work.

This commentary had a great reputation. It was translated into Latin within a very few years of its publication by his namesake Eusebius of Vercellae, who however omitted the parts which he considered heretical (Hieron. l. c.; Epist. 61, i. p. 348; Vir. Ill. 96, ii. p. 932). The translation is lost. The work of Eusebius is mentioned several times, as we have seen, by Jerome; it was largely used by Theodoret; and it is frequently quoted by later writers. Extracts of Syriac extracts from it appear in Wright's Catal. Syr. MSS Brit. Mus. pp. 35 sq., 121.

(21) Commentary on Isaiah (ὑπομνήματα εἰς Ἰσαΐαν) [Op. vi. p. 77 sq.]. This work also was first published by Montfaucon, Coll. Nov. Patr. ii (Paris, 1706), partly from MSS containing large portions of the continuous work, partly from copious extracts in the Catenae. As in the former case, so here also he added a translation, very meagre notes, and a good preface. This commentary is mentioned by Jerome in one passage (Vir. Ill. 81) as consisting of ten books ("libris decem"), in another (Comm. in Isai. Prol., Op. iv. p. 5) as comprising fifteen books ("quindecim volumina"). As Jerome must have had the work by him when he wrote the latter passage, we may suppose that fifteen is the correct number, unless there be some clerical error. In the existing MSS there is no trace of any division into books.

The indications of date in this work are as follows. (1) On xlv. 5 (p. 404) Eusebius mentions the persecution of Diocletian as a thing of the past (ἐν γούν τοῖς καθ' ἡμᾶς αὐτοῦς γενομένοις διωγμοῖς . . . ἐθεασάμεθα κ.τ.λ.). (2) On xlix. 23 (p. 440), "Kings shall be thy nursing fathers," he remarks that we "have seen it fulfilled literally with our own eyes," the sovereigns taking the Church under their care, and the provincial governors supplying food (τὰ σιτηρέσια χορηγοῦσαι) to the poor of the Church in obedience to the royal command. The measures here referred to are related in V. C. iv. 28, σιτοδοσίας ἐπὶ χορηγίᾳ πενήτων ἀνδρῶν. (3) On xxiii. 17 (p. 257), the prophecy respecting Tyre, "her merchandise and her hire shall be holy to the Lord," he remarks that this has been fulfilled "in our own day" (καθ' ἡμᾶς αὐτοῦς), and he proceeds to speak of the "establishment of the Church of God" there in language which seems to have been suggested by the erection of the great basilica at Tyre (about A.D. 314), when he himself preached the inaugural sermon (H. E. x. 4). (4) On xiii. 17 (p. 189) there is a direct reference to the Chronicle (ἐν τοῖς πονηθείσιν ἡμῖν χρονικοῖς συγγράμμασι). This last notice would place the date of the Commentary on Isaiah not earlier than A.D. 325, if we could be sure that there were no prior edition of the Chronicle, but the references to that work elsewhere in Eusebius, as has been pointed out (p. 321), are highly perplexing except on such a hypothesis.

This work exhibits the same characteristics as the Commentary on the Psalms. Jerome (Comm. in Is. prol. l. c.) describes the work as "juxta historicam explanationem"; and in other places he complains that, though in the title Eusebius professed to give "a historical exposition," "a historical interpretation" (ib. v. prol., p. 168 sq.; ib. v. § 18, p. 199), he nevertheless sometimes follows Origen and runs off into allegorical interpretations. The criticism is just, but no traces of this limitation appear in the heading in the existing MSS, unless they have been suppressed by the editor. At the same time Jerome himself is largely indebted to Eusebius, whom he sometimes translates almost word for word without acknowledgment. Eusebius occasionally inserts on the authority of a Hebrew teacher traditions which are interesting: e.g. that Shebna became high-priest and betrayed the people to Sennacherib (p. 249); that Hezekiah was seized with sickness for not singing God's praises, like Moses and Deborah, after his victory (p. 361). Sometimes he gives Christian traditions; e.g. (p. 284) that Judas Iscariot belonged to the tribe of Ephraim. This commentary of Eusebius is mentioned by Procopius in his preface, and is freely used by him, as also by later Greek commentators.

(22) Commentary on St. Luke's Gospel (εἰς τὸ κατὰ Λουκᾶν εὐαγγέλιον) [Op. vi. 527 sq.]. Considerable extracts from this work, collected from the Catena, were first published by Mai, Bibl. Nov. Patr. iv. p. 159 sq., Romae, 1847. It is not mentioned by Jerome or Photius.

(23) Commentary on the First Epistle to the Corinthians. At least such a work seems to be implied by Jerome's language, Ep. xlix (Op. i. p. 235 "Origenes, Dionysius, Pierius, Eusebius Caesariensis, Didymus, Apollinaris, latissime hanc epistolam interpretati sunt"), though he does not mention it in his Catalogue. One extract alone, on 1 Cor. iv. 5, appears in Cramer's Catena p. 75 (repeated p. 477).

(24) Commentaries on other Books of Scripture. Extracts are given from, or mention is made of, commentaries on Proverbs (Mai, Bibl. Nov. Patr. iv. p. 316, reprinted by Migne, vi. p. 75); Song of Songs (see Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vii. pp. 397, 409); Daniel (Mai, ib. p. 316, reprinted by Migne, vi. p. 525); Hebrews (Mai, ib. p. 207, reprinted by Migne, vi. p. 605); and several other books of the Old and New Testaments (see Fabric. l. c. p. 399). It is doubtful however whether in such cases the extracts (even when genuine) were taken from continuous commentaries or from other exegetical or dogmatical works of Eusebius. In some instances this is certainly so; e.g. in the case of notes on the gospels, which are extracted in many instances from the Quaestiones ad Stephanum and ad Marinum.

(25) On the Discrepancies of the Gospels (περὶ Διαφωνίας Εὐαγγελίων). Jerome, in his Catalogue (c. 81), mentions among the works of Eusebius a book de Evangeliorum Diaphonia, and elsewhere (Comm. in Matth. i. c. 3, Op. vii. p. 11) he refers to Eusebius as discussing a certain question "in libris διαφωνίας εὐαγγελίων." Ebedjesu also in his list mentions "librum Solutionis Contradictionum quas sunt in Evangelio" (Assem. Bibl. Orient. iii. p. 18). In the 16th century Latino Latini wrote that there had been found in Sicily "libri tres Eusebii Caesariensis de Evangeliorum diaphonia," and it was hoped they would be published shortly. But from that time to this nothing has been heard of the Sicilian MS. Mai however discovered in a Vatican MS an epitome of the whole work, which he published in Script. Vet. Nov. Coll. i. 1, p. 1 sq. (1825), and again in Bibl. Nov. Patr. iv. p. 217 sq. (1847). He also added large portions of the unabridged work, which portions he found in the Catena of Nicetas on St. Luke (Vat. 1611), together with other fragments from other places, including two in Syriac (from the Vatican MS Syr. 104). These last doubtless belonged to the translation with which Ebedjesu was acquainted. Some criticisms on Mai's editing of this work will be found in Burgon, Last Twelve Verses of St. Mark, p. 42 sq.

The work consists of two parts, which form separate works, and are quoted as such:

(i) Questions and Solutions on the Genealogy of the Saviour, addressed to Stephanus; in two books [Op. iv. 879 sq., 953 sq.]. This work is mentioned by Eusebius in the Demonstratio (vii. 3. 18, ἐν τῇ πρώτῃ τῶν εἰς τὴν γενεαλογίαν τοῦ σωτῆρος ἡμῶν ζητημάτων καὶ λύσεων), where he refers his readers to it for further information. Its title may be inferred from this reference, combined with the heading in the Epitome (p. 879), where it is described as "addressed to Stephanus concerning the Questions and Solutions in the Gospel." It is mentioned also by Nicephorus Callistus (H. E. vi. 37).

(ii) Questions and Solutions concerning the Passion and Resurrection of the Saviour, addressed to Marinus; in one book [Op. iv. 937 sq., 983 sq.]. This is the title in Corder. Caten. in Joann. p. 436, where it is quoted (see col. 1009, Migne). More commonly it is cited simply τὰ πρὸς Μαρῖνον (col. 1000, 1009, 1012, 1813).

At the beginning of this second work (col. 957), Eusebius says that, having already written two books (συγγράμματα) of "Questions and Solutions respecting the difficulties at the beginning of the inspired Gospels," he will now proceed in reply to Marinus to discuss questions affecting the end of them, passing over the intermediate parts. Thus he regards the two works as in a manner one; and we understand how Anastasius of Sinai (col. 913) quotes as from the work to Marinus a passage which comes from that to Stephanus. Nor can there be much doubt that the two together formed the work elsewhere entitled de Diaphonia Evangeliorum. The difficulties indeed do not always turn upon discrepancies in the Gospels. Thus for instance, he discusses the question why Thamar is mentioned (col. 905), and so again with respect to the wife of Uriah and to Ruth. But the discrepancies occupy a sufficiently large space to give the name to the whole. Thus the words διαφωνεῖν, διαφωνία, occur again and again (col. 893, 933, 952, 960, 965, 972, 992, 1012); and in one quotation (col. 1008) we are referred to "the treatise addressed to Marinus concerning the apparent discrepancy in the Gospels respecting the resurrection." The two treatises combined moreover give the three books which Latini ascribes to the work de Diaphonia.

We have seen that Eusebius, in the seventh book of the Demonstratio, refers to the Quaestiones ad Stephanum, as already published. But on the other hand there is a reference to the Demonstratio, as already written, in this work itself (col. 912 ὥστε οὐκ συνεστήσαμεν ἐν ταῖς εὐαγγελικαῖς ἀποδείξεσιν), the passage referred to being Dem. Ev. i. 3. How are we to explain these cross references? Are we to assume that they were inserted later, as we find to have been the case elsewhere (e.g. in Plutarch's Lives; see Clinton, Fast. Rom. i. p. 99)? If so, we must give up any attempt to arrange the chronology of Eusebius's writings in despair. But we are not driven to this. The first book of the Demonstratio may have been published before these Quaestiones, but the seventh book after them. Or again, another and a more probable solution offers itself. The reference to the Demonstratio is in the epitome (the corresponding part of the unabridged work not being preserved). If therefore we suppose that this epitome was made at a later date by Eusebius himself, or under his direction, the difficulty disappears. We have seen that he pursued this course with regard to the Martyrs of Palestine; and there are indications of the same thing here. The epitome is at a mere abridgment; but sentences are occasionally inserted to make the meaning more clear. There is however some difficulty in maintaining the relation of the two works, owing to the fact that a writer quoting from the larger work will himself sometimes omit sentences which seem alien to his purpose. The Quaestiones ad Stephanum contained two books in its original form, but there is no trace of a division into books in the epitome. It comprises sixteen questions. In the Quaestiones ad Marinum there are only four questions in the epitome. Mai believes that he has recovered nearly the whole of this latter work (col. 983); but we may reasonably doubt this. The epitome is entitled "A Selection in Brief" (ἐκλογὴ ἐν συντομίᾳ); and it may not only have abridged the solutions but omitted some of the questions. In one quotation we are referred to the thirteenth chapter (col. 1009), and a chapter would naturally correspond to a question.

The work professes to be written in answer to questions asked and difficulties propounded by Stephanus and Marinus respectively (e.g. col. 983, 992, 993, 925, 937). Where a question is stated anonymously (e.g. col. 1005 φαίνεται δ' ἄν τις), this may perhaps be a change made by the author who cites the passage of Eusebius. The writer quotes the second part as "the epistle to Marinus" (col. 1013), but there is no trace of the epistolary form. Who Stephanus and Marinus were, we have no information. Eusebius addresses the former as "his son Stephanus, the most holy [ιερότατος] and studious [φιλοσοφώτατος] of men" (col. 936); the latter as his "son Marinus, most valued by him, and most studious" (col. 937). A certain Stephanus held the see of Antioch for a short time after the expulsion of Eustathius (see above, p. 315), being put forward by the Arian party (see H. E. iii. 20; Socr. H. E. ii. 26; Hieron. Chron. p. 192, Schöne). One Marinus appears as bishop of Palmyra, and another as bishop of Emesa in Palestine, in the lists of the Nicene council.

The work exhibits the characteristic hesitation of Eusebius in a somewhat aggravated form. Alternative solutions are frequently offered, and he does not decide between them. But it is suggestive and full of interest. It is valuable also as preserving large fragments of Africanus (col. 990, 966), besides some important notices, such as the absence of Mark xvi. 9-16 from the most numerous and best MSS (col. 937). From this great storehouse of information on the subject later harmonists of the Gospels plundered freely, and often without acknowledgment. Eusebius's letters on certain difficulties in the Gospels (Epist. 59, 120) are largely drawn from it. The unacknowledged obligations of Ambrose to St. Lake and of Jerome on St. Matthew are pointed out in an appendix by Mai (Script. Vet. Lat. Coll. i. 1, p. 101 sq.). Isidore of Pelusium (Epist. ii. 212, p. 220) plagiarizes whole sentences from it (col. 957). And so in like manner later writers.

A DOCTRINAL.

(26) General Elementary Introduction (Ἡ ἐκλογὴ στοιχειώδης Εἰσαγωγή) [Op. iv. 1271]. The title of this work is given in the Eclog. Proph. ii. 1 (p. 97, Gaisford), iv. 35 (p. 236). The Prophetic Extracts themselves formed the sixth, seventh, eighth, and ninth books of it, and Eusebius promises to deal in the tenth with the errors of "the godless heresies" (iv. 35). The purport of this lost tenth book may be gathered from certain passages in the extant Extracts, especially iii. 9 (restored by Selwyn, Journ. of Philol. iv. p. 277), where he speaks of the Marcionites on the one hand, and the Artemonites, Samosatenes, Ebionites, etc., on the other, as being refuted by the prophet's language (comp. iv. 22). It would form a sequel to the Extracts themselves, and in it our author would discuss the false Christology of these heretics, and perhaps also their views of the relation between the Old and New Testaments. Five fragments of this work have been published by Mai (Script. Vet. viii. pp. 95, 100; Bibl. Nov. Patr. iv. p. 316), being included in the Res Sacrae of Leontius and Joannes, a collection of extracts. These fragments all profess to be taken from different parts (ἐκ τοῦ α', ἐκ τοῦ δ', ἐκ τοῦ ι') τῆς α' εἰσαγωγῆς (ἐπιστολῆς is doubtless a scribe's error in the case of the fifth fragment). Mai explains this to mean the First Introduction, and hence concludes that there were two works at least bearing the name. But this is improbable. All the fragments deal with analogous topics, having reference to general principles of ethics, etc., and it is therefore more probable that the "first book of the introduction" is intended, so that ἐκ τοῦ α', etc. will denote the chapters in the book. This work seems to have been a general introduction to theology, and its contents were very miscellaneous, as the extant remains shew. The Prophetic Extracts is perhaps not the only treatise known to us by another name, which was incorporated in this introduction. The work may have comprised an introduction to the study of the Bible, and, if so, the Vitae Prophetarum would find a fit place in it.

(27) Prophetical Extracts (Προφητικαὶ Ἐκλογαί, or more fully, αἱ περὶ τοῦ Χριστοῦ προφητικαὶ ἐκλογαί. 1 praef.) [Op. iv. 1017 sq.]. The date of this work is fixed approximately by the fact that the persecution is mentioned as still raging (i. 8, p. 26). It must therefore have been written before A.D. 313. On the other hand, it contains a distinct reference to the Chronicle (praef. p. 2); but this difficulty may be met by the hypothesis of an earlier edition of the Chronicle (see above, p. 322). Our treatise itself is referred to in the History (i. 2 ἐν οἰκείοις ὑπομνήμασι τὰς περὶ τοῦ σωτῆρος ἡμῶν Ἰησοῦ Χριστοῦ προφητικὰς ἐκλογὰς συναγαγόντες). It contains extracts of prophetical passages from the Old Testament relating to our Lord's person and work, with explanatory comments, and comprises four books, of which the first is devoted to the historical books of the Old Testament, the second to the Psalms, the third to the remaining poetical books and the other prophets, the fourth to Isaiah. The author's main object, as he explains it, is to shew that the prophets spoke of Jesus Christ as the pre-existent Word, who is "a second cause of the universe and God and Lord," and that they predicted His two advents (pp. 4, 5). Thus the personality of the Logos is the leading idea in his treatment of the prophecies in this work. The preface is unfortunately mutilated. If it had been perfect, we should probably have known more of his design in undertaking it, and of his view of its relations to his other works. It was incorporated in his Elementary Introduction, as we have seen (p. 339).

This work was first published by Gaisford (Oxon. 1842) from a Vienna MS; but before this Lambeck had given an account of it in his Comm. de Bibl. Caesar. Vindob. III. iii. p. 201 (ed. Kollar; see also Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vii. p. 314 sq.), and had identified the authorship from the reference to the Chronicle in the preface, though the MS is mutilated at the beginning, so that the title is wanting. The MS is mutilated in other parts besides, and there are many obvious misreadings. Several emendations are given by the late Prof. Selwyn, who had some thoughts of preparing a new edition, in the Journal of Philology, iv. p. 275 sq. (1872). Migne's text is merely a reprint from Gaisford.

(28) Defence of Origen (Ἀπολογία ὑπὲρ Ὀριγένους). This was the joint work of Pamphilus and Eusebius. The joint authorship is distinctly attested by Eusebius himself (H. E. vi. 33), by Socrates (H. E. iii. 7), by an anonymous writer of the 6th century who collected the Synodic Epistles (Epist. 198), and by Photius (Bibl. 118; comp. 117). This last writer is explicit as regards the portions executed by the two friends. The work, he tells us, comprised six books, of which the first five were written by Pamphilus in his prison with the assistance of Eusebius, and the sixth was added by Eusebius to complete the work after the death of Pamphilus. The first five books therefore were written A.D. 307–309, and the sixth probably soon afterwards.

Of the authorship then there can be no doubt. But the matter was overclouded by an ignoble controversy which raged at the close of the 4th century. In the year 397 Rufinus, at the request of Macarius, translated the first book of this Apology (Rufin. adv. Hieron. i. 582). In his translation he entitled it a work of Pamphilus, suppressing the name of Eusebius. It is very possible that he was not acting arbitrarily in this. The first book may have been so largely the work of Pamphilus that the name of Eusebius was not put forward in it. Perhaps the part of Eusebius in this book was confined to the collection and arrangement of the extracts from Origen. At all events, in the version of Rufinus the name of Pamphilus is prefixed to all the explanations which introduce and connect the passages of Origen, and in the prefatory dedication the writer uses the first person singular, "mihi," "habeo," and so also in the body of the work. When Rufinus's quarrel with Jerome broke out, this was a main charge brought against him by the latter. Jerome maintained that Eusebius was the real author of the work; that Rufinus had deliberately substituted the name of the honoured martyr for that of the tainted Arian, so as to conciliate his readers and thus recommend the heresies of Origen; and that he had altered the book in parts and introduced more orthodox expressions; c. Rufin. i. 8 sq. (Op. ii. p. 464 sq., Vallarsi), ii. 15 sq. (ib. p. 505 sq.), ii. 23 (ib. p. 516 sq.), iii. 12 (ib. p. 541 sq.), iii. 37 (ib. p. 563), Epist. 84 (Op. i. p. 531 sq.), Epist. 133 (ib. p. 1081). In his Catalogus (written A.D. 392) Jerome had supposed that Pamphilus and Eusebius had written two separate works in defence of Origen. Of Pamphilus (§ 75) he there says, "scripsit, antequam Eusebius Caesariensis scriberet, Apologeticum pro Origene," while to Eusebius (§ 81) he attributes "ἀπολογία pro Origene libri sex." In his controversy with Rufinus he excuses himself for this error, pleading that he was misled by the title of Rufinus's translation, and asserting that he had afterwards made diligent search and found in the library at Caesarea a copy of this work, which bore the name of Eusebius (c. Rufin. iii. 12). Jerome's treatment of this matter is a painful exhibition of disingenuousness, self-contradiction, ill-humour, and spite. Indeed he can only be acquitted of direct and conscious dishonesty on the supposition of carelessness so gross as to be criminal under the circumstances. His main points are:—(1) That Rufinus tampered with his author to make him appear more orthodox. Here indeed he has a prima facie case. Rufinus elsewhere shews himself anything but an accurate and conscientious translator, being far more careful about the elegance of the version than the meaning of the original; and he would hardly scruple to alter expressions if the fit was upon him. But we have the negative testimony of Photius, who has a keen scent for heresy and yet makes no complaint of this Apology, that it was in the main orthodox in the original Greek, as it is in Rufinus's translation. (2) That Pamphilus cannot have been the author, because Eusebius in his Life of Pamphilus says that the martyr "ipse quidem proprii operis nihil omnino scripsit, exceptis epistolis," etc. (c. Rufin. i. 9). But the existence of a work which consisted mainly of extracts from Origen with comments, and of which even thus he was only joint author, is quite reconcilable with this statement. Indeed the very form of the expression in the original, corresponding to "ipse quidem," "proprii," was probably chosen so as to exclude this work of compilation and partnership. (3) That the copy in the Caesarean library bore the name of Eusebius. What foundation in fact there may have been for this statement, we cannot say; but occurring, as it does, in the midst of so much disingenuous sophistry, it deserves no credit as against the distinct statement of Eusebius himself (H. E. vi. 33), not to mention other well-informed and careful writers. This avowal of Eusebius, by the way, is entirely ignored by Jerome, though he must have known of it. Nor indeed are Jerome's chronological statements easy to explain. The Catalogus was written A.D. 392; the translation of the Apology for Origen by Rufinus appeared not before A.D. 397. Yet Jerome implies (c. Rufin. ii. 23) that he was misled by Rufinus into ascribing the work to Pamphilus, "ita putans esse, ut a te et tuis discipulis fuerat divulgatum." His memory was very short indeed, for he wrote these words about A.D. 402.

The original of this work has perished, but the first book survives in the translation of Rufinus (printed in Origen, Op. iv. App. p. 17 sq. Delarue). Eusebius (H. E. vi. 3) says that the work was undertaken to refute "captious detractors" (φιλαυτίων); and in the preface mention is made of certain "imperitissimi omnium obtrectatores ejus." The person especially meant was probably Methodius, who had written two works against Origen (Hieron. Vir. III. 93; Socr. II. E. vi. 13), and was attacked by name in the sixth book of this Apology (Hieron. c. Apol. i. 11). It was dedicated, as we have seen (p. 312), to the confessors of Palestine, more especially to Patermuthius (Phot. Bibl. 118) who himself suffered martyrdom the year after Pamphilus (Euseb. Mart. Pal. 13). The first book contains an exposition of Origen's principles generally, and then more especially of his doctrines respecting the Trinity and the Incarnation; after which nine special charges against him are refuted, relating to the nature of Christ, the resurrection of the dead, the metempsychosis, etc. In one of the later books the doctrine of fatalism was discussed (Rufin. Apol. i. 11, in Hieron. Op. ii. p. 582). Elsewhere also it was shewn that Origen in his mystical explanation of Adam and Eve, as referring to Christ and the Church, only followed the traditional interpretation (Socr. H. E. iii. 7). In the same spirit precedents were quoted from earlier writers for his doctrines of the pre-existence of the soul and the restitution of all things (Anon. Synod. Epist. l. c.). This Apology also contained a full account of the life of Origen from first to last (Phot. Bibl. 118). Eusebius himself refers to the second book for accounts of the controversy which arose about his ordination to the priesthood and of his contributions to sacred letters (H. E. vi. 23), and to the sixth book for the letters which Origen wrote to Fabianus and others in defence of his orthodoxy (H. E. 36), besides elsewhere referring to the work generally for the part taken by Origen in the theological controversies of the time (H. E. vi. 33). Socrates (H. E. iv. 27) also states that the panegyric of Gregory Thaumaturgus on Origen was given in this Apology. The statement of Praedestinatus (Haer. i. 43; comp. 42), that Pamphilus in his Apology defended Origen on the ground that the errors laid to his charge were not propounded by him, but by two heretical namesakes, is unworthy of credit. This same writer also represents Pamphilus as asserting that Origen's works were interpolated by the heretics (Haer. i. 22), but here he is probably confusing Pamphilus with Ibas. Antipater of Bostra wrote a Refutation of this Apology (ἀντίρρησις τῆς Εὐσεβίου . . . ἐπὶ τῶν ὁριζήσεως ἀπολογίας); see Fabric. Bibl. Graec. x. p. 518, ed. Harles, where however it is entitled without any authority, Contra Pamphilum Apologiam. A passage of this refutation was read at the Second Council of Nicaea, A.D. 787 (Labbe, Conc. viii. p. 1017, ed. Codd.). It treats Eusebius as the author and does not mention Pamphilus; but for this there was a strong motive. The Apology for Origen is mentioned among the works of Eusebius by Eusebius (Assem. Bibl. Orient. iii. 19). On this work see Delarue, Orig. Op. iv. 2, p. 3 sq.; Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vii. p. 301 sq.

(29) Against Marcellus, Bishop of Ancyra (ἐπὶ Μαρκελλοῦ τοῦ Ἀγκύρας ἐπισκόπου), in two books [Op. vi. p. 709 sq.]. The occasion of writing is explained by Eusebius himself (c. Marc. ii. 4, p. 55 sq.). Marcellus had been condemned of Sabellianism, and deposed by the synod of Constantinople (A.D. 336), which was composed chiefly of the Arian friends of Eusebius (see above, p. 317). This work was undertaken at the instance of these friends to justify the action of the council. Certain persons considered that Marcellus had been unfairly treated, and as he himself was partly responsible for the decision, he felt bound to uphold its justice. This work aims simply at exposing the views of Marcellus. He describes Marcellus as being moved by envy and hatred to write the book against Asterius, which had drawn down upon him the condemnation of the synod (i. 1, p. 1; i. 4, p. 56). "Malice is blind," he writes (i. 4, p. 59), and hence the errors of Marcellus. He accuses him of seasoning his work with fulsome flatteries of Constantine, and thus attempting, though in vain, to poison the imperial ear (ii. 4, p. 115). The indignation of Eusebius is especially aroused by the attacks which Marcellus had made upon the names of the honoured dead, upon his dear friend "the thrice blessed" Paulinus bishop of Tyre, and upon his great hero, the saintly scholar Origen (i. 4, pp. 38 sq., 43 sq., 56). He felt bound in honour also to repel the assaults made upon his namesake of Nicomedia, "the great Eusebius" (i. 4, p. 38 sq.) This treatment of revered names was aggravated by a personal attack upon himself (i. 4, pp. 52, 57).¹ Accordingly he gives instances of the blunders of Marcellus. He adduces examples of false readings and misquotations (i. 2, p. 24 sq.). He accuses him of miscalling books, as when he speaks of the Proverbs as "prophecies" (ib. p. 27). He is especially and justly severe upon his exegetical blunders; e.g. when in Zech. iii. 1 he confuses Joshua the son of Josedek with Joshua the son of Nun (i. 2, p. 18 sq.); or when he interprets the expressions of Col. i. 16 as referring to the incarnation and human life of Christ (ii. 3, p. 88 sq.); or when he explains Prov. viii. 22 sq. in the same way, supposing the "abysses" to be the "hearts of the saints," and the "mountains and hills" to be "the apostles and the successors of the apostles" (ii. 3, p. 91 sq.); or when, with the same motive, in Ps. cix (cx). 3 he interprets "before the morning star" (LXX) as referring to the star which appeared to the magi. These instances shew that the exegesis of Marcellus was hopelessly bad; and yet Eusebius himself is far from faultless in this respect, e.g. when he understands Gal. iii. 19, 20, to refer to Christ as the mediator at the giving of the law, and thus to imply His pre-existence (i. 1, p. 14 sq.). His theological gravamen against Marcellus is briefly summed up in the concluding words: "He confesses neither beginning nor end of the Son of God in accordance with piety" (μήτε ἀρχὴν μήτε τέλος εὐσεβὲς ὁμολογεῖ τοῦ υἱοῦ τοῦ Θεοῦ, ii. 4, p. 116); or, in other words, he does not allow the pre-existence of the Son as a distinct personality before the Incarnation, and he denies the future reign of Christ in His humanity.

(30) On the Theology of the Church, a Refutation of Marcellus (πρὸς Μαρκελλόν ἑλεγχοί . . . περὶ τῆς ἐκκλησιαστικῆς θεολογίας), in three books [Op. vi. p. 824 sq.]. The reasons which induced him to write this additional work are explained in a letter to Flaccillus, bishop of Antioch, prefixed to it, and in the opening sentences of the work itself. He had thought it sufficient in the first instance merely to expose the opinions of Marcellus, without directly refuting them (διὰ τῶν ἀντιρρήσεων), thus leaving them to condemn themselves. But on further reflexion, fearing lest some might be drawn away "from the theology of the church" by their very length and pretentiousness, he had undertaken to refute them. Just as Marcellus had comprised his prolix work in a single book, as he himself alleged, that it might be a testimony to the unity of God which the Arians impugned, so Eusebius divides his reply into three books, that its very form may be a protest on behalf of the distinct personalities in the Blessed Trinity which Marcellus had confused. He undertakes therefore to shew that not a single Scripture favours the view of Marcellus, but that, according to the approved interpretations, they all are dead against him. Having done this, he will expound the true theology respecting our Saviour, as it has been handed down in the Church from the beginning. Thus, as explained by its author, the aim of this second treatise is refutation, as that of the first was exposure. While the first was mainly personal, the second is chiefly dogmatical.

Whatever may be thought of the opinions of Eusebius himself, it can hardly be questioned that he makes good his case against Marcellus. "He shews himself," writes Eusebius (Eccl. Theol. ii. 3, p. 203), "either a Jew or a Sabellius"; i.e. he is either Ebionite or Monarchian. Accordingly he calls him at one time "a downright Jew" (ib. ii. 2, p. 201), at another "a new Sabellius" (ib. i. 20, p. 165); and these charges, especially the latter, are flung at him again and again. Though Marcellus himself perhaps did not intend it, his recklessness of language could only be interpreted as maintaining opinions which had a dangerous approximation to these extreme forms of heresy. The quotations given by Eusebius speak for themselves. At the council of Sardica indeed (about A.D. 346), he was reinstated after making explanations. He had been led into his heretical statements by his hatred of Arianism, and the Athanasian bishops who were dominant at Sardica would be predisposed to take the most lenient view of one who had suffered in the cause. The synod denounces "the base artifice (κακοτεχνία) of the party of Eusebius"; the statements which Marcellus had made "as an enquirer" (ὡς ζητῶν . . . εἰρηκε) they had "accused as if they were his avowed opinions" (ὡς ὁμολογούμενα διαβεβλήκασιν); Athan. Ap. c. Arian. 47 (Op. i. p. 130). Though no direct mention is made of Eusebius of Caesarea (for the person named is, as usual, the bishop of Nicomedia), yet we must suppose that this language was directed, at least in part, against the polemical treatises of the former against Marcellus. This vague language of palliation does not meet the facts as they stand out in the extracts of Eusebius;¹ but the bishops of Sardica doubtless read the written treatise by the light of the subsequent personal explanation. When moreover we remember that Basil and Hilary and Chrysostom all condemned Marcellus as heretical, and that Athanasius himself in after years, when questioned on the point by Epiphanius (Haer. lxxii. 4), smiled a significant smile, but said nothing, and is even stated by one authority to have excommunicated him before the more pronounced heresy of his pupil Photinus cast back its light on the teaching of the master (Hilar. Op. ii. p. 639), we shall be the less disposed to allow that Eusebius misread or misinterpreted the extracts which he gives.

Neither of the two works against Marcellus is mentioned by Jerome or by Photinus. Socrates (H. E. i. 36, ii. 20, 21) is acquainted with the de Ecclesiastica Theologia, though he does not give it this title, but refers to it as a work in three books "Against Marcellus." He quotes (H. E. ii. 21) passages from the first and third books, so that there is no doubt about the identity of the work. Of the previous work Against Marcellus, in two books, he betrays no knowledge; and from his language respecting the other it must be inferred that he was not acquainted with it.

The two treatises were first edited by Bishop R. Montague (Montacutus) with a translation and notes (Paris, 1628) at the end of the Demonstratio, and this edition was reprinted (Lips. 1688). The best edition is that of Gaisford (Oxon. 1852), where they are in the same volume with the work Against Hierocles. He revised the text and reprinted the translation and notes of Montague. The fragments of Marcellus are collected by Rettberg (Marcelliana, Götting. 1794). The monographs on Marcellus, especially Zahn's Marcellus von Ancyra (Gotha, 1867), are useful aids to the study of these treatises.

(31) On the Paschal Festival [Op. vi. 694]. Eusebius (Vit. Const. iv. 35, 36) states that he addressed to Constantine "a mystical explanation of the significance of the festival" (μυστικὴ ἀνακάλυψις τοῦ τῆς ἑορτῆς λόγου), upon which the emperor wrote in reply, expressing himself greatly delighted, and saying that it was a difficult undertaking "to expound in a becoming way the reason and origin of the Paschal festival, as well as its profitable and painful consummation" (τὴν τε τοῦ πάσχα αἰτιολογίαν τε καὶ γένεσιν, λυσitteλῇ τε καὶ ἐπίπονον τελεσιουργίαν where αἰτιολογίαν is doubtless correct, though Heinichen prefers ἀντιλογία, "the controversy"). He added that Eusebius had found no incompetent translator, although it was impossible for a version to do justice to the original. The work therefore had been already translated into Latin, if we are right in so interpreting the very obscure language of Constantine. This letter was written about A.D. 335. A long fragment of this treatise was discovered by Mai in the Catena of Nicetas of Serrae on St. Luke, contained in a Vatican MS, and published by him not take up this position. He accuses Marcellus of denying the pre-existence, not of the Word of God, but of the Son of God, before the Incarnation; and this distinction between the Word and the Son is the very pivot of the controversy.

(see Bibl. Nov. Patr. iv. p. 208). From a comparison it appears that some portions of this fragment had been already published by Cordier as a Latin version of his own in his Catena as this evangelist. There can be no doubt about the identity of this with the work mentioned above, as it corresponds to the description given by Luchian and Constantine. The recovered fragment contains—(1) A declaration of the figurative character of the Jewish Passover. (2) An account of its institution and of the ceremonial itself. (3) An explanation of the typical significance of the different parts of the ceremonial, with reference to their Christian counterparts. (4) A brief statement of the settlement of the question at Nicaea. (5) An argument shewing that Christians are not bound to observe the time of the Jewish festival, mainly on the ground that it was not the Jewish Passover which our Lord Himself kept.

Of this treatise Jerome makes no mention in his list of the works of Eusebius (Vir. Ill. 81); not in an earlier chapter (ib. 61), when speaking of Hippolytus, he states that Eusebius "composed a treatise for the Paschal festival, a cycle of ninety years, that is, an ἐννεακἀετηρίς." The bearing of this notice on the transactions of the council of Nicaea has been already discussed (p. 313). Here it is sufficient to say that, though the extant portion of our treatise contains nothing of the kind, this cycle is very likely to have found a place in it, either as an appendix or in the body of the work.

I. ORATIONS AND SERMONS.

(32) At the Dedication of the Church in Tyre. This oration is inserted by Eusebius in his History (i. 4). In this way it has been preserved. The heading which it bears in the MSS (whether due to Eusebius himself or not, we cannot say) is, "Panegyric over the Building of the Churches, addressed to Paulinus, Bishop of the Tyrians." The circumstances under which it was delivered have been already mentioned (p. 312). The new basilica at Tyre was one of the most important and splendid buildings which arose after peace was restored to the Church; and Eusebius seizes the occasion to emphasize the greatness of the epoch. He addresses Paulinus as a Bezaleel, a Solomon, a Zerubbabel, as a new Aaron or Melchizedek. He applies to the occasion the predictions of the Jewish prophets foretelling the rebuilding of the temple and the restoration of the polity. He pours out his thanksgiving for the triumph of Christ, the Word of God, who has proved mightier than the mightiest of kings. This magnificent temple, which has arisen from the ruins of its predecessor, is a token of His power. Then follows an elaborate description of the building itself. This material building, continues the orator, is a symbol of the spiritual church of Tyre, of the spiritual Church throughout the world, in its history, its overthrow, its dissolution, its re-erection on a more splendid scale, as well as in the arrangement of its several parts. But the spiritual Church on earth is itself only a faint image of the heavenly Zion, where the adoring hosts sing the praises of their King without ceasing.

(33) At the Vicennalia of Constantine (λόγος δεκαετηρικός), A.D. 325. This oration, which is not extant, is mentioned Vit. Const. proem. in 11. It seems to have been the opening address at the Council of Nicaea, as stated above, p. 313.

(34) On the Sepulchre of the Saviour, A.D. 335. It is mentioned, Vit. Const. iv. 33, 46 sq. The circumstances under which this oration was delivered have been already described, p. 318. Eusebius (V. C. iv. 47) promises to append it to his Life of Constantine; but if he ever fulfilled his promise, it has been dissevered and is lost.

(35) At the Tricennalia of Constantine (λόγος τριακοετηρικός), A.D. 335 or 336 [Op. ii. 1315]. This is the work commonly called de Laudibus Constantini. Eusebius promises to append it (with the oration last mentioned) to his Life of Constantine (V. C. iv. 46); and accordingly it is found at the end of the MSS of this work, where it bears the title εἰς Κωνσταντῖνον τὸν βασιλέα τριακοετηρικός. It is mentioned also in the preface to the same work. The circumstances under which it was delivered have been already given, p. 317 sq. As on other similar occasions, Eusebius makes this oration a vehicle for the communication of theological teaching, more especially from the apologetic side. Referring to this speech, he describes himself in one passage as "weaving tricennial wreaths of words" and "crowning the sacred head" of the emperor therewith (V. C. proem.), in another as "glorifying God the universal King" (V. C. iv. 46). The two passages combined justly describe the purport and contents of the oration. It falls into two parts, of which the first (§§ 1-10) has a more special reference to the emperor and the festival, while the second (§§ 11-18) is a theological exposition on the person and work of the Logos. There is this difference also, that, whereas in the first part Constantine is spoken of throughout in the third person, in the latter part he is directly addressed. In a MS in the library of Trinity College Cambridge (B. 9. 6), where this oration appears by itself (without the Life of Constantine), the two parts are separated; and the heading is repeated before the second. It is difficult to resist the conclusion that the two parts were delivered at separate times. Though the second part forms no unfit sequel to the first, and was doubtless written with this view, yet each part is complete in itself.

The orator, taking occasion from the festival, begins to speak of the Almighty Sovereign, and the Divine Word through whom He administers the universe (§ 1). The emperor is a sort of reflexion of the Supreme Word. The monarchy on earth is the counterpart of the monarchy in heaven (§§ 2, 3). The Word is the interpreter of the Invisible God in all things (§ 4). An emperor who is sensible of his dependence on God, like Constantine, is alone fit to rule (§ 5). Periods and divisions of time are from God, as is all order throughout the universe. The number thirty (3×10) has a special significance in the language of symbolism. It reminds us of the kingdom of glory (§ 6). The powers of wickedness, and the sufferings of the saints, were ended by Constantine, the champion and representative of God (§ 7). He waged war against idolatry, profligacy, and superstition (§ 8). What a change has been suddenly wrought! The false gods did not foresee their fate. The emperor, armed with piety, advanced against them and overthrew them. Churches rise from the ground everywhere (§ 8). The truth is proclaimed far and wide (§ 9).

"Come now [ἔπε δὴ], most mighty victor Constantine," says the orator, "let me lay before thee the mysteries of sacred doctrines in this royal discourse concerning the Supreme King of the Universe." Accordingly he proceeds to speak of the person and working of the Divine Word, as the mediator in the creation and government of the universe. The error of polytheism is condemned. As God is one, so His Word is one (§§ 11, 12). Humanity, led astray by demons and steeped in ignorance and sin, needed the advent of the Word (§ 13). It was necessary too that He should come clothed in a body (§ 14). His death and resurrection also were indispensable, that He might accomplish the redemption of men (§ 15). The power of the Divine Word was evinced by the establishment of the Church and the spread of the gospel (§ 16). It was manifested in our own time by the faith of the martyrs, by the triumph of the Church over oppression, and by the punishment of the persecutors themselves (§ 17). We have evidence of the divine origin of our faith in the prophetic announcements of Christ's coming, and in the fulfilment of His own predictions; more especially the coincidence in time between the establishment of the Roman empire and the publication of the Gospel (§ 18).

Nearly the whole of the 8th chapter, describing Constantine's suppression of the profligacies of pagan worship, appears word for word in Vit. Const. iii. 54, 55. Eusebius may have been already engaged on his Life of Constantine, which appeared within a few years after this oration was delivered. Again, the theological portion of the speech reappears almost verbatim, though with great differences in the arrangement, in the Theophania. The inference from this fact has been already stated, p. 332 sq.

(36) In Praise of the Martyrs. The catalogue of Ebedjesu (Assem. Bibl. Orient. iii. p. 19) mentions an oration on this subject in addition to the History of the Martyrs. Assemani (ib. i. p. 184) attempted to shew that this work was an account of the Eastern (i.e. Persian) martyrs, as the other was of the Western (i.e. Palestinian); but the language of Ebedjesu ("also a History of Constantine; also of the Western martyrs, also a Speech on their praises") will not admit this interpretation. The question however is set at rest by the discovery of the discourse itself in a Syriac version. It is preserved in the same MS (dated A.D. 411), which contains also the Theophania and Martyrs of Palestine (Wright's Catal. Syr. MSS Brit. Mus. p. 632), where it bears the same title as in Ebedjesu. It has been published in the Journal of Sacred Literature, N. S. v. p. 403 sq., with a translation by Mr. B. H. Cowper, ib. vi. p. 129 sq. The discourse is short and of little value; but it is worthy of notice that the orator (p. 133) mentions, among those whom he invites his hearers to commemorate, almost every bishop of Antioch from the closing years of the second century onward to his own time, Asclepiades, Serapion, Philetus, Zebinas, Demetrius, Flavianus (Fabianus?), Cyrillus, Babylas, so that it would seem to have been delivered at Antioch.

(37) On the Failure of Rain, mentioned by Ebedjesu (l. c.), but apparently not elsewhere.

Its theme may have been the incident of 1 Kings xvii, xviii, or perhaps some contemporary event.

F. LETTERS.

(38) To Alexander, bishop of Alexandria, on behalf of Arius and his friends (see above, p. 312), complaining that they have been misrepresented. A fragment is preserved in the proceedings of the Second Council of Nicaea, act. vi (Labbe, Conc. viii. pp. 1147, 1149, ed. Colet.). It is added to these proceedings that other letters of Eusebius to Alexander "are extant [ῥέπονται], in which have been found many blasphemies vindicating the party of Arius."

(39) To Euphrasion (sometimes written incorrectly Euphrasion), bishop of Balanea in Syria, a strong opponent of the Arians (Athan. de Fug. 3, Op. i. p. 254; Hist. Ar. ad Mon. 5, ib. p. 274), who was present at the Council of Nicaea. Athanasius refers to this letter as declaring plainly that Christ is not true God (de Synod. 17, Op. i. p. 584). An extract (containing the passage to which doubtless Athanasius refers) is quoted at the Second Council of Nicaea (l. c.). It insists strongly on the subordination of the Son.

(40) To Constantia Augusta [Op. ii. 1545], the sister of Constantine and wife of Licinius, who was closely allied with the Arians [CONSTANTIA]. Two fragments of this letter are preserved in the proceedings of the Second Council of Nicaea, act. vi (Labbe, Conc. viii. p. 1144 sq.), and many more in the Antirrhetica of Nicephorus the Patriarch (iv. 9 sq. in Spicil. Solesm. i. p. 283 sq.), who took an active part against the Iconoclasts. From the quotations in this latter writer (then unpublished) the letter to Constantia was pieced together by Boivin in his notes to Niceph. Gregor. Hist. Byz. xix. 3 (see ii. p. 1301 sq., ed. Bonn), from whom it is reprinted in Spicil. Solesm. l. c., and by Migne, Op. ii. p. 1543. It seems to be nearly complete, wanting little besides the beginning and end. There is no ground for questioning its genuineness, though this is done by Petavius, Theol. Dogm. de Incarn. xv. 14. 9, and by Lee (Theophania p. lxxii), who ascribes it to Eusebius of Nicomedia. Constantia had asked Eusebius to send her a certain likeness of Christ, of which she had heard. He rebukes her for making the request, saying that such representations are inadequate in themselves, and tend to idolatry. He states that a foolish woman (γύναϊόν τι) had brought him two likenesses, which might be philosophers, but were alleged by her to represent St. Paul and the Saviour. He did not know how she had come by them; but he had detained them lest they should prove a stumbling-block to her or to others. He reminds Constantia that St. Paul declares his intention of "knowing Christ no longer after the flesh." This noble letter has done more than any of his writings to injure his reputation. It was adduced by the Iconoclasts in their favour, and their opponents were thus provoked to rake up all the questionable expressions in his writings, that they might blacken his character for orthodoxy.

(41) To the Church of Caesarea [Op. ii. 1535], written from Nicaea (A.D. 325) during or immediately after the council to vindicate his conduct. This letter is preserved by Athanasius as an appendix to the de Decret. Syn. Nic. (Op. i. p. 187; comp. § 3, ib. p. 166); in Socrates, ll. E

i. 8; in Theodoret, H. E. i. 11; in Gelasius Cyz. Est. Conc. Nic. ii. 34 sq. (Labbe, Conc. ii. 264 sq. et. Calet.); in the Historia Tripartita, ii. 11; and in Nicephorus, H. E. viii. 22. On the question, whether it was appended to his work by Athanasius himself, see Cave, Hist. Lit. i. p. 179. The occasion and contents of this letter have been discussed already (p. 313). Gelasius (H. C. N. ii. 54) calls it an "encyclical letter." On the other hand Theodoret (l. c.) speaks of it as addressed "to certain persons holding the opinions of Arius." Athanasius (l. c.) however describes it as addressed "to his own church," and so too Socrates, "to the people under him." To the Caesareans doubtless it was written. A passage towards the end of the letter (§§ 9, 10), which savours strongly of Arianism, is wanting in Socrates and in the Historia Tripartita, but appears in the other authorities, and seems certainly to be referred to by Athanasius in two places (de Decr. Syn. Nic. i. l. c.; de Synod. 13, Op. i. p. 581). It is condemned however by Bull (Def. Fid. Nic. iii. 2. 3), and by Cave (Diss. Tert. in Joh. Cleric. p. 58, printed at the end of his Hist. Lit. vol. ii.), as a spurious addition, probably inserted by some Arian. The letter is translated and annotated by Dr. J. H. Newman in Select Treatises of St. Athanasius p. 59 sq. (Oxford, 1853).

In the proceedings of the Second Nicene Council act. vi (Labbe, Conc. viii. 1145), mention is made of "all the letters" of Eusebius, as though a considerable number were then extant. Gelasius of Cyzicus (H. C. N. ii. 1) speaks of a letter which he addressed to the assembly of orthodox bishops in defence of his views; but he is doubtless in error, as no such document is mentioned elsewhere.

In addition to those works of which an account has been given, several other writings are extant, either whole or in part, which claim Eusebius of Caesarea as their author. In 1643 Simon published in Latin fourteen Opuscula asserting this claim, and they have been several times reprinted (Op. vi. 1047, Migne). They are discussed by Tillemont, vii. p. 61 sq.; comp. also Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vii. p. 406 sq. The most important of these are two books, or rather treatises, Against Sabellius. Cave (H. L. i. p. 183) prefers assigning them to Eusebius of Emesa, and Thilo (Ueber die Schriften des Eusebius von Emesa, etc., p. 64 sq.) maintains this position with much force. Tillemont would ascribe the first to Eusebius of Caesarea and the second to Acacius. The remaining twelve works are sermons on the Resurrection, the Ascension, &c. In the Syriac MS Brit. Mus. Add. 17, 142, belonging to the 6th century (see Wright's Catalogue, p. 1042), is a treatise On the Star which appeared to the Magi, ascribed to our Eusebius. It was published by Wright, Journal of Sacred Literature (1866) ix. p. 117, x. p. 150. The authorship is disputed by Ceriani, Nöldeke, Va Gutschmid, and others. From the closer resemblance of the Biblical quotations to the Peshito, than to the LXX, Nöldeke conjectures that it was written originally in Syriac. Epiphanius (Haer. lxi. 21) mentions among other refutations (ἀντιρρήσεις) of the Manicheans one by Eusebius of Caesarea; but no such work is mentioned elsewhere (e.g. in Theod. H. F. i. 26); and we must therefore suppose either that Epiphanius was mistaken or that this refutation was not a separate treatise, but occurred incidentally in some other work. Other writings, attributed to Eusebius, are enumerated as extant, wholly or in part, in manuscript in various libraries by Fabric. Bibl. Graec. vii. pp. 407, 408, Cave, H. L. i. p. 183; and probably several others, not mentioned in these writers, are lying hidden elsewhere. Thus a MS (B. 9. 6) in the library of Trinity College, Cambridge, contains in Latin Sermones Quinque Eusebii Caesariensis Episcopi de Sancto Stephano.

In reviewing the literary history of Eusebius, we are struck first of all with the range and extent of his labours. His extant works, voluminous as they are, must have formed somewhat less than half of his actual writings. No field of theological learning is untouched. He is historian, apologist, topographer, exegete, critic, preacher, dogmatic writer, in turn. And, if the permanent utility of an author's labours may be taken as a test of literary excellence, Eusebius will hold a very high place indeed. The Ecclesiastical History is absolutely unique and indispensable. The Chronicle is the vast storehouse of information relating to the ancient monarchies of the world. The Preparation and Demonstration are the most important contributions to theology in their own province. Even the minor works, such as the Martyrs of Palestine, the Life of Constantine, the Questions addressed to Stephanus and to Marinus, and others, would leave an irreparable blank, if they were obliterated. And the same permanent value attaches also to his more technical treatises. The Canons and Sections have never yet been superseded for their particular purpose. The Topography of Palestine is the most important contribution to our knowledge in its own department. In short, no ancient ecclesiastical writer has laid posterity under heavier obligations.

The explanation of this fact must be sought in some degree in his great erudition. In the History, in the Chronicle, and in the Preparation, he has preserved for us a vast amount of early literature in three several spheres, which would otherwise have been irrecoverably lost. But beyond his learning he deserves the highest credit for the intelligent selection of his subjects. No writer has ever shewn a keener insight in the choice of themes which would have a permanent interest for future generations. He lived on the confines of two epochs, separated from each other by one of those broad lines of demarcation which occur only at intervals of many centuries. He saw the greatness of the crisis; he seized the opportunity; he, and he only, preserved the past in all its phases, in history, in doctrine, in criticism, even in topography, for the instruction of the future.

This is his real title to greatness. As an expositor of facts, or as an abstract thinker, or as a master of style, it would be absurd to compare him with the great names of classical antiquity. His merits and his faults have been already indicated in the criticisms on his several works (pp. 324 sq., 331). His gigantic learning was his master rather than his slave. He had great conceptions, which he was unable adequately to carry out. He had valuable detached thoughts, but he fails in continuity of argument. He was most laborious, and yet most desultory. He accumulated materials with great diligence; he was loose and perfunctory and uncritical in the use of them when accumulated. His style is especially vicious. At times indeed, when he forgets himself in his subject, as, for instance, in his attack on Marcellus, his language is plain and direct enough; but, when his theme seems to him to demand a loftier flight of rhetoric, as in his Life of Constantine, his language becomes hopelessly turgid and unnatural. These two works are especially instructive as examples, because they were written about the same time. Theodorus Metochita (Miscell. 17) propounds the theory that all writers who were brought up in Egypt, contracted a harsh style (τραχύτερον τῷ λέγειν χρῶνται), and he instances Eusebius, who himself states that he had made a long sojourn in that country (τοῖς ἐπ' Αἰγύπτου πάλυ τι χρόνιος συνεπόλησεν). But we need not go so far for an explanation. Athanasius, though an Egyptian, can write with point and clearness. On the other hand the connexion of Eusebius with Egypt was very slight after all (H. E. viii. 7); and his vicious style, so far as it was not inherent in himself, may be ascribed with much greater probability to Syrian and Oriental influences.

One other point deserves notice. While his writings cover so large an area and are so various in character, he is before all things an apologist. His great services in this respect are emphasized by Evagrius (H. E. i. 1 περὶ οὗτος εἶναι τοὺς ἐντυγχάνοντας θρησκεύειν τὰ ἡμέτερα); and doubtless his directly apologetic writings were much more effective than at this distance of time we can realize. But his part as an apologist does not end with his apologetic works. Whatever subject he touches, his thoughts seem to pour instinctively into this same channel. If he takes up the subject of chronology, a main purpose is to shew the superior antiquity of the Hebrew oracles to the wisdom of the Greeks. If he sets himself to write a history of the Church, he does so because he sees in the course of events a vindication of the Divine Word, in whom the faith of the Christian centres. If he selects a theme so purely mundane as the encomium of a sovereign, he soars aloft at once into the region of theology, for he sees in the subject of his panegyric an instrument used by a higher power for the fulfilment of a Divine economy. If he employs himself on a task so essentially technical as the division of the Gospels into sections, his underlying motive is the desire to supply materials for a harmony, and thus to vindicate the essential unity of the evangelical narratives against gainsayers. This character as an apologist was due partly to the epoch in which he lived, and partly to his individual temper and circumstances. To the epoch in which he lived: for his lot was cast in the great crisis of transition; he stood, as it were, on the frontier line between two ages, with one foot in the Hellenism of the past and the other in the Christianity of the future; and by his very position he was constrained to view them face to face, and to discuss their mutual relations. To his individual qualifications: for he was equally learned in the wisdom of the Greeks and in the teaching of the Scriptures, while his breadth of sympathy and moderation of temper fitted him beyond most of his contemporaries for the task of tracing their conflicts and coincidences.

"The grave accusation under which he lies," writes Dr. Newman (Arians, p. 262 sq.) "is not that of Arianizing, but of corrupting the simplicity of the Gospel with an eclectic spirit. While he held out the ambiguous language of the schools as a refuge, and the Alexandrian imitation of it as an argument against the pursuit of the orthodox, his conduct gave countenance to the secular maxim that difference in creeds is a matter of inferior moment, and that, provided we confess as far as the very terms of Scripture, we may speculate as philosophers and live as the world."^m This grave charge of indifference to truth will be dealt with presently. It is sufficient to say here that the characteristic which is thus made the head and front of his offending, was his strong point as a champion of the faith. Like St. Paul on Mars' Hill, he sought out the elements of truth in pre-existing philosophical systems or popular religions; and thus obtaining a foothold, he worked onward in his assault upon paganism. The Greek apologists of the 2nd and 3rd centuries all, without exception, took up this position. It was the signal merit of the great Alexandrian fathers that they did not treat as a mere dead letter the prologue of St. John's Gospel, in which the evangelist identifies the Word, who in the fulness of time became incarnate, with 'the light that lighteth every man.' Eusebius, through his illustrious spiritual ancestors, Origen and Pamphilus, had inherited this tradition from Alexandria. It was the only method which could achieve success in apologetics in an age when Christianity stood face to face with still powerful forms of heathen worship. It is the only method which can hope for victory now, when once again the Gospel is confronted with the dominant and widespread religions of India and the farther East.

X. Character. If we may judge from the silence of his contemporaries—and silence in this case is an important witness—Eusebius commanded general respect by his personal character. With the single exception of the taunt of Potammon, which has been considered already, not a word of accusation is levelled against him in an age when theological controversy was peculiarly reckless and acrimonious. It is difficult to draw with any confidence the portrait of one of whose private acts so little is known. But we seem to see that his character was marked by amiability and moderation. His relations to Pamphilus, more especially, shew a strongly affectionate disposition; and it is more than probable that he was drawn into those public acts from which his reputation has suffered most, by the demands, or what seemed to him to be the demands, of private friendship. His moderation is especially praised, as we have seen (p. 318), by the emperor Constantine; and his speculative opinions, as well as his personal

^m Dr. Newman adds in a note (p. 263), "In this association of the Eusebian with the eclectic temper, it must not be forgotten that Julian the Apostate was the pupil of Eusebius of Nicomedia, his kinsman," etc. It will fill with us all, if we are held responsible for the opinions of the pupils of our brothers and cousins; but there is no reason for believing that Eusebius of Nicomedia was an relation of Eusebius of Caesarea (see above, p. 309).

ack bear out this commendation. "He seems," writes Dr. Newman (Arians, p. 262, 4to. ed.) "to have had the faults and the virtues of the mere man of letters; strongly excited neither to good nor to evil, and careless at once of the cause of truth and the prizes of secular greatness, in comparison of the comforts and decencies of literary ease." If this description had stopped short at the first sentence, it might have been accepted as substantially just; but we may well challenge the fairness of the explanatory clauses. What ground is there for saying that the friend of Pamphilus was not strongly excited to good? How can it be maintained that the laborious apologist of the Gospel, the adversary of Marcellus, was indifferent to the cause of truth? Still less can we accept "the comforts and decencies of literary ease" as the description of a life which was before all things laborious and self-denying. He was not only the most learned and prolific writer of his age; but he administered the affairs of an important diocese, and he took an active part in all the great questions which agitated the Church. Not Athanasius himself was a harder worker in the cause of Christ. From youth to advanced age he laboured with unrelaxing vigour. The self-sacrifices of the man of letters, if he is true to his calling, are not less in extent than those of the man of action, though they may be different in kind.

The excessive admiration of Eusebius for Constantine will be felt to need some apology. Yet it is not difficult to understand how he was led to this exaggerated estimate. Constantine was unquestionably one of the very greatest of the great emperors of Rome. His commanding personality must have been irresistible; and the impression thence derived would be enhanced by his deference towards the leading Christian bishops. The external circumstances of his reign moreover seemed to stamp it with a peculiar grandeur. He had ruled longer than any other emperor since Augustus, the founder of the empire. He had carried out a change in the relations between the Church and the State incomparably greater than any which had preceded, or than any which would follow. Eusebius delighted to place these two great sovereigns in juxtaposition. During the one reign the Word had appeared in the flesh; during the other He had triumphed over the world. The one reign was the counterpart and complement of the other.

II. Theological Opinions. A discussion of the theological opinions of Eusebius is impossible within the limits of an article like the present. Readers who desire to see what may be said on either side, are referred to Baronius (ad ann. 313, c. 38 sq.), Petavius (Dogm. Theol. de Trin. lib. i. cap. xi sq.), Montfaucon (Praelim. in Comm. ad Psa. c. vi), and Tillemont (H. E. vii. p. 67 sq.), among those who have assailed, and Hall (Def. Fid. Nic. ii. 9. 20, iii. 9. 3, 11), Cave (Hist. Lit. ii. app. p. 42 sq.), and Lee (Theopneust. p. xxiv. sq.), among those who have defended, his opinions, from the orthodox point of view. A convenient summary of the controversy will be found in Stein, p. 117 sq. It is clear from the latter list of names (which might be considerably enlarged) that his orthodoxy must be hastily denied. Dr. Newman himself, writing on this point, says that "in his own writings, numerous as they are, there is very little which fixes on Eusebius any charge, beyond that of attachment to the Platonic phraseology. Had he not connected himself with the Arian party, it would have been unjust to have suspected him of heresy" (Arians, p. 262). If we except the works written before the Council of Nicaea, in which there is occasionally much looseness of expression, his language is for the most part strictly orthodox, or at least capable of explanation in an orthodox sense. Against the two main theses of Arius, (1) that the Word was a creature (κτίσμα) like other creatures, and (2) that there was a time when He was not, Eusebius is explicit on the orthodox side (e.g. c. Marc. i. 4, p. 22, de Eccl. Theol. i. 2, 3, p. 61 sq., ib. i. 8, 9, 10, p. 66 sq.). He states in direct language that the Word had no beginning (Theoph. ii. 3, comp. de Laud. Const. 2). If elsewhere he represents the Father as prior to the Son (e.g. Dem. Ev. iv. 3. 5, ὁ δὲ πατὴρ προῦπαρχει τοῦ υἱοῦ καὶ τῆς γενέσεως αὐτοῦ προῦφύστηκεν), this priority is not necessarily intended to be temporal, and in such a case the meaning of the writer must be interpreted by his language in other passages. Nor again do such expressions as "second existence," "second cause," necessarily bear an Arian sense; for they may be taken to imply that subordination which has ever been recognised by the most thoughtful writers on the orthodox side. But though his language might pass muster, "his acts," it is said, "are his confession." This is the strongest point in the indictment. His alliance with the Arian party is indisputable; but the inference drawn from it may be questioned. His friendships lay much among Arians, and he may have made too great concessions to friendship. His natural temper suggested toleration, and the cause of the Arians was, or seemed to be, the cause of comprehension. He had a profound and rooted aversion to the Sabellianism of Marcellus and others, who were acting with Athanasius; and as it was necessary to take one side or the other, he may have ranged himself with Eusebius of Nicomedia and his allies, as the best means of averting this danger which seemed to him to threaten the truth. Where we have no certain information as to the motives which guided him in his conduct, it seems only fair to accept his own statements as final with respect to his opinions.^a

^a "The remark has been made," writes Dr. Newman (Arians, p. 263), "that throughout his Ecclesiastical History, no instance occurs of his expressing abhorrence of the superstitions of Paganism," and that his custom is either to praise, or not to blame, such heretical writers as fall under his notice; and in his note he refers to Kestner, de Euseb. Auctor. proleg. § 17.

If the reader will refer to Kestner, he will find that the passage assumes a different complexion when read in its own context; but this by the way. Nothing could be more erroneous as a statement of facts, than Dr. Newman's language here. Even if it had been true, that there is no abhorrence of paganism expressed in the History, great parts of the Præparatio and Theophania, not to mention the Tricennial Oration and the Life of Constantine, are one continuous and elaborate indictment of the superstitions and horrors of heathendom; so that the comparative silence in the History must be explained by the fact that the mention was not suggested, except incidentally, by his theme. On the other point—the attitude

XII. Posthumous Fame. While the Arian controversy was still fresh, the part taken by Eusebius was remembered against him in the Greek Church, and the mention of him in orthodox fathers is generally depreciatory. But as the direct interest of the dispute wore out, the tide turned and set in his favour. Hence in the fifth century and onwards we find a disposition to clear him of any complicity in Arian doctrine. Thus Socrates (H. E. ii. 21) is at some pains to prove him orthodox, alleging passages out of his works as evidence of catholicity. So again Gelasius of Cyzicus stoutly defends this "most noble tiller of ecclesiastical husbandry," this "strict lover of truth" (ὁ φιλαληθέστατος), as he calls him (H. S. N. ii. 1). He assures his readers that if there be any suggestion, however faint, of Arian heresy (μικρόν τι τὰ Ἀρείου ὑπονοούμενα) in his sayings or writings, it was due to the inadvertence of simplicity (ἐξ ἀπεριέργου ἀπλότητος), and that Eusebius himself pleaded this excuse in self-defence. Accordingly he represents him, as we have seen (p. 314), as the leading champion of orthodoxy against Arian opponents. But at a later date the tide turned once again. The turning-point was the Second Council of Nicaea. The occasion was the Iconoclastic controversy. The Iconoclasts alleged his authority for their views (see above, p. 344). The opposite party sought to disparage him. If they could only brand him deeply enough with the mark of heresy, the ground was cut from under their antagonists. The opinions of these later ages respecting Eusebius find expression in Photius. "His own books," says this writer, "cry aloud that he is convicted of Arianism" (Ep. 73). "In his very repentance," he continues, "he shews himself more plainly to be impenitent." A permanent injury was inflicted on his reputation by dragging him into the Iconoclastic dispute.

In the Latin Church he fared somewhat better. Jerome indeed did his best to damage his reputation. "The chief of the Arians," "the standard-bearer of the Arian faction," "the most flagrant champion of the impiety of Arius"—so he stigmatizes the teacher to whom he was more largely indebted than perhaps to any one else. But, notwithstanding this virulence of language, the eminent services of Eusebius to Christian literature carried the day in the Western Church. Two popes successively threw the shield of their authority over his reputation. Gelasius declined to place his History and Chronicle on the list of proscribed works (Decret. de Libr. Apocr. 4). Pelagius II gives expression to a truly noble sentiment while defending him: "Holy Church," he says, "weigheth the hearts of her faithful ones with of Eusebius towards heresies—the account is still wider of the mark. It is difficult to see how language could surpass the expressions which he uses from time to time against different heretics and heresies; e.g., i. 1; ii. 1, 13; iii. 26, 27, 28, 29, 32; iv. 7, 29, 30; v. 13, 14, 16-20, etc., "grievous wolves," "most abominable heresy," "like a pestilent and scabby disease," "incurable and dangerous poison," "most foul heresy, overshooting anything that could exist or be conceived, more abominable than all shame," "double-mouthed and two-headed serpent," "like venomous reptiles," "loathsome evil-deeds," these and similar expressions form the staple of his language, when he comes athwart a heresy.

kindliness rather than their words with rigour" (Ep. 5. 921). It is worthy of notice that neither Gelasius nor Pelagius refers directly to the charge of Arianism. The offence of Eusebius, which seemed to them to require apology, was his defence of the heretic Origen. An unknown Latin writer of a later age, quoted by Valois, doubtless expressing the feeling of his own time, calls Eusebius "the key of the Scriptures and the guardian of the New Testament."

But a more remarkable fact still is the canonization of Eusebius, notwithstanding his real or supposed Arian opinions. In an ancient Syrian Martyrology (quoted above, p. 318 sq.), which is translated from the Greek and which can hardly date more than half a century after his death, May 30 is assigned to "the commemoration of Eusebius, bishop of Palestine," where he takes his rank among the honored martyrs and confessors of the church. Nor was it only in the East that this honour awaited him. In the Martyrologium Hieronymianum for xi Kal. Jul. we find the entry "In Caesarea Cappadociae depositio sancti Eusebii" (Hieron. Op. xi. 578). The person intended was doubtless Eusebius the predecessor of St. Basil [EUSEBIUS (24), p. 355 sq.], as the addition "Cappadociae" shews (see Laemmer, de Martyrologio Romano, p. 71 sq., Ratisbonae, 1878). But the transcendent fame of the other Eusebius of the other Caesarea eclipsed this comparatively obscure person and finally obliterated his name from the Latin calendars. The word "Cappadociae" altogether disappeared. In Usuard the notice becomes "In Caesarea Palaestinae sancti Eusebii historiographi" (with a v. l.); and in old Latin martyrologies, where he is not distinctly specified, the historian Eusebius is doubtless understood. Accordingly, in several Gallican service books the historian is commemorated as a saint (see Valois, Testimonia pro Eusebio); and in the Martyrologium Romanum itself he held his place for many centuries. In the revision of this Martyrology under Gregory XIII his name was at length struck out, and Eusebius of Samosata substituted in his place, under the mistaken idea that the latter had been originally commemorated, and that Caesarea had been substituted for Samosata by a mistake. The Martyrologium Hieronymianum, which contained the true key to the error, had not yet been discovered. [L.]

EUSEBIUS, CHRONICLE OF. This work may be described in words suggested by the author's own account of it at the beginning of his Eclogae Propheticae, as "chronological tables, to which is prefixed an epitome of universal history drawn from various sources." The epitome constitutes the first book of the Chronicle, the tables the second. The tables, as will more clearly be seen from the specimen we give farther on, exhibit in parallel columns the successions of the rulers of different nations, in such a way that the reader can see at a glance with whom any given monarch was contemporary. And they are accompanied by notes marking the years of some of the more remarkable historical events, these notes also constituting an epitome of history. The context of a second passage, where Eusebius refers to his Chronicle (Praep. Ev. x. 9), accounts very clearly for the interest which Christians felt in the study of comparative chronology. If their heathen opponents contrasted the antiquity of their rites with the novelty of the Christian religion, the Christian apologists retorted by proving that the most celebrated Grecian legislators and philosophers were very much junior to the Hebrew legislator, and to the prophets who had beforehand testified of Christ, and who had taught a religion of which the Christian was the legitimate continuation. This argument is the subject of the section of the Præparatio Evangelica to which we have referred; and Eusebius there quotes largely from preceding writers who had proved the antiquity of the Jews; from Josephus, from Iulian, from Clement of Alexandria, and in particular from Africanus. This last writer (see the article on him, Vol. I. p. 56) had made the synchronisms between sacred and profane history his special study, and he published the results in a chronological work which gave Eusebius the model and, to a great extent, the materials for that which is the subject of this article.

A work whose excellence is literary has a vitality which is not affected by the efforts of subsequent imitators; but one the merits of which are scientific is inevitably superseded by the works of later writers, who, having learned from it all that it is able to teach, combine therewith the fruits of more advanced knowledge. Thus the chronology of Africanus has perished, the first cause of its falling into neglect probably being the superior popularity of the work which Eusebius had founded on it. In like manner, the Greek of Eusebius's own work has been lost, and until comparatively recent times it was only known through the labours of successors who had made use of it, in particular of Jerome, who translated it into Latin, enlarging the notices which related to Roman history, and continuing the chronology to his own time. In 1606, Scaliger published an edition of the Chronicle, in which he attempted to restore the Greek of Eusebius, collecting from Syncellus, Cedrenus, and other Greek chronologers, notices which he believed himself able, mainly by the help of Jerome's translation, to identify as copied from Eusebius. In this work he shewed great learning and industry, but over-confidence in his critical capacity sometimes led him to claim for Eusebius more than really belonged to him; and his restoration of the first book, where he had but little guidance from Jerome, did not inspire confidence at the time, and has since proved to be untrustworthy. It seems over-bold also to pronounce concerning two lost works that the one was little but a transcript from the other; yet this was the judgment which Scaliger confidently expressed concerning the obligations of Eusebius to Africanus. It is very certain that Eusebius owed much to Africanus, but we are not entitled to assume, as Scaliger did, that Eusebius copied Africanus without alteration in every place where he does not expressly state his dissent from him. A closely going over the work of Jerome, Scaliger was strongly impressed by the haste and carelessness with which the Latin translator did his work, trusting too much to the attendants who read to him or wrote for him. The most striking instance is Jerome's creation of a historical Paradius, out of the two Greek words, παλαιός and ἀδελφός. He translates Μίνως Κρησίων ὁς παρέδωκεν, "Minos Cretensibus leges dedit."

ut Paradius memorat." Scaliger was in consequence led to impute mistranslation to Jerome every time that he found a difference between Jerome's Latin and the corresponding notices in the later Greek chronologers. And though Vallarsi, whose edition of the Chronicle, in vol. vii. of his great edition of Jerome's works, contains much able criticism of Scaliger's work, urges that we have no right to assume that the Greek chronologers simply copied Eusebius without introducing any changes of their own, or that in any difference between them and Jerome they must be pronounced right and he wrong, there remain, after every allowance made, several cases where Jerome cannot be cleared from the charge of having blundered. The objections made by Vallarsi to Scaliger's restoration of the first book, and his opinion that the Chronicle never had contained anything which could properly be described as a first book, need not be considered, the question having been set at rest by the discovery of an Armenian translation of the Chronicle, first published in 1818, which enables us now to state what the contents of the first book really were.

The author, at the commencement of his work, deprecates the expectation of too minute accuracy in the investigations on which he enters, and thinks that our Lord's words, "It is not for you to know the times and the seasons," are applicable not only to the end of the world, but also to the knowledge of all times and seasons. He pleads the difficulties, in the case of the Greeks, arising from the comparatively recent beginning of civilization in that nation, concerning which he quotes the saying of the oft quoted story told in the Timæus of Plato, that the Greeks were but children; in the case of the Egyptians and the Chaldeans, arising from the fables of which their early history is full. Even Hebrew chronology is not free from difficulties of its own. He then, in the first section, gives a sketch of Chaldean and Assyrian history, subjoining a table of the succession and lengths of reigns of Assyrian, Median, Lydian, and Persian kings, ending with the Darius conquered by Alexander. The authors whom he employs are Alexander Polyhistor, and, as known through him, Berosus; Abydenus, Josephus, Castor, Diodorus, and Cephallion. He notes the coincidences of these writers with Hebrew history, and he suggests that the incredible lengths assigned to reigns in the early Chaldean history may be reduced by the supposition that the "sari," said to be periods of 3600 years, in reality were far shorter periods. In like manner, the Egyptian chronology may be shortened by supposing that the years of their periods were in reality but months. Africanus had previously mentioned this solution. Another is mentioned farther on in this first book, viz. that some of the Egyptian dynasties may have been, not consecutive, but synchronous. The second section treats of Hebrew chronology, the authorities used in addition to the sacred volume being Josephus and Africanus. He notices the chronological difference between the Hebrew, Septuagint, and Samaritan text, and conjectures that the Hebrews, desirous to justify by patriarchal example their love of early marriages, systematically shortened the intervals between the birth of each patriarch and that of his first son. He gives other arguments which decide him in favour of the LXX, especially as their version was the only one in use in the Christian church which had received it from our Lord and the apostles. A trifling difference here shews that Scaliger was wrong in supposing that Eusebius slavishly copied Africanus, for he reckons the years from the Creation to the Flood as 2242, instead of 2262, which we learn from Syncellus were counted by Africanus, the difference no doubt arising from a difference of reading as to the years of Methuselah; for in this case there is a well known variation of reading, probably in the first instance arising out of a conjectural emendation made in order to get rid of a chronology which would have made Methuselah survive the Deluge. In the next division of time, from the Deluge to the birth of Abraham, which Eusebius makes the initial point of his own tables, he follows the Septuagint, except that he omits the second Cainan, making the number of years 942; and thus placing the birth of Abraham in the year from the Creation 3184. He notes in his tables that the Hebrew chronology made this interval 1949 years, which agrees within a year with that derived from our copies. Eusebius places the Exodus in the year from the birth of Abraham 505, in which he appears to agree with Africanus, but he differs with him in respect of the next interval, viz. that to the building of Solomon's temple. Josephus counted that interval 592 years, which agrees closely enough with the 450 years assigned to the period of the Judges in the received text of Acts xiii. 20. Clement of Alexandria (Strom. i. 21), as Eusebius notes, does not substantially disagree from the computation of Josephus. Africanus had extended this interval to 744 years. He may have been, as Scaliger supposes, desirous to maintain the then received computation of 5500 years from the Creation to the birth of our Lord, notwithstanding his throwing out of the chronology the 130 years of the second Cainan. For he gained as many years elsewhere, enlarging, for instance, the period of the Judges by counting 30 years for the elders that outlived Joshua, 40 years of anarchy after Samson, and 30 years of peace, arbitrary insertions for which he is censured by Eusebius. The great crux of Scripture chronologers has been how to reconcile the interval of about 600 years between the Exodus and Solomon's temple, which is what most naturally comes out from adding up the years assigned to the Judges, with the statement (1 Kings vi. 1) that the interval was only 480 years. A reconciliation could be effected, and the times of the Judges shortened, by throwing out of the computation the years when the land is said to have served foreign rulers, and considering these as counted in the years of some contemporary judge; if it were not that the authority of the apostle Paul, as already quoted, seems to favour the longer computation. Eusebius is moved to decide in favour of the shorter mainly by the consideration that between Naasson and David there intervened but Salmon, Boaz, Obed, and Jesse. These five generations, then, in a period of, according to Africanus, over 700 years, or, according to Josephus, 600, would give on the lowest computation the inadmissible length of 120 years to a generation. Eusebius therefore counts the interval 480 years, as in 1 Kings. If in Acts xiii. he adopted the reading of the oldest MSS now extant, he does not found on it any attempt to maintain Paul's chronological accuracy, his line of defence being that the apostle's object was not to teach scientific chronology, but that he merely had occasion, while preaching the saving doctrine of Christ, to make incidental mention of the times of the Judges, in doing which he conformed to the received chronology of the time. The consequence of the shortening of the Hebrew chronology by Eusebius in the period now under consideration was to bring down the place of Moses as compared with the line of Greek chronology. In the preface to his second book, Eusebius states that his predecessors had made Moses contemporary with Inachus, and 700 years earlier than the Trojan War. His own computation made Inachus contemporary with Jacob, and Moses with Cecrops, but he contends that this leaves Moses still nearly 400 years older than the capture of Troy, older than Deucalion's Deluge or Phaethon's Conflagration; older than Bacchus, Aesculapius, Castor and Pollux, or Hercules; older than Homer and the Seven Wise Men of Greece, and Pythagoras the first philosopher.

In the next period, Eusebius counts 442 years from the foundation of the temple by Solomon to its destruction under Zedekiah. He discusses how the 70 years' captivity are to be reckoned, and his conclusion is that there are two prophetic periods of this length. The one begins with the destruction of the temple, and ends with the second year of Darius, son of Hystaspes, and the rebuilding of the temple under Zerubbabel. In so counting, Eusebius claims that he follows Clement of Alexandria (Strom. i. 21), but Scaliger remarks that this is only true as respects the end of the period. Clement had made his 70 years begin with the captivity under Jeconiah, as the prophecy in Jeremiah xxix. seems to demand. The other prophetic period of 70 years he makes end in the first year of Cyrus (when an altar was set up at Jerusalem, and the foundations of the temple laid), and begin with the first prophesying of Jeremiah in the fifteenth year of Josiah. In the tables, Eusebius gives another way of counting this period, viz. from the third year of Jehoiakim to the nineteenth of Cyrus.

From the second year of Darius, which he counts as the first year of the 65th olympiad, Eusebius counts 548 years to the preaching of our Lord and the fifteenth year of Tiberius, which he reckons as the fourth year of the 201st olympiad; and as the year from the creation of the world 5228. He gives as elements of this part of the calculation the lengths of the years of the Persian kings, of Alexander and his Egyptian successors down to the time of Antiochus Epiphanes, carrying on the calculation from this point through the Maccabees (with respect to whom he refers again to Africanus) and the Jewish princes who succeeded them. Both in this and in the first part of this book, Eusebius sums up his calculations by giving the total of years down to the Vicennalia of Constantine (325), which is made the closing point of the Chronicle. The third part of the first book contains a sketch of Egyptian history commencing with an extract from Diodorus, but mainly taken from Manetho from whom large extracts had also been made by Africanus and Josephus. For the history after the time of Alexander the Great, Porphyry is employed. The fourth part treats of Grecian history. The first authority employed is Castor, who would seem to have drawn up his results in chronological tables, and from them Eusebius takes his history of the kings of Sicyon, accounted the oldest monarchs of the Ionic race, of Argos and of Athens. Eusebius next gives notice of the foundation of the Olympic contests, considering that with the first olympiad authentic Greek history begins. He gives a list of Olympic victors, which according to the title professes to end with the 247th, but which actually is continued to the 249th. This is the latest that could have appeared in the work of Africanus, so that the breaking off the list here is evidence of the source whence it is derived. Next follows from Diodorus a list of kings of Corinth and Lacedaemon, with a table of the nations who successively held dominion of the sea, with the number of years for which each held it. After this come Macedonian, Thessalian, and Syrian history, the authority of Porphyry being followed in the later history. The tables, must have found this method unsuitable on account of the length of time covered by his tables, which go back more than 1200 years before the first olympiad. And the same objection applied to the use of other celebrated eras which Eusebius does not mention, such as that of Nabonassar or of the Seleucidae. On the other hand, the differences between the Hebrew and the Septuagint chronology would have made it inconvenient to date years from the Creation; for when Eusebius has occasion to make such a computation, he gives the result according to both systems of chronology. The important differences between the Hebrew and the Septuagint all lie in the period prior to the birth of Abraham; that, accordingly, Eusebius records as the first event in his Chronicle, and makes it the beginning of his era, in respect of their distances from which all subsequent events are dated. The next columns give the successions of the rulers of different nations. Eusebius only counts the chronology of three nations as going back so far as the commencement of his Chronicle, the Assyrians, the Sicyonians, last section of the first book treats of Roman history. He begins with an enumeration of the historians whom he had employed, viz.: Alexander Polyhistor, Abydenus, Cephalion, Diodorus, as already mentioned; the eighteen books of Cassius Longinus, which go down to the 228th olympiad; the fourteen books of Phlegon, the freedman of Hadrian, which include 229 olympiads; the six books of Castor, from Ninus to the 181st olympiad; the three books of Tullius, from the taking of Troy to the 167th olympiad; and Porphyry, from the taking of Troy to the reign of Claudius. To these is to be added Dionysius of Halicarnassus, from whom all the early Roman history is taken. The work professes to add a table of emperors and of consuls, but the Armenian is here defective. The second book shews that he employed also Philochorus and Palaephatus. In the second book of the Chronicle the lists of successions given in the former book are drawn out in the form of tables, the nature of which will be more easily understood from the specimen we give.

The first column marks the year counting from the birth of Abraham. The use of this era is a speciality of the work of Eusebius. Africanus had marked dates by olympiads, as Greek chronologers had usually done. Eusebius, though he duly registers the olympiads in his and the Egyptians; and he places the first year of Abraham as corresponding to the forty-third year of Ninus, king of Assyria, to the twenty-second of Europa, king of Sicyon, and to the first year of the sixteenth or Thebaean Egyptian dynasty. With the foundation of new monarchies the number of columns increases, rising to as many as eight; diminishing again as kingdoms disappear, until, towards the close of the Chronicle there remains but the single line of Roman emperors. The remaining space in the tables, called by Scaliger the Spatium Historicum, contains entries of different historical events. These entries have been liable to much dislocation in the process of transcription, copyists altering their position as the space at their disposal made it convenient. Thus, while the Armenian and Jerome's translation, as a general rule, agree as to the dates of the accession of the kings, they differ perpetually as to the entries in the historical space. We give an example to illustrate the difficulty of recovering with any certainty the chronological system of Eusebius from these entries. Eusebius, as we have already mentioned, had before him a list of the nations who successively held dominion over the sea, with the number of years of the rule of each. This list he worked into his tables, no doubt counting the years back from the crossing of the Hellespont by Xerxes, which is its final point. But it is now, to all appearance, a hopeless task to recover the arrangement of Eusebius. Thus, the first name on the list is the Lydians, ninety-two years; and these years are given in the Armenian 848-928, by Jerome 842-960. There is but one entry out of seventeen in which the Armenian and Jerome agree. In this case there is no room for doubt that the notes were originally intended by Eusebius to be connected with definite years. But many of the others might from the first have been as well affixed to one year as another, and probably were not at first intended to be connected so much with particular years as with particular decades of years, indicating vaguely as they do the times about which certain events happened or when certain men flourished. It appears to us that these historical notes, incorporated with the tables of reigns, are what Eusebius had in view when, at the beginning of his Eclogae Propheticae, he refers to his tables and says that he had joined with them an epitome of history. The word he uses is ἀντιπαθέρες; if that contained in the first book had been intended, a different word would have been used. There is every reason for thinking that more editions of the Chronicle than one were published by Eusebius in his lifetime. In its latest form it terminates with the Vicennalia of Constantine; but the Praeparatio Evangelica, in which the Chronicle is referred to, had been published several years previously. It is possible that the hypothesis that Eusebius himself published different editions of his Chronicle may give the true explanation of the differences between Jerome's version and the Armenian. These are more than can be ascribed to the fault of transcribers. The Armenian version and Jerome's can readily be compared in Schoene's edition, where both are to be found on the same opening of the page, and the comparison is helped by a valuable memoir of Mommsen's on the subject (Abhandl. der philologisch-histor. Classe der Königl. Sächs. Gesellschaft der Wissenschaften, i. 669). The account which Jerome gives in his preface of his claims to originality is that as far as the taking of Troy his work was a mere translation of that of Eusebius; that from that date on to the point at which the work of Eusebius closes, his work was still but translation, only enlarged by notices, taken from Suetonius and others, relating to Roman history, concerning which Eusebius, as a Greek writing for Greeks, had not been full; and that the conclusion continuing the Chronicle from the point where Eusebius breaks off to his own time was entirely his own. Mommsen finds that in the part of the Chronicle before the time of our Lord the Armenian must have mutilated the work of Eusebius by capricious omissions, there being a multitude of notices absent from it, which are found in Jerome, and which are proved really to belong to Eusebius by being quoted as his by subsequent Greek chroniclers; on the other hand, in the history after Christ, the Armenian appears to have faithfully reported Eusebius, almost everything additional that is found in Jerome being capable of being traced to non-Eusebian sources. Mommsen has expended some pains in tracing the sources of Jerome, and finds that, as indeed had been previously remarked, he is even more indebted to the history of Eutropius, which he does not mention, than to the work of Suetonius, which he does. Mommsen gives several illustrations of the haste and carelessness with which Jerome used his authorities. For instance, Jerome describes the emperor Claudius as "patruus Drusi qui apud Moguntiacum monumentum habet," a strange statement, which is accounted for by a reference to Eutropius, where we find, "patruus Caligulae, Drusi qui apud M. m. habet filius."

Some lengths of the reigns of Roman emperors, which are merely entered in the Armenian by the round numbers of the years are given in Jerome, with the more minute accuracy of months and sometimes of days; and one of Jerome's statements, viz. that Pertinax reigned six months, instead of a year as in the Armenian, is proved, by a Greek quotation, really to have been made by Eusebius. Jerome also gives notices, not found in the Armenian canon, of the places where the emperors died; but the source of these is found in a list of the places and manner of deaths of the emperors, still found in the Armenian, which Eusebius had prefixed to his tables. He had also prefixed a table of the lengths of their reigns, but that has been lost from the Armenian by mutilation, so that we cannot now tell whether there were originally discrepancies which Jerome removed between the list and the entries in the tables, or whether Jerome's version represents a later edition of the work of Eusebius. The succession of the Roman bishops will form the subject of a separate article [ROME, BISHOPS OF]. Suffice it here to say that Jerome's dates for the accessions of the bishops differ from the Armenian in such a way as to suggest that Jerome had exchanged the work of a translator for that of a chronologer, reforming the system of his original by means of an independent list. Jerome's chronology of the Roman bishops approaches much more nearly than the Armenian to that of the later work of Eusebius, his Church History. Appended to Schoene's edition of the Chronicle is a translation, by Roediger, of a Syriac chronicle which goes down to the year A.D. 636, and which epitomizes the work of Eusebius, though possibly, as von Gutschmid conjectures, known to the Syriac writer through the intervention of Anianus. In this there are four cases where the Syriac agrees, as to the lengths of episcopates with Jerome, where he differs from the Armenian, and in three of them from the Church History of Eusebius as well. As it is improbable that Jerome's work could have been known to the Syriac writer, we are led to believe that both used a common source. After what has been said as to Jerome's rough and ready method of working, it seems to us improbable that he took more pains in correcting the chronology of Eusebius by the help of other authorities than he himself lays claim to have done. And it seems to us that the simplest account of the phenomena that have been described is the hypothesis that Jerome worked on a later edition of the Chronicle than that represented by the Armenian translation. We have referred [EVODIUS] to Harnack's theory as to the principle on which the Chronicle dates the accessions of bishops of Antioch. The difficulties in the way of accepting that theory are stated in the prolegomena to Lightfoot's Lectures; and it may be added here that any theory seems to us to rest on an untrustworthy foundation which requires us to assume that we can rely to a year on the dates given in the Spatium Historicum of the Armenian. Take, for instance, the episcopate of Peter, about which it is likely that as much care was taken as in the case of any later episcopate. The Armenian gives its length as twenty years, and the years 2055-2082; Jerome makes the length twenty-five years, and the years 2058-2084. Jerome places Peter's arrival in Rome in the second year of Claudius, the Armenian two years before that emperor's accession. Now, in addition to Luediger's Syriac epitome already mentioned, there have been published by Bruns, in Eichhorn's Repertorium für bibl. und morgenl. Literatur, xi. 273, extracts from another Syriac chronicle. These two witnesses are independent, for the latter agrees with the Armenian in making Peter's episcopate twenty years, the former makes it twenty-five with Jerome. But both agree in entering Peter's arrival at Rome after the accession of Claudius. We conclude therefore that the earlier date of the Armenian has only arisen in an inaccuracy of transcription. It may be noted here that in the later MSS. of Jerome's Chronicle the historical notices are all collected into the right-hand margin, the Spatium Historicum of Scaliger; and Jerome's preface as given in the printed editions contained directions for distinguishing by the use of differently coloured inks to what nation each notice belonged. The older MSS. insert the historical notices in two places, between the columns of text. The Armenian also gives the notices in two places, the inner and outer margins. Scaliger considered that the directions in the preface which are not found in the older MSS. had been omitted by scribes, who found the use of different inks too troublesome, and he drew the paradoxical inference that the later MSS. contained the oldest text. But Schoene points out that it would be far more laborious for any scribe to separate into two, according to nations, notices which he had found all together than to put together notices which he had found separate; and that the former change, if made at all, must have been made in the 5th century, the archetype of one of the MSS. being traceable to about the year 500. He concludes, therefore, that we may receive the oldest MSS. as giving the oldest text, and rejects the passage in the preface as an interpolation inserted when the method of the later MSS. was introduced.

Enough has been said as to the general chronological system of Eusebius to make it unnecessary to comment at any length on the entries in the tables of the second book. We only mention that he makes the principality of Herod the end of the sixty-nine weeks of Daniel, understanding the prophecy, "after sixty-two weeks the Messiah shall be cut off," as fulfilled in the coming to an end of the line of anointed Jewish rulers. He takes notice also of a different way of counting, according to which seventy weeks or 490 years, beginning at the dedication of the temple under Nehemiah end at the reign of Nero, in which reign the last siege of Jerusalem began. It may be mentioned as a confirmation of what has been said as to the liability to dislocation of the Armenian entries, that in the Armenian the crucifixion of our Lord is connected with the sixteenth year of Tiberius and the second year of the 202nd olympiad, although Eusebius connects the year with the statement of Phlegon as to the occurrence of a great eclipse of the sun and of an earthquake in Bithynia in the fourth year of that olympiad, and though we learn from Cedrenus that Eusebius placed the crucifixion in the eighteenth year of Tiberius.

We have next to speak of the method of reducing Eusebius's years of Abraham to years B.C. and A.D. Petavius (de Doct. Temp. ix. 1) had maintained that Eusebius's first year of Abraham began Sept. 1, B.C. 2017. The matter has recently been carefully investigated by von Gutschmid (de Notis Temporum quibus in Chronicis utitur Eusebius, Kiliae, 1867) who has also co-operated with Schoene in his edition of the Chronicle. Von Gutschmid has found that, as was perhaps to be expected in a work compiled from various sources, different rules must be applied to different parts of it. His method of investigation is to take the dates given in the Chronicle for the accessions of the monarchs of the three great lines, of Persian kings, of Egyptian Lagidae, and of Roman emperors—dates as to which the Armenian and Jerome agree—and to compare these with the historical dates of these events known from other sources. In this enquiry a good deal turns on determining the day on which Eusebius began his years. Every year of the Chronicle is assigned to a definite ruler, so that, when a king died in the middle of a year, the chronicler had to choose whether he would count this the last year of the reign of the deceased monarch or the first of that of his successor. And—what amounts to the same question—in counting the lengths of reigns, he had to choose whether he would throw away odd months or consider them as equivalent to an entire year. The result at which von Gutschmid arrives is that from Cyrus to Ptolemy III. the dates of the Chronicle are made to agree with the true dates by the assumption that the first year of Abraham begins at the summer solstice B.C. 2016; from Ptolemy IV. to Cleopatra, that it begins at the autumnal equinox B.C. 2018; and from Julius Caesar to Pertinax, that it begins at the autumnal equinox B.C. 2019. He gives an explanation, which need not be here repeated, how the different calculation of the middle period is to be accounted for by the use of different sources by the chronicler. Setting this aside, the other two reckonings, which differ by nine months, are best harmonized by the assumption that Eusebius's first year of Abraham begins on Jan. 1, B.C. 2016. Eusebius makes his olympiads begin with the year of Abraham 1240, that is to say, with Jan. 1, B.C. 777, the true date being the summer solstice B.C. 776. The olympiads of Eusebius therefore are only bissextile Julian years, differing by a year and a half from the true olympiads. Jerome makes his olympiads begin a year later than Eusebius, and so brings them into closer harmony with the true.

After the reign of Pertinax there ensues a confusion in the chronology, and the agreement between the Armenian and Jerome as to the date of the accessions of the emperors ceases. In fact,

Eusebius, who in this part of the history appears to have worked on an Alexandrian table of reigns, in which years are counted from the beginning of the month Thoth, i.e. Aug. 29, assigns a whole year to the reign of Pertinax, which lasted only three months, or five if we take in the reign of Julianus; he gives seven years to Caracalla who really reigned only six years two months, and he gives seven years to Philip instead of five and a half years. In this way the time between the deaths of Commodus and of Philip is made three years too long. One of these redundant years is afterwards cast out by the omission of the year that intervened between the resignation of Diocletian and the acceptance of the title of Augustus by Constantine. Jerome partially, but only partially, corrects these errors. It has been thought surprising that Eusebius should go wrong in the part of the chronology which lay near his own time; of this von Gutschmid offers the following ingenious explanation. Among ourselves the change from beginning the year on March 25 to Jan. 1 occasionally leads to a mistake of a year in the dates of events which occurred in the first three months of years before the change of style. Chronological confusion to a much greater extent arose when the genuine olympiads came in different places to be superseded by pseudo-Olympic periods, of four years indeed, but not commencing at the same time as the true. A change in the way of counting the dates could not be made in any history from one period to the other without a breach of continuity at the point of transition. It has been explained (Vol. I. p. 508) what use was made of the period of eight (or twice four) years in counting the Easter full moons. Von Gutschmid tries to shew there was in use in Alexandria such a cycle, in which the summer solstice of the year 284 commenced a period, and a different one at Rome commencing with Jan. 1, 298. His hypothesis is, that with Pertinax the sources from which Eusebius had previously been drawing were exhausted, that he then employed materials in which Alexandrian pseudo-olympiads were used, and later himself employed the Roman way of reckoning. This explanation is too complicated to carry with it complete conviction; and it does not seem to us incredible that Eusebius should have simply blundered in making out his chronology by the help of lists of emperors' reigns. Modern chronology is kept straight by the habitual use of the reckoning A.D., but if we dated events by the years of the reigning sovereign, we should be liable to error every time there was inaccuracy in our information how much each monarch lived to complete of the last year on which public documents shewed him to have entered. The part of history which persons in general know worst is that which immediately precedes their own time. It was much easier for Eusebius to preserve historical accuracy in the early history, where he had the guidance of trustworthy historians, than in the period after the histories which he had been following came to an end, and where he had to make, as best he could, a way for himself. Whatever may be thought of the correctness of von Gutschmid's explanation, it does not affect the value of his rule for turning Eusebian years of Abraham into years B.C. and A.D.; viz. in the period from the first olympiad to the beginning of the vulgar era, that is to say from the year of Abraham 1140-2016, subtract the year of Abraham from 2017, and the remainder gives the year B.C., thenceforward to Pertinax, viz. from the year of Abraham 2017-2209 subtract 2016, and the remainder is the year A.D.; from 2210-2319, the last year in the Armenian, subtract 2018 in order to obtain the year A.D. Von Gutschmid has also compared the Eusebian with the true date of a number of events entered in the Spatium historicum, as to the position of which the Armenian and Jerome agree. He finds that they may be distributed into two classes, in one of which the dates fairly correspond to those obtained by the preceding rule; in the others the dates as given by olympiads in the table will be right if we consider these as true olympiads. Cases of this kind would arise whenever Eusebius copied the dates given in olympiads by older authorities without any attempt to adapt them to his own chronology.

We do not occupy space with an enumeration of editions of the chronicle, because, for the student's practical purposes, previous editions are superseded by that of Schoene, Berlin, 1875, 1866. Full explanation is given as to the mode of using the tables, p. xli. In his prolegomena will be found information as to the labours of previous editors, as also in Fabricius, Bibl. Gr. Harles, vii. 340, and in the preface to Aucher's edition of the Armenian. This version was made from a MS. brought from Jerusalem to Constantinople, of which transcripts were sent to Aucher in Venice in 1790 and 1793; but various hindrances delayed the publication of his translation till 1818. We have not room to speak of the anticipation of this work by Zohrab and Mai in 1815. Petermann, for Schoene's edition, failed in his attempt to make a new collation of the Jerusalem MS., but he was able to compare the transcript of 1793 with a later one made by Aucher himself; and also another MS. closely akin to the Jerusalem MS., but in Petermann's opinion not derived from it, but rather both from a common original. The Armenian version he pronounces to be as early as the 5th century. Some errors in it are obviously to be accounted for as originating in a misreading or misunderstanding of Greek words; other features indicate a Syriac original; and though it is possible that the errors just mentioned may have been introduced by the Syriac translator, yet Petermann's opinion is that there were in Armenia in the 5th century two versions, one made directly from the Greek, the other through the medium of Syriac; and that two or three centuries afterwards these were combined into their present form. Whatever be the languages through which the words of Eusebius passed, some of them certainly have become much disguised in the process. It would require a sagacious critic from the words "Iéandrus primus virtutem ostendit, superabat enim iracundiam," to restore the original Μέγας δὲ πρῶτον δρᾶμα διδάξας Ὀργὴν ἐνίκα.

Scaliger's edition contained in addition to the chronicle of Eusebius, besides the Latin continuation of St. Jerome an ἐπιτομή χρόνων taken from the Paschal chronicle at that time unpublished, the Chronographia of the Patriarch Nicephorus, and what he called ιστορικὴ συνάγωγὴ which is not an ancient work, but a collection of historical notices made by Scaliger himself, in some cases even translated by him from Latin into Greek. Subjoined to his Latin chronicles are what Scaliger calls most useful extracts from Eusebius, Africanus, and others turned into Latin, "ab homine barbaro inepto, Hellenismi et Latinitatis imperitissimo." [CHRONICON SCALIGERIANUM.] The blunders in it are of such a character that this description is not too severe; for instance: τὸ Ἰλίου ἦλθε ὑπὸ τῶν Ἀχαιῶν is rendered "Ille solis confixus est ab Achaia," but the historical matter contained in the notices promises to repay more careful investigation than it has yet received. These excerpts have been newly edited in Schoene's edition from a careful collation with the original MS. at Paris. Schoene's edition also contains the χρονολογικὸν σύνταγμα, a work of the year 853, which had been published by Mai (Script. Eccl. Aec. Coll. vol. i.), the first part of which professes to be derived from the labours of Eusebius. The list of Alexandrian patriarchs has traces, in a number of curious alterations, of having been derived from a list in which the Monophysites are treated as the orthodox and the adherents of Chalcedon as heretics. [G. S.]

EUSEBIUS (24), bishop of Caesarea in Cappadocia, by whom Basil the Great was ordained to the presbyterate. Eusebius was a layman and unbaptized at the time of his elevation to the episcopate A.D. 362. On the death of Dorianus, the church of Caesarea was divided into rival factions, nearly equally balanced, and, as in the case of Ambrose of Milan, the choice of a layman universally known and respected and of high character for orthodoxy, was the readiest way out of the dilemma, as involving no acknowledgment of weakness on either side. Dorianus was by no means covetous of the honour thus forced upon him. Military force had to be employed to overcome his reluctance, and to compel the consecrating prelates to fulfil their functions. No sooner were they free than the bishops endeavoured to annul their act and declare the consecration of Eusebius void. But the counsels of the elder Gregory of Nazianzus prevailed. He represented to them that it would have been the more honourable course to have risked their lives by refusing to ordain Eusebius, rather than to have yielded to the dictation of the populace through fear, and then annul their own act. There were dissensions enough in the church, without their adding to them (Greg. Naz. Orat. xix. 36, pp. 308-9). The election of Eusebius was ratified, to the indignation of the emperor Julian, who grudged the loss of so valuable a servant to the state, and he held the see for a period of eight years till 370. Eusebius proved a very respectable prelate, who would have filled his office with credit to himself and advantage to the church in ordinary times; he showed himself, however, quite unequal to the circumstances of severe trial in which he soon found himself. He was, writes Dr. Newman (Historical Sketches, p. 4), "a bishop of orthodox profession, but had little of the theological knowledge or force of character necessary for coping with the formidable heresy with which the church was assailed." One of the earliest acts of his episcopate was to ordain Basil to the presbyterate. The coldness which grew up between

Eusebius and Basil, probably arising from jealousy of the superior knowledge and greater influence of the latter, his insulting conduct towards Basil, leading to Basil's three years' retirement to Pontus, his desire to regain Basil's aid in combating the attack of the Arians under Valens on the church of Caesarea, and the ultimately successful mediation of Gregory Nazianzen with his old friend, are fully narrated in another article. [BASILIIUS OF CAESAREIA.] (Greg. Naz. Orat. xx. §§ 51-53; Epist. 19, 20, 169, 170.)

In 366 Eusebius saw Basil return to Caesarea. Each had learnt wisdom from the past. Basil was content to guide the counsels of Eusebius without publicly trenching on his prerogatives, while Eusebius was satisfied with official power and dignity, flattering himself, in Gregory's words, that he himself was ruling while Basil was actually the ruler. (Greg. Naz. Orat. xx. § 57-59.) The harmony continued unbroken to the death of Eusebius, A.D. 370.

Fleury states that Eusebius is reckoned by some among the martyrs, but why, it would be hard to say (Fleury, xv. 13, 14; xvi. 9, 14, 17). Florentinus thinks that Usuard confounds Eusebius of Cappadocia with Eusebius the historian, whom he notes on June 21. Upon this point see arguments of Papebrochius in AA. SS. Boll. Jun. iv. 75; and on the other side, Till. Mém. vii. 39. See also EUSEBIUS (23), supr. p. 348 b). [E. V.]

EUSEBIUS (25), fourth bishop of Cahors, succeeding St. Ursicinus and followed by Rusticus. He is mentioned in this order in one of the Vitas of St. Desiderius, a later bishop of the same see. (Vit. Desid. cap. 4 in Patr. Lat. lxxxvii. 223 c; Gall. Christ. i. 120.) [S. A. B.]

EUSEBIUS (26), bishop of Chalcis in Coele Syria, a zealous man and a staunch Catholic, ordained by Eusebius bishop of Samosata, though in another province, after his return from exile, c. A.D. 378 (Theod. H. E. v. 4). He attended the council of Constantinople, A.D. 381 (Labbe, ii. 955). Theodoret narrates a visit paid by him to Marcian the solitary (Hist. Rel. c. 3, p. 789). [E. V.]

EUSEBIUS (27), ST., bishop of Cibalis, a town and district in Pannonia between the Drave and the Save, subject to the metropolitan authority of Sirmium (Dict. G. & R. Geog.). He suffered martyrdom during either the Valerian or the Diocletian persecution. He is the only bishop of this see whose name is known. (Farlati, Illyricum Sacr. vii. 574; AA. SS. Boll. 28 April, iii. 565; Mart. Usuardi, Ap. 28.) [L. D.]

EUSEBIUS (28), bishop of Clazomenae near Smyrna, present at the councils of Ephesus A.D. 431 and Chalcedon A.D. 451. (Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 729; Mansi, iv. 1216, vi. 1085.) [L. D.]

EUSEBIUS (29), bishop of Como, 512. (Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Italia, xi. 313; Ughelli, Ital. Sacr. v. 260.) [A. H. D. A.]

EUSEBIUS (30), bishop of Constantinople; vid. of Nicomedia. [EUSEBIUS (60).]

EUSEBIUS (31), bishop of Cremona, 637, a native of Piacenza; said to have erected the church of St. Antonius, martyr. For an examention of the inscription in the church, see Cappellotti, Le Chiese d'Isol. xii. 120. [A. H. D. A.]

EUSEBIUS (33), bishop of Cysicus, present at the council of Constantinople, A.D. 380. (Mansi, viii. 970.) He is described by Procopius (Bel. Pers. i. 25) as a man of overbearing character, and was ultimately murdered by the people of Cysicus, as Malalas relates, in a conspiracy headed by John of Cappadocia, who was then an exile at Cysicus. (Jo. Malalas, Chron. lib. xviii. p. 480, ed. Dindorf; La Quen. Oréme Christ. i. 754.) [L. D.]

EUSEBIUS (34), bishop of Doberus on the borders of Macedonia and Paeonia, present at the Latrocinium of Ephesus, A.D. 449, where in the subscription he is called "episcopus Topiritanus," though some MSS. read Dobyritanus. (Mansi, vi. 800; La Quen. Oréme Christ. ii. 77.) [L. D.]

EUSEBIUS (35), bishop of Dorylaeum in Phrygia Salutaris, the constant supporter of orthodoxy against Nestorius and Eutyches alike. About Christmas A.D. 428, when Nestorius was asserting his heresy in a sermon at Constantinople, there stood up in full church a man of excellent character (ἀνὴρ καὶ εὖ καὶ ἁγῶς ἐκτρέφετο), still a simple layman, but distinguished for "not inconsiderable erudition" (οὐκ ἀδυνάμειρος παιδείας) and orthodox zeal, and asserted in opposition to Nestorius, that the "eternal Word begotten before the ages had submitted also to be born a second time" (i.e. according to the flesh of the Virgin). This bold assertion of the faith caused great excitement and division in the church. (Cyril. Alex. Adv. Nestor. i. 30 in Migne, vol. lx. p. 41 D; Marine Marston, pars ii. lib. i.; Patr. Lat. xlviii. p. 709 A.) The "vir probus, adhuc laicus" of this narrative is certainly, as Theophanes (Chron. p. 70) expressly says he was, our Eusebius, who has the credit of being the first to oppose the Nestorian heresy. (Evagr. Hist. i. 8 in Patr. Gr. lxxvi. 2445.) He was also the first to protest against the heretical utterances of Anastasius, the synkellos of Nestorius (Theophanes, Chron. p. 70.) He was at this time a "rhetor" (Evagr. l. c.) distinguished in legal practice. (Leont. Dymet. Cont. Nestor. et Eutych. lib. iii. in Patr. Gr. lxxvi. 1360) and an "agens in rebus" to the court, (Gesta de Rom. Acacia, cap. i. in Galland, Biblioth. x. 867; cf. Tillamont, liv. note xi. on Cyril of Alexandria.) Theophanes (l. c.) calls him a ἐκκλησιαστικὸς καὶ ἀντιπρόσωπος.

After the sermon of St. Proclus against Nestorius, and before the orthodox had separated from the communion of Nestorius, in consequence of the council of Ephesus, there appeared, fixed in a public place, a document exposing the identity of Nestorius's doctrine with that of Paul of Samosata. This document common opinion attributed to Eusebius (Leontius, Cont. Nestor. et Eutych. lib. iii. cap. 43 in Patr. Gr. lxxvi. 1300 σπουδαίως, ὅτι γὰρ, κατὰ ἐξουσίαν).

in Constantinople. It draws out the parallel between the doctrine of Nestorius and that of Paul of Samosata, who both deny that the child born of Mary was the Eternal Word; it asserts the true faith out of the creed in use at Antioch (whence Nestorius and Anastasius came), adduces the testimony of Eustathius bishop of Antioch, one of the bishops present at Nicaea, and ends with an anathema on him who denies the identity of the Only Begotten of the Father and the child of Mary. Eusebius must have been a priest at the time when St. Cyril wrote his five books against Nestorius (Cyril. Opera, ix. 41 A, Migne). So much is implied in the καὶ ἐκ τῆς ἐκκλησίας, La. about A.D. 430. He was certainly bishop of Dorylaeum in A.D. 448. We learn from his own statement that he was poor. (Labbe, Concil. iv. 231 D.) At this date he bestowed himself against the heretical teaching of Eutyches. Common hostility to Nestorius had hitherto united Eusebius and Eutyches; but about this time Eusebius, perceiving the heretical tendency of his friend, frequently, as he afterwards told the council of Constantinople, visited him, and exhorted him to reconsider his ways. (Labbe, Concil. iv. 134 D.) Finding him however immoveable and obstinate, Eusebius took the opportunity of a council assembled at Constantinople under Flavian, Nov. 8, 448, apparently for some other purpose (cf. Tillam. xv. 496) to present a "libellus" against Eutyches. In this "libellus," he describes himself as unsuspected of heresy, always fighting against heretics, and defending to the utmost of his power the orthodox faith. (Labbe, iv. 131.) He deploras the persistency of Eutyches in error, and demands that he should be summoned before the council to answer the charges of heretical teaching which he made against him. Flavian, who was very unwilling to admit the petition, urged Eusebius more than once to visit and speak to Eutyches in private. Eusebius replied that it was impossible for him to do so again. His petition was accordingly granted by the council, though with unwillingness, and a feeling against the propriety of Eusebius's conduct. At the second session of the council (Nov. 17), Eusebius requested that the second letter of St. Cyril to Nestorius as a letter to John of Antioch should be read in the council as representing the standard of orthodoxy. This led to a profusion of the orthodox faith from Flavian, which was assented to by the other bishops. At the third session of the council (Nov. 18) Eusebius asked what reply Eutyches had made when summoned to attend. It was found that he had refused to come, alleging a determination never to quit his monastery, and saying that Eusebius had been for some time (ῥῆμα) his enemy. [EUTYCHES (4).] He was again summoned, with the same result. Only at the third summons was he with difficulty induced to submit to the demand. Meanwhile Eusebius was pressing his point with the council persistent and even harshly; he behaved with so much warmth that, as Flavian said, "fire itself could to him, in his zeal for orthodoxy"; the discovery of the attempt which Eutyches had made to secure the adhesion of the other archimandrites to his cause (FAUSTUS (26)) Eusebius urged that he should be immediately treated with the rigour he deserved. (Labbe, iv. 231) Flavian still urged patience and moderation

At last, on Nov. 22, Eutyches appeared with a large monastic and imperial escort, and was examined on the subject of his orthodoxy. Eusebius seems by this time to have become a little afraid of the power of Eutyches: "I am poor," he said, "he threatens me with exile; he has wealth, he is already depicting (ἀνέγραφε) the oasis for me." Eusebius feared also lest Eutyches should turn round and assent to the orthodox faith—thus causing him to be suspected of making calumnious charges with an evil intention. (Labbe, iv. 221, C, D, E.) The question with which he tried Eutyches was this: "My lord archimandrite, do you confess two natures after the Incarnation, and do you say that Christ is consubstantial with us according to the flesh or not?" To the first part of this question Eutyches could not be got to give assent; he was condemned by all the bishops, and sentence of deposition was passed on him. He at once wrote to pope Leo I. in his own defence (Leo Mag. Ep. xxi. 739), complaining of the "machinations" of Eusebius.

We next hear of Eusebius at the examination of the Acts of the council of Constantinople, which Eutyches had declared to have been falsified. With him were fourteen others from among the bishops who had condemned Eutyches, out of the whole number of thirty-four. This examination was held at Constantinople in April 449. (Labbe, iv. 235.) Eutyches was represented by three delegates; Eusebius and others remonstrated against his not being present in person, but the emperor's edicts overruled their remonstrances. During this examination Eusebius made it a special point that all examination into the case of Eutyches, and into any question other than the authenticity of the acts, should be referred to a general council. (Labbe, iv. 268.) The examination of the acts does not seem to have brought to light any accuracy of importance.

When Eusebius arrived in Ephesus at the beginning of August, A.D. 449, to attend the council, he seems to have lodged with Stephen of Ephesus (Labbe, iv. 111 D, E), but he was not permitted to attend the meetings of the council. It was urged as a reason for this that the emperor had forbidden it. (Labbe, iv. 145 A, B.) Certainly when Flavian urged that he should be admitted and heard, Elpidius, one of the imperial commissioners, opposed the proposal (Hefele, Conciliengesch. ii. 355), and the wish or command of the emperor was urged by Dioscorus at the council of Chalcedon as an excuse for his not being heard. Nor did his name receive a complimentary welcome in the council; for when the passage in the acts of Constantinople was read where Eusebius pressed Eutyches to acknowledge the two natures after the Incarnation, the council burst forth, "Off with Eusebius! burn him! let him be burned alive, let him become two! as he desired, let him be divided!" (Labbe, iv. 224 A.) Finally, sentence of deposition was pronounced against Flavian and Eusebius, Dioscorus, in giving assent to their deposition, professing to do so on the ground that they had innovated upon, or altered the doctrines of Nicaea, and had been in this way an occasion of scandal to the churches. After the conclusion of the council Eusebius and

Flavian were put in prison (Liberat. cap. xii.; Galland, xii. p. 140), and immediately sent into exile (Gest. de Nom. Acac. Galland, x. 668). Eusebius escaped and found refuge at Rome, where Leo welcomed him and granted him communion. He was there till April 481 (Leo Mag. Ep. lxxix. lxxx. 1037, 1041), for Leo mentions his presence in a letter to Pulcheria at this date and commends to her care his diocese, "which some one who has been iniquitously thrust into his place is said to be laying waste." Liberatus however (Breviar. cap. xii. in Galland, xii. 140) says that no bishop was put into the place of Eusebius. Perhaps Leo, whose words are "qui injuste asseritur subrogatus," represents no more than a rumour at Rome. Leo also commends him to the care of Anatolius of Constantinople, the successor of Flavian, as one who for the sake of the faith has undergone many dangers and troubles. Eusebius, of course, left Rome to attend the council of Chalcedon. He had addressed a formal petition to the emperor Marcian against Dioscorus, and he appears in the council as his accuser. His petition to the emperor was the first document read in the first session of the bishops at his own request (Labbe, iv. 95); he complains more than once of the conduct of Dioscorus in excluding him from the council of Ephesus (145, 156). His innocence, with that of St. Flavian, was fully recognized at the close of the first session of the council of Chalcedon (Labbe, iv. 322, 323); but he was not yet satisfied; at the third session, on Oct. 13, he presented a further petition against Dioscorus, addressed to the council, in which he represents himself as speaking on behalf of himself, of Flavian (τοῦ ἐν ἁγίοις) and of the orthodox faith. He urges the iniquities of Dioscorus at Ephesus, and begs for complete exculpation for himself, and condemnation for Dioscorus. (For the conduct of the latter and his condemnation, cf. s. v. p. 861; Labbe, iv. 381.) We find Eusebius again in the fourth session of the council, taking a part in the case of certain Egyptian bishops who declined to condemn Eutyches, alleging in excuse that they were bound to follow their patriarch (i.e. Dioscorus), and that in so doing they were acting in accordance with the council of Nicaea. Eusebius has but one word to say, "ψεύδομαι" (Labbe, iv. 513 A). We find him a little later (fifth session, Oct. 22) siding at first against the imperial officers, and the wishes of the Roman legates for making no addition to the council's definition of faith. (Labbe, iv. 558 D; cf. Bright, Hist. of the Church, p. 409.) Afterwards, however, he assisted at the revision which made that definition a completer expression of the doctrine of Leo's tome. In the eleventh session we find him (699 A) voting for the deposition of both claimants, Bassian and Stephen, to the see of Ephesus, on the ground that both alike had been irregularly consecrated. He appears in the fifteenth session (Oct. 23), as signing the much-contested twenty-eighth canon of the council on the subject of the position to be held by the see of Constantinople. [LEO I.] The last time that Eusebius's name appears is in the rescript of the emperor Marcian, June 452. This rescript has for its special object to rehabilitate the memory of Flavian, but it secures also that the condemnation of the robber council should in no way injure the reputation of Eusebius and Theodoret. (Labbe, iv. 866.) Nothing more is known of Eusebius. His name indeed appears in the list of bishops signing the decrees of the council at Rome in A.D. 503, but this list certainly belongs to some earlier council. (Cf. Baron. ann. 503, ix.) Comparing him with Flavian we cannot help feeling that there was a want of generosity in his treatment of Eutyches, whose superior in logical power and theological perception he undoubtedly was. But none can deny him the credit of having been a watchful guardian of the doctrine of the Incarnation all through his life, and a keen-sighted and persistent antagonist of error, whether on the one side or the other, who by his sufferings for the orthodox faith may be said to have merited the title of Confessor. [C. G.]

EUSEBIUS (35) EMESENUM, bishop of Emesa, now Hama, in Syria, c. A.D. 341–359. He was born at Edessa, of a noble family. As from his earliest years he was taught the Holy Scriptures, his parents must have been Christians. Eusebius enjoyed all the advantages of a liberal education which, begun in his native city under teachers who resorted thither, was carried on in Palestine, and subsequently at Alexandria. In Palestine he studied theology under the celebrated Eusebius of Caesarea and Patrophilus of Scythopolis, from whom he imbibed the Arian leanings which distinguished him to the end of his life. Jerome terms him "the standard-bearer of the Arian party," "signifer Arianæ factionis" (Chron. sub ann. x. Constantii), and his Arian tenets are spoken of by Theodoret as too well known to admit question. (Theod. Eranist. Dial. iii. p. 257, ed. Schulze.) About A.D. 331 Eusebius visited Antioch. Eustathius had been recently deposed and banished, and the see was occupied by one of the short-lived Arian intruders, Euphronius, with whom he lived on terms of intimacy. His heterodox leanings would thus receive additional strength. Eusebius's high personal character and reputation for learning marked him out for the episcopate. He had, however, no desire to become a bishop, and to avoid being compelled by force to take the office upon him, according to the strange custom of the time, he left Syria and repaired to Alexandria. Here he devoted himself to the study of philosophy in the celebrated schools of that city. When he had made himself fully acquainted with their systems, he returned to Antioch, of which Flaccillus (otherwise called Placillus) was the Arian bishop. Eusebius was received with the honour due to his learning and reputation for piety. Flaccillus received him into his episcopal residence, and admitted him to his friendship and confidence. When the Arian synod met at Antioch A.D. 340, under the predominant influence of Eusebius of Nicomedia, to nominate a successor to the newly deposed Athanasius, the unstained life, attractive eloquence, and popular manners of Eusebius, together with his personal acquaintance with Alexandria and its leading inhabitants, marked him out for the vacant throne. Eusebius, however, was by no means disposed to yield to his namesake's wishes. He well knew how deservedly beloved Athanasius was with the Alexandrians, and he shrank from facing the storm of unpopularity a bishop in Alexandria would have to meet. He refused the dignity, and Eusebius's scruples, however, to the episcopate were by this time overcome, and he allowed himself to be created bishop of the see of Emesa. This city, situated on the river Orontes to the north-east of the Libanus range, some distance to the north of Laodicea, was famous for its magnificent temple of Elagabalus, the Syrophenician sun-god, from which the young priest Bassianus, himself also a native of Edessa, had been chosen by the army as their emperor, assuming the title of the deity whose minister he had been. A report, based on Eusebius's astronomical studies, had reached the excitable inhabitants that their newly chosen bishop was a sorcerer, addicted to judicial astrology. His approach was the signal for a violent popular commotion, before which he fled, taking refuge with his friend and future panegyrist, George, bishop of Laodicea. By his exertions, and the influence of Flaccillus of Antioch, and Narcissus of Neronias, the people of Emesa were convinced of the groundlessness of their suspicions, and he obtained quiet possession of his episcopal see. He was a great favourite with the emperor Constantius, who took him with him as a counsellor and friend on several of his military expeditions, especially those directed against Sapor II., king of Persia. It is singular that, as we learn from Sozomen, the charge of Sabellianism was brought against one whose Arian leanings were so pronounced. The historian attributes the charge to mere malevolence, excited by jealousy of his exalted qualities. His death occurred before the end of A.D. 359. He was buried at Antioch (Hieron. de Vir. Ill. 101). His funeral oration was pronounced by George of Laodicea, who ascribed miraculous powers to him.

Eusebius of Emesa was a very copious writer, and his works enjoyed much popularity. Jerome (u. s.) speaks somewhat contemptuously of his productions as merely elegant and rhetorical compositions, written with a view to applause, chiefly studied by those who delight in having themselves clapt (κατὰ τῶν κρότοις χαίροντες). He particularizes treatises against the Jews, the Gentiles, and the Novatians, an exposition of the Epistle to the Galatians in ten books, and a very large number of very brief homilies on the Gospels. The whole of these are lost, with the exception of a Disputation against the Jews. Theodoret has preserved two passages on the impassibility of the Son of God, a truth for which he says Eusebius endured many and severe struggles, which he quotes with high commendation in his Eranistes (Dial. iii. p. 258, ed. Schulze). Theodoret also speaks of works of his against Apelles (Haer. fab. i. 25) and Manes (ib. 26). He also wrote a commentary on Genesis, of which Jerome speaks depreciatorily (Quaest. in Gen. tcm. iii. p. 213), and of which, as well as of his commentaries on the New Testament, fragments occur in the Catenae. Three homilies are accepted by some authorities as genuine, and are printed by Migne: (1) on the descent of John the Baptist to Hades and his preaching there; (2) on the treachery of Judas; (3) on the Devil and Hell. Fifty homilies published in Latin by Gagne, Paris, 1547, are a cento made up from various Latin fathers. All the extant remains of Eusebius are printed by Migne, Patrolog. tom. lxxvi. i. p. 461 ff. and by Mai, Biblioth. Nova, tom. ii. p. 528 ff. See also Fabricius, Bibl. Graec. tom. vii. p. 412 ff.

EUSEBIUS (36), bishop of Epiphania in Syria Secunda, south-east of Apamea. He was present at the second general council at Constantinople, A.D. 381, as representative of the Syrian church. (Mansi, iii. 568; Le Quien, Or. Christ. ii. 917.) [J. de S.]

EUSEBIUS (37) I., bishop at the Roman synod of 501, described as "Fanestrensis" (Mansi, viii. 299 c). He is believed to have been the third bishop of Fano, between Vitalis and Leo (Boll. Acta SS. 18 Apr. ii. 542; Ughelli, Ital. Sacr. i. 658), in which case he may be the same as the following. [C. H.]

EUSEBIUS (38), bishop of Fano, accompanied pope John I. when Theodoric compelled him to go on a mission to the emperor Justin in 536. See Anonymus Valesianus, i.e. the chronicle of Maximian archbishop of Ravenna, according to Vatt and Holder Egger, Monum. Rerum Ital. et Lap. 1878, p. 273 (ed. Gardthausen, 1873, p. 43). [A. H. D. A.]

EUSEBIUS (39), bishop of Foligno, c. 740 to c. 760 (Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Italia, iv. 401). [A. H. D. A.]

EUSEBIUS (40), bishop of Gabala, in Syria, south of Laodicea. He was present at the second general council held at Constantinople, A.D. 381. (Mansi, iii. 568; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. ii. 797.) [J. de S.]

EUSEBIUS (41), bishop of Gadara; the only known bishop of Palestine who subscribed the council of Antioch, A.D. 341. (Mansi, ii. 1307; Le Quien, Or. Chr. iii. 597.) [C. H.]

EUSEBIUS (42), bishop of Grasse, previously Antibes; vid. of Antibes, Nos. 9, 10.

EUSEBIUS (43), bishop of Heraclea Pontica, in the province of Honorias, present at the oecumenical council of Ephesus, A.D. 431. (Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 573; Mansi, iv. 1213.) [L. D.]

EUSEBIUS (44), bishop of Huesca, signs acts of the eighth council of Toledo, A.D. 653 (Aguirre-Catalani, iii. 448). [M. A. W.]

EUSEBIUS (45), bishop of Jabruda, in Phoenicia Secunda, north-east of Damascus; mentioned in the Acts of the council of Chalcedon, A.D. 451, by his Metropolitan Theodorus of Damascus, who signed in the name of certain absent bishops. (Mansi, vii. 169; Le Quien, Or. Christ. ii. 845.) [J. de S.]

EUSEBIUS (46), supposed patriarch of Jerusalem; mentioned only in Hugo's Life of Magdalene (cap. 2, § 28, in Boll. Acta SS. 4 Oct. t. 300), where it is related that this saint, on making a pilgrimage to Jerusalem, is honourably received there by the patriarch Eusebius. Le Quien, who discusses the subject fully (Or. Chr. ii. 209), places him between Theodorus I. and Theodorus II. cir. A.D. 772. See also Papebroch on the Patriarchs of Jerusalem, in Boll. Acta SS. ix. i. Introd. p. xxvii. [C. H.]

EUSEBIUS (47), bishop of Jubaltiana, in the Byzacene province of Africa. One of the catholic bishops summoned to a conference with the Arians at Carthage, and subsequently sent into exile, where he died, by Hunneric the Vandal king of Africa, A.D. 484 (Morcelli, Africa Christ. i. 192; Notitia in Victor. Vit. 58, Migne, Patrol. Lat. lviii.). [L. D.]

EUSEBIUS (48), bishop of Laodicea, in Syria Prima. He was a native of Alexandria, where he became a deacon. In the persecution under Valerian, A.D. 257, when the venerable bishop Dionysius had been banished from Alexandria, Eusebius remained behind in the city, ministering to the confessors in prison, and burying the dead bodies of the martyrs. The faithfulness of his services is gratefully commemorated in a letter of Dionysius (apud Euseb. H. E. vii. 11). During the civil strife which followed the death of Valerian, when Alexandria was in revolt, A.D. 262, Aemilianus, who had assumed the purple, was driven into the strong quarter of the city called Bruchium, where he was besieged by Theodotus, the general of Gallienus, and was hard pressed by famine. Eusebius without the entrenchments, and his friend Anatolius within the besieged quarter, strenuously exerted themselves to lessen the horrors of the siege. Eusebius having obtained promise of quarter from Theodotus for all who would surrender themselves, informed Anatolius, who induced the senate, cooped up in Bruchium, to accept the terms for all useless hands. Nearly the whole of the besieged availed themselves of this opportunity of escape, including a large number of Christians, many disguising themselves as women and making their way out by night. The fugitives were kindly received by Eusebius, who supplied them with food and medicine, and carefully tended the sick and suffering. On the summoning of the synod at Antioch, A.D. 264, to consider the charges against Paul of Samosata, Dionysius, bishop of Alexandria, being unable to be present through age, commissioned Eusebius as his representative. The see of Laodicea was then vacant. The Laodiceans resolved that Eusebius should be their bishop, and when he was about to refuse he was seized and forcibly consecrated. As bishop of Laodicea he sat at the synod when Paul of Samosata was deposed, A.D. 270. He was succeeded by his old friend Anatolius διδόχος ἀγαθὸς ἀγαθοῦ. (Euseb. H. E. vii. 11; ibid. 32; Tillemont, Mém. Eccles. iv. 304; Le Quien, Or. Christ. ii. 792; Neale, Patriarchate of Alexandria, i. 77; Patric. of Antioch, 54.) [E. V.]

EUSEBIUS (49), bishop of Larissa, in Syria Secunda, south of Apamea. He signed the synodical epistle of the province of Syria Secunda addressed to Joannes, A.D. 518. (Mansi, viii. 1049; Le Quien, Or. Christ. ii. 920.) [J. de S.]

EUSEBIUS (50), fifth bishop of Le Puy, following Roricus I. and succeeded by St. Paulianus. (Gall. Christ. ii. 688; Gams, Series Episc. 608.) [S. A. B.]

EUSEBIUS (51), one of the bishops of Macedonia addressed by Innocent I. (Ep. 17, Pat. Lat. xx. 527), and doubtless the one of the same name among the Macedonian bishops whom Chrysostom

thanks for their firm adherence, A.D. 406. (Chrysost. Ep. 163; Pat. Gr. lii. 706.) [C. H.]

EUSEBIUS (52), ST., sixth bishop of Mâcon, succeeding St. Justus, and followed by Florentinus; present at the following councils, Mâcon, A.D. 583, Lyons in the same year, and Valentia in the year 584 or 585. He was buried in the church of St. Clement at Mâcon. (Gall. Christ. iv. 1041. Mansi, ix. 936, 943, 946.)

[S. A. B.]

EUSEBIUS (53), bishop of Magnesia on the Maeander in the province of Asia, one of the Arian seceders to Philippopolis from the council of Sardica, A.D. 347. (Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 697; Mansi, iii. 139.)

[L. D.]

EUSEBIUS (54), bishop of Magnesia, near Mount Sipylus, in the province of Asia, present at the council of Ephesus A.D. 431. (Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 735; Mansi, iv. 1215.)

[L. D.]

EUSEBIUS (55), bishop of Maranopolis, an unknown town in Mesopotamia, subscribing to the council of Chalcedon, A.D. 451, through his metropolitan, Simeon bishop of Amida. (Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 1007; Mansi, vii. 165.)

EUSEBIUS (56), twenty-second bishop of Milan, between Lazarus and Geruntius, succeeding the former in 449. He was one of the bishops of Milan to whom Ennodius, bishop of Pavia, in the succeeding generation dedicated epigrams in verse. This author calls Eusebius a Greek, who came into those parts from the East out of regard to a people that were strangers to him. At the time of his election to the see he was a deacon at Milan, and Ughelli states, upon what authority does not appear, that he was consecrated by pope Leo the Great. At the period of his accession the controversy was on foot that led to the assembling of the fourth general council, which commenced at Chalcedon on Oct. 8, 451. In anticipation of it Eusebius, at Leo's request, held a synod of his province, in which was considered the important letter which Leo had recently addressed to Flavian patriarch of Constantinople, giving his view of the doctrine in dispute. The letter was entirely satisfactory to the synod of Milan, the particulars of which are known from an extant synodical epistle of Eusebius addressed to Leo, and now printed among the epistles of Leo (ep. 97 in Pat. Lat. liv. 945), and in Mansi (vi. 141). Its editorial date is August or September, 451, and it was signed by or on behalf of eighteen suffragans. According to the traditions of the church of Milan, as related by Ughelli and Cappelletti, Eusebius shewed much zeal in restoring the churches which had been ruined by the Gothic invasion of north Italy, and in renewing the service books which had been burnt. An ancient metrical inscription in the church of St. Thecla (given in the note at Ennodius as cited below) commemorates him as the restorer of that church in particular, after its destruction by fire. Ughelli states that Eusebius was present at pope Hilary's synod at Rome, Nov. 17, 465, and that, returning to Milan, he died Aug. 12, 466, and was buried in the basilica of St. Stephen. But in the list of bishops attending the Roman synod his name is not included, nor is Milan represented at all (Mansi, vii. 965), a circumstance which suggests either that the see was then vacant, or that Eusebius was in his last illness. Cappelletti does not accept Ughelli's statement, but believes Eusebius to have died in 465. (Ughelli, Ital. Sacr. iv. 50; Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Italia, xi. 110, 301; Ennod. Carm. lib. ii. carm. 86 in Pat. Lat. lxiii. 350.) [C. H.]

EUSEBIUS (57), bishop of Miletus; his name is found in the list of the Nicene fathers, A.D. 325. (Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 919; Mansi, ii. 695.)

EUSEBIUS (58), bishop of Nantes, present at the first council of Tours, 461. (Sirmond, Concilia Galliae, i. 126; Gall. Christ. xiv. 797.)

EUSEBIUS (59), bishop of Naples, c. 644-650. (Gesta Episcoporum Neapolitanorum, part i. 28, in Scriptores Rerum Italicarum et Lingob. 1878, p. 416.)

[A. H. D. A.]

EUSEBIUS (60), bishop of NICOMEDIA. Our knowledge of the character of this prelate is derived almost exclusively from the embittered language of his theological antagonists, and from the hints given by them concerning the extraordinary influence he wielded over the fortunes of some of the great party leaders of the 4th century. The fascination Eusebius exercised over the minds of Constantine and Constantius, the dexterity with which he utilized both secular and ecclesiastical law, in order to punish his theological enemies, the ingenuity with which he blinded the judgment of those who were not alive to the magnitude of the problem then under discussion, and persuaded the unwary into a belief of the practical identity of his personal views with those of the Catholic church, together with the political and personal ascendancy he achieved, reveal mental capacity and diplomatic skill worthy of a better cause. During twenty years his shadow haunts the pages of the ecclesiastical historians of the period, though they seldom bring us face to face with the man, or preserve either his spoken words or his correspondence. Some of the most noteworthy expressions of his thought which have survived have been latterly brought into discredit. The chronology of his life is singularly perplexed, and while studying it we must steer our way through conflicting statements of the only authorities to which we can appeal.

It is difficult to understand the pertinacity and even ferocity with which Eusebius and his party pursued the Homoousian leaders, and to reconcile their sleepless and dogged antagonism to the great Catholic bishops with their well-accredited compromises, their shiftings of front, and their theological evasions. Dr. Newman (The Arians of the Fourth Century, p. 272) admits their consistency in one thing, "their hatred of the sacred mystery." He thinks that this mystery, "like a spectre, was haunting the field and disturbing the complacency of their intellectual investigations." Their consciences did not scruple to "find evasions of a test." They undoubtedly compromised themselves by signature, and if they were as unscrupulous as their enemies supposed, might thenceforward have dismissed the controversy from their minds. Yet, as a matter of fact, they did not treat as either insignificant or unimportant that which they were in the habit of declaring to be such; but they set all the machinery of church and empire in motion to enforce their latitudinarian view on the conscience of the church.

The controversy between the Arian and the orthodox turns on problems and inquiries of which the full solution lies beyond the range of the human intellect. They agreed as to the unique and exalted dignity of the Son of God, they both alike described the relation between the first and second hypostasis in the Godhead, as that which is imaged to us in the paternal and filial relation. They even agreed that the Son was "begotten of His Father before all worlds"—before the commencement of time, in an ineffable manner—that the Son was the originator of the categories of time and place, that "by His own will and counsel He has subsisted before time and before ages, as perfect God, only begotten and unchangeable." (Letter of Arius to Eusebius of Nicomedia preserved by Theodoret, i. 5.) They agreed that He was "God of God," "Light of Light," and worthy of all honour and worship. The orthodox went further, and in order to show that the Deity of the Son of God was absolute and not relative, infinite and not finite, asserted that He was of the same ousia with the Father. There Arius and Eusebius stopped, and passing the significance of the image of Father and Son by materialistic analogies into logical conclusions, they argued that "generation" implied that "there was [a period, rather than a 'time'] when He was not," that "He was not before He was begotten." The one element, said they, which the Son did not possess by his generation was the eternal, absolute ousia of the Father. Arius wrote that to say the contrary was an "impiety to which we could not listen, even though the heretics (meaning the party of Alexander) should threaten us with a thousand deaths" (Theod. i. 5). "We affirm," said Eusebius, in his one extant authentic letter, addressed to Paulinus of Tyre (Theod. i. 6), that "there is no one who is unbegotten, and that there also exists another, who did in truth proceed from Him, yet who was not made out of His substance, and who does not at all participate in the nature or substance of Him who is unbegotten." The mind grows dizzy in this exalted region of speculation, and thought trembles as it dogmatizes on the eternal nature of the internal "relations" and the nature of the "absolute" and Infinite God; but if we follow out the logical conclusions that are involved in the denial of the orthodox statement on this transcendental theme, it is more easy to understand the abhorrence with which the dogmatic negations of the Arians were regarded by the Catholic church.

The position taken by Arius and Eusebius involved a virtual Ditheism, and re-opened the door to a novel Polytheism. After Christianity had triumphed over the gods of heathendom, Arius seemed to be re-introducing them under other names. The numerical unity of God was at stake in these speculations; and a schism, or at least a divarication of interests in the Godhead, seems to be possible. Moreover the 'Divinity' of the incarnate Word was on this hypothesis less than God; and so behind the Deity which He claimed there loomed another Godhead, between whom and Himself antagonism might easily be predicated. The Gnosticism of Marcion had already drawn such antagonism into sharp outline, and the entire view of the person of the Lord, thus suggested, rapidly degenerated into a cold and unchristian humanitarianism.

The exigencies of historic criticism and of the exegesis of the New Testament compelled the Arian party to discriminate between the Word, the power, the wisdom of God, and the Son. They could not escape the conclusion, since God could never have been without His "logos," that the logos was in some sense eternal. They could not honestly apply their negative formulae to the logos, and so took advantage of the distinction drawn in the Greek schools between λόγος ἐνδιδόχους, identifiable with the wisdom, reason, and self-consciousness of God, and λόγος προφητικός, the setting forth and going out at a particular epoch of the divine energy. The latter they regarded as the λόγος which was made flesh and might be equated with the Son. "The external (prophetic) word was a created Being made in the beginning of all things as the visible emblem of the internal (endiathetic) word, and (used as) the instrument of God's purposes towards His creation." (Newman, l.c. 199; cf. Athan. Hist. Conc. Arim. et Seleuc. cap. ii. § 18.)

The orthodox party admitted the double use of the word λόγος, allowed that it answered to the eternal wisdom and also to the eternal manifestation of God, and discarding the trammels of the figurative expression by which the internal relations of the Godhead can alone be represented to us, they declared that they could not carry the materialistic or temporal accompaniments of our idea of Father and Son into this "generation," and boldly accepted the sublime paradox with which Origen had refuted Sabellianism, viz. the "eternal generation of the Son." To suppose the relation between the Father and Son other than eternal was to be involved in the toils of a polytheistic emanation and Gnostic speculation. As they were compelled to formulate expressions about the infinite and eternal God, they concluded that any formula which divided the essence of God left infinity on the one side, and the finite on the other, i.e. that there would be, on this hypothesis, an infinite difference even in majesty and glory between the Father and the Son. This was blasphemy to those who held the Divinity of the Son of God.

The controversy was embittered by the method in which Arius and Eusebius appealed to Holy Scripture. They urged that Godhead and participation in the divine nature were attributed to the Lord Jesus Christ in the same terms in which similar distinctions are yielded by God's will and appointment to other creatures, angelic, human, or physical (Theod. H. E. i. 6, 8), and thus the rank in the universe of the Redeemer of the world might be indefinitely reduced, and all the confidence placed in Him ultimately proved to be an illusion. The method of argument had a tone of gross irreverence, even if the leaders can be quite acquitted of blasphemous levity or intentional abuse. It is difficult adequately to appreciate the wrath shewn by Athanasius (Contra Arianos, Serm. i. 1; De Conc. Ar. &c. cap. ii.) against the metre chosen by Arius for the composition of his Thalia. He and Eusebius doubtless calculated the effect which would be produced by the elephantine joke which roused the ire of the church Fathers. At any rate, we can see that if the angle of the original controversy be almost microscopic to modern eyes, yet the arc subtending the angle may itself become infinite if we follow out to the full its legitimate consequences. Two perfectly parallel lines may apparently correspond with two lines which intersect at a great distance, yet a measureless difference between them will manifest itself if we follow our two pairs of lines out into infinity.

One of the tactics adopted by the Arian or Eusebian party was to accuse of Sabellianism those who did not accept their interpretation of the relation between the Father and the Son. We can easily believe that many Arians, and many Catholics, who were not versed in philosophical discussion, were incapable of discriminating between the views of Sabellius and an orthodoxy which vehemently or unguardedly condemned the Arian position. Eusebius repudiated violently the Pantheistic tendency of the Sabellian doctrine. They dreaded a merely modal Trinity. It was perilous in their opinion to regard Father, Son, and Holy Ghost as merely subjective aspects of the Divine Being. They repudiated an "incarnation of the Logos (which) became little more than a figurative personality of divine power in the life and conduct of a mere man." (Newman.) It was politic of them to charge Athanasius, Eustathius, Marcellus of Ancyra, and others, with Sabellianism, and endeavour to make the world, if not the church, believe that the tables were turned, that they alone held the Catholic faith, and that those who refused to tolerate their negative definitions were "impious heretics."

Eusebius of Nicomedia is the most prominent and most distinguished man of the entire movement. It has been confidently and plausibly argued that Eusebius was the teacher rather than the disciple of Arius. Athanasius himself made the suggestion. At all events, we learn on good authority, that of Arius himself, that they were fellow disciples of Lucian of Antioch (Theodoret, H. E. i. 5). It is true that Lucian afterwards modified his views, and became a martyr for the faith, but his rationalizing spirit produced a great effect on the schools of Antioch. Antioch was singularly prepared by Jewish prejudices, and by the remains of the Ebionitic and Essenic spirit which lingered in certain parts of Syria, Asia Minor, and Mesopotamia [PAULUS OF SAMOSATA] to receive a rationale of the person of Christ, which was deprived of its mystery and of its authoritative claims. Aristotelian logic was quickening an incipient nominalism, and broad eclecticism was growing rank in the schools of Antioch. Lucian imbibed and consecrated the tendency. Eusebius submitted to his influence before he came into contact with Arius. According to Ammianus Marcellinus,^b Eusebius was a distant relative of the emperor Julian, and therefore possibly a relative of Constantine.^c ^b The Benedictines make conjectures as to this relationship between Julian and Eusebius; Tillemont, however, can see no good ground for them (Mém. vi. 741).

We know nothing further of his early history, nor how he came to enter or serve the church. Constantine implies that at one time he was the friend and supporter of Licinius. It may have been through the wife of Licinius and sister of Constantine that he received his first ecclesiastical appointment. This was the bishopric of Berytus (Beirut) in Syria, the port which would be much used by all travellers from Antioch or Damascus to the West. We cannot say under what pretext he was translated to the episcopal see of Nicomedia, a city which since the accession of Diocletian was still the principal seat of the imperial court. The Encyclical Letter of the Egyptian Council comments severely on the step: "He left the one see contrary to the law, and contrary to the law invaded the other; he deserted his own see, for he failed in affection, and took possession of another's, though he failed in a plea."^d In Nicomedia the ambitious spirit of Eusebius, and personal relations with the imperial family, gave him much influence. "He was," says Sozomen (H. E. i. 15), "a man of considerable learning, and held in high repute at the palace." The palace and cathedral of Nicomedia were memorable in the history of Christianity [DIOCLETIAN], and here were spun the webs by which the Arian conspiracy for a while prevailed over the faith and discipline of the church. One of the most authoritative documents of Arianism is a letter sent by Arius to Eusebius of Nicomedia, when stung by what he describes as his persecution and affliction, following the first suspension of his presbyteral functions at Baucalis, Alexandria, and in which [ARIUS] he reminds Eusebius of their ancient friendship, and briefly states his own views. He boasts that Eusebius of Caesarea, Theodotus of Laodicea, Paulinus of Tyre, Athanasius of Anazarbus, Gregory of Berytus, Aetius of Lydda, and all the bishops of the East, if he is condemned, must be condemned with him (Theod. H. E. i. 5). There is no subtlety of thought or expression in this letter, but a tone of honest and stupefied indignation that ideas which he regards as fundamental should be assailed by "the impieties" which were subsequently enshrined in the creed of Nicaea. The alarm created by the conduct of Arius and the numerous friends which he appeared to make in high quarters induced Alexander of Alexandria to indite his famous letter to Alexander of Constantinople, which has something of an encyclical character, and which was sent in some analogous form to Eusebius of Nicomedia and to other prelates. Exasperated by its tone, the latter called a council in Bithynia (most likely at Nicomedia itself) of the friends of Arius, who took it upon themselves to address numerous bishops, desiring them to grant communion to the Arians, and requiring Alexander himself to do the like (Soz. i. 15).

Moreover these proceedings drew from Eusebius a written expression of his views, in a letter to Paulinus of Tyre. This epistle is preserved by Theodoret (i. 6). Eusebius at that time believed Alexander of Alexandria to be in doc-him, error, but not so far gone but that Paulinus, if he were to try, might put him right. It is the tacit assumption that the party of Alexandria asserted "two unbegotten beings," a position utterly denied by themselves. He repudiated strongly the idea that the Son was made in any sense out of the substance of God. In fact, he declares the Son "to be entirely distinct in nature and power," that the method of His generation is known only to God, not even to the Son Himself. Stress is laid by Eusebius on the use of the verb "created," in Prov. viii. 22-26. The term, he said, could not have been used if the "wisdom" of which the prophet was speaking was ἐξ ἀκρόποδος τῆς οὐράς. "For that which proceeds from Him who is unbegotten must be said to have been created or founded either by Him or by another." The effect of the word "begotten" is reduced to its minimum by saying that the term is used of "things," and of persons entirely different in nature from God. "Man," "Israel," and "drops of dew" are in different scriptures said to be "begotten" of God. Therefore, Eusebius argued, the term cannot and does not carry similarity, still less identity of nature.

On the first exhibition of the divergent opinions of Alexander and Arius, the emperor Constantine treated the conflict as if it were capable of easy adjustment by a wise exercise of Christian temper. In the year 324 he wrote them a joint letter, which he entrusted to Rufinus of Cordova (Sozomen, H. E. i. 16), in which he called upon the disputants for his aid, and for the sake of peace, to terminate their controversy. The dispute was a "trifling and foolish verbal dispute," and he called on the disputants to regard the problem as secondary, and to urge that any difference of judgment was compatible with union and communion on their part. It is highly probable that the mind of Constantine had been led to this step by the bishop of Nicomedia, while the strong pressure put upon Alexander to receive Arius into communion corresponds with the subsequent and persistent demand of the Eusebians. The effort at solution failed, although it was conducted by the skilful diplomacy and tact of the venerable bishop. As the dispute was no mere verbal squabble, but did in reality touch the very object of Divine worship, the ground of religious hope, and the unity of the Godhead, such words of restraint poured fresh oil on the flame. Arius was again condemned by a council at Alexandria, the entire East was disturbed, and the well-known interference of the emperor augmented the animosity of the disputants. The angry letter of Constantine to Arius, which must have been written after his condemnation by the Alexandrian council and before the council of Nicaea, shews that the influence of Eusebius must now have been in abeyance.* Though Constantine was no theologian, he hated a recalcitrant subordinate in church or state, and hence the undoubted vacillation of his mind towards Alexander, Arius, Eusebius, and Athanasius. The next appearance of Eusebius is at the oecumenical council of Nicaea in 325, where he does not hesitate to play the part of the defender of the excommunicated presbyter, and to be the advocate and interpreter of his opinions before the council. We must concede to him some credit for moral courage in risking his position, not only as a bishop, but as a court favourite, for the sake of his theological views, and in opposing himself almost single-handed to the nearly unanimous judgment of the first representative assembly of the Christian episcopate—a judgment now fanned into enthusiasm by the breath of martyrs and monks from the African monasteries, and accepted hurriedly but passionately by the emperor of the world. The courage was of short duration, and made way for disingenuous wiles. He soon displayed an inconsistent and temporizing spirit. Whether he continued to hold that the discussion covered a merely verbal difference, we know not, but it is certain that when the Arian bishops in the council found that the Godhead of the Redeemer was declared by the vast majority to be of the very essence of Christian doctrine, they made every effort to accept the terms in which that Godhead was being expressed by the council, making signs to each other that term after term, such as "Power of God," "Wisdom of God," "Image of God," "Very God of very God," might be accepted because they could use them of such divinity as was "made" or constituted as such by the Divine appointment. Thus they were becoming parties to a test, which they were at the same moment intending to evade. The term Homoousion, as applied to the Son of God, rallied for a while their conscience, and Eusebius declared it to be untenable. According to Theodoret (i. 8), the "formularly propounded by Eusebius contained undisguised evidence of his blasphemy; the reading of it occasioned great grief to the audience on account of the depravity of the doctrines; the writer was covered with shame, and the impious writing was torn to pieces." The feebleness and inconsistency of the Arian party is exaggerated by Theodoret, for he adds, "the Arians unanimously signed the confession of faith adopted by the council." This is not precisely the case. There were seventeen bishops (Soz. i. 20),† who in the first instance refused their signatures, among them both the Eusebii, Theognis of Nicaea, Menophantus of Ephesus, Secundus of Ptolemais, Theonas, Patrophilus, Narcissus, Maris, and others. Eusebius of Caesarea, after long discussion, signed the symbol, which was in fact an enlargement of a formal creed that he had himself presented to the council in its entirety, on the ground that the negative dogmata of the Arian party, which were anathematized by the council, could not be found in Scripture. Others of his party followed. According to Theodoret (i. 9), they all, with the exception of Secundus and Theonas, joined in the condemnation of Arius, and Sozomen (i. 21) declares explicitly that Eusebius of Nicomedia, with others, "sanctioned" the decision of the synod as to the consubstantiality of the Son, and the excommunication of those who held the Arian formulae; but Sozomen goes on to say that "it ought to be known that Eusebius and Theognis, although they assented to the exposition of faith set forth by the council, neither agreed nor subscribed to the deposition of Arius." He may have drawn a distinction between anathematizing his supposed views, and consenting to the ecclesiastical and civil degradation of the man. Otherwise these two statements are somewhat inconsistent. Sozomen, apparently, makes this refusal to sign, on the part of Eusebius and Theognis, to have been the reason or occasion of their own exile, and of the filling up by Constantine of their respective sees with Amphion and Chrestus. Philostorgius^s seems, in the fragments of his worthless history which remain, to have put another colour upon the transaction. He admitted that the whole rank and file of the Arian party, with the exception of Secundus and Theonas, signed the symbol, and adds that they did it deceitfully (δὲ δόλῳ), and with the mental reservation of substituting in their case ὁμοιούσιον (of similar substance), for ὁμοούσιον (of the same substance). He adds, according to his editor, that they did this under the direction of Constantina, the sister of Constantine; and further he relates that "Secundus, when sent into exile, reproached Eusebius for having signed, saying that he did so in order to avoid going into exile, and that Secundus expressed a confident hope that Eusebius would shortly be exiled, an event which took place three months after the council." Moreover Athanasius (de Decretis Syn. Nic. cc. 3, 18) expressly says that Eusebius signed the formulary, and made no reference to any reservation of either kind.

Notwithstanding their signature, for a reason which is not cleared up perfectly, Eusebius and Theognis were banished for nearly three years from their respective sees. Theodoret (H. E. i. 20) preserves a portion of a letter written by the emperor Constantine against Eusebius and Theognis, and addressed to the Nicomedians. The document displays bitter animosity, and, for so astute a prince, a curious simplicity.^a Considerable confusion accompanies it, and Baronius has seen fit to assign its composition to a much later period. As it refers to the period of the Nicene council and the feeling then entertained by Constantine towards Eusebius, it is important. Constantine reveals a private grudge against Eusebius for his conduct when Licinius was contending with him, and he professes to have seized the accomplices of Eusebius, and to have possessed himself of damaging papers and trustworthy evidence against him. He reproaches Eusebius with having been the first defender of Arius, and with having deceived him in hope of retaining his benefice. This is coupled with angry reference to the conduct of Eusebius in urging on Alexandrians and others the duty of communion with the Arians. And this pertinacity is suggested by Constantine as the actuating cause and occasion of his exile.

Now Epiphanius (Hær. lxxviii.)¹ details the circumstances of the union of the Meletian schismatics with the Arians, and the disingenuous part taken by Eusebius in promising his good offices with the emperor, if they in their turn would promote the return of Arius to Alexandria, and would promise inter-communion with him and his party. "I was myself deluded and deceived by Eusebius," said Constantine.¹ "In everything he acted according to the desire of him whose mind is full of evil. . . . I sent orders for the apprehension of certain individuals in Alexandria who opposed our faith (i.e. Arians), but those good and excellent bishops who by the clemency of the council had been admitted to penitence (i.e. Meletians), not only received them under their protection, but also participated in their evil deeds. Hence I came to the determination of banishing those ungrateful persons to some far distant region." This, doubtless from its connexion, refers to Eusebius and Theognis.

The terms of hatred and disgust with which Constantine speaks of Eusebius in this letter, render his early return to Nicomedia very puzzling. Sozomen (ii. 16) and Socrates (i. 14) both record a letter which in the year A.D. 328. Eusebius and Theognis wrote, not to Constantine, but to "the Bishops," explanatory of their views, in which these men say, "We hold the same faith that you do, and that after a diligent examination of the word ὁμοούσιος, we are wholly intent upon preserving peace, and that we are seduced by no heresy. Having proposed for the safety of the church such suggestions as occurred to us, and having certified what we deemed requisite, we signed the confession of faith. We did not certainly sign the anathemas, but this was not because we impugned the confession of faith, but because we did not believe the accused to be what he was represented to us, the letters we had received from him and the discourses he had delivered in our presence compelling us to entertain a contrary opinion of him. So far from opposing any of the decrees enacted in your holy synod, we assent to all of them—not because we are wearied of exile, but because we wish to avert all suspicion of heresy. . . . The accused having justified himself and having been recalled from exile, &c. &c. we beseech you to make our supplications known to our most godly emperor, and that you immediately direct us to act according to your will." If this letter is a genuine utterance of the mind of Eusebius, it demonstrates the fact of his partial and incomplete signature of the symbol of Nicaea, and that the incompleteness turned on personal and not on doctrinal grounds. It vindicates somewhat the character of Eusebius, it assigns the cause of the exile to that inchoate signature, it implies the return of Arius from exile, independently of his personal influence, and reveals what must be granted to be a certain chivalrous regard to the character and safety of Arius. Other statements of Sozomen (ii. 27) are in harmony with it, for he relates that an Arian priest was on terms of intimacy with Constantina (sister of Constantine and widow of Licinius), who represented to her that Arius was the victim of Alexander's personal enmity. Sozomen further that she, as a dying request, besought Constantine not to leave good men in perpetual banishment, and that this induced Constantine to permit Arius to draw up an artfully-drawn document expressive of his faith, which caused a synod of bishops at Jerusalem, and was enough to placate the vacillating mind of the emperor.

There are reasons for hesitating to receive these statements. The part said to be taken by Constantine in the return of Arius is hampered by serious chronological difficulties; but the letter itself is in obvious contradiction with the evidence already offered that Eusebius and Theognis signed the symbol, anathemas and all. If they had not signed, they would have been banished then and there, and not as Philostorgius says, "three months after the council," in Nov. 325. Even Socrates implies it was after the council. The banishment could not have taken place in the midst of the troubles of Athanasius, or he would in his numerous references to Eusebius have mentioned it. De Broglie¹ urges that it would be much more probable that some other influence brought a bar on Constantine should have first secured the return of the bishops, and then that they should have secured the recall of Arius from Syria. The circumstance that it should have been addressed to the bishops rather than to Constantine is treated as suspicious, because Eusebius had not been condemned by them, since he had signed the formularies. The alleged spuriousness of the letter, on the other hand, rests upon the assertions of Philostorgius (l. 9), and Epiphanius (lxxviii. 5) that Eusebius did join in the anathemas and sign in toto. Are we to believe them against the conjoint testimony of Sozomen and Socrates, who expressly give a consistent representation of another kind, and are undoubtedly more favourable to Eusebius? The difficulty about the recall of Arius may be reduced by a statement of Sozomen (l. 12) that Eusebius and Theognis secured the return of Arius to Alexandria, whereas the letter given by Sozomen and Socrates merely refers to his recall from exile.

The most powerful argument of De Broglie and others against the genuineness of the letter, being written from the exile of Eusebius, is the silence of Athanasius, who never once makes use of the argument it would have put into his hands, as to the identity of the position and sentiments of Arius and Eusebius.

Philostorgius² tells us another rumour that after the council Eusebius desired to have his name expunged from the list of signatures, and a similar statement is repeated by Sozomen (l. 11) as the possible cause of the banishment of Eusebius. The fact may, notwithstanding the adverse judgment of many historians, have been that Eusebius signed the formulary, expressing at the time the view he took of its meaning, and how he discriminated between an anathema of certain positions and the persecution of an individual. It is probable that a signature, thus qualified, may have saved him from immediate banishment, that in the course of three months his sympathy with Arius as a deposed and banished man probed old sores in the mind of Constantine, and his underhand proceeding with the Meletians roused the emperor's indignation and led to his banishment. The probability that Arius was recalled first, as positively stated in what purports to be a contemporary document, is certainly greater than that merely à priori probability on which De Broglie insists. Moreover, if Arius had been restored to favour, the vacillating mind of Constantine may have been moved to recall the two bishops. At all events, about 329 we find Eusebius once more in high favour with Constantine (Socrates, H. E. i. 23), discharging his episcopal functions, persuading Constantine that he and Arius held substantially the creed of Nicaea.

The course thenceforward pursued by Eusebius was to use his great power at the court, and the ascendancy he had again acquired over the mind of Constantine to blast the character and quench the influence of the most distinguished advocates of the anti-Arian views. He put all the machinery of church and state into operation to unseat Athanasius, Eustathius, Marcellus, and others; and by means which are open to the severest reprehension, he steadily and unscrupulously strove to enforce his latitudinarian compromise on the Catholic church. In the first place, it is not difficult to trace his hand in the letter Constantine addressed to Athanasius, now archbishop of Alexandria,³ in which Constantine threatened Athanasius with deposition if he did not admit to the church those who were anxious for such communion. Moreover, Athanasius assures us that Eusebius wrote to him personally with the same object in view.

The answers rendered by Athanasius both to Eusebius and to the emperor made it clear that the project could never succeed so long as Athanasius remained at Alexandria. This was the occasion on which the Meletians were encouraged to concoct the earliest of those charges against the honour, sobriety, and loyalty of Athanasius, which for a quarter of a century were almost lifted into articuli stantis vel cadentis ecclesiae.

While the charges against Athanasius were in process of incubation, considerable controversy had prevailed between Eusebius of Caesarea and Eustathius of Antioch on the true meaning of the important term Homousios, and while Eustathius [EUSTATHIUS (3)], in his great zeal for the Nicene faith, had strenuously refused to admit Arians into communion, he laid himself open, in the opinion of Eusebius of Caesarea, to the charge of Sabellianism (Soz. ii. 18). This provided the opportunity for Eusebius of Nicomedia to strike a blow at one of the pillars of the Nicene formulary. Nothing can exceed the treachery shewn by Eusebius on this occasion. His apparently friendly visit to Eustathius, on his way to Jerusalem (Soz. ii. 19; Theod. i. 21), the gathering of his supporters and rallying of the Arian notables, on his return to Antioch, shew the scheme to have been deeply laid. Here, A.D. 330 or beginning of 331,* the council of his friends was held, at which the charge of Sabellianism was, according to Theodoret (i. 21) and Philostorgius (ii. 7), aggravated by the accusation brought by a woman, that Eustathius was the father of her child.

Socrates makes no distinct mention of the latter charge, and it must be remembered that this was not an uncommon device of the enemies of ecclesiastics. We may charitably hope that Eusebius was not a party to the odious incrimination, but it is obvious that some such charge was brought, for Sozomen speaks of the accusation of "unholy deeds," and Eusebius,[†] the historian, appears to confirm it. The upshot was that through this and other vamped-up charges of disrespect to the emperor's mother,[‡] the bishop of Antioch was deposed and exiled by the Eusebians.

The letter of Constantine upon the affair, and against heretics generally, brought the controversy to a lull, until the first attack upon Athanasius. The career of Eusebius of Nicomedia during the remaining ten years of his life is so closely intertwined with the romantic sufferings of Athanasius that it is difficult to indicate the part he took in the persecution of Athanasius without reproducing the story of this great hero of the Catholic faith.

The first charge which Eusebius encouraged the Meletians to bring against Athanasius concerned his taxing the people of Egypt for linen vestments, and it turned upon the supposed violence of Macarius, the representative of Athanasius, in the act of reproving (for uncanonical proceedings) Ischyrae, a priest of the Colluthian sect, upon the overthrow on that occasion of the altar and the chalice. These charges were all absolutely disproved by Athanasius before Constantine at Nicomedia. On the return of Athanasius to Alexandria he had to encounter fresh opposition. The well-known but preposterous story of the murder of Arsenius, with its grotesque accompaniments, was gravely laid at his door. [ARSENIUS; ATHANASIUS.] To this, at first, he disdained to reply. Eusebius declared even this to be a serious charge, and made much capital out of the refusal of Athanasius to attend the council at Caesarea, which was summoned, among other causes, to investigate it (Theod. i. 28). In 335, at the council of Tyre, Athanasius was compelled to attend, and meet a complicated series of accusations of the most varied character.[§] Though these charges were refuted in the most convincing manner, Athanasius had no chance with his infuriated calumniators, who sat as his judges, and who refused even the evidence of their own senses in favour of the accused prelate, and he fled to Constantinople, to lay his case once more before the emperor. In his absence, the council of Tyre passed a sentence of deposition, which Arsenius, who was said to have been murdered by him, and who had confessed his sin and shame in extant letters to Athanasius, actually signed. Constantine summoned the whole synod of Tyre before him. Eusebius and a few of his party, Theognis, Patrophilus, Valens, and Ursacius, obeyed the summons, and confronted Athanasius. Instead of standing on the veracity of the disproved charges, upon which nevertheless the sentence of deposition rested, Eusebius and his friends met him with new accusations, likely to damage him in the view of the emperor. When Athanasius protested that he was utterly unable to do that which was alleged, viz., prevent the importation of corn from Alexandria to Constantinople, Eusebius thundered him down with the declaration that he was a rich man, and could do what he pleased. Constantine yielded to the apparently malicious invention of Eusebius, and banished Athanasius to Treves, in Feb. 336.* The cause of banishment is obscure, as Sozomen says nothing about the delay of the corn-ships, while Athanasius himself (Apol. c. Ar.) says that this charge had been raised in Constantine's own letters. The statements of the Apology (§ 9, § 87) are slightly divergent, and twice over (Ap. § 87, Hist. Ar. § 50) Athanasius declares that Constantine sent him to Gaul in order to deliver him from the fury of his enemies. While Athanasius was in exile, Eusebius and his party aimed a second blow, by impeaching Marcellus of Ancyra for refusing to appear at the Council of Dedication at Jerusalem, A.D. 335, and also for Sabellianism, an implication of heresy to which he exposed himself while zealously vindicating his refusal to hold communion with Arians.[†] [ASTERIUS; MARCELLUS.] Marcellus was deposed by the Eusebians, and not restored to this see till the council of Sardica reinstated him.

Arius was present at the Council of Dedication, at Jerusalem, and having propounded a view of his faith, which was satisfactory to the council, he was received into the communion of the church, and sent by Eusebius to Alexandria, whence, as his presence created great disturbance, he was summoned to Constantinople. There Eusebius had planned his public reception into the church. The tragic end of Arius on the eve of his public reception, A.D. 336, is described by Sozomen (ii. 29, 30) in words quoted from Athanasius. (De Morte Arij, Ep. ad Episc.) The death of Alexander of Constantinople followed very shortly, in 336, when the effort to elect PAUL in his place (without the consent of the bishop of Nicomedia) roused the ire of Eusebius, who intrigued to secure his first deposition.[‡] Eusebius must still have retained the favour of Constantine, as he appears to have administered baptism to the dying emperor, May 337. Jerome says that by this act Constantine avowed himself an Arian. "But all history protests against the severity of this sentence" (De Broglie). Hefele supposes that Constantine regarded Eusebius as the great advocate of Christian unity, and as one who felt it to be right to expel from positions of importance and influence in the church those who were stumbling-blocks in the way of his comprehensive charity. Moreover, in the eyes of Constantine, Eusebius was one who had signed the Nicene symbol, and had renounced the opinions of Arius. Philostorgius (ii. 1) believed that Eusebius was the Arian priest to whom Constantine entrusted his "will," for presentation to his sons; it is far more probable that this functionary was the Arian priest called by later writers Eustathius, who at sundry important epochs exercised much influence over him. There is reason to think that Constantine before his death had determined to recall Athanasius, and this is the ostensible ground on which Constantine II. (Emperor of the West) took the steps necessary to secure that result. The ecclesiastical historians of the period often differ in their chronology, and perplex us by their divergent statements as to the time when Eusebius was raised to the episcopate of Constantinople. Theodoret (i. 19) accuses Eusebius of unlawful translation from Nicomedia to Constantinople, "a direct violation of that canon which prohibits bishops and presbyters from going from one city to another," and he asserts that this was the place on the death of Alexander. There is, however, proof of another kind that Paul, who was twice banished through the influence of Eusebius, was the immediate successor of Alexander.

Paul was nominated by Alexander, but the Eusebian party put forward Macedonius (Soz. ii. 4), and were defeated. The dispute thus raised roused the indignation of Constantius, and "through the machination of the enemies of Paul a synod was convened, and he was expelled from the church, and Eusebius, bishop of Nicomedia, was installed in the bishopric of Constantinople," and with this statement Socrates (ii. 7) agrees. Paul's first occupancy of the see must have been brief and troubled. Differences have been raised as to the time when Paul was first banished, and whether he suffered from the Eusebian charges before or after his elevation to the bishopric. It would seem that he was bishop when Athanasius visited Constantinople, and this visit is supposed by Pagi to have been made on his own instigation, from the vehement manner he had to advance the interests of the Catholic party in the Constantinopolitan church. According to him Athanasius must have been witness of the discomfiture of Paul and the steps which led to the election of Eusebius. For a while the education of Julian was entrusted to the courtly bishop, who had unbounded influence over Constantius. Gibbon says that Julian never expressed any gratitude to Eusebius for his instruction. Baronius* suggests, with unscrupulous bitterness, that Julian's apostasy may be attributed, in part, to the time-serving spirit of compromise conspicuous in the career of Eusebius. However that may be, the course taken by Constantius was in the main due to Eusebius.

In 340 the Eusebians held a synod at Antioch, at which Athanasius was once more condemned. In 341 (May) the council developed into the celebrated council at Encaeniis, held also at Antioch, at which, under the presidency of Eusebius or Placetus of Antioch, and with the assent and presence of Constantius, divers canons were passed, which are esteemed of authority by later oecumenical councils. These two councils are confounded and identified by Socrates (ii. 2), and by Sozomen, and strange complications have arisen from the supposition that what was treated as a true synod by Julius, and was termed by Hilary a Synodus Sanctorum, could possibly have passed resolutions condemnatory of Athanasius.*

The history of this controversy does not belong to the life of Eusebius. The cruel injustice to which Athanasius was subjected by long exile is freely attributed to Eusebius, as its mainspring and constant instigator.† Nevertheless the last thing we are told about Eusebius by Socrates (ii. 13) is that he appealed from the council of Antioch to Julius, bishop of Rome, to give the definitive sentence as to the faults and sins of Athanasius, but that before the sentence of Julius reached him, "immediately after the council broke up, breath went out of his body, and so he died," A.D. 342. He is compared by his theological opponents to Ahab. The courts of many successive emperors are supposed to have suffered from the virus of his influence, and the world to have been permanently damaged by his errors and his spite.

EUSEBIUS (64), twelfth bishop of Orleans, following Dago, and succeeded by Leontius. In his episcopate was founded the abbey of Micy, or St. Mesnin, where the Loiret flows into the Loire, in the diocese of Orleans. His signature is appended to Clovis's charter. (D'Achery, Spicilegium, iii. 307; Migne, Pat. Lat. lxxi. 1158.) In A.D. 511 he was present at the first council of Orleans, and in 518 we hear of him as burying the body of St. Laurian bishop of Seville at EUSEBIUS (65), bishop of Osca, i.e. Huesca, No. 44.

EUSEBIUS (66), bishop of Palaeopolis, a town of uncertain position in the province of Asia; present at the synod held at Constantinople under Mennas, A.D. 536. (Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 731; Mansi, viii. 1146; Gams, Series Episc. 444.) [L. D.]

EUSEBIUS (67), an orthodox bishop of Palestine, who signed the Sardican confession of faith, A.D. 343-4. (Athanas. Apolog. contr. Arian. c. iii. § 50.) [E. V.]

EUSEBIUS (68), a bishop in Palestine, one of those to whom the synodical of Theophilus bishop of Alexandria in the year 400, in condemnation of Origenism, is addressed. (Jerome, Ep. xcii.) [W. H. F.]

EUSEBIUS (69) I., bishop of Paris cir. 555, between Saffaracus and Germanus. But there is much dispute among French writers as to his existence (Gall. Christ. vii. 17). [C. H.]

EUSEBIUS (70) II., 22nd occupant of the see of Paris, succeeding Ragnemodus, A.D. 591. Gregory of Tours gives the following account of him. Ragnemodus bishop of Paris died: his brother Faramodus, a priest, was a candidate for the office, but one Eusebius, a merchant of Syrian birth, by dint of many presents obtained the see. Made bishop he dismissed the whole schola (according to Ruinart, the readers, singers, and others who were under the direction of the archdeacon) of his predecessor, and appointed his fellow-countrymen to the offices of the church. Eusebius, however, did not enjoy his honours long, and on his death he was succeeded by the Faramodus or Faramundus, whom he had disappointed. (Greg. Tur. Hist. Franc. x. 26 in Migne, Patr. Lat. lxxi. 558; Gall. Christ. vii. 22.) [S. A. B.]

EUSEBIUS (71), bishop of Pelusium, between Ammonius and Georgius. He was present at the council of Ephesus in 431 (Mansi, iv. 1127 A, 1219 B, 1366 D, v. 615 C). His contemporary Isidore, abbat of Pelusium, depicts him in the darkest colours. Eusebius, according to this account—which we have no means of checking—was a man of some taste and some ability, an “agreeable” preacher (Ep. i. 112; cp. v. 301), but at once hot-tempered (v. 196; cp. iii. 44) and easily swayed by men yet worse than himself (Ep. ii. 127; v. 451); his hands were not clear of simoniacal gain, which he employed in the building of a splendid church (i. 37; ii. 246); he “entrusted the flock to dogs, wolves, foxes” (v. 147), “the monasteries to herdsmen and runaway slaves” (i. 262); he was forgetful of the poor, and inaccessible to remonstrance (iii. 260). His confidants were Lucius, the archdeacon, who was said to take money for ordinations (i. 29); Zosimus, a priest, who disgraced his grey hairs by vices which exceeded those of his youth (i. 140; ii. 75, 205, &c.), and took to himself contributions meant for the poor (Ep. v. 210); and three deacons, Eustathius, Anatolius, and Maron (Ep. i. 223; ii. 28, 29, &c.), with whom Gotthius (Ep. ii. 10), Simon, and Chaeremon (Ep. v. 48, 373) are associated. The greediness of those who administered the church property was insatiable (Ep. v. 79). The offences of these men, or of some of them, were so gross that men cried out against them as effective advocates of Epicureanism (Ep. ii. 153, 230), and Isidore had to tell his correspondents that he had done his best (as, indeed, many of his letters shew, e.g. i. 140, 436; ii. 28, 39, &c.) to reclaim the offenders, but that the physician could not compel the patient to follow his advice, that “God the Word Himself” could not save Judas (Ep. iv. 205), that a good man should not soil his lips by denouncing their conduct (Ep. iii. 229; v. 116), and that nothing remained but to pray for their conversion (Ep. v. 2, 105, &c.), and in the meantime to distinguish between the man and the office (Ep. ii. 52), and to remember that the unworthiness of the minister hindered not the effect of the sacraments (Ep. ii. 32). But the fullest account of the misgovernment of the church of Pelusium is given in the story of Martinianus (Ep. ii. 127), whom Eusebius had ordained, and made “oconomus” or church steward. He played the knave and the tyrant, treated the bishops as his tool, was more than once in peril of his life from the indignation of the citizens, went to Alexandria, was menaced by Cyril the archbishop with excommunication, but returned, and imputed to Cyril himself a participation in simony. These things, and such as these, induced many to leave Pelusium in disgust; “the altar lacked ministers” (Ep. i. 38); a pious deacon, such as Eutonium, was oppressed by Zosimus (Ep. ii. 131), and attacked by the whole clergy, to some extent out of subserviency to the bishop (v. 564).

Eusebius is not mentioned among the fathers of the council of Chalcedon in 451. In 457 he assisted, along with Peter bishop of Majuma, at the ordination of Timotheus Aelurus for the see of Alexandria (Evag. H. E. ii. 8), and those who were parties to that proceeding are stated by Theodorus Lector (H. E. i. 9) to have been deposed bishops. The epistle of the Egyptian bishops to Anatolius (Cod. Encyc. in Mansi, vii. 533 A) represents the two bishops (here unnamed) who ordained Timotheus as having no communion with the Catholic church. (Le Quien, Or. Chr. ii. 533; Tillem. Mém. xv. 747, 748, 782-788.) [W. B. and C. H.]

EUSEBIUS (72), bishop of Pergamos, one of the Arian seceders to Philippopolis from the council of Sardica, A.D. 347 (Mansi, iii. 139); Le Quien (Oriens Christ. i. 715) supposes him to be the same as Eusebius, one of the fifteen bishops who met in synod at Gangra in Paphlagonia, and condemned the heretical asceticism of Eustathius. The date of this synod is disputed. [L. D.]

EUSEBIUS (73), fifth archbishop of Rouen, succeeding Severus and followed by Marcellinus. He subscribed two councils, the doubtful one of Cologne in 346, and that of Sardica in 347. (Gall. Christ. xi. 7; Mansi, ii. 1379, iii. 67.) [S. A. B.]

EUSEBIUS (74), seventh bishop of Saintes, according to St. Trojanus, and followed by Emerius. He was present at the second council of Orleans in 533 and the fifth in 549, and according to the lib. of St. Radegundis by the nun Baudonivia (Signe, Patr. Lat. lxxii. 672) he summoned another council in conjunction with Leontius bishop of Bordeaux; but nothing further seems to be known of it. We learn from some verses of Venantius Fortunatus (lib. i. cap. xii., Patr. Lat. lxxviii. 74) that he founded a church in honour of St. Bibienus, which Leontius completed. (Gall. Christ. ii. 1057; Mansi, Conc. viii. 638 in 136.) [S. A. B.]

EUSEBIUS (75) L, ST., fourth bishop of St. Paul de Trois Châteaux in Dauphiné, between St. Sulpicius and St. Torquatus, lived perhaps about the beginning of the 3rd century. His day of commemoration is March 23. (Gall. Christ. i. 705; Gams, Series Episc. 619.) [S. A. B.]

EUSEBIUS (76) II., fourteenth bishop of St. Paul de Trois Châteaux, between Victor and Letta. He represented his predecessor at the council of Lyons in A.D. 567. As bishop, he was one of the subscribers of the second council of Valence, in 584 or 585, and, through a delegate, of the second council of Mâcon, A.D. 645. He is said to have died on March 23, and was honoured on that day in his own diocese. (Gall. Christ. i. 708; Mansi, Conc. ix. 788, 946, 947.) [S. A. B.]

EUSEBIUS (77), bishop of SAMOSATA. Samosata, the capital of Commagene on Euphrates, distant from Caesarea in Cappadocia about three hundred miles of difficult travelling, is interesting to the student of ecclesiastical history as being the early home of Paul, bishop of Antioch, between the years 260-270, whose monarchianism took a purely Unitarian form, denying the divine element in the person of Christ. Samosata is interesting between the years 360-373, being the seat of the bishopric of Eusebius, the friend alike of Basil the Great, of Theodoret, and of Gregory Nazianzen. All that is definitely known of Eusebius is gathered from the epistles of Basil and of Gregory, and from some circumstances detailed in the Ecclesiastical History of Theodoret. The fervent and laudatory pictures in which these divines address their friend might suggest hyperbole if it were not so repeated and constant. We are compelled to admit that his personal character must have been lofty and pure, that he was treated with almost unique reverence, that his singular piety and extraordinary zeal commanded the respect of his contemporaries. Gregory assures Eusebius that the severe and almost fatal illness which prevented his paying him the respect of a visit when passing through Cappadocia, gave him less pain than the disappointment of not seeing his friend, which much more to the same effect. (Ep. xxviii. Greg. Naz. Opp. ed. Prunaena, Colon. vol. i. 721) And in another letter (Ep. xxix.) he styles him "a pillar and ground of the truth," "a light-bearer to the world," a "gift of God to the church," "a rule of faith," "all these things at once and more than all put together." Gregory never hesitates to utter a panegyric, but this was in a private letter, and it corresponds with the equally exuberant way in which St. Basil of Caesarea rejoices in his presence, deprecates his absence, and extols the effect of his teaching and the enthusiasm inspired by his virtues. He was probably much older than Basil, who speaks of him in 369 in most reverential terms. (Ep. xxxiv. Basilii opera, ed. Par. tom. iii. The quotations from Basil are made according to the Paris enumeration of the letters.) We find him bishop of Samosata in the year 361, when he took part in the consecration of Meletius as bishop of Antioch. At this time Meletius was in communion with the Arians, and a coalition of bishops of both parties placed the document affirming the consecration in the hands of Eusebius. Even Tillemont admits that at this time he must himself have been in communion with the Arians. Theodoret (l. 31, 32), however, represents the election of Meletius as partly due to the ignorance of the Arians who, unaware of the real sentiments of Meletius, imagined that he was an adherent of their party and petitioned Constantius for his appointment. Moreover Theodoret says that Eusebius was a "noble defender and champion of the truth."

Meletius very soon proclaimed in an explicit way his Nicene Trinitarianism, and opened himself to the usual charge of Sabellianism, and was banished by Constantius. Meanwhile Eusebius had "returned to his own city," having in his possession the written pledge of the appointment of Meletius to the see of Antioch. The Arians were anxious to destroy this proof of their complicity with the appointment of Meletius, and persuaded Constantius to demand, by a public functionary, the reddition of the document. Eusebius replied, "I cannot consent to restore the public deposit, except at the command of the whole assembly of bishops by whom it was committed to my care." This reply incensed the emperor, who then wrote to Eusebius commanding him to deliver up the decree, threatening him with amputation of his right hand unless he complied with the injunction. Theodoret says that the threat was only meant to intimidate the bishop, if so, it failed of its effect, for Eusebius stretched out both his hands, exclaiming, "I am willing to suffer the loss of both my hands rather than resign a document which contains so manifest a demonstration of the impiety of the Arians." It is said that the bravery of Eusebius extorted the admiration of Constantius, who, however, shortly afterwards died.

On the accession of Julian many exiled bishops, orthodox and Arian, Donatist and Catholic, were restored to their sees. Among them Athanasius returned to Alexandria, and Meletius to Antioch. But in the interim, the orthodox, who had separated themselves from Euzoius, the Arian interloper, had favoured a separate community in Antioch, and they were unwilling to return to the mother church on the reappearance of the orthodox Meletius.

Eusebius of Vercelli and Lucifer of Cagliari undertook to reconcile the parties and establish concord. But Lucifer was baffled by the pertinacity of the disputants, and made matters worse by ordaining Paulinus over the orthodox separatists, forming a schismatical communion, which retained its separated church life for eighty-five years.

Tillemont hesitates to claim for Eusebius, as many writers have done, the honour of being the Christian confessor in the persecutions under Julian, who, according to Gregor. Naz. (Orat. c. Julianum, i. p. 133 B.C.), when suffering on the rack and finding one part of his body not as yet bruised and tortured, complained to the executioners for not conferring equal honour on his entire frame. The persecution under Julian, notwithstanding the details recorded by Theodoret and Gregory (Orat. c. Julianum, iii. 7), was not of the character to render this treatment of a Christian bishop very probable. The death of Julian and the accession of Jovian gave liberty to the church, and facilitated the holding of synods at Alexandria and at Antioch in 363. Acacius of Caesarea, who had hitherto been a zealous Arian and anxious to find himself on the winning side, induced his party to declare their adhesion to the Nicene formula, with express acceptance of the great term Homousios, as one "very well interlaced of the fathers, interpreted and explained with commodious phrases and fit epithets," and as incompatible with the "blasphemous doctrine of Arius." But the last word meant, according to them, "that the Son is born of the substance of the Father, and is in respect of substance similar to him." (Socrates, iii. 25.) The synod held at Antioch adopted, with this explanation, the Nicene formula, and the document was signed by Meletius of Antioch, Eusebius of Samosata, Acacius of Caesarea, and twenty-two other bishops. This circumstance seems to suggest that Eusebius up to this time, as well as Meletius, had not sufficiently cleared themselves from Arian proclivities, and were even then somewhat compromised by semi-Arian equivocations.

During and after the temporary lull in the imperial patronage of the Arian party, it is probable that the great exertions of Eusebius took place. He is represented as travelling in the guise of a soldier (Theod. iv. 13) through Phoenicia and Palestine, ordaining presbyters and deacons, and he must thus have become known to Basil, who on the occasion of the death of Eusebius of Caesarea wrote to Gregory, (Bas. Ep. xlvii. Paris ed.) the father of Gregory of Nazianzus, advising the selection of Eusebius of Samosata to the vacant bishopric. The Paris editors of Basil plausibly suggest that the letter thus numbered was written by Gregory to Eusebius concerning Basil, rather than by Basil concerning Eusebius. The part which Eusebius did take in the election of Basil is well known, and though the strict interpretation of canonical rules might render such interference in the affairs of Cappadocia unsuitable, yet numerous instances occur of the like eagerness. The efforts made by Gregory the younger and Eusebius were crowned with success. Basil became bishop of Caesarea. The appointment gave Gregory extreme satisfaction, and in a letter (Greg. Naz. Ep. xxix.) charged with eulogies he dilates on the intense satisfaction with which the visit of Eusebius to Caesarea had diffused through the community. The bedridden had sprung from their couches, and all kinds of moral miracles had been wrought by his presence.

* If this were so, and this were all that was intended by the term, the conflict need never have raged over it.

From this time forward the correspondence between Basil and Eusebius reveals the progress of their joint lives, and throws some light upon the history of the church. The two ecclesiastics are passionately eager for one another's society, and appear to have formed numerous designs for mutual interchange of visits, which fell through.

In 372 Eusebius signed, with Meletius, Basil, and twenty-nine others, a letter addressed to the Western bishops, in view of their common troubles from the presence of Arian opponents. The letter is given (Basil. Ep. xcii. Paris ed.) at length, and commences with the names of Meletius, Eusebius, Basilus, &c., in an order due to the dignity, character and age of the respective bishops, and a melancholy Jeremiad it is, recounting disaster and disorder, uncanonical proceedings, and Arian heresy. The Eastern bishops feel it some solace to pour out their hearts to their brethren in Italy and Gaul, and trust to receive from them sympathy and advice. Great honour is paid to the unadulterated pristine purity, which the Western churches had preserved intact, while the Eastern churches had been lacerated and undermined, and divided by heretical ideas and unconstitutional acts. Later in the same year Basil entreats Eusebius to meet him at Phargamon in Armenia, where an assembly of bishops was to take place (Ep. xcvi.). If Eusebius will not or cannot attend the conference, neither will Basil; and in another letter (Ep. xcvi.) he passionately urges him to visit him at Caesarea. Letters from Eusebius appear to have been received by Basil, who (Ep. c.) once more implores a visit at the time of the festival of the martyr Euphrosinus [EUPHROSINUS], since many things, said he, demand mutual consideration. At the end of the year Basil (Ep. cv.) managed to accomplish the laborious journey to Samosata and to secure from his friend the promise of a return visit. This promise, said he, had ravished the church with joy. In the following year, 373 Basil urged Eusebius to fulfil his promise, and (Ep. cxvii.) assured him that Jovinus had answered his expectations as bishop of Nicopolis. Jovinus was a worthy pupil of Eusebius, and gratified Basil by his canonical propensities. Everywhere the θρόνα of Eusebius exhibited the express image of his sanctity, τὸν χαρακτὴρ τῆς οἱς σεμνότητος. It appears from other authorities (Tillemont, Art. iii.) that the saint Jovinus relapsed afterwards into Arianism. The good offices of Eusebius were solicited by Eustathius of Sebaste, who had quarrelled with Basil, in order to bring about a reconciliation. Basil's principle of "purity before reconciliation" convinced Eusebius of his wisdom and moderation.

The date of the council of Gangra is a great puzzle, but it was probably held in the year 371 or 373. At this council Eustathius of Sebaste in Armenia, was condemned for Arian tendencies and for hyperascetic practices, which amounted to something like the Manichaean condemnation of matter.^b There has always been difficulty in deciding who was the Eusebius mentioned primo loco in the heading of the synodal letter, as the see is not mentioned. It is perfectly conceivable that it could have been the bishop of Samosata, and that as Basil entreated his advice with reference to Eustathius, he may have joined him, Hypatius, Gregory, and other of his friends, whose names also occur in this promissionamento. His age and moral eminence, and the enthusiasm of his friends about him, may have given him this prominent position. The canons of Gangra, twenty in number, are detailed with interesting comment by Hefele, who neither accepts the view of Emory Ceillier that it was held in 376, nor that of the Bellarmini that it was held between 362 and 370, as this turns on the bare supposition that the Eusebius was no other than Eusebius of (Nicomedia) Constantinople. Hefele thinks the chronology entirely uncertain, and mainly on the ground of the difficulty of this identification. I venture to make the above suggestion, which would throw considerable light on the practical character of the bishop of Samosata.

In the year A.D. 373 by a letter of Basil (Ep. cxvi.) we learn that Eusebius had successfully interfered in securing the election of a Catholic bishop at Tarsus. In consequence of this success, he was eagerly entreated to visit Basil at Caesarea. He may have done so, and presided at the council of Gangra. It should be said that Tillamont suggests that as Valens was at the time resident at Hierapolis in the valley of Ephrates, the pastor of the flock at Samosata would be unwilling to leave them. This, however, is only a supposition. Eusebius must be credited at this time with eager desires after formal and mutual recognition of church privileges between the East and West. Even Basil (Ep. cxi.) has to suggest caution in the matter. An encyclical which Eusebius proposed to send to Italy was not prepared, but Dorotheus and Gregory of Nyssa were induced to visit Rome in the year 374. The Paris editors put at an earlier date, viz. A.D. 368 or 369, the letters (Ep. xvii. xxii.) descriptive of Basil's illness, and the famine that arrested his movements, but whatever written, they reveal the extraordinary, almost magical, confidence put by Basil in his brother bishop. He had been in fact personally healed by the intercessions of Eusebius, and now, since all medical aid has failed in the case of Hypatius his brother, he commended him, and sent him to Samosata to be under the care and prayers of Eusebius and his brethren. It is remarkable that Eusebius was allowed to remain undisturbed during the bitter persecutions of the orthodox at the hand of the emperor Valens. At length his hour came, and few pages in the history of the time are more vivid than those which portray the circumstances of his exile.

Valens made a promise to the Arian bishop Eudoxius, who had baptized him, that he would banish all who held contrary opinions. Thus "Melitius was expelled from Antioch (a second time), Pelagius from Laodicea, and Eusebius from Samosata." (Theod. iv. 13.) The imperial summons demanded Eusebius's instant departure to Thrace. (Theod. iv. 14.) Ceillier (v. 3) places this event in 374. The officer who served the summons was bidden by Eusebius to conceal the cause of his journey. "For if the multitude (said Eusebius), who are all imbued with divine zeal, should learn your design they would draw you, and I should have to answer for your death." After the conduct of worship, he took one domestic servant, a "pillow, and a book," and departed in the dead of night. "When he arrived at the banks of Euphrates, which washes the walls of the city, he leaped into a ferry-boat and desired the rowers to convey him to Zeugma, which he reached at break of day." The effect of his departure upon his flock is graphically described by Theodoret. The clamour, the weeping, the pursuit, the entreaties to return to Samosata, and to brave the wrath of the emperor, the humble submission of the bishop to the will of the prince, on the ground of the authority of the Apostle St. Paul, the refusal of costly gifts, the parting of the old man and his people, and the disappearance of the venerable confessor on his long and perilous journey to the banks of the Danube, are all told with a few striking sentences. Eusebius left a deep impression behind him. He had excited a persistent and intense antagonism to the views of the Arians, which assumed very practical forms. The Arian bishop Eunomius was left in complete isolation. He was avoided as if smitten with deadly and contagious pest. The very water he used in the public bath was wasted by the population of the city as contaminated by his use of it. The repugnance being invincible, the poor man, inoffensive and gentle in spirit, retired from the unequal contest. His successor, Lucius, "who was a wolf and a deceiver of the flock," was received with scant courtesy. The children of the city spontaneously burned a ball which the ass on which the Arian bishop was mounted had accidentally trodden upon. Lucius was not conquered by such manifestations of dislike, and took counsel with the Roman magistracy to banish all the Catholic clergy. Meanwhile Eusebius by slow stages reached the banks of the Danube at a time when "the Goths were ravaging Thrace and besieging many cities." On his way through Cappadocia he failed to see Gregory, which was bitterly lamented by his friend, and regarded as a punishment for his own sins.* The most vigorous enlogium is passed upon Eusebius for his power to console others. There was scarcely a strip of blue sky in the heavens at the time, but the faithfulness of Eusebius was a joy to the bishops of the East. Basil congratulated Antiochus, a nephew of Eusebius, on the privilege of having seen and conversed with such a man (Ep. clxviii.), and Gregory thought his prayers for their welfare must be as efficacious as those of a martyr. Ceillier seems to think that Basil enjoyed a passing interview with his friend. We see no sign of it. While Eusebius was concealed in his place of exile Basil contrived to institute means of communication between him and his old flock. From one of Gregory's letters (Ep. xxx.) it would seem doubtful whether the vacant bishopric was filled, but, as we have seen, Theodoret was explicit on this head, and Basil (Ep. ccxix.), while approving of the resistance made by the church to the pastoral offices of Eunomius, warned the clergy, with moving words, against internal commotion and dissension. Numerous letters passed between Basil and Eusebius were in the tone of young lovers than that of old bishops, and some interesting hints are given as to difficulty of communication. Eusebius was eagerly longing for letters, while Basil protested that he had written no fewer than four, which never reached their destination. The bad roads, the carelessness of the "runners," the illness of Basil himself, were regarded as some explanation of apparent neglect. Grave anxieties had arisen in his mind καὶ τὸ ἀσθενεῖν, and those he does not venture to commit to paper, but entrusts to a namesake of Eusebius, a reader. Basil (Ep. cxxxvii. dated 376-380) was intending to have sent a letter to Eusebius by the vicar of Thracia, and also by a certain Prospetrus of Philippopolis, who was visiting his neighbourhood, but the vicar came late in the evening when he was busy at his work and left early in the morning, and so never received the letter. A like calamity occurred on the occasion of the visit of the "Prospetrus," and thus, though his heart was bursting with news and with sorrows, he had been compelled to keep them all to himself. The letter went on to speak of the vicar as a favourer of heretics, though he questions whether he was able, from the stress of his occupations and the character of his mind, to understand Christian doctrine. Still, he had taken the active part of summoning an heretical synod in mid-winter in Galatia, and there had deposed Hypsianus on a worthless and unsubstantiated charge, and appointed one Eudicius in his place, and he had moreover endeavoured to force Eustathius of Sebaste on Nicopolis. In another letter to Eusebius (cxxxix.) he deploras the appointment of Eudicius, complains bitterly of the treatment he received, and lach of fair dealing on the part of the Western church. Antiochus, who had been to see Eusebius in his exile and carry the news of his suffering to the church at Samosata, was among those whom Lucius the Arian bishop exiled, and had to retire to an exile in Armenia. But the darkest hour is that before the dawn. Basil, notwithstanding his intense orthodoxy, was far from happy in his estimate of the sympathy accorded to him by the Western church, and mysterious hints are not unfrequently dropped as to the sentiment entertained at Rome with reference to himself, Eusebius, and Meletius. In the year 377 Dorotheus found that the two latter were, to the horror of Basil, reckoned at Rome among the Arians. Basil (Ep. cxcvi.), addressing Peter of Alexandria, condemns the implicit charge with great bitterness, and justly asks whether their present and banishment for their anti-Arian was not a sufficient proof of the injustice of the charge. The charge itself appears to run through, and it appears that Eusebius was far from the barbarian ravages of a than from this momentary assault on it.

In year 378 the persecuting policy of the Valens was brought to a close by his The emperor Gratian recalled the prelates, and gave peace to the Eastern Theoderet (H. E. v. 4, 5) expressly the permission to Eusebius to return.

In 380, Basil and Basil's successor Dorotheus.

Notwithstanding the apparently non-essential character of the proceeding, Eusebius ordained numerous bishops on his way from Thracia to the Euphrates. Acacius at Barosa, Theodorus at Hierapolis, Ildore at Cyrrus, Eulogius at Edessa, were among the number. All these names were appended to the creed of Constantinople. Baronius conjectures that he was empowered by the council of Antioch to take this step. This council of 146 orthodox bishops was held in October of the year 379, at which Eusebius was present, and in the records of which his name follows that of Meletius. But a more plausible explanation is, that his virtue and the reverence he universally inspired, proved mightier than the letter of the canon.

It was when he was engaged in the like work, taking part in the ordination of Marcellus the little town of Doliche (Theod. H. E. v. 6), that a woman charged with Arrian passions hurled a brick, which fell upon his head, and wounded him fatally.

It was not improbable that he had other enemies who were delighted at his tragic fall, at this moment of his triumph. A beautiful incident is recorded by Theodoret, to the effect, that the aged bishop in the bliss of having secured the crown of martyrdom and in the spirit of the proto-martyr, as well as of his Divine Lord, extorted promises from his attendants that they would make no search for his murderers. When the magistrates were ready to prosecute those who had clearly plotted the death of Eusebius, the Catholics earnestly besought pardon for them. The 22nd June is the day on which the Eastern church commemorates his so-called martyrdom. In the Roman calendar the 31st June is the day chosen for the same purpose. His nephew Antiochus probably succeeded him in the bishopric of Samosata. (Tillem. viii. 386; Oudier, v. 5.) [H. E. R.]

EUSEBIUS (78) II., bishop of Samosata in the latter part of the 5th century, deposed by the emperor Zeno at the instigation of Peter the Fuller, bishop of Antioch, on the plea that he was favouring the tyrants, but really because he rejected the Homoion. (Theophan. ante 482, Le Quin, Or. Christ. ii. 336.) [E. V.]

EUSEBIUS (79), bishop of Sebaste (Samaria), who signed the semi-Arian formula at Seleucia, A.D. 359. (Epiphani. Hæres. lxxiii. No. 96, p. 974, &c.; Mansi, iii. 324; Le Quin, Or. Christ. iii. 451.) [E. V.]

EUSEBIUS (80), bishop of Seleucia Pieria, who signed the Acanian formula at Seleucia, 359. (Epiphani. Hæres. lxxiii. No. 96; Le Quin, Or. Christ. ii. 777; Mansi, iii. 324.) [E. V.]

EUSEBIUS (81), bishop of Salamis, in Syria, present at the council of Chalcedon, A.D. 451. (Mansi, vii. 143 a, 434 c; Le Quin, Or. Chr. ii. 922.) [E. V.]

EUSEBIUS (82), bishop of Sion, at the council of Rome in 405 (Ugh. Ital. sac. iii. 396; Cappell. Le Ch. d'Ital. xvii. 373, 387; Mansi vii. 359.) [C. H.]

EUSEBIUS (83), bishop of Sardinia, in the province of Numidia, who was amongst those banished by Huneric, A.D. 484. (Morcelli, Africa Christ. i. 291; Notitia in Victor. Vit. 56, Migas, Patrol. Lat. lviii.) [L. D.]

EUSEBIUS (84), ST., first bishop of Sutrium in Etruria, present at the synod of Rome in 465; in 487 the see was held by Constantius. (Mansi, vii. 959 c; Ughelli, Ital. Sac. i. 1274; Capp. Le Ch. d'Ital. vi. 224, 267.) [C. H.]

EUSEBIUS (85), bishop of Tarragona, from before 610 (?) to about 632; signs among the metropolitans the (disputed) Decretum Gundemari in 610 [GUNTIMAR]. In the letter in which Braulio asks St. Isidore for his Etymologiar (ann. 631 or 632, apud Esp. Sagr. xxx. 322, 326) he speaks of Eusebius as just dead, and prays St. Isidore to use his influence with the king for the appointment of a suitable successor. Isidore replies (l. c.) that he will do his best, but that the king is not favourably inclined to the candidate mentioned by Braulio, and in 633 Aduar signs the Acts of Cc. Tol. iv. as metropolitan of Tarragona. To this Eusebius was addressed a curious and much discussed letter from the king Sisebert (612-621), first published by Florez (Esp. Sagr. vii. 326) but well known to Spanish antiquaries before his day. The king's opening sentences speak in the most violent language of a letter just received from Eusebius, which, "omni contagione pollutam extremis vix attigimus manibus." Eusebius and his friends are accused of being the adherents of worthless causes, "inanium metatores causarum," and of having been led away, "miseris hominibus et inflatis." The reproach against Eusebius of having taken part in certain theatrical games and performances "ludis theatris taurorum (or phanorum)," is universally believed. Who does not see what is so evident? The bishop has ventured to accuse publicly men devoted to divine things. Let him, however, not expect any further indulgence from the king, but at once commit the rule of the church of Barcelona "huic viro qui de magis quam miserandis placet hominibus." The matter is to be settled before the forthcoming Easter, so that "de ejus gaudeamus Pontificatu optabili, et de vestra tandem vel eras consolatione." This obscure and barbarously written letter was, before Florez, commonly interpreted as containing the deposition of a Eusebius bishop of Barcelona, for participation in the games and spectacles which still in the 7th century maintained themselves all over Spain, and were essentially heathen in form and matter. (On the survival and gradual transformation of the ancient theatre in Spain, see Gams, K. G. ii. pt. i. 38-55, 126. Schack, Gesch. der dram. Lit. und Kunst in Spanien, Berlin, 1854, l. Amador de los Rios, Hist. de la Lit. Española, i. 441.) It is now, however, plain from Braulio's letter and the signature quoted above that Eusebius was metropolitan of Tarragona, and that the king's letter refers to some opposition of his to the election of a certain candidate for the see of Barcelona (probably SEVERUS, q. v.), whom the king was determined to see appointed. The mention of the games is apparently used as a thrust to extort submission, and does not of course prove that Eusebius was guilty of the charge. The letter throws valuable light upon the state of episcopal elections at the time, and together with Isidore's letter to Braulio, and other cases, shews that when in the closely following fourth council of Toledo, special care was taken to define and re-affirm the canonical procedure of election by clergy and people; consecration by metropolitan and comprovinciales, and confirmation by the crown (which is not mentioned, but apparently taken for granted—C. Tol. iv. 19), the Spanish church, led by the great Isidore, was defending itself against certain very real, and in these two cases at least, recent abuses of the royal power. (Esp. Sagr. xxv. 82; Gams, K. G. ii. pt. 2, 79; Aguirre-Catalani, iii. 324.) [M. A. W.]

EUSEBIUS (86), about the year A.D. 600, bishop of Thessalonica; author of a Letter to Andrew the Monk and Ten Books against the Errors of Andrew the Monk, which works are both lost. An account is given of them by Photius.

In 593 pope Gregory the Great addressed a letter to him, and the bishops of Dyrrhachium, Milan, Nicopolis, Corinth, Prima Justiniana, Crete, Larissa, Sardinia, and Sicily, on the subject of the decree of the emperor Maurice, which had declared all ecclesiastics subject to the rulers of their country, and had given certain instructions about admission to monasteries which Gregory altered.

In 598 the pope again wrote to Eusebius, on the subject of a presbyter named Luke, who with a certain Peter boasted that he did not receive the council of Chalcedon. There was also a letter on the subject of the title of universal bishop, arrogated by the patriarch of Constantinople. In 600 Theodore, reader of the church of Thessalonica, was sent to Rome by Eusebius. For some reason Theodore entrusted the letters he was carrying to a monk named Andrew, with whom he had long been acquainted. The monk, actuated by an excess either of folly or of malice, tampered to such a degree with the letter of Eusebius to the pope, that anybody reading it must have thought the writer a heretic or a fool; besides this he composed several discourses under the name of Gregory highly discreditable to that acute theologian; and committing the blunder of making him speak in Greek. The pope wrote an account of these forgeries to Eusebius, and begged him to suppress the discourses if they fell into his hands; confessing that he did not understand Greek and had never composed any work in that language.

Photius says that the monk Andrew, who belonged to the sect of the Aphthartodocetae, wrote a letter also to Eusebius, begging him for God's sake to read it. Eusebius wrote him a very candid answer, saying that he did not know how to write, had made many blunders, and should never have broken the repose of his monastic life to undertake a duty for which he was so unfit. He then confuted Andrew's chief errors, and exhorted him to retract. Andrew, however, composed a treatise in defence of his propositions, which produced from Eusebius the Ten Books. His style is said to have been plain and clear, sufficiently pure, and not without judgment. (Photius, Biblioth. 162; Patrol. Graec. ciii. p. 451; Fabricius, Biblioth. Graec. Harles. vii. 417; Dupin, Eccl. Hist. tom. v.;

EUSEBIUS (87), 40th occupant of the see of Tours, succeeding Albertus and followed by Oetaldus, subscribed the council of Autigny in A.D. 765. He sat, according to some sixteen, according to others, twenty years. (Manz. xii. 976; Guil. Christ. xiv. 32.)

EUSEBIUS (88), bishop of Trevis Châteaux; vill. of Saint-Paul de Trevis Châteaux, No. 76.

EUSEBIUS (89), bishop of Tyre, attended the second council of Constantinople, A.D. 553, and signed the acts. His name appears among those who invited pope Vigilius to the council. (Labbe, v. 416, 429, 514, 561; Le Quin. Or. Christ. ii. 309.)

[E. V.]

EUSEBIUS (90), bishop of Valentianopolis, in Proconsular Asia, by whom Antoninus, bishop of Ephesus, was accused in the spring of 400, before Chrysostom and the concave of bishops sitting at Constantinople, of simony and other scandalous acts of avarice. Chrysostom perceiving that the moving cause of the delation was a personal quarrel between Eusebius and the accused party, endeavoured to induce him to withdraw the written charges, on the promise that he would investigate the case, and if proved, correct it. Eusebius, however, with much vehemence persisting in his accusation and refusing the conciliatory offers of Paul, bishop of Heraclea, presented the libel a second time to Chrysostom within the choir of the cathedral as he was about to commence the eucharistic office, calling on him, by the life of the emperor and other fearful adjurations, to attend to the charges it contained. Chrysostom was too much disturbed by Eusebius's violence to continue the service, and requesting Pansophia, a bishop of Pisidia, to take his place as celebrant, he retired with the rest of the bishops. Service over, he took his seat in the baptistery, and having summoned Eusebius before the concave and warned him of the responsibility of bringing forward charges of so much gravity, which if once admitted he was bound to prosecute, the indictment was admitted and formally read to Antoninus, who met the acts by a flat denial of their truth. Some of the charges led Chrysostom in to investigate them on the spot. Some of Antoninus's powerful friends, alarmed by Gaius having prevented from leaving Constantinople, a coadjutor bishop was appointed to hold Hypaepe, a town near Ephesus, to a charge in conjunction with the the province. If either accuser or led to appear within two months, he excommunicated. Both obeyed the but only to frustrate the ends of the hollowness of Eusebius's character, reality of the righteous horror he had revealed when it was discovered equal and his accuser had come to that Eusebius had accepted a bribe sinus to annul the prosecution by ign. At first no witnesses were forthcoming, and when forty days had been granted for their production, instead of employing the time in looking them up, Eusebius went off to Constantinople and kept himself close, that no one might know where he was. The time allotted having expired, and neither Eusebius nor his witnesses appearing, the commissioners sent circular letters to the bishops of Asia pronouncing sentences of excommunication on him as a slanderer and a runaway. In spite of the summer heats, on which Eusebius had relied to drive the commissioners away before the expiration of the time they lingered on at Hypaepe for another month, at the end of which they returned in despair to Constantinople. There they happened to fall in with Eusebius, who, ever ready with an excuse, when upbraided with his conduct, pleaded sickness as the cause of his delay, and promised that he would still produce his witnesses. Meanwhile Antoninus was removed by death from a human to a divine tribunal. The case of the six bishops who were involved in the accusation of simony and the partners in their crime, however, was still prosecuted, and the death of Gaius in January, A.D. 401, having set Chrysostom at liberty, he crossed over to Asia, and arriving at Ephesus conducted the trial in person. The shameless Eusebius again appeared on the scene, declaring that he had been unjustly excommunicated, and claiming to be readmitted to communion. The bishops refusing to allow his claim on the ground of his having failed to substantiate his charges against his brethren, he reasserted their truth, and engaged to bring forward abundant evidence in support of his accusations. The evidence proved overwhelming. The accused, who at first denied their guilt, were driven to a humiliating confession of having obtained the episcopal rank by purchase, and were condemned to be deprived of their sees. They were not, however, anathematized, and the heirs of Antoninus were required to repay the purchase-money in each case. The after history of this base and shameless man is unknown. (Pallad. Dial. pp. 130-140; Le Quin. Or. Chr. i. 711.)

[E. V.]

EUSEBIUS (91), bishop of Valeria (Valera de Arriba, near Cuenca) in 633, when he subscribed the acts of the fourth council of Toledo. He signed also the fifth council of Toledo in 636. He preceded thirty-eight bishops in the first one out of sixty-two, and signs fifteenth or fourteenth (?) out of twenty-four in the second (Manz. i. 642, 657; Ep. Segr. viii. 208; Aguirre-Catalan. iii. 363.)

[M. A. W.]

EUSEBIUS (92), bishop of Vence, placed by the Samaritan in 374; he subscribed the acts of the synod of Nismes in 394. These acts are not to be found in the older collections, but are given by Hefele (Conc.-Gesch. b. 2, § 110) from a MS. lately discovered at Darmstadt. (Guil. Christ. iii. 1213.)

[E. T. S.]

EUSEBIUS (93) ST., bishop of Verucis (Verucelli), known for his zeal and sufferings in the cause of orthodoxy in the 4th century. He was born in Sardinia, but there appears no record of the date of his birth. He went to Rome, and was there ordained a "reader," and in the year 349 was consecrated bishop of Vercellae. St. Ambrose, in a letter addressed to the church of Vercellae (Ep. 63), gives Eusebius great praise for his devotion, and especially commends him as having been the first bishop in the West who joined the monastic discipline with the discharge of episcopal duties. He took several of his clergy to live with him, and adopted something of a monastic rule for their daily life. In 354 (Jaffé, Reg. Pontif. p. 15) he was asked by Liberius the bishop of Rome to go with Lucifer of Cagliari and others to the emperor Constantius, to suggest the summoning of a council, which might pronounce on matters of dispute between the Arians and the orthodox. The council was held in the next year at Milan. At first Eusebius absented himself from it. But he ultimately yielded to the united solicitations of the Arian party which led in the council, of Lucifer and Pancratius, the orthodox delegates of Liberius, and of the emperor Constantius, and took part in its deliberations. The proceedings of the council were somewhat disorderly, and the action of the bishop of Milan [DIONYSIUS (14)] was undecided. The practical question was whether the bishops present should sign a condemnation of Athanasius. Eusebius was so peremptory in refusing to do this as to excite the anger of the Arianizing emperor, who banished him, together with some priests and deacons, to Scythopolis in Syria. Patrophilus, a leading Arian, was bishop in Scythopolis, and Eusebius calls him his "jailer." In the course of his confinement here, two messengers arrived bringing a sum of money and assurances of good will from the churches of Vercellae and other neighbouring places to the exiled bishop. In a reply which he sent back by the hands of the messengers, and which has been preserved, Eusebius gives full particulars of the annoying treatment to which he was subjected at Scythopolis. He was a troublesome prisoner, having twice all but starved himself to death because he would not accept provisions from Arian hands. After a while he was removed to Cappadocia, and thence to Egypt. From the Thebaid in Egypt he wrote a letter, which is extant, to Gregory, a bishop of Elvira in Spain, praising his anti-Arian constancy.

The emperor Julian, who succeeded Constantius in 361, permitted all banished bishops to return to their churches. Eusebius, being one to whom the interests of orthodoxy were paramount, did not hasten home at once, but went to Alexandria to consult with Athanasius. The two bishops agreed to convoke a council, which was held in the year 362 at Alexandria. [ATHANASIUS, Vol. I. p. 197.] One of the objects of the council was to put an end to a schism at Antioch, and when its meetings were over Eusebius went thither as the bearer of a synodal letter or "tome," addressed by the council to the Antiochenes. He found, however, on his arrival that he was too late. Lucifer of Cagliari had preceded him, and had aggravated the schism by the hasty consecration of Paulinus as a rival bishop; and Eusebius immediately withdrew from Antioch. [MILETIUS, PAULINUS.] Lucifer proceeded to resume communion with Eusebius and with all others who, in accordance with his reconciling decree of the Alexandrian council, were willing to receive back bishops who repented of their connexion with Arian heresy.

Leaving Antioch, Eusebius made a tour amongst the Eastern churches, using his influence to confirm them in the orthodox faith. From the East he passed into Illyria, and so to Italy, which, in the words of Jerome, "put off its mourning on Eusebius's return."

He now joined with the zealous Hilary of Poitiers in endeavours to re-establish orthodoxy in the Western churches. With this view they stirred up opposition to the Arianizing Auxentius bishop of Milan, but they were foiled by a profession of orthodoxy on the part of Auxentius. This was in 364. After this nothing is recorded of Eusebius until his death, which is placed by Jerome in the year 371.

The extant writings of Eusebius are three letters; one a brief answer to Constantius, announcing that he would attend the council at Milan, but would do there whatever should seem to him right and according to the will of God; and the two already mentioned, to the church at Vercellae and to Gregory of Elvira. They are to be found in Galland, Biblioth. Patrum, and in Migne, Patrol. Lat. t. xii. Jerome mentions Eusebius as having translated, with the omission of what was heterodox, the commentaries on the Psalms of his namesake of Caesarea; and he also names him, with Hilary of Poitiers, as a translator of Origen and the same Eusebius; but nothing further is known of these translations. A famous "Codex Vercellensis" is thus described by Tregelles:—"A MS. of the 4th century, said to have been written by the hand of Eusebius bishop of Vercelli, where the codex is now preserved. The text is defective in several places, as might be supposed from its very great age. It was transcribed and published by Irici, at Milan, in 1748. . . This MS. is probably the most valuable exemplar of the old Latin in its unaltered state."

The chief authority for the life of Eusebius is St. Jerome, who gives him a place amongst his Viri Illustres, and makes allusions to him in his letters and elsewhere. There are several letters addressed to him by Liberius, and there are allusions to him in the works of Athanasius. Mention of him may be also found in the works of Rufinus, Theodoret, Sozomen, and Socrates. The Sermones relating to him preserved in the works of Ambrose are admittedly spurious.

EUSEBIUS (94) II., bishop of Vercelli, 520. (Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Italia, xiv. 365; Ughelli, Ital. Sacr. iv. 762.) [A. H. D. A.]

EUSEBIUS (95), priests who were martyrs (Nos. 109, 112)

EUSEBIUS (96), Aug. 14, presbyter, confessor, at Rome, A.D. 358, and by some styled martyr. From the earliest times his fame has been everywhere celebrated. A church dedicated to him is mentioned in the first council held at Rome under pope Symmachus, A.D. 498 (Mansi, viii. 236, 237). It was rebuilt by pope Zacharias, cir. 742 (Anastas. Lib. Pontif. art. Zacharias, num. 226). The facts of his history are very obscure. His Acts tell the following story (Stat. Mon. i. ii. p. 141). Upon the death of pope Liberius by the emperor Constantine, Eusebius preached against them both as Arians; and since the orthodox party, who now supported Felix, were excluded from all the churches, he continued to hold divine service in his own house. For this act of nonconformity he was arrested and brought before Constantine and Liberius, when he boldly reproved the pope for falling away from Catholic truth. Constantine thereupon consigned him to a dungeon four feet wide, where he continued to languish for seven months and then died. He was buried by his friends and co-presbyters Ursinus and Gregory, in the cemetery of Callistus, where they placed over him the simple inscription "Eusebio Hominum Dei." Constantine then arrested Gregory for his kindness to the body of his friend, and consigned him to the same dungeon, where he also died, and was in turn buried by Ursinus, by whom the Acts of Eusebius profess to have been written. The Bollandist and Tillemont point out some grave historical difficulties in this narration, especially the fact that Constantine, Liberius, and Eusebius never could have been in the city together. Petrus de Natalibus gives us the story of a bishop Equitius, which may throw some light on this difficulty. He speaks of the zeal of Eusebius, which shone forth against these heretics Constantine and Liberius, and which so annoyed Liberius that at the request of the pope the civil power intervened, and imprisoned the recalcitrant priest. This narrative does not require the presence of the emperor at all. The whole matter is a source of great trouble to Roman Catholic writers, because the saintly character of St. Eusebius, guaranteed by the Roman martyrology as revised by pope Gregory XIII., seems necessarily to involve the fall of Liberius. The Bollandists at great length vindicate the catholicity of Felix II., and of course are equally zealous champions of St. Eusebius. Tillemont, and in the present day Hefele, in his History of the Councils, vol. ii. c. 81 ("Pope Liberius and the Third Sirmian Formula"), are equally decided opponents of Felix. But what then becomes of St. Eusebius, whose orthodoxy and faithfulness are proved by the oldest monuments of the church? Tillemont makes an attempt to separate Eusebius from Felix, and concludes in the following words, which are a plain instance of begging the question: "But notwithstanding the facts told by Ado, the sainthood of St. Eusebius appears sufficiently attested by the records of the church to assure us that he could not have been a perjured person, nor a schismatic, nor, consequently, a partisan of Felix," conveniently forgetting that the sainthood of Felix himself is equally well attested. (Mort. Rom.

Ado, Adonis, Usuardi, Wandalus, Cal. 88; Kol. Front.; Gregor.; Baronius, 857, 57; ib. i. vi. 438, 774-778.) The Eusebius and Felix must have been among the populace, as they were at the election of the next pope, ib., A.D. 308. Ursinus was the friend of Liberius, Damasus Felix. On one day there were church occupied by Ursinus, owned by the party of Damasus, the dead bodies of one hundred and thirty-seven men. Damasus at last conquered, and Ursinus was banished. This triumph may help to account for the early insertion of the names of Eusebius and Felix in the list of saints and martyrs. (Ammianus Marcellinus, lib. xxvii. c. 5; see also petition of Marcellinus and Faustina, belonging to the party of Ursinus, addressed to the emperors Theodosius and Arcadius, in Sirmend. Opp. t. i. p. 127; Neander, E. N. vol. iii. 314, Bohn's ed.; Milman's Lat. Christ. i. 85-89.) [G. T. S.]

EUSEBIUS (87), a deposed presbyter, who, in violation of the decrees of the council of Melitane, was reinstated by Eupidius bishop of Satala. (Soz. H. E. iv. 24.) [E. V.]

EUSEBIUS (88), presbyter, a correspondent of Sulpicius Severus, among whose remains a letter addressed to him has been preserved. The letter unfortunately fails to throw light upon the position or character of Eusebius, unless we are entitled to infer, from his being so eagerly addressed, that he shared the opinions reprobated in the letter. It would seem that Severus, who had written a short treatise on the life of St. Martin, and had recorded many of his miracles, had failed to notice that he who had often extinguished fires, by which the lives of others were endangered, had even been in the greatest danger from fire himself. Why it should have been so was the question. Severus reminds Eusebius that of the Lord himself it was said, "He saved others, Himself he cannot save." He shows that the danger in which the saint had been, as in the case of the viper on the hand of St. Paul at Melita, illustrated his glory. Surrounded by fire he came out unharmed.

The letter is that marked I in the edition of the works of Severus by Clarius, Leipzig, 1709, i. 258. [W. M.]

EUSEBIUS (89), of Cremona, presbyter, a friend of St. Jerome, and known through the writings of that father. He was with him at Bethlehem in the year 308, and became the unconscious means of extending into Italy the strife concerning Origenism which had been begun at Jerusalem. Epiphanius had written a letter to John bishop of Jerusalem, in vindication of his conduct on his recent visit to Palestine, A.D. 394. [EPIPHANIUS (1), p. 150; JEROME.] This letter was widely circulated and much prized; and Eusebius, not knowing Greek, begged Jerome to translate it for him. This he did in a rapid and cursory manner (Jerome ad Pammachium, Ep. 57, § 2, ed. Vall.). The translation is given among Jerome's letters (Ep. ii. ed. Vall.). This document was stolen from the cell of Eusebius by one whom Jerome calls a Pseudo-monachus, and whom he believed to be in the service of Rufinus, together with another letter in which Rufinus was spoken of with praise (Jer. cont. Ruf. iii. 4). Rufinus appears to have sent the translation of Epiphanius's letter to Rome, with accusations against Jerome of having falsified the original in translating it. This accusation Jerome answered in his letter to Pammachius, "on the best method of interpretation" (Ep. 57), written two years later. Eusebius remained at Bethlehem till the Easter of the year 308, when he was obliged to return hastily to Italy (perhaps with Pse-him, Jerome's brother—cont. Ruf. iii. 24). Jerome was at that time recovering from a three months' illness; but at the request of his friend he composed the commentary on St. Matthew as a stimulus or supply of spiritual food for his journey. (Pref. to Comm. on Matt. vol. vii. 6.)

Lactantius, on arriving in Rome, became an agent of Jerome's party in the Origenistic controversy. He lived at first on good terms with Rufinus, who, however, afterwards accused Lactantius of having come to Rome "to bark against him." Rufinus, who had gone to Rome the previous year, was at this time engaged in translating the real hexapla of Origen for the use of his friends, leaving out some of the passages deemed most objectionable. Eusebius obtained a copy of this work and sent it to Bethlehem, where it was denounced by Jerome as a mistranslation. Rufinus replied that Eusebius had obtained an imperfect copy, either by bribery of the copyist or by other wrong means, and that he had also tampered with the MS. after it came into his hands. St. Jerome, however, vehemently defends his friend from these accusations (conf. Def. lib. 5).

The pope Anastasius being entirely ignorant of Origen and his teaching, Eusebius, together with Marcella and Pammachius, brought before him certain passages from Origen's writings (Anastasius ad Simplicianum in Jerome, Ep. 95, ed. Vall.) which so moved him that he at once condemned not the passages only, but Origen himself and all his works. Eusebius being about to return to Cremona in the year 400, the pope charged him with the letter just quoted to Simplicianus bishop of Milan, and he there set forth the same passages of Origen which he had laid before the pope. He was confronted, however, by Rufinus, who declared these passages to be false; and Eusebius continued his journey without having induced Simplicianus to condemn Origen.

After this we hear nothing of Eusebius for more than twenty years. But he appears to have remained in Italy supporting Jerome's interests and corresponding with him. At the extreme end of Jerome's life we still find Eusebius writing to him and sending him books relating to the Pelagian heresy (ad Alyp. et Aug. Ep. 143), and receiving from Jerome the last of his Commentaries, that on Jeremiah (Prolog. to Comm. on Jer. a vol. iv. 833). He is spoken of by Ceillier Antiqu. Ecclési. vol. vii. index) as bishop of Cremona; but in the last-named passage he is still called presbyter, and he is not in the list of the bishops of Cremona.

The Life of St. Jerome, under the name of Lactius of Cremona, printed among the documents at the beginning of Vallarsi's edition of Jerome, and the account of Jerome's death, also attributed to Eusebius, are manifestly spurious. [W. H. F.]

EUSEBIUS (100), presbyter and archimandrite of the monastery of Elias in Constantinople, attested by pope Leo I., A.D. 450, among the subarchimandrites (Leo. Mag. Ep. 71, p. 1012; Epist. Pat. L. liv. 895). He signs the address of the archimandrites to the emperor Marcian in 451. and appears in the council of Chalcedon in subscribing the deposition of Eutyches (Mansi, v. 754. vii. 75). [C. G.]

EUSEBIUS (101), presbyter and archimandrite of the monastery of St. Eulogius in Constantinople. This archimandrite Eusebius, contemporary with the foregoing, appears in the Greek (not in the Latin) heading of the address of the archimandrites to Marcian (Labbe, Council. iv. : 31 ; Mansi, vii. 75), and as subscribing by his deacon Theodulus the deposition of Eutyches in the council of Chalcedon (Mansi, vi. 754).

[C. G.]

EUSEBIUS (102), priest of Jerusalem, who was at Constantinople in the year 536, with the patriarch Mennas, in whose company he was fond of dilating on the reformatations that were going forward at Jerusalem under Peter the bishop of that city. Mennas, in his letter to Peter, styles Eusebius "communis frater, imo communis benefactor Deo amantissimus presbyter." (Mansi, Concil. viii. 1165; Baron. Annal. ann. 536, xciv.)

[С. Н.]

EUSEBIUS (103), cardinal-priest at Rome, who signs a diploma of pope Paul I., A.D. 761, given by Baronius from the original in the convent of St. Silvester at Rome. He occupied the church of St. Laurentius in Lucina. (Baron. A. E. ann. 761, xii.) [C. H.]

[С. Н.]

Deacons and Reader.

EUSEBIUS (104), a deacon of the church of Constantinople, who, happening to be at Rome on ecclesiastical business in A.D. 404, when Theophilus's report of the proceedings connected with the deposition of Chrysostom reached pope Innocent, prevailed upon the latter to wait for fuller information on the other side before he took any decisive step. (Pallad. Dial. cap. 1, p. 9, ed. Bigot.) [E. V.]

EUSEBIUS (105), deacon, who, with his companion, the deacon Lamprotatus, had shared the persecutions endured by the aged presbyter Hypatius in behalf of the sufferers at Constantinople after Chrysostom's deposition. Chrysostom, in his letter to Hypatius from Cucusus in 405, praises the two deacons for their zeal and constancy (Chrysost. Epist. 180). He may be the deacon Eusebius addressed by Nilus on the subject of Divine Providence in afflictions (Nil. ep. 235 in Pat. Gr. lxxiv. 169). [E. V.]

EUSEBIUS (106), a reader, who accompanied the bearer of a letter from Basil to Eusebius of Samosata A.D. 375. He had been for a long time eager to visit Eusebius of Samosata, but Basil had restrained him till the weather was milder, on account of the delicacy of his health (Basil, Ep. 198 [263]. [E. V.]

[E. V.]

Martyrs.

EUSEBIUS (107), martyrs who were bishops.
(Nos. 24, 27, 77.)

EUSEBIUS (100)—Aug. 25. Martyr at Rome with Pontianus, Vincentius, and Peregrinus, under Commodus, A.D. 192. (Mart. Rom. Vet., Adonis, Usuardi; Tillemont. Mem. t. iii. p. 59; Acta SS. Boll. Aug. v. 115 sq.)

EUSEBIUS (109), priest, martyr with Marcellus, deacon, under Valerian. Commemorated Oct. 20. (Baron. Annal. ann. 259, xvi.) [C. H.]

EUSEBIUS (110)—April 24, martyr under Diocletian. Basil's Menology represents him as converted by witnessing the miracles of the megalomartyr St. George, and as suffering soon after him. [C. H.]

EUSEBIUS (111)—March 5, a martyr at Caesarea in Palestine under Diocletian. He suffered apparently at the same time as Pamphilus and others as narrated in Eusebius (Mart. Pal. cap. xi.). In the Roman Mart. he is connected with Hadrian and Eubulus, mentioned at the end of that chapter. (Mart. Usuardi.)

[G. T. S.]

EUSEBIUS (112)—Aug. 14, priest, martyr in Palestine towards the close of 311 or beginning of 312, when Maximinus made a tour through the provinces subject to him, and in conjunction with Theotecnus devised measures for the persecution of Christianity and the establishment of paganism. Eusebius was brought before the president of the province, Maxentius, and tortured to compel him to sacrifice. He appealed to the sovereign, who was then present, by whom he was beheaded on the next day. (Eusebius, H. E. lib. ix. cap. 2-9; Ceillier, ii. 483.)

[G. T. S.]

EUSEBIUS (113), a Christian of Gaza, who, with his brothers Nestabis and Zeno, was martyred by the pagan inhabitants of that city in the reign of Julian. (Soz. H. E. v. 9.)

[E. V.]

EUSEBIUS (114)—Oct. 22, martyr at Adrianople under Julian, A.D. 362. He was tortured and burned with Philip a bishop, Severus a presbyter, and Hermes. (Martyr. Usuardi.)

[G. T. S.]

EUSEBIUS (115)—May 30, martyr with Christina, Romanus, and many others by fire at Nicomedia (Bas. Menol.). His memory was specially commemorated in a chapel dedicated to St. Euphemia in Petrium, a district in the northern quarter of Constantinople. (Acta SS. Boll. Mai. vii. 237.)

[G. T. S.]

Monks.

EUSEBIUS (116), a Scotie monk, said by Dempster to have flourished A.D. 369, and to have written Translationem Andree, and In Sacras Scripturas aliquid. (Dempster, Hist. Eccl. Gent. Scot. i. 255-6; Tanner, Bibl. 271.)

[J. G.]

EUSEBIUS (117), the third in age of the four Origenist Nitrian solitaires known as the "Tall Brethren." [CHRYSOStOM, Vol. I. p. 525; DIOSCORUS (4)]. (Soz. H. E. vi. 7; Baron. Annal. ann. 399.)

EUSEBIUS (118), abbat of Mount Coryphe, in the 5th century. He was brought up by his uncle Marianus, a solitary, and, like him, at first lived a secluded life near Antioch. At the earnest entreaty of St. Ammianus, he quitted his solitude to become abbat of Mount Coryphe, a lofty hill in the same neighbourhood. His life is given by Theodoret. It is recorded of him, among many other austerities, that he chained his neck to his girdle to prevent his eyes seeing the beauties of nature, and that for forty years he looked upon nothing out of doors but the path which led from the monastery to the chapel. He was followed by a multitude of disciples, and appointed heads to many monasteries which he founded. He is mentioned as having taught philosophy to St. Sidonius (Sidon. Apoll. Epp. iv. 1). He was commemorated on Jan. 23. (Theodoret, Hist. Relig. iv. in Patr. Gr. lxxxii. 1339; Acta SS. Jan. ii. 486; Ceillier, Hist. des Auteurs ecclés. x. 53; Baillet, Vies des Saints, Jan. 23.)

EUSEBIUS (119), an anchorite of Asicha in Syria. His austerities are mentioned by Theodoret, who for a long time was the only visitor he would receive. He clothed himself in skins, lived upon peas and beans soaked in water, and is said to have passed seven weeks fasting, having eaten nothing but fifteen figs. He died some time after the year 400. (Theodoret, Philoth. cap. 18; Acta SS. 15 Feb. ii. 824; Ceillier, Hist. des Auteurs ecclés. x. 58.)

[L. G. S.]

EUSEBIUS (120), solitary, in the 5th century, a disciple of St. Marcellianus, whom, according to the saint's desire, he buried in a secluded and unknown spot. Ceillier suggests that he is identical with the abbat whose life was written by Theodoret (No. 118), but no connexion of the latter with St. Marcellianus is mentioned by either the Bollandists or Baillet (Ceillier, Hist. des Auteurs ecclés. x. 53).

[L. G. S.]

EUSEBIUS (121), Syrian monk, one of a large sect nicknamed Bóσκοι, or "Grazers," from their habits. They lived in the open air, ate no bread nor meat, nor drank wine. At feeding-time each took a sickle and wandered over the hills like cattle grazing, cutting and eating herbs. In the intervals they passed their time in praying and singing hymns. (Sozom. H. E. vi. 33.)

EUSEBIUS (122), a solitary at Carrhae, the ancient Haran, briefly mentioned by Sozomen. (Soz. H. E. vi. 33.)

[L. G. S.]

EUSEBIUS (123), an abbat of age and piety, suddenly excommunicated by Maximianus bishop of Syracuse. For this the bishop was reproved by Gregory the Great in 592, but when he wished again to enter into communion with the abbat, Eusebius refused, upon which Gregory wrote to him, reproving him for his pride. (Greg. Mag. Epist. lib. ii. indict. x. epp. 34, 36, in Migne, lxxvii. 572-574; Ceillier, Aut. Sac. xl. 487.)

[A. H. D. A.]

Lay Dignitaries.

EUSEBIUS (124), consul with Rufinus the year of the council of Sardica, A.D. 343. He may have been the same as the colleague of Hypatius in 359. (Socr. Eccl. Hist. ii. 20; Baron. ad ann. 347.)

[W. M. S.]

EUSEBIUS (125), FLAVIUS, May 22, A.D. 359, consul with Flavius Hypatius at the date of the formula of Sirmium and Ariminum (Athanas. Op. pars i. p. 576; Socr. ii. 39.)

He was brother of the empress Eusebia, wife of Constantius II. (Amm. xxi. 6, § 4), and brother of his colleague Hypatius (Amm. xviii. 1, § 1). Both were banished by Valens (probably about A.D. 374) on the charge of aspiring to the empire, but were almost immediately recalled, the emperor still continuing to treat them with the greatest indignity (Amm. xxix. 2, § 9-15).

[M. F. A.]

EUSEBIUS (126), eunuch, and grand chamberlain under Constantius II. Socrates (ii. 2, 16) relates that, after the death of Constantine in 337, Eusebius of Nicomedia and Theognis of Nicaea, bestirring themselves on behalf of the Arians, made use of a certain presbyter who had before been instrumental in recalling Arius from exile. This presbyter, having been entrusted by Constantine with his will, was in high favour with Constantius. He persuaded Eusebius the head chamberlain to adopt Arian opinions, and the rest of the chamberlains followed. The united force prevailed on the emperor also.

In 354 Eusebius was successful in checking a revolt among some troops at Chalon-sur-Saône (Amm. xiv. 10, § 5). Julian represents the arrest of Gallus as a concession of Constantius to the advice of Eusebius (Ad. Ath. 272 D), and this agrees with the account of Philostorgius, who tells us that it was owing to the entreaties of the eunuch and his companions that the sentence of exile was afterwards changed for that of death, and also that Eusebius intercepted the messengers whom Constantius, in a moment of compunction, had sent to reverse the sentence (ibid. iv. 1; cf. Amm. xiv. 11, § 3). After the death of Gallus in 354, Eusebius was appointed with Arboreus to inquire into the charges against the party of Gallus, and according to Ammianus put them indiscriminately to death (xv. 3, § 2). The same authority informs us that the appointment of the incompetent Sabinianus as prefect of the east, and the consequent revolt of the Persians, was due to his influence (xviii. 5, § 4, cf. xx. 2, § 3). Eusebius was the bitter enemy of Julian, and did all in his power to separate Constantius from him (Jul. Ad. Ath. 24 A; cf. Epist. 17, 384 D).

In 359 Eusebius was the mainspring of the plan of Eusebius and others for dividing the council to be held on the subject of Arianism, making the Western bishops sit at Rimini, the Eastern at Seleucia; part of those in the secret were to sit at each council, and try to gain over their opponents in different ways to Arian views. Eusebius the chamberlain was a dear friend of Julian, and all the other laymen of influence favoured the plan in order to please the chamberlain. (Socr. Eccl. Hist. iv. 16.)

On the death of Constantius in 361 nothing remained for Eusebius but to submit to Julian, since no one else could be made emperor; and accordingly Eusebius tried to curry favour with Julian by assuring him of the loyalty of the east (Amm. xxi. 15, § 4). He was unable, however, to avert what Ammianus and Philostorgius represent as the just reward of his deeds. One of the first acts of Julian was to condemn him to death (Amm. xxii. 3, § 12). Ammianus describes him as the prime mover of all the court intrigues of his day, and sarcastically calls the emperor one of his favourites (Amm. xviii. 4, § 3).

[W. M. S. and M. F. A.]

EUSEBIUS (127), vicar of Pontus, uncle of the empress Dominica, who menaced St. Basil with torture and death if he refused to surrender a lady who had fled to his church to escape a hateful marriage. [BASILIIUS OF CAESAREA, Vol. I. p. 290 A.] [E. V.]

Miscellaneous.

EUSEBIUS (128), father of St. Jerome. [HIERONYMUS.] [W. H. F.]

EUSEBIUS (129), a magician, born at Myndus in Caria, a disciple of Edesius of Pergamus. [EDESIIUS (4).] On the visit of the emperor Julian to the latter, Eusebius seeing his inclination towards the art of magic, persuaded him to go to Ephesus and consult Maximus, who subsequently acquired so great an influence over him. (Eunap. Vit. Marimi. in Vit. Soph.)

[M. F. A.]

EUSEBIUS (130), a young man whom Basil calls his son, in whose behalf he wrote to Sophronius prefect of Constantinople, and to Abargius A.D. 374. Eusebius was implicated in a charge under which a large number of persons had been convicted. Basil requests that he may not be condemned unheard, and that a thorough investigation of his character should be instituted. (Basil, Ep. 177, 178 [334, 360].) [E. V.]

EUSEBIUS (131), a college friend and chamber-companion of Basil at Athens. He came to Caesarea during Basil's temporary absence from home shortly before his death. Basil wrote to express his deep regret at missing the sight of his old friend, and to introduce a presbyter, Cyriacus, to him. (Basil, Ep. 271 [11].)

EUSEBIUS (132), a pagan of advanced years, styled by Gregory Nyssen "a mountain of unbelief," converted by that father during his stay at Constantinople for the council, A.D. 381. (Greg. Nyss. de Futo, ii. p. 62.) [E. V.]

EUSEBIUS (133), a friend of Ambrose, wrongly identified with the bishop of Bologna (No. 22), addressed by Ambrose in two letters, 54 and 55. He had a son Faustinus, to whom Ambrose's letter 39 is written; and he had sent some of his grandchildren to Milan to be educated under the care of Ambrose, including an Ambrosius and Ambrosia, as well as a Faustinus the younger. Ambrose's treatise, de Institutione Virginis, is addressed to him, the occasion of it being the dedication of Ambrosia as a virgin.

EUSEBIUS (134) SCHOLASTICUS, an author who, about A.D. 400, wrote a poem in heroic verse in four books, entitled Γαϊανίς, describing the rebellion of Gaianus the Gothic commander against Arcadius, A.D. 399. Of this rebellion Eusebius had been a spectator. (Socr. H. E. vi. 6; Niceph. H. E. xiii. 6.) [E. V.]

EUSEBIUS (135), a gentleman of Hippo; apparently of the Donatist party, to whom St. Augustine wrote a letter (Ep. 34) complaining of the behaviour of the Donatists in respect of a youth who in the midst of violent conduct towards his mother had sought and received baptism from them. He asks whether this had been done with the sanction of the bishop, Pro-

Proculeianus, and if it be so, as he disliked the notion of a conference of delegates from each party to discuss the matter, he proposes that he should himself discuss it quietly with him either alone or in conjunction with a colleague, or if he objected to him as an opponent, that his own place should be taken by Samsucius bishop of Tunia. In a second letter (35), written apparently in reply to an answer from Eusebius, Augustine mentions cases, of which he says Proculeianus may not be aware, of rebaptism, especially of a subdeacon named Spanianus, and of other men and women guilty of disorderly conduct in the church, and who, on reception into the Donatist community, exceeded their former disorders, and had some of them joined the Circumcellions. He states the rule of the church in receiving persons from the Donatists, viz. to receive them not as heathens, to be baptized for the first time, but as returning penitents, and he inveighs in strong terms against the conduct of these apostates who, he says, being intolerant of discipline, affect a sacrilegious contempt for the church under the pretence of having received a new gift of grace, which is really only a new species of partisan frenzy. After describing his own moderation in the case of a girl whom her father wished to compel by force to return to Catholic communion, he mentions how, at the instigation of one of the Donatist presbyters, he had been publicly assailed with cries of "traditor" and "persecutor." Of these things Proculeianus ought to be made aware, and to restrain the violence of his clergy. [DONATISM, Vol. I. p. 888.] [H. W. P.]

EUSEBIUS (136), brother of Basilissa. On both of them Theodoret composed an epitaph, in which he called them nurselings of the most holy Xoli (Ξολῶν ἡγαθέων). Hesychius (Lex. s. v.) is of opinion that the Xoli were some unknown foreign tribe. They are apostrophized in another of Theodoret's epitaphs (num. 118), ὦ Ξολῶν ζαθέων ἱερὸν νέδον! The language seems to suggest a seat of Christian education, perhaps a monastic settlement or episcopal town. In his next epitaph Theodoret commemorates Georgius, a brother of Eusebius and Basilissa. (Theod. Curm. lib. iv. sec. 2, num. 121, 122.) [C. H.]

EUSEBIUS (137), an advocate of Constantinople, addressed by Theodoret in 448, at the time that the report began to be spread that through the machinations of his implacable enemy, Dioscorus, he was about to be deposed and banished, A.D. 448. Theodoret requests Eusebius to console his friends with the assurance that he rejoices rather than grieves at the prospect, in view of the reward promised to those who suffer faithfully for Christ, and to tell his enemies that what they hoped would overwhelm him with distress was rather a source of happiness to him. Eusebius being familiar with classical literature, Theodoret quotes the words of Socrates, Thucydides, and Homer on the duty of a man, how much more than a Christian, to bear the evils of life, and even death itself, with composure. His letter concludes with a very clear statement of his belief in the two natures in the one personality of the Son, in answer to those who charged him with Nestorian heresy. (Theod. Epist. 21.) [E. V.]

EUSTACHIUS

EUSENDUS, bishop of Lerida. [EURENDA.]

EUSICHIUS. [EUSITIUS.]

EUSIGNIUS, Aug. 5, martyr at Antioch under Julian, in the autumn of A.D. 362. He was originally a distinguished soldier under Constantius, father of Constantine the Great, and was reputed to be 110 years old when Julian arrived at Antioch. Arrested among the very first, he refused to offer sacrifice, and reproved the emperor for his apostasy, after which he was beheaded (Bas. Men.; Bar. Annal. 362). Concerning Julian's cruelty at Antioch, see Greg. Naz. t. i. Orat. 3; Rufin. H. E. i. 35, 36; Socrates, iii. 16; Sozomen, v. 7; Theodoret, iii. 11. [BABYLAS.] [G. T. S.]

EUSITIUS (EUSICHIUS, EUSICIUS, USICHIUS, EUTICHIUS, EUSYCHIUS), abbat, born at Périgueux about A.D. 465. His parents being destitute and driven by famine to Berry, they there sold Eusitius to the abbat of Parpeçay (Patrici or Perci) on the Cher, in the diocese of Bourges. Here he was educated and eventually admitted as a monk. Preferring solitude however, he obtained permission to become an anchorite. His reputation as a healer of the sick was great, and many flocked to see him. He was visited by Childebert I., when marching towards Spain in 531, and also on his victorious return. On this occasion, at the request of the saint, who refused all presents, Childebert set free his Spanish prisoners.

Afterwards being presented with the ground on which his hermitage stood, he there founded the monastery of Celles in Berry, at the confluence of the Cher and the Sandre, of which he became abbat, receiving also jurisdiction over his old monastery. Here he is said to have died about A.D. 542; he was commemorated on Nov. 27. (Greg. Tur. Glor. Conf. cap. 82 in Migne, Patrol. Lat. lxxi. 890.) [L. G. S.]

EUSPICIUS was a priest of Verdun when that city revolted against king Clovis. After a siege, it was on the point of being taken on the night of the death of its bishop, Firminus, A.D. 498. Euspicius was deputed to implore pardon, and prevailed by reason of his venerable age and reputation for sanctity. The king also offered him the vacant bishopric, and on his refusal made him a grant of land, upon which he built the monastery of St. Mesmin de Micy near Orleans, and became its first abbat. (Acta SS. 20 Jul. v. 72.) [R. T. S.]

EUSTACHIUS (1), Oct. 12, presbyter in Egypt, and probably a martyr. Some MSS. of Mart. Hieron. and Usuardus place him in Syria. (Acta SS. Boll. Oct. vi. 9.) [G. T. S.]

EUSTACHIUS (2) (EUSTATHIUS, named PLACIDUS before his conversion), a military martyr, commemorated by the Latins Nov. 2, by the Greeks Sept. 20, with his wife Theopistia, and two sons, Agapius and Theopistus, at Rome under the emperor Hadrian, A.D. 118. Their Acts are evidently spurious, and rejected by Tillemont (Mém. t. ii. 226, 685) as unworthy even of discussion. The fact of their martyrdom has strong and early evidence. The feast of St. Eustachius is marked in the Kal. Allatii and the EUSTACHIUS. There was a celebrated church at Rome dedicated to him. The Bollandist (Acta SS. Sept. vi. 106-137) gives a picture of a artist from it relating the dedication of the church by pope Silvester in honour of the martyr, of the time, as he thinks, of Constantine the Great. (Mart. Usuardi, Wandalbert. ; Bas. Men. ; Euph. Call. H. E. lib. iii. c. 29 ; Joh. Damasc. de Imag. lib. 3 ; Baron. Ann. 120 iii. iv.) Baronius (A. E. ann. 103. iv.) conjectures he may have been the Placidus mentioned by Josephus (de Bell. Jud. lib. iii. c. 4 ; lib. iv. c. 187 ; Jos. Ant. sec. 43, 74) as a celebrated commander under Titus. In that case, at his martyrdom he must have been very old. His Acts are contained in Symeon Metaphrastes and Surinus.

[G. T. S.]

EUSTACHIUS (3), or EUSTASIUS. According to "Praedestinatus" (i. 16), a bishop of Lilyseum, in Sicily, who opposed the heresy of Eutychism.

[G. S.]

EUSTACHIUS (4), bishop of Cremona, present at the third and sixth Roman synods under pope Symmachus, A.D. 501, according to the writing of Dahn (Die Könige der Germanen), who accepts, in this disputed matter, with a slight alteration, the arrangement of Hefele, (ibid. (Mansi, viii. 252 and 315). [A. H. D. A.]

EUSTACHIUS (5), bishop of Susea. [EUSTASIUS (4).]

EUSTACHIUS (6), abbat of Attalina, near Ayn, in Galatia. On the Persian invasion in 638 he and his monks were obliged to evacuate their monastery. As they could not take many books with them, Antiochus, a monk of St. Eusebius near Jerusalem, wrote, at the request of Eustachius, an abridgement of the Scriptures, containing in one volume all that was necessary for salvation, to supply the loss of his library. (Antiochus Monach. Epist. ad Eustath. in Pat. Gr. lxxix. 1422 ; Ceillier, Hist. des Auteurs eccl. xi. 697.)

[I. G. S.]

EUSTACHIUS. [EUSTASIUS, EUSTATHIUS, EUSTATHIUS.]

EUSTADIOLA, abbess. She was the daughter of noble parents, at whose desire she married. After having given birth to a son whom she named Tetradius she was left a widow. She then devoted herself to a monastic life, and founded the "ecclesia medii Monasterii" (Moyen-Monastere) at Bourges, of which she became abbess. Many miracles are recorded of her, and she was commemorated on June 8. She lived in the 7th century, and died at the age of more than sixty years. (Boll. Acta SS. Jun. ii. 133.)

[I. G. S.]

EUSTASIUS (1), ST., reputed 7th or 8th bishop of Naples, cir. 180, between Agrippinus and St. Eusebius, on the authority of Joannes Boninus of Naples. (Ugh. Ital. Sac. vi. 27 ; Acta SS. 29 Mart. iii. 768.)

[C. H.]

EUSTASIUS (2) (Ambros. ep. 42, p. 970 Pat. Lat. xvi. 1129 A ; Epist. Decretal. tom. i.) bishop [EUSTATHIUS (12).]

[F. A.]

EUSTASIUS (3) (Gall. Chr. xii. 806), bishop [EUSTATHIUS.]

EUSTASIUS (4) (EUSTATHIUS, EUSTACHIUS), fifth bishop of Marseilles, succeeding Venerius, and followed by Graecus, in the latter half of the 5th century. He ordained St. Eutropius, who afterwards became the sixth bishop of Orange. Gennadius, who lived towards the close of this century, in his de Viris illustr. (cap. 79 in Migne, Patr. Lat. lviii. 1103), says that Musaeus, a priest of Marseilles, composed and dedicated to Eustasius a book upon the sacraments. (Gall. Christ. i. 634.)

EUSTASIUS (5) (EUSTACHIUS), 26th occupant of the see of Bourges. Gregory of Tours (Hist. Franc. x. 26) states that he was a deacon of Autun, who succeeded Sulpicius I. in the see. He died in 607, or according to Le Cointe (Ann. Eccl. Franc. a. 602, n. xxviii., tom. ii. 555) in 602, and was commemorated as a saint in his own diocese Dec. 31. His successor was St. Apollinaris. (Gall. Christ. ii. 15.)

[S. A. B.]

EUSTASIUS (6), abbat, born in Burgundy about the year A.D. 560. He belonged to a family of distinction, and was nephew to St. Micetius. When grown up, he embraced a monastic life, and entered the monastery of Luxovium (Luxeuil, in Franche-Comté), under the rule of St. Columbanus. He was appointed head of the school attached to the monastery, and soon made it one of the most celebrated of the age. In 610, St. Columbanus retired from Luxeuil, and Eustasius was chosen to succeed him. As abbat he gained the confidence of Clotaire II., who sent him to Italy to try and induce Columbanus to return. This Columbanus refused to do, but confirmed Eustasius in his appointment as abbat. In 616 and 617 Eustasius was employed in missionary labours, at first in his own neighbourhood among the Varasci inhabiting the basin of the Doubs, of whom some were idolaters and others were infected with the errors of Photinus or Bonosus; and afterwards among the Boii or Bavarians, where he remained but a short time, and then sent other labourers to continue the work. While he was absent, one of his monks, Agrestinus, wishing him to discard the authority of Rome, made a schism in the monastery of Luxovium. Eustasius, returning, expelled Agrestinus, who then inveighed fiercely against the rule of St. Columbanus, and so persistent were his accusations that at length a council on the subject was convened at Mâcon in 623 (Baillet, Vies des Saints, March 29). Eustasius, in his speech at this council, cited Agrestinus to appear within the year before the judgment seat of God, there to plead his cause against St. Columbanus, and his opponent was murdered a few months later (Baron. 617, 11). Eustasius died in the fifteenth year of his rule, A.D. 625. Martyrologies vary as to the day on which he was commemorated, some saying March 29, others Oct. 11. Eustasius wrote a life of Columbanus [COLUMBANUS]; his own life was written by his contemporary Jonas of Bobbio, and has been printed by the Bollandists (Acta SS. Mart. iii. 786) and by Mabillon (Acta SS. O. S. B. saec. ii. p. 108). See also Baronius, Annales Eccles. A.D. 612, 10, &c.; Ceillier, xi. 617; Cave, Historia Liter. i. 575. [I. G. S.]

EUSTASIUS. See also EUSTACHIUS and EUSTATHIUS.

EUSTATHIA, sister of Ambrosia, at Jerusalem, whose acquaintance Gregory Nyssen made during his visit to the holy city, and to whom, together with Basilissa, perhaps the daughter of one of them, Gregory Nyssen addressed a letter after his return home, A.D. 379, indicating the disappointment he felt at the unholy lives of so many who dwelt among the holy places. (Greg. Nyss. Opp. vol. iii. p. 659, ed. Morel. 1638; Pat. Gr. xlv. 1015.) The authenticity of the letter is vindicated by Isaac Causaubon, by whom it was first printed, with a Latin version and notes, in 1606.

EUSTATHIUS (1), bishop of Parium, on the Hellespont; he is mentioned among the bishops who attended the funeral of St. Parthenius, bishop of Lampsacus, who lived during the reign of Constantine the Great, A.D. 306-337. (AA. SS. Bolland. Feb. ii. 42; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 787.)

EUSTATHIUS (2), bishop of Arethusa, in Syria Secunda, north of Emesa. He was present at the first general council held at Nicaea, A.D. 325. (Mansi, ii. 693; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. ii. 915.)

EUSTATHIUS (3), bishop first of Berrhoea in Syria, and then of Antioch, c. A.D. 324-331, designated by Theodoret (H. E. i. 7) "the Great," ὁ μέγας, one of the earliest and most vigorous opponents of Arianism, venerated for his learning and his virtues, and admired for his eloquence (Soz. H. E. i. 2; ii. 19; Theod. H. E. i. 20), recognized by Athanasius as a worthy fellow-labourer and fellow-sufferer in the cause of the orthodox faith (Athan. Hist. Arian. § 5). Eustathius was a native of Side in Pamphylia (Hieron. de Vir. Illus. c. 85). Nothing is known of his early life, but the title of "confessor," given him by Athanasius more than once (tom. i. pp. 702, 812) indicates that he witnessed to, and suffered for, the faith, in the persecution of Diocletian. He became bishop of Berrhoea, and while he occupied that see, the esteem in which he was held is shewn by his being selected as one of the orthodox prelates to whom Alexander of Alexandria sent a copy of his letter, addressed to Alexander of Constantinople, on the subject of Arius and his errors (Theod. H. E. i. 4). The date of his translation from Beroea to Antioch is uncertain. Sozomen, however, is decidedly in error in placing it after the Council of Nicaea, and making it the act of the assembled fathers of that synod (Soz. H. E. i. 2). Theodoret states more correctly that he sat at that council as bishop of Antioch, and that his election to that see was the unanimous act of the bishops, presbyters, and faithful laity of the city and province (Theodoret, H. E. i. 7). According to Theodoret he was the immediate successor of Philogonius; but according to the Chronicle of Jerome, which is supported by Theophanes and others, a certain Paulinus, to be distinguished from Paulinus of Tyre, intervened for a short time (Tillemont. vol. vii. p. 22, note i. p. 646). Eustathius accepted the weighty charge very reluctantly, as if foreseeing the troubles it would bring upon him. At the Council of Nicaea Eustathius occupied one of the first, if not the very first place among the assembled prelates (Facund. viii. 4). Whether he occupied the seat of honour at the emperor's right hand and pronounced the panegyric address to Constantine is doubtful. The Allocutio ad Imperatorem given by Labbe (Concil. ii. 633) is certainly supposititious. This fact is asserted by Theodoret (H. E. i. 7), but contradicted by Sozomen (H. E. i. 19), who assigns the dignity to Eusebius. Eusebius himself maintains a discreet silence, but he evidently wishes it to be inferred that the anonymous occupant of the place of honour mentioned by him was himself (Euseb. de Vit. Const. iii. 11). This is accepted by Valesius (not. ad loc.) On his return to Antioch Eustathius used his authority with great decision to check the rising heresy. He banished such of his clergy as were suspected of holding Arian tenets, and resolutely rejected all ambiguous submissions. Among those whom he refused to receive among his clergy were Stephen, Leontius, ὁ ἀνόκωτος, and Eudoxius (who successively occupied his episcopal seat after his deposition), George of Laodicea, Theodosius of Tripolis, and Eustathius of Sebaste (Athan. Hist. Arian. § 5). As well in his published writings as in his sermons, he lost no opportunity of declaring the Nicene faith, and shewing its agreement with Holy Scripture. Theodoret (H. E. i. 8) makes special mention of one of his sermons on Prov. viii. 22, "The Lord possessed me in the beginning of His way," &c., from which he gives a long extract. The troubled relations of Eustathius with the two Eusebii may be dated from the Council of Nicaea. At this synod Eusebius of Caesarea and Eustathius felt themselves to be rivals as well in theological views as in favour with the emperor. The elevation of one meant the depression of the other. To one of Eustathius's uncompromising and somewhat old-fashioned orthodoxy, Eusebius appeared a foe to the truth, the more dangerous on account of his ability and the subtlety with which he veiled his heretical proclivities. Eustathius did not shrink from denouncing his departure from the Nicene faith. Eusebius retorted with the charge of Sabellianism, accusing Eustathius of holding one only personality in the Deity (Socr. H. E. i. 23; Soz. H. E. ii. 18; Theod. H. E. i. 21). Their position became more and more one of mutual suspicion and hardly concealed enmity. Eusebius, endowed with far more subtlety and worldly wisdom than Eustathius, was watching his opportunity to overthrow the rival by whose personal and official superiority he was overshadowed. He could reckon on the support of the majority of the neighbouring bishops, especially his namesake of Nicomedia, impatient like himself of the power and influence of Eustathius. The changed feeling of the emperor and the court favour now shewn towards the Arianizing party deprived their enterprise of any risk of compromising themselves with the imperial power. The two Eusebii and their adherents had but to bide their time, concert their mea-were skilfully, and seize the first favourable opportunity, and success was certain. The council was not slow to present itself. Eusebius of Nicomedia flattered the emperor's vanity by a request to be permitted to visit the magnificent sacred buildings erected by him at Jerusalem. Constantine not only acceded to his petition, but assigned him vehicles and every other convenience for the journey, at the public expense. Theognis of Nicaea accompanied him. Their progress was one almost of royal magnificence. On their passage through Antioch the two prelates had a fraternal reception from Eustathius, and they parted with every appearance of friendship. Their next meeting was of a very different character. His inspection of the sacred buildings over, Eusebius returned to Antioch with a large cortege of partisan bishops—Aetius of Lydda, Patrophilus of Scythopolis, Theodotus of Laodicea, and the prime mover of the whole conspiracy, Eusebius of Caesarea. The cabal entered Antioch with the air of masters. The plot had been maturing in their absence. Witnesses were prepared with charges against the bishop of incontinency and other gross crimes. Eustathius was summoned before this self-constituted tribunal, and in defiance of the opposition of the better-minded bishops, and in the absence of any trustworthy evidence, he was condemned on the ground of heresy, profligacy, and tyrannical conduct, and deposed from his bishopric. The deposition of a bishop whom they loved and revered aroused the indignation of the excitable people of Antioch, who took up arms in his defence. Some of the magistrates and other officials headed the movement, and encouraged Eustathius to refuse to obey so unjust a sentence. An artfully coloured and exaggerated account of these disturbances and Eustathius's complicity in them was transmitted to Constantine. His enemies had already poisoned the emperor's mind by reporting that he had given currency to some scandalous tales derogatory to the character of the emperor's mother, Helena. ("Stabulariam fuisse ferunt." Ambros. de Obit. Theod. 42.) His fate was sealed. A count, believed to have been Strategus Maximianus, was despatched to quell the sedition and to put the sentence of the council into execution. Eustathius gave an example of submission to constituted authority. Accompanied by a large body of his clergy, resolved to share his fate, he left Antioch without resistance, or manifesting any resentment against the authors of so fatal a wrong. (Socr. H. E. i. 24; Soz. H. E. i. 19; Theod. H. E. i. 21; Philost. H. E. ii. 7; Labbe. V. Const. iii. 59.) Jerome states that the place of his banishment was Trajanopolis in Thrace, but he appears to have spent the larger part of his exile at Philippi, where he died, c. 337. The date of his deposition is much controverted. It may be probably placed at the end of 330 or the beginning of 331 A.D. It can hardly be questioned that there is an error in the text of Jerome (de Vir. Illust. c. 85) and Athanasius (Hist. Arian. § 5), which refers the event to the reign of Constantius instead of Constantine. (See Tillemont, Mém. Eccl. vol. vii. pp. 3; see Saint Eustathe; Wetter, Restitutio chronolog. rerum contra Arian. gest.; De Broglie, L'Eglise et l'Empire, ch. vii.) His body, which in Jerome's time was still buried in the place of his banishment—"ubi usque hodie conditus est" (Hieron. de Vir. Illust. c. 85)—was brought back to Antioch by Calandio, then bishop of that city, by the permission of the emperor Zeno, and received with the utmost honour by the citizens, c. 482 (Theod. Lect. ii. p. 557; Theophan. p. 114). The deposition of Eustathius was the origin of a lamentable schism in the church of Antioch, which had the effect of dividing the Catholic church into two parties, and creating misunderstanding and discord in the ranks of the orthodox. This schism lasted nearly a century, not being completely healed till the episcopate of Alexander, A.D. 413-420.

Eustathius was a copious writer, and is much praised by early authorities for the eloquence of his language, which, according to Sozomen (H. E. ii. 19), had somewhat of an archaic cast, and the grave dignity of his style, as well as for his knowledge of Scripture and power of orthodox interpretation (Hieron. Epist. 70 [84], ad Magnum). Of his numerous writings, we possess only one entire work, that named by Jerome De Engastrimytho adversus Origenem, printed by Galland. In this work he attacks Origen with great vehemence, ridicules him as a πολυίστωρ, and controverts his idea that the prophet Samuel was actually called up by the witch of Endor (Galland, Vet. Patr. Bibl. vol. iv.) and Migne (Patrol. vol. xviii. p. 614, ff.) Of his other works, we only have a few scattered fragments. Excerpts from his eight books against the Arians, gathered from Photius, Facundus, Gelasius, &c., are given by Galland (u. s.), Fabricius (Biblioth. Graec. ix. 131 ff. ed. Harles), and Migne (u. s. p. 691 ff.). Some passages from his sermon on Prov. viii. 32 and from his exposition of Ps. xv. and xcii. are to be found in the Exanistes of Theodoret (Diacl. ii. p. 90; dial. iii. p. 156, &c.). His discourse on Prov. ix. 5 is quoted in the acts of the second Nicene council (Labbe, Concil. viii. pp. 1099, 1479). His expositions of Holy Scripture are frequently quoted in the Catenae. Of his innumerable letters, "infinite epistolae" extant in Jerome's time, not one remains. A liturgy bearing his name, but probably spurious, appears in Renaudot (i. 254) and Migne (u. s. p. 698 ff.). A spurious commentary on the Hexameron bearing his name is also printed by Migne (p. 707 ff.). (Fabricius, Bibl. Graec. vol. ix. p. 131, ff. ed. Harles; Cave, Hist. Lit. i. 187; Galland, Vet. Patr. Bibl. tom. iv.; Migne, Patrolog. tom. ix. p. 131 ff.; Tillemont, Mém. Eccl. tom. vii. p. 21 ff.; De Broglie, L'Eglise et l'Empire, tom. ii. p. 294 ff.) [E. V.]

EUSTATHIUS (4), bishop of Sebasteia, or Sebaste (the modern Sivas), a town of Pontus, on the northern bank of the Halys, the capital of Armenia Minor (c. A.D. 357-380). Eustathius occupies a more conspicuous than honourable place in the unhappy dissensions between the adherents of the orthodox faith and the various shades of Arian, semi-Arian, and Anomoean heresy which destroyed the peace and retarded the growth of the church during the middle of the 4th century. Originally a disciple of Arius he retained to the last the taint of his early heretical training, proving in Basil's words that "the Ethiopian could not change his skin," and after repeated approaches more or less nearly to the Nicene faith, and with occasional professions of accepting it, he probably ended his days as a Eunomian heretic. The frequent and rapid transformations his creed experienced are a proof that Eustathius's religious convictions did not rest on any well-grounded dogmatic basis, but that with an underlying tendency in favour of his early Arian teaching, he had no fixed principle to save him, to use Basil's image, from being "carried hither and thither, like the clouds, with every changing wind" (Basil. Epist. 244 [82], § 9). Few in that epoch of conflicting creeds and formularies of faith ever signed more and more various documents. Basil enumerates his signature of the formularies of Ancyra, Seleucia, Constantinople, Lampsacus, Nice in Thrace, and Cyzicus, which, if not all directly at variance with one another, were sufficiently diverse to indicate the vagueness of his theology (Basil. l. c.). By his frequent changes of opinion Eustathius naturally forfeited the confidence of the rival schools of theology, and was regarded with suspicion by all. He was subjected to repeated sentences of censure and deposition. He was deposed by Eulalius, the bishop who ordained him, and by Eusebius of Constantinople, excommunicated by a synod at Neocaesarea, convicted of perjury at a council at Antioch, condemned by the council of Melitene, deposed and banished at Constantinople, while his hyper-ascetic extravagances were the cause of the summoning of the council at Gangra, where he and his followers were synodically condemned. Lamentable as were Eustathius's vacillations of faith and dogmatic inconsistencies, his personal character appears to have been not only free from reproach, but of so high a standard as to account for the powerful influence he exercised over others. There must have been something more than common in a man who could secure the affection and respect for many years of Basil the Great, "as bearing about him all the marks of a zealous and honest though erring man" (J. H. Newman, Hist. Sketches, iii. 20), and in Basil's own strong language, "exhibiting something more than man," μείζον τι ἢ κατ' ἀνθρώπου (Basil. Epist. 212 [370], § 2), and of whom, after the painful dissensions which embittered Basil's later years, that great saint could say that from childhood to extreme old age he had watched over himself with the greatest care, the result of his self-discipline being seen in his life and character (Basil. Epist. 244 [82], § 4). His life was one of unsparing austerity. As bishop, he manifested a loving care for the sick and needy, and was unwearied in his exertions in the fulfilment of his episcopal duties. The force of Eustathius's character is evidenced by the rapid success of the system of coenobitic monasticism which was introduced by him into Asia, and which Basil took as his model. This Sozomen attributes to personal influence alone, inasmuch as he was devoid of eloquence. (Soz. H. E. iii. 14; Basil. Epist. 223 [79], § 3.)

Eustathius was born in the Cappadocian Caesarea towards the beginning of the 4th century. According to Socrates and Sozomen (Socr. H. E. ii. 43; Soz. H. E. iv. 24), he was the son of Eulalius, bishop of Caesarea. No bishop of that name, however, appears to have held the see at that time, and the statement is probably erroneous. As he was ordained at Antioch about the time that Eulalius was bishop of that city, it is possible that there has been some confusion between a natural and a spiritual father. He studied at Alexandria under the heresiarch Arius (c. A.D. 320) and, according to Basil, was regarded as one of his most genuine disciples (Basil. Epist. 223 [79], § 3; 244 [82], § 9; 263 [74], § 3). On leaving Alexandria he repaired to Antioch, where he was refused ordination on account of his Arian tenets by his orthodox namesake, the bishop of that city (Athanas. Solit. p. 812). He was afterwards ordained by the Eulalius of whom we have just spoken (c. 331), but was very speedily degraded by him on account of his refusal to wear the clerical dress (Socr. H. E. ii. 43, Soz. H. E. iv. 24). As the twelfth canon of Gangra (convened, as we have said, at a later period, to correct the extravagances of Eustathius) condemns the wearing of the πεπλόμας (the rough pallium adopted by philosophers and monks to shew their contempt for luxury) as a mark of superior sanctity, we may reasonably conclude that this, and not the use of the secular garb, was the offence which was thus punished. From Antioch Eustathius returned to his native city of Caesarea, where he obtained ordination from Hermogenes, the orthodox bishop of that city, on declaring his unqualified adhesion to the Nicene faith (Basil. Epist. 244 [82], § 9; 263 [74], § 3). On the death of Hermogenes, Eustathius repaired to Constantinople and attached himself to Eusebius, the bishop of the Imperial city, "the Coryphaeus of the Arian party" (Basil. l. c.). By him he was a second time deposed (c. A.D. 342) on the ground of some unspecified act of unfaithfulness in the discharge of duty (Soz. H. E. iv. 24). He retired once more to Caesarea, where, by a careful concealment of his Arian proclivities, he sought to commend himself to the then bishop, Dorian, a man whose love of peace was stronger than his zeal for orthodoxy, of which, moreover, his sense was not very keen. The subsequent period, till he became bishop of Sebaste, is almost a blank in Eustathius's history. We must, however, assign to it the theological argument held by him and his friend Basil of Ancyra with the audacious Anomoean, Aetius, who is regarded by Basil the Great in some sense as Eustathius's pupil (Basil. Epist. 123, § 5), in which, according to Philostorgius (H. E. iii. 16), they were shamefully worsted, but according to Gregory Nyssen (J. Eunom. lib. i. pp. 289, 296) obtained a decisive victory. However this may have been, Eustathius zealously seconded Basil's endeavours to blacken Aetius's character with Gallus, who were nearly ending in his execution (Philostorgius H. E. iii. 27). It was certainly during this period that together with his early friend and fellow disciple, the presbyter Aetius [AETIU] Eustathius undertook an ascetic life, and became the founders of coenobitic monachism in Armenia and the adjacent provinces (Epiphanius Haer. 7 § 2). The rule laid down by him for the government of his religious communities of both sexes formed the model of the system subsequently established by Basil the Great, whose good sense cleared it of the extravagances alluded to by Socrates and Sozomen, which are not unlikely have been the cause, otherwise unknown, of his excommunication by the council of Neo-Caesarea.

nations by those historians (Socr. H. E. ii. 4; Soz. H. E. iv. 24). It was while Eustathius was regulating his coenobitic foundations (c. A.D. 358) that he was visited by Basil, who renowned of the ascetic system, had been travelling far in search of the most perfect example of that life, and found it eventually very near his own home. Basil records the delight with which he saw the coarse garments, the girdle, the sandals of undressed hide, and witnessed the self-denying and laborious lives of Eustathius and his followers. His admiration for such a victory over the world and the flesh dispelled all suspicions of Arian sentiments, and the desire to spread them secretly, which had been rumoured (Basil. Epist. 223 [79], § 3). After Basil had retired to the banks of the Iris and commenced his own monastic life, he and his brother Gregory received frequent visits from Eustathius, who would sometimes accompany them across the river to Annesi, the residence of their mother, the sainted Macrina, where they would spend whole days and nights in friendly theological discussion (Ibid. § 5).

We are ignorant of the exact date of Eustathius's elevation to the episcopate, but it must have been before A.D. 357, when Athanasius speaks of him as a bishop (Athanas. Orat. in Ann. i. p. 290; Solit. p. 812). He was made bishop of Sebasteia, according to the same authority, by the influence of the Arian party, who hoped to have in him an able and facile instrument. His early companion Acrius was a candidate for the bishopric, and felt the mortification of his failure very severely. Eustathius merited the utmost consideration for his friend, when he ordained presbyter, and appointed manager of a house of refuge for the poor, the foundation of which was one of the first acts of his episcopate. The failure of Eustathius's attempts to reconcile Acrius's wounded pride, the grave but groundless charges brought by him against his bishop, and the final rupture between them, are detailed in another article [AERIUS]. Somewhere about this time we may place his conviction of perjury in the council of Antioch mentioned by Sozomen (H. E. iv. 24), and his condemnation and deposition by the obscure council of Melitene in Armenia c. A.D. 357 (Basil. Epist. 263 [74]).^a Neither of these untoward events appear to have entailed any lasting consequences. Eustathius was one of the prelates assembling at the semi-synod summoned at Ancyra by George of Laodicea before Easter A.D. 358, to check the alarming spread of Anomoean doctrines, and accompanied Basil of Ancyra and Eleusius of Cyzicus when conveying the synodal letter, publicly repudiating the Anomoean and Homoiousian doctrines, and declaring for the Homoiousion to the emperor Constantius at Sirmium (Soz. H. E. iv. 13, 14; Basil. Epist. 263 [74], § 4). When the council met at Seleucia the next year, Sept. 27, 359, Eustathius occupied a prominent place in its tumultuous and indecisive proceedings, and was the head of the ten episcopal deputies, Basil of Ancyra, Silvanus of Tarsus and Eleusius of Cyzicus being other chief members, sent to Constantinople to lay their report before Constantine. The closing days of the year were spent in stormy discussions, in which Eustathius took the lead on the semi-Arian side as against the pure Arians. He vehemently denounced the blasphemies of the bold Anomoean, Eudoxius, bishop of Antioch, and produced a formulary of faith declaring the dissimilarity of the Father and the Son, which he asserted to be his composition. Eudoxius denied the authorship of the paper, which he said had been drawn up by Aetius. Aetius was summoned by the emperor, and acknowledged the parentage of the document. Eustathius, however, insisted that though Eudoxius might not be the author of this paper, he held all the doctrines contained in it. Constantius declaring that he must proceed on proved facts, and could condemn no one on conjecture, Eustathius adroitly suggested that Eudoxius might clear himself from all suspicion if he would pronounce an anathema on the propositions of Aetius. This pleased the emperor, and Eudoxius, as cowardly as he was profane, after various subtle shifts, was driven, by Constantius's threats of deposition and banishment, to anathematize the views he inwardly held and afterwards openly promoted. To revenge himself on his accusers, Eudoxius, in his turn, demanded that Eustathius and his fellow-deputies should be required to condemn the Homoiousion as a term not contained in Holy Scripture. Silvanus of Tarsus succeeded in persuading Constantius that if not actually expressed, it might be established from Holy Writ, and, following up his success, induced Constantius to require of Eudoxius to subscribe a repudiation of the leading Arian propositions. Constantius then proceeded to the personal examination of Aetius, who was successfully encountered by his old opponents, Eustathius and Basil (Theod. H. E. ii. 27; Soz. H. E. iv. 23). All seemed to augur the triumph of orthodoxy, when the arrival of Valens and Ursacius from Ariminum announcing the subjugation of the Western bishops and the general proscription of the Homoiousion suddenly changed the scene. Constantius was overjoyed at the unlooked for attainment of his object, and after a protracted discussion, extending through the last day and night of the year, compelled Eustathius and the other Seleucian deputies to sign the fatal formulary. It was then, in Jerome's words, "ingemuit totus orbis et se esse Arianum miratus est" (Hieron. in Lucif. 19). This base concession, however, profited the recreants but little, and when the synod, called by the emperor, of which Acacius was the ruling spirit, met at Constantinople in January A.D. 360, Eustathius was deposed in a violent and tyrannical manner by those who were at the same time accusers and judges, together with Cyril of Jerusalem, Basil of Ancyra, Eleusius of Cyzicus, and other prelates of high consideration. The grounds of deposition were in no case professedly dogmatic. Party spirit and personal hatred were the real causes; but in each instance some old charge of a frivolous nature was reproduced, and made the ostensible plea. Eustathius was not even allowed to defend himself. His former deposition by Eulalius was regarded sufficient (Socr. H. E. ii. 41-43; Soz. H. E. iv. 24). Constantius confirmed the sentence, sent the deposed bishops into exile, and bestowed their sees on others. The death of Constantius in A.D. 361, and the accession of Julian witnessed the recall of Eustathius to his see with the other banished bishops. He immediately repudiated his signature of the creed of Ariminum, and did all he could to shew his horror of pure Arianism. Sozomen informs us that, together with Eleusius, Sophronius, and others of the same sentiments, he held several synods, in which the partisans of Acacius were condemned, the creed of Ariminum denounced, and the Homoiousion asserted as the true mean between the Homoiousion of the West and the Anomoeon of Aetius and his followers (Soz. H. E. v. 14). With the accession of Valens in A.D. 364, Arianism once more assumed the ascendancy in the East. The semi-Arian party, or Macedonians as they now began to be called, seeing the emergency, by imperial permission, met in council at Lampsacus A.D. 365, under the presidency of Eleusius. Here they repudiated the proceedings of the Acacian council of Constantinople in A.D. 360, and the creed of Ariminum, renewed the confession of Antioch (In Encensis), and pronounced sentence of deposition on Eudoxius and Acacius (Socr. H. E. iv. 2-4; Soz. H. E. vi. 7). These proceedings irritated Valens, who refused to confirm their decrees, and required them to hold communion with Eudoxius. On their refusal he sentenced them to fine and banishment, and gave away their sees to others. To escape complete annihilation, the Macedonians determined to send deputies to the Western emperor Valentinian and Liberius, bishop of Rome, who had now recovered from his unhappy lapse in A.D. 357, offering to unite with them in faith. Those chosen to go were Eustathius, Silvanus, and Theophilus of Castabala in Cilicia. Before they arrived Valentinian had left for Gaul, and Liberius at first looked coldly on them, and refused to receive them, as Arians. On their declaring that they had long since returned to the right path, and had condemned the doctrine of the Anomoeans, Liberius required them to give in their written adhesion to the Nicene creed, and their acceptance of the Homoiousion. On their doing this, Liberius consented to receive Eustathius and his companions into communion, and gave them letters in his name and that of the Western church to the prelates of the Eastern church, expressing his satisfaction at the proof he had received from their representatives of the identity of doctrine between the East and the West (Socr. H. E. iv. 12; Soz. H. E. vi. 11). No mention was made of the new Macedonian heresy concerning the Holy Spirit, which was infecting the Eastern church, and of which Eustathius and the other deputies were among the chief promulgators. On the receipt of the papal letters Eustathius and his companions at once repaired to Sicily, where a synod of bishops was summoned by them, which, on the profession of their orthodoxy, gave them letters of communion, with which they returned to their own country. On their return a synod of orthodox bishops was assembled in A.D. 367 at Tyana, to receive the letters of communion from the West and other documents (Soz. l. c.; Basil. Epist. 244 [82], § 5). Eustathius and his fellow delegates were recognised as true Catholics, and they were acknowledged as the rightful bishops of their sees. The council appointed by their synod to meet at Tarsus, to consolidate the union so happily inaugurated, was prohibited by Valens, who, yielding to his wife's urgency, had committed himself to the Arian party by receiving baptism from Eudoxius, and who now put forth an edict ordering the expulsion of all the bishops, who, having been deposed by Constantius, had been restored by Julian. Eustathius, to save himself, had the contemptible weakness to sign a formula at Cyzicus of Homoiousian character, which also denied the divinity of the Holy Spirit. Basil says tersely of Eustathius and his party, "they saw Cyzicus and returned with a different creed" (Basil. Epist. 244 [82], § 5, § 9; 226 [73]).

^a Somewhere about this time Meletius, the celebrated bishop of Antioch, was appointed to the bishopric of Sebasteia, which he resigned after a very short trial in consequence of the contumacy of his flock (Theod. H. E. i. 24). It is impossible to decide whether this was subsequent to Eustathius's deposition at Melitene, or at Constantinople. The earlier date is more probable. Ibid. (p. 137) places his episcopate before that of Basil. (See Tillemont, vol. viii. note li. S. Melece.)

On Basil's elevation to the episcopate in A.D. 370, Eustathius exhibited the greatest joy, and professed an earnest desire to be of service to his friend in his new and responsible office. On the plea that Basil would be in want of fellow helpers and counsellors, he recommended persons to his notice, who, as Basil bitterly complains, turned out to be spies of his actions and watchers of his words, interpreting all in a malevolent sense, and reporting his supposed heretical leanings to their chief (Basil. Epist. 223 [79], § 3). The subsequent relations of Eustathius and Basil, which so much embittered his episcopate, have been detailed in another article [BASILIIUS OF CAESAREIA]. Eustathius not only heaped calumnies on the head of his former associate, openly charging him with Apollinarian and other heretical views and accusing him of haughty and overbearing conduct towards his suffragans and clergy, but also encouraged the clergy of his diocese and province to separate themselves from him, and form a rival communion. Demosthenes, the Vicar of the Prefect, an old enemy of Basil, strenuously forwarded this object. In A.D. 376 he visited Sebasteia among other chief places in the province, for the purpose of crushing Basil's adherents, whom he compelled to undertake onerous and costly public duties, while he loaded the followers of Eustathius with the highest honours (Basil. Epist. 237 [264], § 2). Eustathius, seeing Arianism in the ascendant, and orthodoxy everywhere punished, began openly to court communion with those whom he had repeatedly denounced. His deposition by the dominant party at Constantinople remained a fact which the Arians took care to remember, and up to this time they had declined to recognise him as a canonical bishop. As they were now the party in power, it was of the utmost importance to secure their goodwill. This he sought by the most humiliating concessions. He had overthrown the altars of Basilides, bishop of Gangra, as an Arian, and he now supplicated him to admit him to his communion. He had treated the people of Amasea as heretics, excommunicated Elpidius for holding intercourse with them, and he earnestly sought their recognition. At Ancyra, the Arians refusing to recognise him publicly, Eustathius submitted to communicate with them in private houses. When the Arian bishops met in synod at Nyssa he sent a deputation of his clergy to invite them to Sebasteia, and ness them to be conducted through the province with every mark of honour. On their arrival he shewed them the utmost deference, and allowed them to preach and celebrate the Eucharist in his churches, and withheld no mark of the most intimate communion (Basil. Epist. 257 [72], § 3). These humiliations had but tardy and partial success in obtaining his public acknowledgment by the dominant ecclesiastics. The efforts made by Eustathius to secure the favour of the Arian party by repressing the Nicene faith, the effrontery with which he employed his former recognition by Liberius as a means of investing his words and actions with the authority of one in close communion with the great church of Rome, extorted from Basil a vehement letter of remonstrance, addressed to the bishop of Rome, and the other Western bishops, depicting the evils inflicted on the Eastern church by the wolves in sheep's clothing, and requesting Liberius to declare publicly the terms on which Eustathius had been admitted to communion (Basil, Epist. 263 [74], § 3). As will be read in the article already referred to (vol. i. p. 292 ff.) all Basil's efforts to obtain this mark of sympathy and brotherly recognition from the West were fruitless. He continued to be harassed by the unscrupulous attacks of Eustathius till his death in A.D. 379. If the see was vacated by his death, and not, as Hefele holds, with much probability, by his deposition at Gangra, Eustathius soon followed him to his great account. In the following year, A.D. 380, Peter became bishop of Sebaste, and thus, in the words of Tillemont, by a remarkable dispensation of "providence St. Basil's brother was seated on the throne of Eustathius, Basil's most dangerous enemy" (Mém. Eccl. ix. 574).

No little uncertainty hangs over the synod of Gangra, which is too intimately connected with the name of Eustathius to be passed over. The question of its date, and the identity of the Eustathius there condemned with the bishop of Sebaste, which, though affirmed by every ancient authority, has been denied by Blondel (De la Primauté, p. 138), Baronius (Annal. iii. ann. 361, n. 53), Du Pin (Nouvelle Bibliothèque, ii. 339), and called in question by Tillemont (Mém. Eccl. ix. note 28, S. Basile), has been carefully investigated by Hefele (Hist. of the Church Councils, ii. 325 ff. Engl. trans.). He pronounces himself unable to arrive at any certain conclusions as to its date (GANGRA, COUNCIL OF, DICTIONARY OF CHRISTIAN ANTIQUITIES, i. 769), but regards the notion that another Eustathius is intended as undeserving of any serious consideration. The self-righteous and heretical form of asceticism, professing a higher degree of spirituality and despising church ordinances, condemned in the twenty-one canons or anathemas of this council is in complete accordance with the account of Eustathius as the leader of the ascetic and coenobitic life in Armenia given by Socrates (H. E. ii. 43), and Sozomen (H. E. iv. 24), Labbe (Concil. ii. 413). Ecclesiastical history is entirely silent as to the after fortunes of this hyperascetical sect. Hefele states that "in accordance with the decisions of Gangra Eustathius is said to have laid aside his peculiarities, and again dressed himself like other ecclesiastics, not as a monk" (u. s. p. 337).

EUSTATHIUS (5), bishop of Epiphania, in Syria Secunda; he was a member of the Arian party both at Philippopolis, 343, and Seleucia, 359 (Mansi, iii. 322). At the latter synod he signed the Acacian creed (Epiphan. Haeres. 73). He is reported to have died of horror on hearing that during the revival of pagan worship under the emperor Julian the image of Bacchus had been brought into his church with tumultuous revelry, and he was consequently regarded as a martyr (Le Quien, Or. Christ. ii. 917). [E. V.]

EUSTATHIUS (6), bishop of Pinara in Lycia, present at the synod of Seleucia, A.D. 359, where he signed the heretical creed of Acacius of Caesarea and George of Alexandria. (Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 975; Mansi, iii. 321.) [L. D.]

EUSTATHIUS (7), a bishop censured by the semi-Arian party (among whom was his namesake, the bishop of Sebaste), at the council of Seleucia in A.D. 359. There were two sentences: (1) deposition, which fell on Acacius and eight others; (2) restriction to the communion of their own churches until they should purge themselves of their errors; which was pronounced on eight besides Eustathius. (Socr. H. E. ii. 40, Patr. Graec. lxxvii. col. 345; Athanas. Opp. pars i. p. 580; Patr. Graec. xxvi. col. 704; Baron. Ann. ad ann. 359; Fleury, Hist. du Christian. lib. xiv. cap. 17.) [W. M. S.]

EUSTATHIUS (8), bishop of Himmeria in Osrhoene, to whom Basil wrote in A.D. 374 with reference to the persecution the orthodox were enduring from the Arians. He commends him for the care he bestowed, not on his own church only, but on those of the bishops who had been banished for the faith. (Basil. Epist. 184 [306].) [E. V.]

EUSTATHIUS (9), a chorepiscopus sent by Eustathius of Sebaste with a letter to Basil. Eustathius deferred for three days delivering the letter, and finally left it at Basil's house late in the evening when he was in bed and asleep, and departed the next morning. This was distorted by Basil's enemies into a charge of his refusing to admit the messengers of Eustathius of Sebaste. (Basil, Ep. 226 [75].) [E. V.]

* EUSTATHIUS (10), bishop of Prusa (Theopolis) in Bithynia, present at the council of Constantinople, A.D. 381. (Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 617; Mansi, iii. 572.) [L. D.]

EUSTATHIUS (11), bishop of Canna, in Lycaonia, present at the oecumenical council of Constantinople, A.D. 381. (Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 1083; Mansi, iii. 570.) [L. D.]

EUSTATHIUS (12) (EUSTASIUS), a bishop, see unnamed, present at the council of Milan in 390 (Baron. A. E. ann. 390, xlvii.). He is probably the bishop Eustathius mentioned without a see at the council of Aquileia in 381 (Mansi, iii. 601 A). The Sammarthani believe him to be the first bishop of Aosta and a suffragan of Ambrose (Gall. Chr. xii. 806), but it is incredible that he could have lived, as they suppose, to 451. [EUTHASIUS.] [C. H.]

EUSTATHIUS (13), one of the bishops of Macedonia addressed by Innocent I. (Ep. 17, Pat.

lat. xx. 527), and no doubt the one of the same name among the Macedonian bishops whom Chrysostom thanks for their firm adherence, A.D. 406. (Chrys. Ep. 163, Pat. Gr. lii. 706.)

[C. H.]

EUSTATHIUS (14), bishop of Attalia, in Pamphylia, A.D. 431. His story is noticeable as a case of resignation of a see. Part of the last day of the council of Ephesus (July 17) was taken up with a consideration of his affairs. He was an old man, and was far from home and friends. He had been canonically elected and consecrated to Attalia, but various hostile parties made numerous accusations against him. It seems that he could easily have acquitted himself, but being timid and confused he wrote a renunciation of his see. The provincial council of Pamphylia thereupon placed Theodorus on his throne. Eustathius, for whose character little respect can be felt, had always intended to keep the name and honours of the episcopate. He therefore presented himself before the council of Ephesus, with tears and lamentations, to demand them, assuring the fathers at the same time that he had no thought of resuming his diocese. The canons did not allow the resignation of a see, so he had been deprived of communion. The council inquired into the charges brought against him, and restored him communion and rank on his promise not to do any episcopal act on his own authority. They permitted the provincial synod of Pamphylia to deal with him still more kindly if they pleased. (Concilia Generalia, i. 500, ed. 1628; Ceillier, viii. 59.)

[W. M. S.]

EUSTATHIUS (15) L, bishop of Parnasus in Cappadocia, of the party of John of Antioch and the Orientals at the council of Ephesus, A.D. 431, and consequently cut off from the communion of the orthodox (Baluze, Concil. p. 507); subsequently he joined the synod held at Constantinople by archbishop Flavian, which condemned Eutyches, A.D. 448 (Mansi, vi. 760). Ten years later, A.D. 458, he subscribed the synodal letter of the second Cappadocia to the emperor Leo (Mansi, vii. 599; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 416; Gams, Series Episc. 440).

EUSTATHIUS (16), bishop of Docimium in Phrygia Salutaris, present at the general council of Ephesus, A.D. 431 (Mansi, iv. 1224), and also at the synod held by Flavian at Constantinople, 448, which condemned Eutyches (Mansi, vi. 760), where his name is written in the acts Eustochius, a corruption found also in some MSS. of the transactions of the council of Chalcedon, A.D. 451, at which also he was present. (Mansi, vii. 157; Le Quien, Or. Christ. i. 853.)

EUSTATHIUS (17), bishop of Aegae, on the seaboard of Cilicia, to whom Theodoret addressed a letter relating to a Carthaginian lady named Maria, who having been taken captive at the sack of Carthage by Genseric, A.D. 439, had been sold as a slave, together with her waiting-maid, to an inhabitant of Theodoret's diocese of Cyrrhus. Some Christian soldiers quartered there hearing of her misfortunes had purchased her freedom, and she was desirous of returning to her native country, where she heard that her father was still alive and holding a magistracy. Theodoret requests Eustathius to put Maria under the care of some of the Western merchants who resorted to the fair at Aegae whose fidelity might be relied on to convey the unfortunate lady safe to her destination. (Theod. Epist. 70.)

EUSTATHIUS (18), bishop of Temnus in the province of Asia, present at the council of Chalcedon, A.D. 451. (Mansi, vii. 168 b; Le Quien, Or. Chr. i. 707.)

[C. H.]

EUSTATHIUS (19), bishop of Sabatra or Savatra, in Lycaonia; in the sixth session of the council of Chalcedon his name was subscribed in his absence by Onesiphorus of Iconium, A.D. 451. (Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 1084; Mansi, vii. 165.)

EUSTATHIUS (20), bishop of Saracenorum Tribus in Phoenicia Secunda. He was present at the fourth general council at Chalcedon, A.D. 451, and also signed the synodical letter to the emperor Leo, A.D. 458. (Mansi, vii. 127, 163, 559; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. ii. 852.)

[J. de S.]

EUSTATHIUS (21), bishop of Colonia, in the lesser Armenia, signed the synodal letter which the bishops of that province sent to the emperor Leo concerning the murder of St. Proterius of Alexandria and the faith of Chalcedon, A.D. 458. (Le Quien, Or. Christ. i. 430; Mansi, vii. 589.)

EUSTATHIUS (22), bishop of Berytus (Beyrout) in the 5th century. He was one of the time-serving, cowardly prelates attached to the court, who regarded their rank and position as the thing to be secured at all costs, changing their faith with change of circumstances, and bowing the knee to the dominant party. The object he kept steadily in view was the aggrandizement and independence of his see of Berytus, then suffragan to Tyre. For this he curried court favour, and lent himself to the arbitrary and violent acts of the "Robbers' Synod." He was a bishop of some consideration for theological knowledge, and was appointed one of the three commissioners, with Photius of Tyre and Uranius of Himera, by Theodosius II., A.D. 448, to examine the tenets of Ibas of Edessa, against whom serious complaints had been laid by the monastic party as favouring Nestorian heresy, and who had been acquitted at a council at Antioch in consequence of two of his accusers failing to appear. This commission was dated Oct. 26, A.D. 448, and was addressed to Damasus, the secretary of state (Labbe, Concil. iv. 638). The commission was opened at Berytus, Feb. 1, A.D. 449, in the residence of Eustathius, recently erected by him in the vicinity of the magnificent new church he had built as part of his scheme for the exaltation of his see. The examination was continued for some time. Ibas indignantly disclaimed the blasphemies attributed to him, and produced a document signed by a large number of his clergy, protesting that they had never heard him utter words contrary to the faith (ibid. p. 637). The accusation broke down. But the investigation was revived a week or two afterwards at Tyre. Uranius was absent (ibid. 635). Eustathius and his brother commissioners succeeded in arranging matters between the contending parties. They drew up a concordat, which was signed, Feb. 25, by bas and his accusers, as well as by Eustathius and Photius, as authenticating it (ibid. 632). On the meeting of the second council of Ephesus, the disgraceful "Robbers' Synod," Aug. 8, in the same year, Eustathius was vested with a special authority, together with Eusebius of Ancyra and Basil of Seleucia, as imperial commissioners (ibid. 1079). True to his principle of supporting the dominant party he lent all his influence to Dioscorus against the venerable Flavian. Perceiving that a considerable impression had been made on the assembly by the reading of the letters of Cyril on the two natures, which had been accepted as a rule of faith, he brought forward other less definite statements of the same writer with the view of neutralizing their effect (ibid. 173), and resolutely refused to accept the expression that the Son of God had taken man in the Incarnation (ibid. 189). He voted for the rehabilitation of Eutyches, declaring that he had stated the true faith with such clearness, and in such perfect conformity to the doctrine of godliness, that it deserved to be accepted as the faith of the fathers (ibid. 262). The following year, 450, through the influence of pope Leo and his legates at Constantinople Eustathius's name was erased from the diptychs of the church, together with those of the other supporters of Dioscorus, as accomplices in the violent death of Flavian. He and his associates, however, were allowed to retain their episcopal office, in the hope that this leniency might lead them to repentance (Leo Magn. Epist. 60). The feeble Theodosius being now replaced by Pulcheria's husband, the senator Marcian, no less remarkable for his orthodoxy than for the vigour of his government, Eustathius found it politic to change his camp, and on the meeting of the council of Chalcedon he lost no time in abandoning Dioscorus. At the first session, he declared his agreement in faith with Flavian, and with exaggerated expressions of penitence asked pardon for his share in the acts of the recent synod (ibid. 141, 176, 177). Unfortunately for him, on the reading of the acts of that assembly, some words of his appeared declaring in the strongest terms against the two natures. The heresy was so flagrant that the council exclaimed that it was worthy only of Eutyches and Dioscorus. Eustathius endeavoured to defend the orthodoxy of his words by a mutilated quotation from Cyril (ibid. 176), but the imperial officers regarded the matter in so serious a light that they proposed his deposition, together with the chief agents in the late council (ibid. 323). Emboldened by this Eustathius presented himself at the second session, apparently alone of his party (ibid. 327). Dioscorus, when put on his trial, demanded that Eustathius and his other supporters at the "Latrocinium" should be cited, as involved in the same charge as himself, and when they pleaded the contemptible justification that they had not been free agents, and had been compelled to act against their better judgment, he retorted that they were self-condemned as having trampled on right through fear of man (ibid. 390). The abject humiliation of Eustathius and his party prevailed with the orthodox bishops. They pronounced a verdict of acquittal on them as mere tools of Dioscorus, and received them as brothers with every token of perfect union (ibid. 508-509).

At a later session of the council, Oct. 20, the point at issue between him and Photius of Tyre was discussed (ibid. 539). As a reward for the zeal he had shewn in support of the court party at the "Latrocinium," Eustathius had obtained from Theodosius a decree giving metropolitanical rank to the see of Berytus (Lupus, in Canon. 950). Flavian's successor Anatolius, together with Maximus of Antioch and some of the court bishops, had consequently taken upon themselves at the close of 449 to dismember the diocese of Tyre, and had assigned five churches to the formerly suffragan see of Berytus (Labbe, iv. 542-546). Photius disregarded this partition, and continued to consecrate bishops for these churches. For this he was in a high-handed spirit excommunicated by Anatolius, and the prelates he had consecrated were deposed and degraded by Eustathius (ibid. 530). Photius got frightened, and submitted to this interference on the threat of deposition, protesting at the same time that he did so by constraint. He now required of the council to maintain the ancient prerogatives of the metropolitanical see of Tyre, and pronounce the acts of Eustathius null and void. The council on hearing the case decided against Eustathius, and refused to allow the gathering of bishops at Constantinople which had presumed to dismember the bishopric, any right to the title of a church council (ibid. 542-550). When at a still later session, Oct. 26, Ibas appeared and demanded restoration, Eustathius and Photius attested the fact of his acquittal at Tyre (ibid. 631).

When in 457 the emperor Leo, anxious to give peace to the sorely divided church of Alexandria, and yet wishing to avoid the summoning of a synod, directed letters to the chief metropolitans on the question of the intrusion of Timothy Aelurus, Eustathius was one of those consulted, and joined in the condemnation of the intruding patriarch (ibid. 890). A fragment of a defence of the letter of pope Leo against Timothy Aelurus is preserved by Canisius (Lectio. Antiq. ii. 257), and is printed by Migne (Pat. Gr. lxxxv. 1803). The church built by him at Berytus is described by Zacharias Scholasticus de mundi opificio. (Tillemont, Mém. Eccl. xv.; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. ii. 818; Cave, Hist. Lit. i. 440.) [E. V.]

EUSTATHIUS (23), bishop of Philadelphia, in the province of Lydia; his name is appended to the letter of the synod of Constantinople to the patriarch John, condemning Severus of Antioch, A.D. 518, which was read in the fifth session of the synod also held at Constantinople under Mennas, A.D. 536, which condemned Anthimus and Severus. In his subscription Eustathius calls Philadelphia the metropolis of the province of Lydia, as if it set up rival claims to Sardis. (Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 870; Mansi, viii. 1047.) [L. D.]

EUSTATHIUS (24), bishop of Perrha, in Mesopotamia, driven out of his bishopric by the emperor Justin I. on account of his adherence to the heresy of Severus, A.D. 518. (Le Quien, Oriens Christ. ii. 946; Assemani, Bibl. Orient. ii. Dis. de Monophys. § 2.) [L. D.]

EUSTATHIUS (25), bishop of Anthedon (Agrippias), on the seaboard of Palestine, who was one of the signatories of the synodical letter of John of Jerusalem to John of Constantinople against Severus, A.D. 518. (Labbe, v. 191; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. iii. 682.) [E. V.]

EUSTATHIUS (26), bishop of Gomphi in Thessaly, mentioned in the petition of Stephen of Larissa to the Roman synod under pope Boniface II., wherein he complains that they and other Thessalian bishops had been summoned to appear before Epiphanius of Constantinople, who had no jurisdiction over them, on an accusation of irregularly ordaining Stephen, A.D. 531. Through mutilation of the records, the decision of the synod is lost. (Le Quien, Oriens Christ. ii. 115; Mansi, viii. 743.) [L. D.]

EUSTATHIUS (27), bishop of Tiberiopolis, in Phrygia Pacatiana, present at the synod held at Constantinople under Mennas, A.D. 536. (Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 799; Mansi, viii. 1146.) [L. D.]

EUSTATHIUS (28), bishop of Tholona (Tlos) in Lycia, at the synod of Constantinople, A.D. 536 (Mansi, viii. 974). When an appeal was made concerning a suit between him and Pistus, a deacon of the church of Telmessus, and the judges were in doubt whether it should be decided according to the law as it stood, or as it was at the time of the suit, the emperor Justinian ordered, by his Novella cxv., Theodorus, praetor throughout the East, that it should be decided by the law as it was at the time of the original pleadings (Kriegel, Corpus Juris Civ. pt. iii. p. 490), and that this should form a rule for all future cases. Le Quien (Oriens Christ. i. 979) says that the emperor ordered the praetors not to hesitate in correcting the decisions of the bishops. Baronius adduces this case as an instance of Justinian asserting an ecclesiastical jurisdiction disallowed by the canons (A. E. ann. 541, xvi.). [L. D.]

EUSTATHIUS (29), bishop of Damascus; present at the fifth general council held at Constantinople, A.D. 553. (Mansi, ix. 174; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. ii. 836.) [J. de S.]

EUSTATHIUS (30), bishop of Maximianopolis (formerly Impara), in Thracia, near Rhodope; was present as a metropolitan at the fifth general council at Constantinople, A.D. 553. (Mansi, ix. 391; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 1200.) [J. de S.]

EUSTATHIUS (31) II., bishop of Parnasus in Cappadocia, present at the synod called Trullana, or Quinisexta, held at Constantinople, A.D. 692. (Mansi, xi. 1005; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 418.) [L. D.]

EUSTATHIUS (32), bishop of Amblada, in Lycaonia, subscribed the canons of the synod called Quinisexta or Trullana, held at Constantinople, A.D. 692. (Mansi, xi. 1004; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 1078.) [L. D.]

EUSTATHIUS (33), bishop of Celenderis (Chelendreh) in Isauria, on the western coast of Cilicia. He was present at the seventh general council held at Nicaea, A.D. 787. (Mansi, xii. 1016; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. ii. 1016.) [J. de S.]

EUSTATHIUS (34), bishop of Lamus in Isauria, at the mouth of the river of the same name; present at the seventh general council held at Nicaea, A.D. 787. (Mansi, xii. 150 D; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. ii. 1018.) [J. de S.]

EUSTATHIUS (35), bishop of Hyrcania in the province of Lydia, present at the second Nicene council, A.D. 787. (Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 888; Mansi, xii. 1102.) [L. D.]

EUSTATHIUS (36), bishop of Laodicea, the metropolis of Phrygia Pacatiana, present at the seventh general or second Nicene council, A.D. 787. (Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 795; Mansi, xi. 994.) [L. D.]

EUSTATHIUS (37), bishop of Soli in Cyprus, present at the seventh general council (Nicaea), A.D. 787. (Le Quien, Oriens Christ. ii. 1073; Mansi, xii. 1099.) [L. D.]

EUSTATHIUS (38), bishop of Erythrae in the province of Asia, opposite Chio, present at the seventh general council (Nicaea), A.D. 787. (Mansi, xii. 996; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 728.) [L. D.]

EUSTATHIUS (39), March 29, bishop of Cius, an ancient town of Bithynia, and martyr amid the iconoclastic controversies. (Bas. Men.; Boll. Acta SS. Mart. iii. 790.) [G. T. S.]

EUSTATHIUS (40), succeeded Politian as orthodox patriarch of Alexandria, in 801, during the caliphate of Al-Raschid and the patriarchate of Mark over the Jacobite communion. He had been a linen manufacturer, but his life was changed by the discovery of a treasure, hidden in the place where he exercised his trade. He resolved to dedicate himself, with his unexpected wealth, to God, and entering the monastery of Al-Kosairi, was presently raised to its abbacy. In that office he built a church, dedicated to the two apostles, within the wall of Al-Kosairi, and also a room for the use of the bishop.

At the moment of his call to the chair of Alexandria, the recent cessation of the iconoclastic controversy, and the gratitude of the caliph for the service rendered him by Politian might well have raised the hopes of the orthodox, but the short and uneventful patriarchate of Eustathius brought no change in the slow decline of their power. The Jacobites, on the other hand, were strengthened at this time by their reconciliation with the Barsanuphians, subdivision of the Acephali, who, at the close of the 5th century, had seceded from the majority in order to uphold the episcopal consecration of Barsanuphius. Eustathius died in 801 and was succeeded by Christopher. (Eutych. Annales, Oxon. 1658, tom. ii. 411; Le Quien, Oriens Christianus, Paris, 1740, ii. 464; Nestle, Patriarchate of Alexandria, ii. 136, 137; L'Année de vérifier les Dates, Paris, 1818, iii. 482.) [F. P.]

EUSTATHIUS (41), deacon, by whose hands the elder Gregory of Nazianzus sent a letter to Eusebius of Samosata, cir. A.D. 370, begging him to come to Caesarea and aid in securing the election of Basil to the vacant see. (Bas. Epist. 47 [4].) [E. V.]

EUSTATHIUS (42), deacon, who enjoyed the confidence of Basil, and by whom Basil sent a letter to Eusebius of Samosata, A.D. 372 (Basil, Ep. 47 [4]). Later in the year Basil had to nurse Eustathius for two months in an illness, which afterwards attacked the rest of his household and finally himself (id. Ep. 136 [257]).

[E. V.]

EUSTATHIUS (43), monk, who was a member of the family of Gregory Nazianzen at the time of his death, and appointed by him one of the guardians of his poorhouse. He was joint legatæ with Gregory, the deacon of a farm at Armanzi. (Greg. Naz. Testam.)

[E. V.]

EUSTATHIUS (44), deacon of Macedonia, for whose deposition twenty-three Macedonian bishops, in the course of their synodal letter, petitioned Innocent I. the bishop of Rome, A.D. 414. In his reply, Dec. 13, 414, Innocent declines, on the ground that Eustathius, who had been frequently approved by him, had never been accused of any offence against the faith or of any mortal sin. (Innoc. Ep. 17, c. 7, § 15. Pat. Lat. xx. 536; Ceillier, Anteurs Sac. vi. 515.)

[C. H.]

EUSTATHIUS (45), an aurifex of Philadelphia in Lydia, A.D. 431, induced by Jacobus, a Nestorian, to abjure Quartodecimanism and petition Theophanes, bishop of Philadelphia, to be restored to communion. He had also subscribed the "symbolum" of Jacobus. (Labbe, Concil. iii. 675, 678, 683.)

[CHARISIUS (1).] [T. W. D.]

EUSTATHIUS MONACHUS (46), a solitary known only from his letter De Duabus Jatribus to Timotheus Scholasticus against the errors of Severus. It would seem to belong to the age of Justinian in the 6th century. The Greek text was printed by Mai, Vet. Script. Nov. vii. 277, and with a Latin translation by Migne, Patrolog. Gr. lxxxvi. 1, p. 901 sq.

[E. V.]

EUSTATHIUS (47), (EUSTRATIUS), presbyter of Constantinople, biographer of the patriarch Eutychius (552-582), and his chaplain. He was a faithful adherent to his superior in misfortune and prosperity, and regarded him as the greatest and holiest of men. The life, written in a turgid and prolix style, was printed by Surius (de Prob. Hist. SS. April 6, p. 83); by Heneschen, with annotations and introductory observations (Boll. Acta SS. 6, Ap. i. 559); by Papebroch in Greek, the name here being EUSTRATIUS (Boll. Acta SS. Ap. i. Appendix p. lix.; and elsewhere). [EUTYCHIUS (18), sub fin.] He is identified with his contemporary Eustratius of Constantinople by Cave (i. 536), Fabricius (Bibl. Gr. ed. Harles, x. 725, xi. 623), and some others. [EUSTRATIUS (5).]

[W. M. S.]

EUSTATHIUS (48), a reader in the church of Caesarea in Palestine, deposed by the bishop Eulogius (No. 5), on the false charge of having corrupted the virgin daughter of a presbyter. Having obtained the bishop's permission to marry the girl, he persuaded her to enter a monastery, where, at the birth of the child, according to Palladius, the innocence of Eusta-thius was miraculously proved. He devoted himself to an ascetic life, was endowed with extraordinary gifts, and was popularly regarded as a martyr. (Pallad. Hist. Lausiac. c. 141, pp. 1041-1045; Tillemont, Mém. Eccles. xi. 518.)

[E. V.]

EUSTATHIUS (49), July 28, a military martyr at Ancyra, in Galatia, under a prefect named Cornelius. (Bas. Men.)

[G. T. S.]

EUSTATHIUS (50), March 14, otherwise called Eutychius, martyr with many others at the hands of the Arabs, at Carrhae, in Mesopotamia, in the 22nd year of Leo the Isaurian, A.D. 740. (Acta SS. Boll. Mart. iii. 355.)

[G. T. S.]

EUSTATHIUS (51), a famous philosopher of Cappadocia, whom Basil travelled far in search of shortly after his return from Athens, A.D. 355, and to whom he addressed a letter from Alexandria (Basil, Ep. 1 [165]).

[E. V.]

EUSTATHIUS (52), physician, ἀρχιτρίβος to whom Basil addressed the doctrinal treatise which stands among his epistles (Ep. 189 [80]), maintaining the unity of the Divine nature in all three Persons of the Trinity, and asserting the proper divinity of the Holy Spirit. This treatise is also found in a somewhat enlarged form among the writings of Gregory Nyssen (Opp. i. 6), but is ascribed by the best authorities to Basil (Tillem. Mém. Eccl. ix. 678, "S. Basile," Note 77).

EUSTATHIUS (53), a domestic in the family of Theodora, a disciple and correspondent of Chrysostom. Theodora had expelled him from her house for some real or alleged misconduct. Chrysostom wrote from Cucusus very earnestly in behalf of Eustathius, saying that if he had been accused wrongfully simple justice required his restoration to favour, and that if he were really guilty Theodora should forgive him as she hoped to be forgiven. (Chrysost. Epist. 117.)

[E. V.]

EUSTATHIUS (54) of Edessa, a Messalian condemned at Antioch. (Photius, Cod. 52.) The common reading was Εὐστράθιος αἰδέσιμος, and the person intended was supposed to be Eustathius of Sebaste; but according to Bekker this puzzle of a complimentary title given to a condemned heretic originated in a corruption of Ἐδεσσηνός written αἰδέσιμος. [EUCHITES.]

[G. S.]

EUSTATHIUS (55), a quaestor at Constantinople, witness to the inventory presented by Germanus and Cassianus in refutation of the charge against Chrysostom of having made away with the church goods. (Pallad. Dial. p. 27.)

[E. V.]

EUSTATHIUS (56), translator of Basil's Homilies on the Hexameron into Latin, cir. A.D. 440. The translation was much praised by Cassiodorus. It was first printed by Nicholas Faber at Paris in his edition of the works of Basil, 1603. (Cassiod. Divin. Lect. cap. 2 in Patr. Lat. lxx. 1110; Sigebert, Gembl. de Scr. Eccl. cap. 21 in Patr. Lat. clx. 552; Cave, Hist. Lit. i. 428.)

[C. H.]

EUSTATHIUS (57), of Epiphaneia in Syria, wrote a history from the earliest times to writings give a picture of her character, and of her manner of life. She was small in stature but, Jerome says, "In parvulo corpusculo ingentes animos cerneret" (l. 290). She had great courage and decision of character (l. 394). She followed the ascetic teaching of Jerome and her mother with unwavering confidence and enthusiasm (l. 402, 403). She had considerable linguistic power; she spoke Greek and Latin with equal facility, and she learnt Hebrew also so as to sing the Psalms in the original (l. 720). Thierry considers that the incident relative to SABINIANUS (i. 1084) shews that she was deficient in the power of influence, and that the convent degenerated under her. Jerome, however, gives no hint of this. He praises her skill in the training of virgins, whom she led in all acts of devotion (i. 290), and to whom she set an example by undertaking all menial offices (i. 403). She was eager in her wish for the knowledge of the Scriptures, so that to her importunity Jerome ascribes the writing of many of his commentaries, which were dedicated to her in conjunction first with her mother and afterwards with her niece the younger Paula. The letters which Jerome wrote for her instruction were innumerable (ii. 956, Epistolarum ad Paulam et Eustochium, quia quotidie scribantur, incertus est numerus). She attended her mother with devoted care during her last long illness (i. 721, 723), and, though left after her death in poverty (i. 671), she continued in her vocation to the end. She had as her coadjutors the younger Paula and the younger Melania, and continued with them her convent work and her study of Scripture, so that to them some of Jerome's latest commentaries are dedicated. She is reckoned as a saint in the Roman church, her festival being on Sept. 28. [W. H. F.]

EUSTOCHIUS (1), June 23, presbyter and martyr at Ancyra, in Galatia, under Maximian, A.D. 311. (Bas. Men.) [G. T. 8.]

EUSTOCHIUS (2), a layman whose slaves had given serious cause of offence to Callisthenes, whose anger Basil deprecates in his letters (Ep. 72, 73 [351, 388]). [CALLISTHENES.] [E. V.]

EUSTOCHIUS (3), sophist of Constantinople, an early friend of Gregory Nazianzen, with whom he appears to have studied at Athens (Greg. Naz. Ep. 61), and to whom he subsequently sent a pupil named Promoeus (Ep. 111). Nicobulus, the husband of Gregory's niece, having sent his son to study under another sophist named Stagirus, Eustathius was so much offended that he wrote to Gregory complaining of this breach of friendship, and bringing serious charges against his rival. Gregory replied, remonstrating faithfully but affectionately on his unworthy jealousy, which brought reproach on philosophy, and injured his own pupils (Ep. 61). Eustathius took these remonstrances in bad part, and began attacking Gregory himself, who wrote to him that he cared nothing for his insults, but that he had better hold his tongue if he could (Ep. 62). [E. V.]

EUSTOCHIUS (4), ST., fifth archbishop of Tours, between St. Brictius and St. Perpetua. He was of senatorial rank, and, according to Gregory of Tours, "magnificae sanctitatis vir"

He is said to have built four churches, at Brixia (Brissac in Anjou), Iciodorum (Iseure in Touraine, on the Creuse below Tournon), Luccae (Luchon in Touraine), and Dolus, which must be Dolus near Châteauroux, and another in Tours itself, for the relics of the saints Gervasius and Protasius. He was at the Council of Angers in 453. He occupied the see seventeen years, and was buried in the church of St. Martin. There is extant a letter (Migne, Patr. Lat. liv. 1239), which, in conjunction with Leo bishop of Bourges and Victorinus of Le Mans, he wrote to the clergy of the third province of Lyons, denouncing those of the clergy who had recourse to temporal tribunals. He is commemorated Sept. 19. (Greg. Tur. Hist. Franc. ii. 1, 14, x. 31; Mansi, vii. 900; Gall. Christ. xiv. 11; Boll. Acta SS. Sept. vi. 28.) [S. A. B.]

EUSTOCHIUS (5), eighth bishop of Angers, between Eumerius and Adelphiua. He subscribed the first council of Orleans in 511. (Mansi, viii. 57; Gall. Christ. xiv. 547.) [S. A. B.]

EUSTOCHIUS (6), patriarch of Jerusalem, in succession to Peter, and according to Papebroch from A.D. 544 to 556. On the death of Peter, Eustochius, oconomus of the church of Alexandria but residing at Constantinople, was favored by the emperor Justinian in preference to Macarius, an Origenist, who had been first elected. At the synod of Constantinople A.D. 553, Eustochius was represented by three legates, Stephanus bishop of Raphia, Georgius bishop of Tiberias, Damasus bishop of Sozusa or Sorytana (Mansi, ix. 173 c); and when the acts of a condemnation of Origenism were sent by the emperor to Jerusalem, all the bishops of Palestine except Alexander of Abila confirmed them. But in the monasteries of that province, and especially in that named the New Laura, the parties of the proscribed opinions grew daily more powerful, notwithstanding the resolute efforts of the patriarch against them. In 555, after eight months of persistent admonition, Eustochius went in person, accompanied by the archbishop Anastasius, to the stronghold of the opposition and forcibly expelled the whole body of the Eusebians, replacing them by sixty monks from the principal laura and sixty from other orthodox monasteries of the desert, under the prior Joannes. By these proceedings Origenism was rooted out of Palestine. According to Victor Tununensis Eustochius was removed from the patriarchate, and Macarius restored. (Cyrillus Jerusopol. in Coteler. Monum. Eccles. Græc. iii. 373; Evagrius, H. E. iv. 37, 38; Victor Tunun. in Pat. L. lxxviii. 962 A; Theoph. Chronog. A. M. 4490; Papebroch, Patriarch. Hierosol. in Boll. Acta SS. introd. to vol. iii. of May, p. xxvii.; Le Quien, Or. Chr. iii. 210.) Pagi (ann. 561 B.) discusses the chronology. See also Clinton, F. & 537, 557. [C. H.]

EUSTOCHIUS (7), bishop of Avila, signs the seventh Council of Toledo, A.D. 646. (Esp. Sup. iv. 22; Aguirre-Catalani, iii. 423.) [J. M. A. W.]

EUSTOCHIUS (8), of St. Praxedis, cardinal-bishop, present at the canonization of St. Swithbert by pope Leo III. in the presence of Charlemagne in the church of St. Swithbert at

Werda (Kaiserswerth on the Rhine below Düsseldorf), on Sept. 4, 804. (Epistle of St. Ludgerus, cap. 9, in Surius, de Prob. Hist. SS. tom. ii. Mart. 1, p. 20, and in Baron. Annal. ann. 804, iv.) [C. H.]

EUSTOLIUM, a consecrated virgin of Antioch, whose intimate relations with Leontius, afterwards bishop of that see, having caused scandal, he mutilated himself in order that he might continue to enjoy her society without reproach. (Athanas. Apolog. pro fuga, c. 26, p. 718; Socr. H. E. ii. 26.) [E. V.]

EUSTOLIUS, bishop of Nicomedia at the council of Ancyra, A.D. 314. (Mansi, ii. 534 d; Le Quien, Or. Chr. i. 584.) [C. H.]

EUSTORGIUS (1), April 11, presbyter and martyr at Nicomedia (Mart. Hieron., Usuardi.) [G. T. S.]

EUSTORGIUS (2), named by Ambrose, with the title of confessor, as one of his predecessors in the see of Milan (Opp. iii. p. 920). According to Ughelli's Italia Sacra, he was the tenth bishop of Milan. [J. Ll. D.]

EUSTORGIUS (3), bishop of Dios-hieron (Christopolis) near Ephesus; his name was subscribed in his absence to the acts of the Council of Chalcedon, by the order of Stephen bishop of Ephesus, through Hesperius bishop of Pitane, A.D. 451. (Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 723; Mansi, vii. 168.) [L. D.]

EUSTORGIUS (4), bishop of Milan, A.D. 512-518. There is a letter to him from Avitus archbishop of Vienne (Avit. Epist. in Patr. Lat. lvii. 227), addressed to him as a bishop. Avitus thanks him for the liberal contribution which he had sent him for the use of the church in Gaul. He is identified as bishop of Milan in a letter of Theodoric to count Adila, enjoining that due care should be taken of the possessions of his see in the Isle of Sicily (Cassiodorus, Var. ii. 29). He is supposed to have been the Eustorgius mentioned in the poems of Ennodius (Carm. ii. 149). In the epistles of Cassiodorus, among those attributed to Theodoric, but most probably written by himself, there is a remarkable one (Var. i. 9) addressed to Eustorgius, respecting the bishop of Augusta (Aosta), unjustly accused by his clergy of treasonable intentions. Theodoric would not punish them himself, but he remitted the case to the bishop of Milan, who he knew would deal with the case according to ecclesiastical usage. (Boll. Acta SS. Jun. i. 643; Ugh. Ital. Sac. iv. 55; Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Italia, xi. 113.) [F. A.]

EUSTOSIUS, Nov. 10, martyr at Antioch, with Demetrius a bishop, and Anianus a deacon. (Mart. Hieron., Usuardi.) [G. T. S.]

EUSTRATIUS (1), Dec. 13, martyr at Sebaste in Armenia, under the prefect Agricolaus in the Diocletian persecution (Bas. Men.; Cal. Byzant.; Bar. Annal. 311, 20); Dec. 12 (Cal. Armen.) [G. T. S.]

EUSTRATIUS (2), a kinsman of Gregory Nazianzen. In his behalf Gregory wrote to Olympius, governor of Cappadocia Secunda, begging that he would pardon some unspecified offence (Ep. 177.) [E. V.]

EUSTRATIUS (3), count, addressed by FIRMUS bishop of Caesarea in Cappadocia, who commends to his patronage an instrumental performer unsurpassed in skill by ancients or moderns, whose sacred music the count had often enjoyed. For the sake of Firmus and of the church itself this musician should be warmly encouraged. Firm. ep. 39, Pat. Gr. lxxvii. 1508.) [C. H.]

EUSTRATIUS (4), (EUSTACHIUS), bishop of Sufes, near the river Bagrada, in the Byzacene province of Africa, one of the bishops banished by Genseric on the accusation that he had referred to him in his sermons, as Victor Vitensis narrates, in his book De Persecutione Vandal., b. i. c. 7 (Patrol. Lat. lviii. 190). He seems, however, to have returned, as he was summoned to the conference at Carthage, A.D. 484, and subsequently banished by Hunneric. He is mentioned in Bede's Martyrology, on 28th Nov. (Morcelli, Africa Christ. i. 288; Patrol. Lat. xciv. 1117). [L. D.]

EUSTRATIUS (5), presbyter of the Greek church at Constantinople, contemporary with the patriarch Eutychius, author of a work variously cited as De Vita functorum Statu, De Vita functorum Animis, On the State of the Dead. Photius (cod. 171) mentions the work describing its scope, but citing no formal title. Leo Allatius discovered the actual work and printed it with a Latin translation in his Agreement of the Churches of West and East about Purgatory, Rome, 1655, pp. 336 sq. The Latin version alone appeared afterwards in the Max. Bibliotheca Patrum, vol. xxvii. 362; Cave, i. 536; Ceillier, xi. 347. This author has been identified with Eustathius, the biographer of Eutychius. [EUSTATHIUS (47).] The treatise argues (1) that the souls of the dead, blessed or accursed, think and act after separation from the body; (2) that the souls which have appeared to men have their characteristic qualities; (3) that prayers for the dead are efficacious. His arguments are a strange medley. [W. M. S.]

EUSTRATIUS (6), bishop of Alba, together with George, bishop of Praeneste, and Citonatus bishop of Porto, consecrated the intruding Constantine as pope July 5, 767. (Vita Stephani IV. Liber Pontificalis, Migne, Pat. Lat. cxxviii. 1150; Jaffé, Regest. Pont. 198.) [A. H. D. A.]

EUSTRATIUS (7), bishop of Apamaea or Myrlea, in Bithynia, present at the seventh general council, A.D. 787. (Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 657; Mansi, xii. 1096.) [L. D.]

EUSTRATIUS (8), bishop of Methymna, in the island of Lesbos, present at the seventh general council, A.D. 787. (Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 961; Mansi, xii. 1095.) [L. D.]

EUSTRATIUS (9), bishop of Cotraja (otherwise Cotradus or Costradus) in Isauria. Its situation is doubtful. Eustratius was present at the seventh general council at Nicaea, A.D. 787. (Mansi, xiii. 142; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. ii. 1032.) [J. de S.]

EUSTRATIUS (10), bishop of Debeltum in North-eastern Thracia. Was present at the seventh general council held at Nicaea, A.D. 787.

(Mansi, xiii. 150; and Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 1184.) [J. de S.]

EUSYCHIUS, hermit. [EUSITIUS.]

EUTACTUS. [ARCHONTIOT.]

EUTALIUS, bishop of Edessa. [EUTHALIUS (2).]

EUTASIUS, a bishop in Cyprus, one of those to whom the synodical of Theophilus, bishop of Alexandria in the year 400, in condemnation of Origen, is addressed. (Jerome, Ep. xcii.) [W. H. F.]

EUTERIUS (1), Feb. 22, martyr with thirty-one others at Nicomedia, under Diocletian, A.D. 304. He was a member of the imperial guard. The exaggerations with respect to the martyrdoms at Nicomedia are very great. In the modern Roman Martyrology, on March 18, 10,000 martyrs at Nicomedia are noted. In Greek Menology, at Sept. 4, there are 3628 commemorated, while at Dec. 25 we are told that many thousands of martyrs were there burned in a church. (Acta SS. Boll. Feb. iii. 289.) [G. T. S.]

EUTERIUS (2), first abbat of Mauzac in Auvergne, mentioned in a charter of Pippin, citing that Euterius obtained authority for the erection of the monastery from king Theodoric and his son king Clovis, i.e. Thierry III. and Clovis III. The tenor of the charter is given by Mabillon (Annal. t. ii. p. 204), but the text does not occur in the collections of Pertz and Baluze. See also Gall. Ch. ii. 352. [C. H.]

EUTHALIA (1), Aug. 27, virgin and martyr at Leontini, in Sicily, about the year 257. She is said to have been killed by her brother Sermilianus, on becoming a Christian. Her name was inserted in the Roman calendar by pope Paul V. Her acts, which are fabulous, were published by Octav. Cajetan in his Vitae SS. Sicul. t. i. p. 76. (Acta SS. Boll. Aug. vi. p. 12; Men. Graec. Sirlet. in Canisii Antiq. Lect.) [G. T. S.]

EUTHALIA (2), a lady, a correspondent of Chrysostom, to whom he wrote from Cucusus in A.D. 404 and 405, thanking her for her kindness in writing to him, and begging her to continue to do so frequently. He praises her for despising the things of this world, and directing her chief care to her spiritual state. (Chrysost. Epist. xxxii. 178.) [E. V.]

EUTHALIUS (1), bishop of Byblus in Phoenicia, north of Beyrout. He is mentioned in the Basilian Menologion (June 13, Patrol. Gr. cxvii. 496), as having administered baptism to the martyr Aquilina during the persecution of Diocletian. (Le Quien, Oriens Christ. ii. 821.) [J. de S.]

EUTHALIUS (2), bishop of Edessa, present at the Council of Nicaea, A.D. 325 (Mansi, ii. 694, where the name occurs under the forms Ethilaus, Aetholaus, Aetholus. The Chronicle of Edessa, cap. 14 (Assem. Bibl. Or. i. 394), says he was made bishop in 324, and built the cemetery and the south side of his church. Assemani transliterates the name Aitallahas, which means (Stanley, East. Church, p. 104, 4th ed.) "the light of God," like the Greek Theophorus. The Syrian writer Amrus (Assem. ii. 588) calls him Eubalas. Moses of Choren (lib. ii. cap. 89) in the French translation of Le Vaillant (p. 373) calls him Euthalius, and in the Italian version of Cappelletti (p. 193) Eutalio. This writer speaks of Euthalius journeying to the council in company with Jacobus of Nisibis and John of Pertia. [C. H.]

EUTHALIUS (3), a fellow deacon with Gregory Nazianzen. The civil authorities having endeavored to compel him to military service after he had attained the presbyterate, Gregory wrote to Amphilochius, then a leading advocate, to use his influence to get him off (Ep. 159). If he was the same person, he was accused by one Philadelphius, a kinsman and brother presbyter, of having imprisoned and beaten him. Gregory was desiring a deacon named George, to whom he had given some authority in the church, to bring Euthalius before him to answer to the charge (Ep. 182). [E. V.]

EUTHALIUS (4), bishop of Colophon in the province of Asia, present at the council of Ephesus A.D. 431. (Mansi, iv. 1217; Le Quien, Itin. Christ. i. 726.) [L. D.]

EUTHALIUS (5), a deacon of Alexandria, afterwards bishop of Sulca, for there is no doubt that both designations belong to the same person.

The time at which he flourished has been erroneously stated by Cave as A.D. 396 (Hist. Lit. sec. iv.). But this date, mentioned in a short statement on the martyrdom of St. Paul in the close of his prologue to the fourteen Epistles of that Apostle, does not apply to himself, but to one whom, in the course of the Prologue, he had described as "a certain father most wise and most beloved of Christ." Immediately afterwards, however, he gives the date of his own day as sixty-three years later, thus bringing us down to A.D. 459. This date is confirmed by the fact that the works of Euthalius are attributed to Athanasius the Younger, who was bishop of Alexandria about the middle of the fifth century. At that time Euthalius appears to have been a deacon of the Alexandrian church, and to have turned his attention to the study of the New Testament text. Since he is now best known as the author of the Euthalian Sections, we shall speak first of them.

It is hardly necessary to remind the reader that the different books of the New Testament were originally written without divisions of any kind, whether of chapters, verses, or words, from their beginning to their close. Such at least is the appearance presented by them in our most ancient MSS.; and, as it can be shewn that these MSS. were copied in their form from old papyrus rolls, there is not the slightest reason to doubt that the characteristic of their structure, of which we are now speaking, belonged to them in their earliest condition, when they issued from the hands of the sacred writers. The inconveniences arising from this must have been manifold and great, but the first steps towards improvement seem to have proceeded less from any desire to remedy these, than from the wish to supply an easy means of reference to the parallel passages in the gospels. This was done by what are known as the Ammonian Sections, together with the Eusebian Canons, any detailed account of which would lead us too far away from our present purpose. It is enough to say that to Ammonius of Alexandria, in the 3rd century, is generally ascribed the merit of having been the first to divide all the four gospels into sections, regulated by the substance of the narratives contained in them. As yet, however, no similar principle of division had been carried into any of the other books of the New Testament. It was Euthalius who introduced a system of division into all the books of the New Testament not yet divided, except the Apocalypse, which proved so acceptable that it spread rapidly over the whole Greek church and has become, by its presence or absence, a valuable test of the antiquity of a MS.

Euthalius was not indeed really the first to suggest the whole of that scheme of division associated with his name. As far as the Epistles of St. Paul are concerned, he himself tells us that he only adopted the scheme of the "father" already alluded to. The name of this father is nowhere given, and Mill's conjecture (Prolegomena N. T. p. 78) that it was Theodore of Mopsuestia,* whose name was concealed, because he was at that time under censure of the church, has hardly sufficient positive ground to rest on. But, whoever he may have been and however Euthalius may have been stirred up by his example to independent exertion, there seems to be no doubt that the latter, by means, in all probability, of his other labours, and of the further critical apparatus, of which we have yet to speak, procured for them the acceptance which they soon obtained. It will give some idea of the length of these capitula if we observe that in the Epistle to the Romans there were 19; in that to the Galatians 12; in that to the Ephesians 10; in First Thessalonians 7; in Second Thessalonians 6; in Hebrews 22; in the Epistle to Philemon 2; and so with the other Epistles.

In themselves these sections possess no value. Their whole value arises from the fact that they were very widely adopted throughout the church, and that transcribers of manuscripts were in the habit of using them, and marking them on their parchment. Their presence or absence becomes thus a valuable aid in determining the antiquity of a manuscript. If they are marked on it, and that in a manner which shews them to be of the same age, it is of course a proof that that manuscript cannot be older than about the time of Euthalius. If, again, they are wanting, while at the same time the Ammonian Sections, with their numbers in the Eusebian Canons, are marked, the evidence is almost irresistible that the manuscript falls between the time of Eusebius and the early part of the 5th century. Where our evidence as to antiquity is often at the best defective, every consideration that can render the least help is to be valued; and thus this simple arrangement has preserved the name of Euthalius when all his other labours might have failed to do so. Of these labours we have now to speak.

They relate mainly to three points in connexion with the text: the Larger Sections or Lessons, which Euthalius was the chief instrument of leading the Greek church to adopt upon a uniform plan; the smaller divisions, or στίχοι as they were called, to which, if he did not introduce them, he at least gave a greater currency than they previously possessed; and his plan of collecting and noting the quotations from the Old Testament in the New. We will remark upon each of these.

(1) The Lessons. Fixed lessons to be read in public worship had been known even in the synagogue, and there can be little doubt that they passed into the Christian church, at least as soon as the canon was settled. But up to the time of Euthalius there seems to have been little or no uniformity in them. Individual churches, for the most part, had divisions of their own. The scheme proposed by Euthalius, however, so commended itself that it speedily became general wherever the Greek tongue was spoken. The whole of the New Testament, except the Gospels and the Apocalypse, was divided by it into fifty-seven portions, some certainly very different in length from the others. In Acts there were 16; in the Pauline Epistles 31; 5 in Romans; 5 in First Corinthians; 4 in Second Corinthians, &c.; in the Catholic Epistles, 10; 2 in James; 2 in First Peter; 1 in Second Peter, &c.; in all 57. Of these, 53 were for the Sundays of the year, which seem alone to have been provided for in the Alexandrian Synaxes, and it is supposed by Mill that the other four were for Christmas, Good Friday, Easter, and Epiphany. (Proleg. in N. T. p. 90.)

(2) The smaller divisions. These are the well-known στίχοι, that is lines, in Latin versus, each containing either a few words complete in themselves, or as much as it was possible to read without effort at one breath. Like that of the sections or capitula formerly spoken of, the plan of these "verses" was not introduced by Euthalius. It had already been adopted in the case of some of the poetical books, and even in some of the poetical parts of the prose books of the Old Testament. The Septuagint had occasionally employed it. It had been sanctioned by Origen. The Vulgate had used it, and it is found in the psalms of the Vatican and Sinaitic manuscripts, both as old as the time of which we speak, if not even older. Nay, the idea had also been partially applied to the New Testament, for Scrivener refers to Origen as speaking of the 100 στίχοι of the second and third epistles of St. John, of the few of St. Paul's Epistles, of the "very few" of 1 John; while Eustathius of Antioch, in the 4th century, is said to reckon 135 from John viii. 59 to x. 31 (Introduction to Codex D, p. 17). It is clear, however, from the figures thus quoted, that many of these divisions cannot have been στίχοι in the strict sense of the term. They must have been of very unequal length, and for the most part considerably larger than those divisions to which the term properly belongs. The credit due to Euthalius lay in this, that what was before partially and imperfectly done, was now extended upon better principles and with greater care. His work thus forms an important step in the process by which punctuation, so invaluable to the ordinary reader of the Bible, was at last reached.

But it was hardly as a system of punctuation, however imperfect, that the divisions to which we refer were at first designed. Euthalius, in describing his labours on the Acts of the Apostles and the Catholic Epistles, makes a mention of this. He speaks only of increase of facility of reading, and more especially of the meet expression which his labours afforded to that love and admiration of scripture which ought to lead to its being adorned in ever-increasing measure by successive students (p. 409). In the Epistle to the Romans he made 920 such στίχοι; in Galatians, 293; in Ephesians, 312; in First Thessalonians, 193; in Second Thessalonians, 106; in Hebrews, 703; in Philemon 37; and so on.

(3) Still a third part of the labours of our author was expended upon enumerating all the quotations from the Old Testament, and even from profane writers, to be found in those books of the New Testament to which his attention was turned. These he numbered in one catalogue; assigned to the various books whence they were taken in a second; and quoted at length in a third.

The points of which we have hitherto spoken refer to the outward arrangements of the sacred text; but, if we may look upon the Argumenta which are published as a part of the works of Euthalius as his own, and not as the production of a later hand, he went also into the substance and meaning of the books edited by him. These Argumenta contain short summaries of the books to which they are prefixed, and convey a simple and excellent idea of their contents. It has indeed been contended by Zacagnius, the editor, that they must belong to a later time than that of Euthalius, inasmuch as they present discrepancies from statements in other parts of his works as to the places where the Epistles were written (Praef. p. 60). Thus the Argumentum to First Corinthians states that it was written from Ephesus (p. 589); but in the collected statement as to the cities whence all the epistles were written, Philippi is said to have been the place (p. 546). The argument is by no means conclusive. It may be urged with equal, if not more probability, that the general statement is the interpolation, and that it is extremely unlikely that at a date later than that of Euthalius, any one could have been found to depart from the long-standing tradition of the church.

However this may be, it is not without interest to observe that both Euthalius himself and his patron Athanasius had wonderfully correct ideas of the manner in which such a work as one on the text of the New Testament should be set about; for when the patriarch, interested by his deacon's success with the Pauline Epistles, urged him to undertake a similar task with the Acts and Catholic Epistles, we are told that he immediately set out to Caesarea in order that he might there have the best opportunity of comparing the famous MSS. of Origen and of Paphlagon the martyr, which had been collected by Eusebius, bishop of that city. At the close of his work on these latter books, he expressly states that he had done this. (Works, p. 513.)

Beyond the critical labours of which we have spoken, it does not appear that Euthalius was tempted much. He wrote indeed a short life of St. Paul, which forms the first part of his work on the fourteen epistles of that apostle. But is bald and meagre that it is altogether underrunning of notice. Besides this, it has been said that he wrote comments on the Acts of the Apostles and the Gospel of St. Luke; and that an ancient catena on the epistle to the Romans fragments of his writings were to be found. None of these statements seem to be correct. Longinus, at all events, tells us that he had searched everywhere for the commentaries spoken of, but in vain. (Praef. p. 71.)

We have seen that Euthalius began his labours as a deacon of the church, and it was in this capacity that he earned the distinction which he handed his name down to posterity. In later life he was appointed to a bishopric, and he is known as Episcopus Sulcensis. Scrivener observes that Sulci in Sardinia is the only see of that name that he can find (Intr. p. 53, n. 1). Possibly that may be the place; yet it is unlikely that one who had belonged to the church at Alexandria, and who had earned his promotion at the hands of its bishop, would be sent all the way to Sardinia. Zacagnius thinks that Sulca may have been the same name as Psilca, a city in the Thebaid near Syene, and that there, in recognition of his labours, Euthalius was honoured with the episcopate; but Galland throws doubt on the conjecture. It is unnecessary to inquire further into a point of this kind, on which it is almost impossible to throw any light.

The works of Euthalius remained long unknown. Cave had spoken of them as hidden away somewhere, but obviously without any idea where they might be. At last, however, in A.D. 1698, they were edited and published at Rome by Laurentius Alexander Zacagnius, praefectus of the Vatican Library, in the first volume of his Collectanea Monumentorum Veterum Ecclesiae Graecae ac Latinae. The edition has prefixed to it a long preface by the editor, in which different questions relating to Euthalius are discussed with much care. It has been printed in Galland (Biblioth. Pat. x. 197) and in Migne (Gr. lxxv. 621). Notices of Euthalius will also be found in the Prolegomena of the New Testament of Wetstein and Mill, and in Scrivener's introduction to the Criticism of the New Testament. [W. M.]

EUTHARIC, an Ostrogoth, belonged to the stock of the Amali. He was an indirect descendant of Ermanaric, and grandson of Ermanar, who had wandered from the Ostrogoths to the Visigoths (Dahn, Die Könige der Germanen, ii. 115, 116). He married Amalasuntha, the only daughter of Theoderic. Their son Athalaric was born ann. 518. Theoderic allowed his son-in-law to be adopted by Justinian ("factus est per arma filius" Cassiod. Var. lxxviii. 1 in Migne, lxxix. 733). Eutharic was killed in 519, and though he was hostile to and even upon the Catholics, by the magnificence of his games and his genial bearing he conciliated the people of Rome. He died a few years before Theoderic. (Jordanis, ed. Closs 168; Scripta Valesiana, i.e. the chronicle of Maximian, archbishop of Ravenna, ed. Gardthausen, MS. p. 301; Dahn, Die Könige der Germanen, i. 176.) [A. H. D. A.]

EUTHASIUS (EUSTASIUS), bishop of Augusta Augusta (Aosta), represented by a presbyter, Gratus, at the council held under Eusebius of Milan, in A.D. 451. (Leo. Mag. Ep. 97, 1083, in Pat. Lat. liv. 948 B.) He is identified in Gallia Christiana, xii. 806, with a bishop Eustasius or Eustachius, who was present at a council in A.D. 381 at Aquileia (S. Ambros. Opera, 786. 1), whom Gall. Christ. and Gams (Series Episc. p. 828) call "Saint," and who is identified, without much ground, with a Eustachius mentioned in the "de laude sanctorum," published among the Acta S. Victricii (see Ghesquière, AA. SS. Belgii, i. 420, § 11). [EUSTATHIUS (12).] [C. G.]

EUTHERIUS (1) (ETHERIUS), subscribed the council of Sardica, A.D. 347 (Athan. i. 132. Patr. Graec. xxv. 337). [W. M. S.]

EUTHERIUS (2), bishop of Tyana, an earnest Nestorian, and an acknowledged leader of that party both in the council of Ephesus, A.D. 431, and for some time afterwards. Before the assembling of that council he was in active correspondence with John of Antioch, on the subject of the alleged Apollinarianism of Cyril of Alexandria and his adherents (CYRIL (7), vol. i. 764 A; Theodoret. Ep. 112; Migne, Patrologia Gr. lxxxiii. 1310). He was one of the 68 who demanded that the council should not be opened until John's arrival (Synodicon ado. Truycod. Irenaei, Migne, Patrol. Gr. lxxxiv. 566). The appeal of Nestorius after his deposition to the emperor is signed by Eutherius, as are also the sentences of deposition pronounced in the synod convened by John of Antioch at his lodging (Acta Conciliiab. u. s. 598). On July 1 Cyril and his party wrote to the emperor to complain of the proceedings of John and his friends, among whom they name Eutherius (Act. Co. Eph. Labbe and Cossart, u. s. 746-751). On July 18, John of Antioch and his adherents were deposed and excommunicated, and Eutherius among them (Act. Co. Eph. acta v. u. s. 654). Both parties now issued circulars to the churches relating what they had done, and those issued by John were signed by Eutherius. Towards the end of the month a letter arrived from the emperor, commanding all to return to their homes in peace. This was addressed to fifty-one bishops by name, and among them Eutherius. Eutherius would seem to have at once obeyed the imperial injunction, as shortly afterwards we find him in friendly correspondence with his neighbour, Firmus of Caesarea, notwithstanding that Firmus had taken part in his excommunication, on the subject of a lawsuit which was pending between two members of their several flocks. (Firm. ep. 23; Patrol. Gr. lxxvii. 1498.) But before the end of the year, deposition of Eutherius at Ephesus had been confirmed at Constantinople.

Soon after this Firmus was sent to Tyana, to ordain a successor to Eutherius, and met with great opposition on the part of the citizens, who were evidently much attached to their bishop. Longras also, the imperial officer who was in command of the Isaurian troops stationed in the city, interfered; and both Firmus, and the person whom he had ordained in spite of the opposition with which he met, were compelled to flee. The newly ordained bishop soon renounced his orders, and seems to have returned to lay life. (Theodoret, Ep. Hypomnesticon Alex. Hierapolis Synodicon. c. 45, u. s.)

When negotiations were opened for reconciliation between the rival patriarchs of Alexandria and Antioch, one of the conditions upon which John and his adherents at first most strenuously insisted was the restoration of, among others, the deposed bishop of Tyana (Theodoret, ad Himerium ap. Mar. Mercator.; Migne, Patrol. xlviii. 1081). In the meanwhile, Eutherius and his fellow sufferers had written to Cyril, to Maximian the newly appointed successor of Nestorius, and also to Xystus bishop of Rome, to protest against the extreme measures of which they were the victims. (Cyril, ad Donat. ep. 45, ol. 42; Migne, Patrol. Gr. lxxvii. 250, and Act. Co. Eph. pt. iii. c. 38.) In their letter to Xystus they not only complain of Cyril, but they also charge him with having introduced "novelties." At the same time they express their painful astonishment that John should have so far yielded to Cyril as he had done, and pray the intercession of Xystus with the emperor in their behalf. (Synodicon, c. 117, u. s. 727; and Migne, Patrol. i. 594). After the reconciliation had been effected, Eutherius wrote to John to remonstrate with him on his inconsistency and want of loyalty to what he once contended for, but says nothing of his having abandoned his friends, and left them to their fate. (Synodicon, c. 73, u. s. 681.) He also wrote to Alexander of Hierapolis, who was equally opposed to the reconciliation, a long letter in which he ably defends the position which they and others were still determined to maintain (Synodicon, c. 201, u. s. 815); and to Helladius bishop of Tarsus, who had also written to Alexander, to encourage him in his opposition to it, expressing his great joy at what he had done. (Synodicon, c. 74, u. s. 684.) Eutherius was ultimately banished to Scythopolis, and from thence to Tyre, where he died. (Synodicon, c. 190, u. s.).

Eutherius is the author of a treatise in seventeen chapters, with a prefatory letter addressed to Eustathius bishop of Parnassus, which Photius ascribed to Theodoret (Phot. Biblioth. c. xlvi. Migne, Patrol. Gr. ciii. 79), and which has since been attributed by some to Maximus the Martyr, and by others to Athanasius (Garner's notes on Marius Mercator in Patrol. L. xlviii. 759, 1086, 1087; Fabricius, Biblioth. Gr. ed. Harles, viii. 304), in which he subjects the "Scholia" of Cyril of Alexandria, 'de Incarnatione Unigeniti' (Mar. Mercat. u. s. 1066) to elaborate and searching criticism. This treatise is still published with the works of Athanasius, but among the "Dubia," under the title of "Confutationes quarundam Propositionum" (Athanas. Op.; Migne, Patrol. Gr. xxviii. 1337, v. Praef. to the Dubia, p. 1287, and cf. the titles of chapters 8-24, inclusive of the "Libri" read by Photius with those of the seventeen chapters of the "Confutationes"). Gams infers from the prefatory letter that Eutherius published this treatise before his banishment. [T. W. D.]

EUTHERIUS (3), bishop of Stratonicia, in the province of Lydia. His name is appended to the protest signed by several bishops against the opening of the Council of Ephesus before the arrival of John of Antioch; nevertheless, he attended the first session, which was held on the day of the protest, A.D. 431. (Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 893; Mansi, iv. 1224; Baluz. Synod. c. 7, Concil. 698.) [L. D.]

EUTHERIUS (4), (AETHERIUS), bishop of Sardis, the metropolis of the province of Lydia, received a letter from the emperor Leo, ordering him to collect his province, and to inquire about the murder of St. Proterius of Alexandria, and about the faith of Chalcedon, A.D. 458. The synodal letter sent in answer to Leo is extant. (Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 862; Mansi, vii. 523, 571.) [L. D.]

EUTHERIUS (5), a person whom pope Gregory the Great styles "magnificae memoriae," and for whose death he writes to console Clementina Patricia. From some misapprehended allusion to episcopal duties in the letter Eutherius has been conjectured to have been a bishop. (Greg. Mag. Epp. lib. i. ind. ix. ep. 11; Patr. Lat. lxxvii. 458.) [C. H.]

EUTHERIUS (6), bishop of Chartres. [ETHEERIUS (2).]

EUTHIMIUS or Euthymius, deacon and martyr at Alexandria. He died in prison. (Mart. Vet. Rom., Adon., Usuard.) [G. T. S.]

EUTHONOMUS, an Italian bishop who suffered martyrdom in Bithynia, A.D. 311. (Baronius, Annal. 311, 18.) [G. T. S.]

EUTHORIC, king of the Visigoths. [EURIC.]

EUTHYMIUS (1), a convert at Milan, cir. A.D. 390. During the struggle between the empress Justina and Ambrose at Milan, Justina offered high dignities and rewards to anyone who would withdraw Ambrose from the church and conduct him into banishment. Euthymius purposely took a residence near the church, and kept a carriage in readiness. At the end of a year, however, and on the very day in which he had hoped to take Ambrose by surprise, he was himself apprehended, and was taken into banishment in the very carriage which he himself had provided. Euthymius, reflecting upon the workings of Providence, was himself converted. (Paulin. in Vit. Ambros. sec. 12.) [F. A.]

EUTHYMIUS (2), a presbyter of Constantinople, who with Philip presided over the schools in that city, from which office they were deposed on account of their adherence to the cause of Chrysostom, and the freedom with which they had condemned the proceedings of his persecutors. Chrysostom wrote to Euthymius from Cucus in A.D. 404 to console him under his trials, and to encourage him to persevere. (Chrysost. Epist. 318.) [E. V.]

EUTHYMIUS (3), the youngest of the four Nitrian solitaries known as "the Tall Brethren." [CHRYSOSTOM; DIOSCORUS.] [E. V.]

EUTHYMIUS (4), abbat in Palestine. He was born in 377, at Melitene in Armenia. His parents' names were Paulus and Dionysia, and his birth was considered an answer to prayer made at the shrine of the martyr Polyeuctes. His tutor was Acacius, afterwards bishop of Melitene. He was placed at an early age under the direction of Otreius, bishop of that town. After his ordination to

As presbyterate he was placed in charge of all the monasteries in and near the place.

Finding this care too great an interruption to his meditations, in his twenty-ninth year he escaped to Jerusalem, to visit the holy places, and settled at the dwelling of a community of separate monks called Pharan, six miles from Jerusalem.

Having made a particular friendship with another hermit, named Theoctistus, he used to take long walks with him into the desert of Cutis at sacred seasons. On one of these occasions, in the fifth year of his stay at Pharan, they came to a tremendous torrent, with a cavern on one of its banks. Here they determined to live lost to the world. They were, however, after a time discovered by some shepherds, who were at first terrified by their appearance, but afterwards sent them gifts from their village. The fathers of Pharan also found them out, and came at times to see them. About 411 Euthymius began to receive disciples. They turned the cavern into a church, and built a monastery on the side of the ravine where it was situated. Theoctistus had charge of it.

In 420 he erected a laura, like that of Pharan, on the road from Jerusalem to Jericho. The fathers of this place and his own disciples were slow to come to consult him on Saturdays and Sundays, and his advice was always given with captivating sweetness and humility. In A.D. 428 the church of his laura was consecrated by Juvenal the first patriarch of Jerusalem, accompanied by the presbyter Hesychius and the celebrated Passarion, governor of a monastery in Jerusalem.

A new turn was given to the life of Euthymius by a cure which he effected for Terebon, son of Aspebetus, prince of the Saracens. The biographer Cyril had obtained the details from many of the fathers, but the most authentic edition of the story was given to him personally by another Isidore, grandson of the subject of the cure. Prince Aspebetus, the Saracen, was tributary to the Persians, but came under the supremacy of Rome in the following manner. Towards the end of the reign of Isdegerdis, king of Persia, a persecution was aroused against the Christians. Officers were appointed on all the roads to prevent the escape of a single believer. One of these was Aspebetus. The sufferings and meekness of the Christians touched his heart; he did not hinder them from flight, and even gave them help. Accused before king Isdegerdis he took his son Terebon, his family, and all his goods, and passed over to the Romans. Anatolius was then prefect of the East; he received him kindly, and made him prefect of all the subjects of the Empire then living in Arabia. The son Terebon, who was not yet grown up, had for some time suffered from some kind of paralysis, which had withered his right side from head to foot. The boy is said to have had a dream indicating the abode of Euthymius and Theoctistus. At any rate, the sheikh Aspebetus brought him to that gloomy retreat. When they arrived with a large train of followers, they were refused admittance to Euthymius because it was neither Saturday nor Sunday. The sheikh, however, took Theoctistus by the hand, and silently pointed to his afflicted son. Terebon, too, himself made an eloquent appeal. Theoctistus reported the scene to his superior; Euthymius did not care to disobey what was said to be a heavenly vision, and came down to the party below. His prayers are narrated to have restored health to the patient, and the whole company believed on the Lord Jesus. Euthymius ordered a little recess for water to be hollowed out in the side of the cave, and baptized them on the spot. The sheikh took the name of Peter. His brother-in-law Maris refused to leave the place, and joined the community of anchorets, bestowing all his wealth for the enlargement of the buildings. The report spread over Palestine and the neighbouring countries, and Euthymius was besieged with applications for medical assistance and prayer.

Mindful of his former untroubled tranquillity, he meditated a flight to a still more secluded place, which is called Ruba in the narrative. Theoctistus, however, divined his intention, and collecting all the brethren, made them fall on their knees around him until he promised to remain. But in spite of this, some few days later he set out with a disciple named Domitian, and took up various stations on the barest peaks of the awful solitudes near the Dead Sea, in some cases founding small settlements of monks amongst the ruins left by Amorites or Moabites.

The next event of importance is the visit of Peter, bishop of the Saracens, on his way to the council at Ephesus, A.D. 431. Euthymius exhorted him to unite with Cyril of Alexandria, and with Acacius of Melitene, and to do in regard to the creed whatever seemed right to those two prelates.

When the council of Chalcedon issued its decrees (451) two of his disciples, Stephen and John, who had been present, carefully brought them to their master, to see whether he approved of them. The report of his sanction spread through the desert, and all the recluses would have followed his example but for the influence of the monk Theodosius, whose life and doctrine appear to have been equally unsatisfactory, who even did his utmost to persuade Euthymius himself to reject Chalcedon, but without success.

The empress Eudoxia, an energetic Eutychian, next crosses the path of Euthymius. After the death of her husband in 450, she went to Jerusalem, alleging a vow as the cause of her journey. She does not seem to have been satisfied with her religious position, and being urged by her brother Valerius to become reconciled to the Catholic church, she determined to have the opinion of the celebrated anchoret of Palestine. Knowing that he would never set foot in a town, she built a tower about four miles south of his laura, on the highest part of the great waste. She sent to him Cosmas, guardian of the so-called True Cross at Constantinople, and Anastasius a bishop. He came; and after giving his blessing to the empress, advised her that the violent death of her son-in-law Valentinian, the irruption of the Vandals, the captivity of her daughter Eudoxia, and of her grandchildren, might all be viewed in connexion with her Eutychian opinions. She should abjure her schism, and embrace the communion of Juvenal, patriarch of Jerusalem. The empress obeyed Euthymius as if she had heard the voice of God, and her example was followed by a multitude of monks and laymen. A celebrated anchoret, also, named Gerasimus, owed his separation from Eutychianism to Euthymius.

Euthymius died in A.D. 473; his obsequies were celebrated by the patriarch Anastasius and a large number of clergy, among whom are mentioned Chrysippus, Guardian of the Cross, and a deacon named Fidus.

These and other details are furnished by Cotelier's edition of the Vita Euthymii by Cyrillus Sythopolitanus (Cot. Eccl. Graec. Monum. iv. 1, Paris, 1692). [W. M. S.]

EUTHYMIUS, patriarch. [EUPHEMIUS (4).]

EUTHYMIUS (5), bishop of Sardis. He was a strong opponent of the iconoclastic emperors. He was present at the Nicene council, A.D. 787, in which he took an active part, and read the confession of faith in the name of the council at the fourth session. He was banished by the emperor Nicephorus, and, according to the Bollandists, ultimately suffered martyrdom under the emperor Theophilus. He is commemorated Dec. 26 (Cal. Byzant.) and on March 11. (Mansi, xii. 994, 1016, 1039, 1088, 1148, xiii. 135, 171, 366, 382; AA. SS. Boll. 11 Mart. ii. 73, 3 April, i. 263 in the Life of Nicetas; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 862.) [L. D.]

EUTHYMIUS (6), bishop of Sozopolis in Thrace, present at the council held at Nicaea, A.D. 787. (Mansi, xiii. 149, 372, 397; Le Quien, Or. Christ. i. 1182.) [J. de S.]

EUTICHIANUS or Eutychianus, Nov. 13, martyr, with his brother Paschasius and two others, in the Arian persecution, raised by the Vandals against the Catholics in the 5th century. Ado notes them on Nov. 12, and records how faithfully they maintained their faith against Sigeric king of Vandals. He tortured and killed them. (Prosper. Chron. A.D. 437; Ruinart in Hist. Persecut. Wandal. p. 431, A.D. 441; Tillemont, Mém. xvi. 500; Mart. Rom. Vet., Adonis, Usuardi.) [G. T. S.]

EUTICHIUS (1)—May 21. A deacon and martyr, with Polius and Timotheus, at Caesarea in Mauritania. (Mart. Vet. Rom., Mart. Hieron., Adon., Usuard.) [G. T. S.]

EUTICHIUS (2), hermit. [EUSITIUS.]

EUTICIUS (1), Oct. 5, martyr in Sicily, with Placidus and thirty others. (Mart. Hieron., Adon., Usuard., Raban.) [G. T. S.]

EUTICIUS (2), Dec. 11, martyr in Spain. (Mart. Hieron., Adon., Usuard.) [G. T. S.]

EUTICUS (1), Sept. 19, martyr, with St. Januarius, bishop of Beneventum. [JANUARIUS.] [G. T. S.]

EUTICUS (2), Sept. 29, martyr, with Plantus, at Heraclea in Thrace. (Mart. Hieron., Usuardi, Rabani.) [G. T. S.]

EUTICUS (3), Dec. 28, presbyter and martyr at Ancyra, in Galatia. He suffered with a deacon, Domitianus. (Mart. Hieron., Usuardi.) [G. T. S.]

EUTIGHERN (EOTIGERN, EICTIGERN). In the Irish annals reference is made to a sacrilegious act of special enormity, which took place at Kildare, the true year probably being A.D. 762 (Ann. Tig.). The entry in the Four Mast. (by Donovan, i. 358–59, A.D. 755) is:—"Eutighern (Eictighern, Ann. Ult., and Ectigernus, Ann. Tigernach), a bishop, was killed by a priest at the altar of St. Brighit, at Kildare (as he was celebrating mass, Ann. Cion.), between the crocaingel and the altar: from whence it arose that ever since a priest does not celebrate mass in the presence of a bishop at Kildare." In the Ann. Ult. and Tigernach, this is said to have taken place in a dertheach or duinteach, Ἀνδριανῶν Cillidara which, in the former, O'Connor interprets as "in hospitio pauperum Kildariae," and in the latter as "in domo poenitentiae monasterii Cildarensis," but evidently the "dertheach" was the oratorium or church (Petrie, Round Towers of Ireland, 343–58; O'Connor, Rev. Hib. Scrip. ii. 255, iv. 99). [J. G.]

EUTO, bishop. [ETHO.]

EUTONIUS, one of the fourteen bishops who met at Diospolis (Lydda) to condemn Pelagianism. (Aug. Contra Julian. lib. i. cap. 5, § 19, in Pat. L. xlv. 652.) [ELEUTHERIUS (3).] [C. H.]

EUTRECHIUS, prefect of the East, A.D. 447. Theodoret addressed a letter of congratulation to him on his appointment, containing expressions of affection for him, and his assurance that it was reciprocal (Theod. Epist. 57). Theodoret wrote to him again in 448, after the machinations of Dioscorus had prevailed with the feeble Theodosius II. to issue an imperial edict forbidding him to leave his diocese of Cyrrhus, as a disturber of the public peace. Theodoret expresses his surprise that Eutrechius had given him no intimation of the plots laid against him, and his regret at the failure of his hopes that Eutrechius's appointment would have calmed the tempest in the church. He was worse treated than murderer and adulterer, in not having any opportunity of answering the charges. (Epist. 80.) Eutrechius seems to have replied with assurances of friendship. Theodoret answers that he does not question his affectionate feeling, and begs that he will endeavour to find out who are the real movers of this persecution, and represent to the emperor how unjust it is to condemn him unheard. (Epist. 91.) [E. V.]

EUTROPIA (1), martyr. [EUPREPIA (1).]

EUTROPIA (2), wife of the emperor Maximianus (Herculius). Her full name, Galeria Valeria Eutropia, is preserved on an ancient medal (Goltz). She was a native of Syria (Victor. Chron. sub voc.). By a former marriage she had a daughter Flavia, whom Herculius espoused to the emperor Constantius. By Herculius she was mother of Maxentius, the usurper, and of Fausta, the wife of Constantine I. A letter of Constantine seems to shew that she embraced Christianity, for he tells the bishops of Palestine that his pious mother-in-law (ἡ δεισιδάρη κηδεστρία) had reported to him the desecration of Mamre. (Euseb. Vit. Const. iii. 52; cf. Sozomen, H. E. ii. 4, § 6.) [M. F. A.]

EUTROPIA (3), third daughter of the emperor Constantius I. by his wife Theodora, and therefore half-sister to Constantine the Great. She was the mother of Nepotianus, the usurper (Ann. ii. 43), with whom, according to St. Athanasius, she was put to death in 350 (Apol. Ad. Imp. Const. cap. 6). Her husband was probably the Popilius Nepotianus who was consul in 301. (Cf. De Cange, sub voc., and Tillemont, Hist. Emp. Constantine, art. iii. ad fin.)

[M. F. A.]

EUTROPIA (4), Dec. 14, virgin, martyr at the hands of the Vandals, A.D. 407. She was sister to Nicasius bishop of Rheims, who suffered in the same invasion. St. Jerome (Epist. i. ad Ageruchian) describes the ravages of the Vandals on this occasion. [NICASIUS.]

[G. T. S.]

EUTROPIUS (1), the first bishop of Saintes. According to Gregory of Tours, he was said to have been sent to Gaul by Clement, bishop of Rome, who first consecrated him to the episcopate. Here he preached the gospel until after a time the heathen rose against him, and by a blow upon the skull he met with a martyr's death. The continuance of the persecution prevented his receiving honourable or Christian burial, but more than one legend affects to trace the ultimate destination of his remains. Gregory tells us that at the close of the 6th century they were solemnly interred by St. Palladius in a church dedicated in their honour, the fatal wound being still visible upon the skull. And from another source we learn that there was a church at Saintes called by Eutropius's name, which Leontius restored when almost in ruins. He is commemorated on April 30. His successor in the see was St. Bibianus. His Acta are to be found in the Bollandists, but they are admittedly apocryphal. (Greg. Tur. de Glor. Mart. i. 56; Venet. Fort. Misc. i. 13; Migne, Patr. Lat. lxxviii. 76; Boll. Acta SS. April, iii. 733; Gall. Christ. ii. 1054; Baron. Annal. ann. 95, vii.)

[S. A. B.]

EUTROPIUS (2), bishop of Adrianopolis. [EUTROPIUS (3).]

[J. de S.]

EUTROPIUS (3), one of the orthodox bishops of Macedonia thanked by Chrysostom, A.D. 406, for their adherence. (Chrys. Ep. 163; Pat. Gr. ii. 706.)

[C. H.]

EUTROPIUS (4), bishop of Evaza, a town of uncertain position in Asia Minor, one of the signers who pronounced in favour of the letter of St. Cyril, and subscribed the deposition of Nestorius at the council of Ephesus, A.D. 431. (Mansi, iv. 1151, 1217; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 731.)

EUTROPIUS (5), bishop of Etenne (Trisenna) in the first Pamphylia, spoke in favour of the two letters of Cyril to Nestorius at the oecumenical council of Ephesus, A.D. 431. (Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 1003; Mansi, iv. 1149.)

EUTROPIUS (6), bishop of Adada, in Pisidia, present at the Council of Chalcedon, A.D. 451. He signed too the letter of the synod of Pisidia to the emperor Leo, A.D. 451. (Mansi, vii. 157, 157; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 1053.)

[L. D.]

EUTROPIUS (7), bishop of Pergamos, voted for the decrees of Dioscorus at the Latrocinium

CORR. MOOR.—VOL. II.

Ephesium, A.D. 449 (Mansi, vi. 853, 932); his name was subscribed in his absence to those of the Council of Chalcedon, A.D. 451, by Hesperius bishop of Pitane, at the instance of Stephen bishop of Ephesus. (Mansi, vii. 168; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 715.)

EUTROPIUS (8), bishop of Aureliopolis in Lydia, signed the synodal decree of Gennadius of Constantinople against the Simoniaci, A.D. 452. (Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 896; Mansi, vii. 917.)

EUTROPIUS (9), twenty-sixth bishop of Mainz, between St. Aureus and Adalbertus. He is said to have sat twenty-three years, and to have died in 477 (Gall. Christ. v. 435), or according to Le Cointe, 474 (Ann. Eccl. Franc. an. 474, tom. i. p. 106.)

[S. A. B.]

EUTROPIUS (10), bishop of Orange (Arausio), which was at that time in the realm of Burgundy.

Authorities.—A letter of Sidonius Apollinaris (vi. 6) assigned by Ceillier (Aut. Sacr.) to the close of the year 473 or 474, after the retreat of the Visigoths from Auvergne; a Life by Verus, a later bishop of Orange (Boll. Acta SS. Mai. vi. 699); Ado and Usuard, under May 27.

He enjoyed a high reputation for spirituality, and for the power of awakening it in others. Sidonius begs that he may be permitted to experience the influence of the great gifts possessed by Eutropius, inasmuch as for his own part he is deeply conscious of a state of spiritual famine and ignorance. The above date gives us the time when this honoured prelate flourished; but we do not know anything further concerning him.

[J. G. C.]

EUTROPIUS (11), eleventh bishop of Angera, between St. Albinus and Domitianus. He lived about the middle of the 6th century, and is said to have consecrated the monastery and churches of Glanfeüll on the Loire. He also transferred the body of his predecessor to the church of St. Germanus, which thenceforth was called after him. (Gall. Christ. xiv. 548; Vita S. Albini, 21, Vita S. Mauri, 48, in Mabill. Acta SS. Ord. S. Bened. saec. i. p. 112, 292, Paris, 1668-1701.)

[S. A. B.]

EUTROPIUS (12), a monk, irregularly consecrated bishop of Ephesus by the imposition of the hand of the dead bishop, Procopius, c. A.D. 560. Like Procopius, he adhered to the heresy of the Julianistae or Incorrupticolae; he ordained ten bishops to various sees, including those of Constantinople, Alexandria, and Antioch, for the dissemination of his heretical views. (Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 682; J. S. Assemanus, Biblioth. Orient. ii. 86-8.)

EUTROPIUS (13), bishop of Valencia in Spain, towards the end of the 6th century, originally abbat of the monastery of Servitanum, the site of which is now doubtful. Most writers, including Florez (Esp. Sagr. viii. 57) place it near the ancient Saetabis (Xativa), while Gams (K. G. von Spanien, ii. 2, 57) inclines to a more southerly position near Olleria. It was founded by St. Donatus, an African monk, who fled to Spain at the time of an incursion, "barbararum gentium" (Ildefons. de Vir. Ill. cap. 4).

A.D. 560, and was according to Ildefonsus the founder of Spanish monasticism. Eutropius was the successor of Donatus. Joannes Biclarensis mentions him first under the year 584. In 589 Eutropius, already with Joannes Biclarensis the most famous of Spanish abbats, assisted St. Leander in drawing up the acts and directing the proceedings of the third council of Toledo—the conversion council under Reccared (Joan. Bicl. Chron. in Pat. L. lxxii. 867, 869; Esp. Sagr. vi. 387). Ximeno in his Noticia Preliminar de los mas antiguos Escritores de Valencia, p. ix. rightly dwells on the great position he must have attained to have been thus associated with the most distinguished of Spanish ecclesiastics, in such an important piece of work, in preference to any bishop. Gams thinks that he was one of the abbats sent by Reccared to Gregory the Great with letters requesting the pallium for Leander (K. G. ii. 2, 31, 59), and points to the superscription of one of his two extant letters to Peter bishop of Arcavica, Ad Petrum papam, de districtione monachorum et ruina monasteriorum directa Romae. The first letter to bishop Peter is concerned with the eight vices, gastrimargia, fornicatio, philargyria, ira, tristitia, acedia, cenodoxia, superbia. The second is in answer to one from Peter, who seems to have remonstrated with Eutropius on the too harsh rule of Servitanum. Eutropius replies in words of fiery vindication of his own views, which, if they were penned at Rome, seem to shew the immediate influence of Gregory and Benedict. We know from St. Isidore alone (de Vir. III. cap. 45) that he was bishop of Valencia and that he wrote while still abbat of Servitanum another letter, now lost, to Licinian of Cartagena on the subject of the administration of the chrism to children in baptism. His episcopal career must have been very short, as in 589 Celsinus was bishop of Valencia, and in 610 Marinus, on the faith at least of the Decretum Gundemari [GUNTHER]. Between these dates we have still to take out his journey to Rome, if the journey itself is to be accepted.

St. Martin of Braga, Donatus, Eutropius, Joannes Biclarensis, St. Emilian and St. Fructuosus were the heads of Spanish monachism in the sixth and seventh centuries. Under the head St. MARTIN of Braga is discussed the much vexed question of the rule or rules observed in the Gothic monasteries. (Esp. Sagr. viii. 166–169; Castro R. de Bibl. Español. ii. saec. vi. p. 279; the two letters, apud Migne Patr. Lat. lxxx.) [M. A. W.]

EUTROPIUS (14), the heathen umpire in the disputations of ADAMANTIUS. [G. S.]

EUTROPIUS (15), March 3, a Cappadocian by birth, and martyr at Cyzicus, on the Hellespont, under Maximin, either A.D. 307 or 311. He was tortured and crucified by the president Asclepius, together with Cleonicus and Basiliscus. (Bas. Men.; Bar. Annal. 311, 19.) [G. T. S.]

EUTROPIUS (16), author of the Breviarium Historiae Romanae from the founding of the city to the death of Julian, dedicated to the emperor Valens. He is said to have been secretary to the emperor Constantine, and to have accompanied Julian in his Parthian expedition. (Brev. x. 16.) He was not a Christian, but a fair-minded heathen like Ammianus. Cf. l. c. on Julian “gloriae avidus ac per eam animi plerumque immodici, religionis Christianae insectator, proinde tamen ut cruore abstineret.” For further details, see the Dictionary of Gr. and Rom. Biography. [J. W.]

EUTROPIUS (17), a man of high character and literary attainments, proconsul of Asia, 374, a correspondent of Gregory Nazianzen. That he was the same person with Eutropius the historian, though maintained by Valesius, is a pure conjecture, embarrassed with chronological difficulties. Gregory Nazianzen having occasion to visit the province of Asia during his proconsulate, Eutropius received him with much distinction as a man of letters and begged him to write to him. Eutropius fell into trouble through suspicion of complicity in the supposed plot of Theodorus against Valens, A.D. 374, but escaped, no evidence having been found against him. Having ceased to be proconsul, he visited the neighbourhood of Nazianzus, and wrote to request a visit from Gregory, who replied, expressing his deep regret at being prevented going to him by illness. If he is the same who became prefect of the East in A.D. 381, the anticipations of his future elevation expressed by Gregory were fulfilled. (Greg. Naz. Epist. 137, 138; Ammian. Marcellin. lib. 29.) [E. V.]

EUTROPIUS (18), a young reader and singer of the church of Constantinople, of great personal beauty and of the most spotless purity of life, who was tortured to death after the expulsion of Chrysostom, in the vain hope of extracting from him the names of the authors of the mysterious conflagration which immediately followed his departure. Eutropius was examined before the prefect Optatus, who treated him with the most merciless barbarity. He was severely scourged, the flesh of his sides and his face was lacerated with iron combs until his bones were laid bare, and his eyebrows were torn off; lighted torches were applied to the tenderest parts of his body, and he was cruelly racked. But young and delicate as he was, his tortures elicited no confession. He was therefore taken to prison, and his feet set in the stocks, where he died. Some presbyters of Arsacius's party, fearing lest his mangled body should be seen by others, gave him a hasty interment by night. The pious imagination of his fellow-sufferers conceived that heavenly mourners accompanied the young martyr to the grave, and that the funeral chant was sung by celestial voices. Sozomen records the story of a vision of St. Stephen the protomartyr, seen by Sisinnius, the bishop of the Novatians, declaring that after long search he had found but one good man in Constantinople, and that one was Eutropius. Sisinnius, on waking, sent one of his presbyters to discover this one righteous person, whom after a search through all the prisons, he found at last at the point of death, and having made known the bishop's dream besought him to pray for him. (Pallad. Dial. cap. 20, p. 198, ed. Bigot.; Soz. H. E. viii. 24; Baron. Annal. ann. 404, liii.) [E. V.]

EUTROPIUS (19), a presbyter who headed a division among the Macedonians on account of a difference of opinion between him and Carterius. (Socr. H. E. v. 24.) [E. V.]

EUTROPIUS (20), eunuch and chief adviser of the emperor Arcadius. He may be the eunuch of this name whom Theodosius I. sent on a confidential mission to the monk John in the Thebaid (Soz. vii. 22, § 7), but this is doubtful.

We acquire our knowledge of his previous history from Claudian, who composed two poems of abuse against him. Claudian tells us that he was born in Armenia (in Eutrop. l. l. 47), that he was the slave of a soldier named Ptolemy, who gave him to the general Arinthoeus (l. 61), who in turn gave him to his daughter on her marriage (l. 104). When too old for further service he came to court (l. 143), where by the influence of Abundantius he was raised to high positions (l. 154). There he abused by peculation and avarice (l. 191), but in spite of this became successively judge (l. 231), general (l. 235 foll.), and consul (l. 297).

One of his first acts under Arcadius (A.D. 395) was to persuade the emperor to marry Eudoxia, thereby giving a check to Rufinus, who had intended his daughter to enjoy that honour (Zosim. v. 3). After the murder of Rufinus by the soldiers at the instigation of Gainas, Eutropius set himself to supplant Timasius, who had now become his most dangerous rival. He persuaded a certain Bargas to act as his accuser, and having used him successfully for the purpose, and procured the banishment of Timasius, afterwards had him put to death (Zosim. v. 8, 10). He was now practically master of the Eastern empire, as Stilicho was of the Western, Arcadius being simply a tool in his hands (ἀπὸ τοῦ Ἀρκαδίου καθ' ὅσον βουκλήματος, Zosim.). His next act was to get his former benefactor Abundantius banished to Sidon. He then proceeded to procure a decree of the senate pronouncing Stilicho a public enemy (Zos. ch. xi.). By securing the adherence of Gildo he transferred the province of Africa from the Western to the Eastern empire, but this Stilicho soon recovered. The account of the avarice of Eutropius given by Claudian is fully borne out by Zosimus. The best men in the state found life under such rule intolerable. Accordingly Gainas formed a plot with Tribigildus to invade the empire. Eutropius was entrusted by the emperor with the chief management of affairs. He appointed as general Leo, a favourite of his own and utterly incompetent, and Gainas, who secretly favoured the rebellion. Had it not been for the exertions of a volunteer named Valentinus, the plot must have been successful (Zos. v. 13-16). In 398 he was raised to the rank of patrician, and was appointed consul for 399. He comes before the notice of the church historians as an active supporter of the election of Chrysostom to the see of Constantinople, A.D. 397 (Soz. H. E. vi. 2, 11; Soz. H. E. vii. 2, 20). For a time they were supposed to be on terms of great intimacy (Soz. vi. 5, 2), and the discourses of the bishop after his fall also imply this. He represents himself as having been originally a friend of the monk, but estranged by his pride and avarice. His fall was as rapid as his elevation was unprecedented. The same year, 399, which saw him consul, witnessed his downfall. Two reasons are given to account for it. Sozomen (H. E. viii. 1, 3) and Philostorgius (xi. 6) say that he was accused of insulting the empress, while Zosimus (x. 17) attributes it to Gainas. Considering how great had been the influence of the eunuch with the emperor, Gainas would probably not have been able to bring about his downfall had it not been for the co-operation of the empress. She was a bold and ambitious woman, and had probably been long jealous of Eutropius. The emperor sent for him and deprived him of all his honours. Thereupon he fled for refuge to the altar of the Christian church, although he had himself just helped in passing a law which took away the right of sanctuary. Himself the first victim of his own impiety, his case afforded a striking instance of the working of retributive justice (Soz. H. E. viii. 7, 6; Soz. H. E. vi. 5, 4, Chrysost. in Eutrop. 3; cf. Eunap. apud Suid. sub voc.). The emperor sent to arrest him, but the bishop refused to give him up, and on the following day delivered the homily which is still extant, pointing the moral of the instability of human fortune by the spectacle of the late favourite cowering beneath the holy table. Zosimus tells us that the emperor violated the right of sanctuary, dragged him from the church, and banished him to Cyprus. St. Chrysostom, however, plainly tells us that had he remained in the church he would have been safe ("οὐχ ἡ ἐκκλησία αὐτὸν ἀφῆκεν, ἀλλ' αὐτὸς τὴν ἐκκλησίαν ἀφῆκεν," de Capto Eutrop. 1). The banishment, at all events, is certain. Gainas was not satisfied with this, and fresh charges were laid against him. He was accused of aspiring to the pomp of the emperor at the time of his entering upon the consulship (Philost. xi. 6), recalled, tried, convicted, and finally beheaded at Chalcedon (Soz. H. E. viii. 7, 5; Soz. H. E. vi. 5, 7). St. Chrysostom made his conviction the occasion of a second discourse, which is still extant, under the title De Capto Eutropio. After his death his name was erased from the list of consuls, and the law which he had passed as to the right of asylum was annulled. He was the first eunuch who ever attained consular rank. (Soz. H. E. vi. 5, 3.) All the historians agree in their estimate of his character, and single out his avarice as his distinguishing feature. Nothing can more strikingly prove the weakness of Arcadius than that such a man should have been able to gain so great an influence over him.

A marble slab has recently been found in the neighbourhood of the ancient Chalcedon, not far from the little church of St. John Chrysostom, bearing the following inscription:—

Εὐτροπίου τάφος εἰμὶ περίφρονος ἥ γὰρ ἀληθὲς
ὄνομα τῆς ἀρετῆς εἶχεν ἀειδόμενον.
Ἄτροπε μοῖρα τί τὸν εὐτροπον ἤρπασας ἄνδρα, ὃς φέρον ἐξ μονάδας, τρεῖς δ' ἐτέων δεκάδας, Πέτρος δὲ γνωστὸς σταθερὴν πλάκα τήνδε χαράξας στήσεν ἀποφθιμένῳ τούτῳ γέρας παρέχων.

The place is still called the harbour of Eutropius, and the letters are said to be of the character of those of the 4th century A.D. The inscription may therefore be a memorial of the subject of this article. (Köln. Zeitung, April 26, 1878.)

[M. F. A.]

EUTROPIUS (21), a Gallic priest of the 5th century, who, according to Gennadius (de Viris Illustr. xlix.; Migne, Patr. Lat. lviii. 1087), wrote two letters or consolatory treatises to two sisters, handmaids of Christ, who had been dis-inherited by their parents for their devotion to celibacy and love of religion. The letters have not survived to us, but, according to the same author, they were elegant and clear in style, and reason and Scripture were alike employed to fortify the argument. It has been suggested, and is not impossible, that he was identical with the bishop of Orange (No. 10). [S. A. B.]

EUTROPIUS (23), layman addressed by Sidonius Apollinaris in the 5th century.

Name.—This name, though it has not descended to modern times, was a common and popular one during the period embraced in this work. It is one of the long list, coined after the fashion recommended by Horace respecting new terms, which will be accepted, says the poet Ars Poetica, 52, 3, “si Graeco fonte cadant parce detorta”; εὐτροπος (versatile, active, and thence secondarily well-disposed) being of course its base.

1. Authority.—Two letters of Sidonius Apollinaris (lib. i. ep. 6; lib. iii. ep. 6 in Sirmond, vol. i. and in Migne, Pat. Lat. lviii.).

Sidonius, being on a visit to Rome, where he believed that he had been supernaturally cured of a fever, while praying in the church of the Apostles (meaning St. Peter's), writes to his friend Eutropius, urging him that he should try to obtain some dignity worthy of his birth. If Eutropius acts on this advice, Sidonius is prepared to help him to the very best of his ability. This Eutropius was evidently a layman. Sidonius appears to respect him, and to regard him as one unduly neglected by those in authority, though such neglect may partly arise from indolence or backwardness on his own part, as the following passage seems to indicate: “Munere Dei tibi congruit aevi, corporis, animi vigor integer: dein quod equis, armis, veste, sumptu famulicio instructus, solum (nisi fallimur) incipere formidas.” We do not know the date of the birth or death of this Eutropius, but he was probably somewhat younger, or at least not older than his distinguished correspondent. The duty specially suggested to him by Sidonius was that of militia palatina, on which Du Cange may be consulted (iv. 6). [J. G. C.]

EUTROPIUS (23), the father of St. Benedict of Nursia. (Pet. Diac. Vir. Ill. cap. 1, Pat. Lat. clxxiii. 1011 A, where the reading is Euproprius.) Another reading appears to be Eutropius. (Ceillier, Histoire des Auteurs ecclés. xi. 156.)

[I. G. S.]

EUTULANUS. [ENDULUS.]

EUTUWINUS, an Anglo-Saxon king mentioned in one of the hymns attributed to Alcuin (Hym., iii. Alc. Opp. ii. 549, ed. Frob.). The editor there supposes he may have been a West Saxon subregulus, or else identical with Escwine. But the poem, which says of him, “Qui primum imperium Saxonum ritè regebat,” and makes him to be succeeded by Caedwalla, negatives both these suppositions. The name is evidently a corruption of Centwine, which king is accurately described in the poem. [CENTWINE.] [C. H.]

EUTYCHES (1), bishop in Africa, eighteenth in Tit. Cyp. Ep. 57, Syn. Carth. ii. de Pace.

[E. W. B.]

EUTYCHES (2), a Christian of Cappadocia taken prisoner by the Goths, c. A.D. 260, and with some of his fellow captives suffered martyrdom for the faith after having sown the seeds of the gospel in the land of their captivity. (Philost. H. E. ii. 5.) The body of Eutyches was sent to Basil c. 372, at the instigation of Ascholius, bishop of Thessalonica, for which that saint sent him a letter of warm thanks. (Basil, Epist. 165 [339].) [E. V.]

EUTYCHES (3) (EUTICUS), April 15, martyr with Maro and Victorinus in Italy. They were exiled at first to the island of Pontia, and afterwards executed in the persecution of Nerva. [DOMITILLA.] (Mart. Rom. Vet., Adonis, Usuardi.) [G. T. S.]

EUTYCHES (4) and EUTYCHIANISM. Eutyches was archimandrite of a monastery near Constantinople. For seventy years (as he told pope Leo) he had lived a monastic life, and during thirty out of those seventy he had presided over his 300 monks. This life-long education in a monastery helps to explain the character attributed to him. He was an honest and pious, but narrow-minded man; full of fiery zeal against Nestorianism, and ready to discern heresy in language different from the dogmatic phraseology he had accepted; an “imprudent and not very learned man,” and led into the error called (after him) Eutychianism by his “want of learning rather than by subtlety of thought” (Leo). He was known among his contemporaries as a staunch upholder of the views and conduct of Cyril of Alexandria; the archbishop had even sent to him, as a special mark of favour, a copy of the Acts of the council of Ephesus, A.D. 431. He enjoyed high favour at court through the influence of the eunuch Chrysaphius, at that time minister, and his own god-child. But neither powerful ecclesiastical and political patronage nor his own passionate energy against Nestorianism availed him when suspicion rested upon his own opinions. By whom he was first accused, whether by Theodoret in his Eranistes, or by his former friend Eusebius of Doryloenum, or by Domnus of Antioch, it seems difficult to decide (cp. Hefele, ii. 319; Martin, 75–78); but it is clear that to Eusebius is due the definite charges first brought against him at Constantinople in 448.

Flavian, who succeeded Proclus in 447 as archbishop, convened a synod in Constantinople on Nov. 8, 448, to consider some questions between the metropolitan of Sardis and two of his suffragan bishops. Eusebius was present, and, at its conclusion, handed in a complaint against Eutyches. Eusebius as a layman had twenty years before exposed and opposed Nestorianism; he was now the first to make an attack upon the extreme errors of an opposite kind. He complained that Eutyches “defamed the holy Fathers and himself, a man who has never been suspected of heresy”; and alleged himself prepared to convict Eutyches of being undeserving of the name of orthodox, and of being untrue to the orthodox faith. Flavian listened to the document in astonishment, and suggested that Eusebius should first privately discuss with Eutyches the points in dispute. Eusebius retorted that he had already several times privately, and as an old friend, remonanted with Eutyches, but unsuccessfully; he, therefore, implored the synod to summon Eutyches before them, not only to induce him to give up his views, but to prevent infection spreading further. The sitting concluded after further debate by the nomination of two deputies, a priest and a deacon, who were instructed to read to Eutyches the complaint laid against him, and to invite him to attend the synod. The synod met again on the 12th of Nov. Eusebius began by renewing his assertion that Eutyches had propagated his errors widely. He then moved, first, the recital of (a) Cyril's first letter to Nestorius, (b) the approbation of that letter by the council of Ephesus, and (c) Cyril's letter to John of Antioch; and secondly, that every one present should express their acceptance of these documents as true expositions of the Nicene creed. Flavian and the bishops present accepted these propositions, and a resolution to the same effect was sent to the absentees for their approval and signature. The synod thus professed its belief in "Jesus Christ the only-begotten Son of God, perfect God and perfect man, of a reasonable soul and body subsisting, begotten before all ages, without beginning; of the Father according to the Godhead, but in these last days for our sake and for our salvation born of the Virgin Mary, according to the manhood; consubstantial with the Father, as touching His Godhead, and consubstantial with the mother, as touching His manhood." "We confess," they stated, "that Jesus Christ, after the Incarnation, was of two natures in one Hypostasis and in one Person; one Christ, one Son, one Lord. Whosoever asserts otherwise, him we exclude from the clergy and the church" (Mansi, vi. 679). The third session took place on Nov. 15, when the deputies announced the result of their interview with Eutyches. He refused to appear before the synod, on the ground that he had made a resolution, as early as the beginning of his monastic life, never to leave the cloister. Further, he wished to inform the synod that Eusebius had long been his enemy, and, in this instance, had grossly slandered him; for that he (Eutyches) was ready to assent to and subscribe the statements of the holy Fathers at Nicaea and Ephesus. Certain expressions used by them were, in his opinion, mistakes; but he would not blame the one nor press the other. In such cases he turned to Holy Scripture, which he considered a safer guide than the fathers. After the Incarnation of the Word—that is, after the birth of the Lord Jesus Christ—he (Eutyches) worshipped one nature, and that the nature of God made flesh and incarnate (μία φύσις προσώπου, και ταύτην Θεὸν σαρκωθέντος και ενσπυριζόμενος). Reading from a little book which he fetched, Eutyches had then, according to the deputies, first protested against a statement falsely ascribed to him—viz. that the Logos had brought His body from heaven—and next asserted his inability to find anywhere in the writings of the Fathers their belief that our Lord Jesus Christ subsisted of two Persons united in one Hypostasis; adding, that even if he did find such a statement, he must decline to accept it, as not being contained in Holy Scripture. In his belief, He who was born of the Virgin Mary was very God and very man, but His body was not of like substance with ours.

Eusebius struck in, "This is quite enough to enable us to take action against Eutyches; but let him be summoned a second time." Two priests (Mamas and Theophilus) were now sent. They were instructed to tell Eutyches that his replies to the deputies had given great offence, and that he must come and explain them, as well as meet the charges originally brought against him. They took with them a note to the effect that if he persisted in refusing to appear, it might be necessary to deal with him according to canonical law, and that his determination not to leave his cell was simply an evasion. During their absence, Eusebius brought forward a further charge. Eutyches, he asserted, had written and circulated among the monks a little book on the faith, to which he had requested their signatures. The statement was evidently an exaggeration; but it was of sufficient importance to deserve verification. Priests and deacons were at once sent to the neighbouring monasteries to make inquiries. In the meantime Mamas and Theophilus returned. They reported that they had encountered many obstacles. The monks round the door of the monastery had affirmed the archimandrite to be ill; one Eleusinius had next appeared reporting himself the representative of Eutyches; and it was only on the assurance that the letter, of which they were the bearers, contained neither hard nor secret messages that they at last procured an audience. To the letter Eutyches had replied that nothing but death should make him leave his monastery, that the archbishop and the synod might do what they pleased, and that they had much better spare themselves the trouble of summoning him a third time. In his turn, he wished them to take a letter; and, on their refusal announced his intention of sending it to the synod. Eusebius at once broke out, "Guilty men have always some excuse ready; we must bring Eutyches here against his will." His coadjutors were more reasonable, and, at the desire of Flavian, two priests (Memnon and Epiphanius) and a deacon (Germanus) were commissioned to make another effort. They took with them a letter exhorting Eutyches not to compel the synod to put in force canonical censure, and summoning him before them two days later (Nov. 17). The synod met on Nov. 16. During the session, information was brought to Flavian that certain monks and deacons, friends of Eutyches, and Abraham, archimandrite of a neighbouring monastery, requested an audience. They were at once admitted. Abraham informed the archbishop that Eutyches was ill, and had deputed him to wait upon the archbishop and speak for him. Flavian's reply was paternal and conciliatory. He regretted the illness of Eutyches, and, on behalf of those present, expressed their willingness to wait till he was restored to health. "Let him remember," he continued, "that he is not coming among strangers, but among men who would receive him with fatherly and brotherly affection, and many of whom have hitherto been his friends. He has pained many, and must defend himself. Surely if he could leave his retirement when the error of Nestorius imperilled the faith, he should do as much when his own orthodoxy is in question. He has but to acknowledge and anathematize his error, and the past shall be forgiven. As regards the future he must give assurance to us that he will only teach conformably to the doctrines of the Fathers." The archbishop closed the audience with words replete with significance, "You (monks) know the zeal of the accuser of Eutyches'. Fire itself seems to him cold in comparison with his burning zeal for religion. God knows I have besought him to desist; but, as he persisted, what could I do? Do you suppose that I have any wish to destroy you, and not rather gather you together? It is the act of an enemy to scatter, but the act of a father to gather."

The fifth session opened on Wednesday, Nov. 17, with Memnon's report on their mission to Eutyches. The archimandrite, he stated, received their letter with the remark that he had sent Abraham and the others to declare to the archbishop and the synod that he (Eutyches) assented to the definitions of Nicaea and Ephesus, and to all that Cyril had spoken. Eusebius started up with the interruption: "If Eutyches assents now and from compulsion, that does not put me in the wrong. My charge against him has to do with the past and not with the future." The archbishop calmed him, and Memnon was allowed to proceed. Eutyches had assured him that he had sent Abraham on account of his own illness. "I pressed him, nevertheless," said Memnon, "to appear personally before you; but first he wished to await Abraham's return, and next—when we offered to remain with him till then—he begged us to request you not to command his attendance this week, and added that he would (God willing) attend on the following Monday." Before any decision was pronounced upon this request, the deputies who had been sent by the synod to the various monasteries were asked to make their report. They stated that they had been to several monasteries. Martin, archimandrite of the first, told them that he had received a document from Eutyches on Nov. 12, which he had been requested to sign; that on his objecting that "definitions of the faith should emanate from bishops and not from him," Eutyches had answered, "If you do not support me, the archbishop, after he has destroyed me, will destroy you." Martin had not read the document, but Eutyches had informed him that it contained what the council of Ephesus and Cyril had taught. A second archimandrite had told them that the monks who had brought him the paper for his signature, had assured him that it contained the definitions of the fathers at Nicaea and Ephesus; but that his request to be allowed to compare it, previous to signing it, with the acts of those councils, had not been accepted, and the monks had departed, seemingly displeased. Other abbats disclaimed all knowledge of paper or request from Eutyches. Such as it was, the evidence was enough for Eusebius. "The charge is proved," he cried, "and we can proceed against him. Moreover, the man is a liar; at one moment he tells us that it is his determination not to come out. At another he promises to come." More rational counsels prevailed. Eutyches was informed that he would be expected on Nov. 22, and that in the event of his failing to appear, he would be deprived of his clerical functions and monastic dignity.

The bishops met for a sixth session on Saturday, Nov. 20, and agreed that Eutyches might be accompanied on the Monday following by four of his friends. The indefatigable Eusebius then rose. He had been given to understand that when Mamas and Theophilus had visited Eutyches, the archimandrite had made use of expressions which had not been reported to the synod, but which threw great light on his opinions. At the request of the bishops, Theophilus narrated what had occurred. Eutyches, he said, had wished to argue with them; and in the presence of several of his monks he had put these questions:—"Where, in Holy Scripture, is there any mention of two natures? Which of the Fathers has declared that God the Word has two natures?" Mamas had replied to the effect that the argument from the silence of Scripture was insufficient. "The word δυοφύσις does not occur in Holy Scripture; we owe it to the definitions of the Fathers. And similarly we owe to them the affirmation of the two natures." I (Theophilus) then asked Eutyches if he believed that God the Word was "perfect (τέλειος) in Christ." "Yes," he answered; and he gave the same answer to my next question:—"Do you believe that the man made flesh was also perfect (in Him)? Whereupon I urged, "If in Christ be perfect God and perfect man, then do these perfect (natures) form the one Son. Why will you not allow that the one Son consists of two natures?" Eutyches replied: "God forbid that I should say that Christ consists of two natures, or dispute about the nature of God. Let the synod depose me, or do what they please. I will hold fast by the faith which I have received." Mamas substantiated the truth of what Theophilus had stated, adding that what led to the discussion was the remark made by Eutyches:—"God the Word became flesh to restore fallen human nature," and the question which he (Mamas) had at once put:—"By what nature, then, is this human nature taken up and restored?" It was a natural question on the part of Flavian to ask, why this conversation had not been reported before: it was a lame, but thoroughly Oriental answer to reply:—"Because we had been sent, not to question Eutyches about his faith, but to summon him to the synod. We gave you his answer to the latter point. No one asked us about the former, and therefore we held our peace."

The synod met in its seventh, last, and weightiest session on Monday, Nov. 22. Eutyches eventually presented himself, accompanied by a multitude of soldiers, monks, and others, who refused to allow him to enter till assurance had been given that he should depart as free as he entered. A letter from the emperor (Theodosius) was presented. "I wish," it said, "for the peace of the Church, and steadfast adherence to the orthodox doctrines of the fathers at Nicaea and Ephesus. And because I know that Florentius the patrician is a man approved in the faith, I desire that he should be present at the sessions of a synod, which has to deal with matters of faith." The synod received the letter with shouts, "Long live the emperor! His faith is great! Long live our pious, orthodox, high-priest and emperor (τῷ ἀρχιερεὶ βασιλεὶ)."

Florentius was conducted to his seat, the accuser (Eusebius) and the accused (Eutyches) took their places in the midst of the assembly, and the session began by the recital of all the papers bearing on the point between them. Cyril's letter to John of Antioch was again read; but, after the words—"We confess our Lord Jesus Christ . . . Consubstantial with the Father, according to the Godhead, and consubstantial with us according to the manhood; for a union of the two natures was made; wherefore, we confess one Christ, one Son, one Lord. And in accordance with the perception of the unconfused union (τῆς τῆς ἀσυνχύτου ἐνώσεως), we confess the Holy Virgin θεοτόκος, because God the Word was made flesh, and became man and united to Himself by conception the temple taken from her." Eusebius exclaimed, "Certainly, Eutyches does not acknowledge this, he has never believed it, but taught the very opposite to every one who came to him." Florentius desired that Eutyches himself should be asked if he assented to these documents or not; but again Eusebius broke in, "If he does so now; then, Eusebius, shall appear to be a calumniator, and I shall lose my office." Eutyches, he asserted, had already threatened him with banishment; Eutyches was a rich man, and possessed plenty of influence, while he (Eusebius) was poor and possessed nothing. Flavian and Florentius succeeded in calming Eusebius, and the former turned to Eutyches with the question: "Do you confess union out of two natures?" "I do," he answered; but when Eusebius put the question in a more precise form: "Do you confess the existence of the two natures after the Incarnation, and that Christ is consubstantial with us according to the flesh?" Eutyches replied, "I have not come here to dispute, but to testify what I think. My opinion is contained in this paper. I pray you command that it be read." And it himself, he would not; and to Flavian's very natural remark: "If it is your own profession of faith, what was the need of a paper?" he continued: "This is my belief. I worship the Father with the Son, and the Son with the Father, and the Holy Ghost with the Father and the Son. I acknowledge that the bodily presence of the Son arose from the body of the Holy Virgin, and that He became perfect man for the sake of our salvation. This is my confession before the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost, and before your Holiness." Further questions followed. The archbishop put the plain one:—"Do you confess that Christ is of two natures?" Eutyches answered, "I have never yet presumed to dispute about the nature of my God; that He is consubstantial with us, have I never said. I readily admit that the Holy Virgin is consubstantial with us, and that our God was born of her flesh." Flavian, Florentius, Basil of Seleucia, and others, pressed upon him: "If you admit that Mary is consubstantial with us, and that Christ took His manhood from her, it naturally follows that He, according to His manhood, is consubstantial with us." Eutyches answered: "I do not say that the body of man has become the body of God; but in speaking of a human body of God I say that the Lord became flesh of the Virgin. If you wish me to add that His body is consubstantial with ours, I will do so; but I cannot use the word consubstantial in such a manner as to deny that He is the Son of God." Flavian's retort was just: "You will then admit this from compulsion, and not because it is your belief." Florentius again appealed to Eutyches: "Do you believe or not that our Lord who was born of the Virgin is consubstantial with us, and—after the Incarnation—has two natures?" and the answer came: "I acknowledge that our Lord before the union (of the Godhead and manhood) had two natures; but, after the union, I confess but one." Finally the synod desired Eutyches to make a full explanation, and to pronounce an anathema on opinions opposed to the documents which had been recited. Eutyches replied that he would, if the synod desired it, make use of language (viz. consubstantial with us, and of two natures) which, in his opinion, was very much open to question; "but," he added, "inasmuch as I do not find such language either in Holy Scripture or in the writings of the Fathers, I must decline to pronounce an anathema on those who do not accept it, lest—in so doing—I should be anathematizing the Fathers." Once more Florentius interposed: "Do you acknowledge two natures in Christ, and His consubstantiality with us?" "Cyril and Athanasius," answered Eutyches, "speak of two natures before the union, but of one nature after the union." "If you do not acknowledge two natures after the union," persisted Florentius, "you will be condemned. Whosoever refuses the formula 'of two natures' and the expression 'two natures' is unorthodox;" to which the synod responded with the cry, "and to receive this under compulsion (as would Eutyches) is not to believe in it. Long live the emperor!" The sentence was pronounced: "Eutyches, formerly priest and archimandrite, hath proved himself affected by the heresy of Valentinus and Apollinaria, and hath refused—in spite of our admonition—to accept the true faith. Therefore we, lamenting his perverseness, have decreed, through our Lord Jesus Christ, blasphemed by him, that he be excluded from all priestly functions, from our communion, and from his primacy in his monastery." Excommunication was pronounced upon all who should consort with and abet him, and the sentence was signed by thirty-two (? twenty-eight) bishops, and twenty-three archimandrites. Eutyches left the council-chamber muttering an appeal to Rome.

Action was at once taken by both parties. The monks rallied round Eutyches, and the influence of Chrysaphius was exerted in his behalf. Eutyches himself wrote to the emperor and to many of the bishops, and placarded notices about Constantinople, protesting against his sentence, and justifying his teaching. Of these letters the most important is that to pope Leo. In it he accuses Eusebius of acting at Satan's bidding, not in the interests of orthodoxy, but with the intention of destroying him. He repeats that he could not accede to the demands of the synod, acknowledge two natures in Christ, and anathematize all who opposed this doctrine, because Athanasius, Gregory, Julius, and Felix had rejected the expression "two natures," he himself having no wish to add to the creed of Nicaea and Ephesus, nor to define too particularly the nature of God the Word. He adds that he had desired the synod to lay the matter in dispute before the pope, promising to abide by his decision; but that this favour not having been accorded to him, and being in great danger, he now implored the pope to give an unprejudiced judgment upon the points in dispute, and to extend protection to him.

Flavian, on his part, circulated the decree of excommunication. He charged the monks to obey it, he communicated it to the emperor, to the pope, and the bishops in the provinces; but his interviews with the emperor were painful to himself, and marked by great suspicion on the part of the emperor; and his letter to Leo was forestalled by that of Eutyches, and required a second, more explanatory of the synodal acts, and refuting the mis-statements of Eutyches, before the pope was satisfied. Leo eventually gave Eutyches his answer in the celebrated "epistola de damnatione ad Flavianum."

It was soon evident that court favour inclined to Eutyches; and early in 449 a commission was appointed by the emperor to examine a charge of falsification of the acts of the late synod of Constantinople, proffered by Eutyches against Flavian. The revision of the proceedings brought to light no such material differences as Eutyches alleged, and the commission had no choice but to confirm the sentence pronounced by the synod; but an agitation was thereby advanced, which was productive of the greatest misery.

A council had already been summoned by the emperor Theodosius to meet at Ephesus. Eutyches and Dioscorus, patriarch of Alexandria, had demanded it, and their position had been supported by Chrysaphius. This conjunction was, in itself, ominous; it more than justified Flavian's openly expressed conviction that a council convened under such patronage could do no good. Chrysaphius was notoriously opposed to Flavian; the eunuch could bear no rival at court, and (if the story be true) he had never forgiven Flavian's election in preference to Eutyches, or the archbishop's rebuke of his capidity. Dioscorus retained the traditional jealousy of the see of Constantinople, and—in defiance of all canonical law—had admitted Eutyches to communion, and declared him reinstated in his functions as priest and archimandrite.

The imperial summons was couched in the names of Theodosius II. and Valentinian III., and was dated May 20, 449. It stated the cause of the summons to be due to the doubts and disputes which had arisen concerning the faith; it so to present himself with ten and ten bishops at Ephesus on 1. It extended the invitation to Theodoret of Cyrus (Kara) being especially summoned by the emperor's letter to Dioscorus appointed at, Barsumas, representative of the archimandrites, evidently on of considering and composing a dispute. The imperial law he commissioners, Elpidius and of them to repress all unruliness, to preserve order, and carry out carefully and quickly. One especially significant: "The Constantinople, had passed judgments were to attend the proceedings, but were not to be allowed to sit, because their own already examined were to be examined anew." Council of Asia, was ordered to commissioners. Two further instructions to be noticed. The first was president of the synod, with John, and Thalassius of Caesarea, as special assessors, in order to check the move made by certain Nestorian bishops to invite Theodoret; and the wish was expressed that no consideration should be shown for any who added to or diminished from the Nicene Creed; the second was addressed to the council itself, and, directly blaming Flavian for his action towards Eutyches and his (alleged) unwillingness to let drop the matters in dispute between them, desired the council to go into the subject thoroughly, to root out the errors, to expel the followers of Nestorius from the Church, and to the true faith on a firm and irremovable basis.

The synod—the "Latrocinium" or "Robber-synod," as posterity was taught to call it by Leo—met for the first time on August 3, 449. It was a synod at which "Flavian was presented as an oppressor, and Eutyches as a victim, and terrible was the day on which it opened. The true faith received in the East a shock from which it has never completely recovered since. The Church witnessed the separation from herself of nations which have never returned to her, and perhaps never will" (Martin).

Leo was not present: Julian, a bishop, Bonetus, a priest, and Hilary, a deacon, accompanied by a notary, appeared as his legates. They brought with them the famous tome, or doctrinal letter, to Flavian, and letters to the emperor, to Pulcheria (his sister), to the archimandrite, to the council, and to others. In his letter to Theodosius (June 13, 449) Leo expresses his regret that "the foolish old man" (Eutyches) had not given up opinions condemned by the synod of Constantinople, and intimates his wish that the archimandrite should be received again if he would keep his promise to the pope, and amend what was erroneous in his views. In the letter to Pulcheria (same date), the pope considers Eutyches to have fallen into his error "through want of knowledge, rather than through wickedness;" in his letter to the archimandrite of Constantinople, he states his conviction that they do not share the views of Eutyches, and exhorts them to deal tenderly with him should he renounce his error; and in his letter to the synod he quotes the confession of St. Peter, "Thou art the Christ, the Son of the living God" (St. Matt. xvi. 16), as embodying belief in the two natures, and argues that Eutyches had rightly understood these words, he would not have swerved from the path of truth in most of these letters Leo refers to the tome as containing the true teaching of the Church.

That tome was indeed presented at the synod but a synod "bought with gold and packed with brutal men" (Eusebius of Duryl.), describe by the emperor Eudoxia as "tumultuous as diabolical," and stigmatized by Leo himself, "as no court of justice, but a gang of robbers," was not likely to permit the recital of a document condemnatory of the man (Eutyches) they were pledged to acquit. It was presented, but shelved

The history of the synod, in its relation to Eutyches, is discussed elsewhere [DIOSCORUS]. The Christian world was rent in pieces by its proceedings. Egypt, Thrace, and Palestine, ranged themselves with Dioscorus and the emperor; Syria, Pontus, Asia, Rome, protested against the treatment of Flavian, and the acquittal of Eutyches. Dioscorus excommunicated Leo, Leo excommunicated Dioscorus. Theodosius applauded and confirmed the decisions of the synod in a decree which deposed Flavian, Eusebius, and others, as Nestorians, forbade the elevation of their followers to episcopal rank, deposed them if already bishops, and expelled them from the country. Leo wrote letters to the emperor Theodosius, to the church at Constantinople, and to the anti-Eutychian archimandrites. He asked for a general council; he interested the emperor Valentinian III., who with his wife (Eudoxia) and his mother (Galla Placidia), happened to be at Rome on the feast of St. Peter's chair (Feb. 22, 450); and he appealed to Pulcheria, whose letter to him—intimating how anxious she considered the views of Eutyches—especially gladdened him. The letters of Valentinian and Leo were answered by Theodosius, in a strain which left no doubt as to his intentions; "the synod at Ephesus had been perfectly unlettered; they had come to conclusions entirely consonant with orthodoxy; Flavian had been justly deposed on account of his innovation on the faith." He desired Leo to recognise Anatolius, an Alexandrian whom Dioscorus had consecrated at Constantinople, and (at that time) a partisan of Eutyches; a request which Leo met by the stipulation that Anatolius must first prove his orthodoxy, by formulating a confession of faith on the lines laid down by Cyril, the council of Ephesus, and his own letter to Flavian.

The wrangle was suddenly silenced by the death of Theodosius (July 450). Pulcheria raised her husband, Marcian, to the throne, and orthodoxy triumphed again: "Eutychianism, as well as Nestorianism, was conquered" (Leo). Marcian assented at once and cordially to the pope's request for a council; Anatolius convened a synod of bishops, archimandrites, priests, and deacons at Constantinople, and in the presence of the Roman legates subscribed the tome, and, together with the whole assembly, anathematized Eutyches, Nestorius, and their followers. Pulcheria wrote to confirm the news, and added that Flavian's body was to be brought to Constantinople and buried in the Basilica of the Apostles, and that the exiled bishops were to be recalled. Leo's joy was sincere, but his wish for a council was not now so urgent. The danger which existed when Theodosius was emperor had passed away. Eutychianism and Nestorianism had been anathematized; his own tome had been everywhere accepted; of more immediate importance, in his opinion, than discussions upon matters of doctrine, was the practical question, how best and most speedily to reconcile the penitent and to punish the obstinate. The war in the West, the invasion of Gaul by Attila, would prevent the bishops of the West from attending a council in Italy, where he wished it to be. Nestorianism was still powerful among the bishops of Syria, and would unquestionably bias the views of many, should a council be called in the East, as the emperor desired. He feared that the men who would unite for the condemnation of Eutychianism, would, out of that very condemnation, find means for a triumph of Nestorianism over orthodoxy.

Leo pressed his views respectfully and firmly; but, in deference to the emperor's convictions, he did not insist upon them. He consented to send representatives to the future council, while he urged that no fresh discussion should be allowed whether Eutyches was heretical or not, or whether Dioscorus had judged rightly or not, but that debate should turn upon the best means of reconciling and dealing mercifully with those who had gone wrong. For a similar reason he urged Pulcheria to cause the removal of Eutyches from the neighbourhood of Constantinople, and to place an orthodox abbat at the head of his monastery; the one step would check the existing means of intercourse, the other would free the community from false teaching. That the last piece of advice was needful seems clear from the appeal made about this time to Marcian by one Faustus and other archimandrites. Eutyches, they urged, had many followers, and especially among his own monks. These persons had paid no attention to the summons to obedience addressed to them by Anatolius and his synod. Therefore, urged the petitioners, let them be proceeded against according to monastic rule, and let fresh archimandrites be appointed to see that the imperial enactments be enforced.

The fourth great council of the church, originally summoned to meet at Nicaea on Sept. 1, 451, met—after various inevitable delays and change of locality—at Chalcedon, on Oct. 8. Its general history is given under DIOSCORUS; here one or two points only need be considered which have special reference to the subject of this article.

During the first session the secretaries read the documents descriptive of the introduction of Eutyches at the synod of Ephesus (the Letrocinium) and the reading of his paper. Eusebius of Dorylaeum interrupted them when they came to words which attributed to Eutyches the statement, "The third general council (that of Ephesus, 431) hath directly forbidden any addition to the Nicene creed." "That is untrue," exclaimed Eusebius. "You will find it in four copies," retorted Dioscorus. Diogenes of Cyzicus urged that Eutyches had not repeated the Nicene Creed as it then stood; for the second general council (that of Constantinople, 381) had certainly appended (against Apollinaris and Macedonius) to the words, "He was incarnate," the words "by the Holy Ghost of the Virgin Mary," though he considered the appended words an explanation rather than an addition; but the Egyptian bishops present disclaimed (as Cyril had previously done) any such revised version of the Nicene confession, and greeted the words of Diogenes with loud exclamations of disapproval. Angry words were again interchanged when the reader continued: "I (Eutyches) anathematize all who say that the flesh of Our Lord Jesus Christ came down from heaven." "True," interrupted Eusebius, "but Eutyches has never told us whence Christ did take His manhood;" and Diogenes and Basil of Seleucia affirmed that Eutyches, though pressed upon this point at Constantinople, had refused to speak out. Dioscorus now, and to his honour, protested: "Let Eutyches be not only punished, but burnt, if he holds heterodox opinions. I only care to preserve the Catholic faith, not that of any individual man;" and then he turned upon Basil for having said one thing at Constantinople and another at Ephesus. "I did so," pleaded Basil, "out of fear of the majority. Before a tribunal of magistrates I would have remained firm even to martyrdom; but I did not dare oppose (a tribunal of) the Fathers (or bishops)." And his appeal for pardon on that ground was caught up by the others. "Yes, we all sinned (at Ephesus); we all implore forgiveness."

At the fourth session (Oct. 17), eighteen priests and archimandrites, headed by Faustus, were admitted to the presence of the Council. They were questioned about a petition (perhaps a counter-petition to their own) addressed to Marcian previous to the opening of the council, by Carosus and other Eutychians, who styled themselves archimandrites. Faustus replied that only two of the petitioners (Carosus and Dorotheus) were archimandrites, the rest were men who lived in martyries (chapels dedicated to martyrs), or were unknown to them, and he demanded their punishment for the assumption of a title which was not theirs. The commissioners commanded that Carosus and the others should be summoned. They came, to the number of twenty. The quick eye of Anatolius discovered among them two men who had been already condemned for heresy; and all present shrank with horror from one man in the company—Barsumas. The petition was read. It was an impassioned appeal to the emperor to prevent an outbreak of schism, to summon a council, and in the meantime forbid the expulsion of any man from his church, monastery, or martyr. The reading had hardly finished when Diogenes denounced Barsumas as the man who had killed Flavian; and cries of "Out with the murderer!" prevented for some moments the recital of another paper which the Eutychians had addressed to the council. In this second document the Eutychians excused themselves for not having previously attended the council, on the ground that the emperor had forbidden it; and they now proffered the request that "his holiness the archbishop Dioscorus and his bishops should be invited to attend." Angry exclamations burst forth on all sides; "Anathema to Dioscorus! Christ hath deposed him. Turn out these men, and blot out the insult they have offered us. We will not listen to a petition which calls the deposed Dioscorus a bishop." The commissioners had the courage to insist that the paper should be read through. "The emperor," it proceeded, "had assured them that at the council the creed of Nicaea only should be established, and that nothing should be undertaken previous to this." It urged that the condemnation of Dioscorus was inconsistent with the imperial promise; he and his bishops should therefore be again called to the council, and the present schism would be removed. Should however, the council decline to act thus, they (the Eutychians) declared that they would hold no communion with men who opposed the creed of the 318 fathers at Nicaea. At the same time, to prove their own orthodoxy, they appended their own signatures to that creed and to the Ephesian canon which confirmed it.

Aetius, archdeacon of Constantinople, now reminded these petitioners that church discipline required monks to accept from the bishops instructions in matters of faith; he pointed out to them that all those present held the confessions of faith approved at Nicaea and Ephesus as firmly as themselves, that the writings of Cyril and Leo were not to be taken as superseding, but as explaining the faith; and he called upon them to say out boldly whether they would assent to the present council or not. The commissioners joined in the explanation and appeal. Carosus fenced with it: "I have no need to anathematize Nestorius. I have spoken as much against him over and over again." "Then anathematize Eutyches," cried Aetius. "It is written," said Carosus, "judge not, and ye shall not be judged;" and then he turned upon Aetius, "Why are you talking, and the bishops sitting still?" Aetius persisted, "In the name of the council, I ask you, 'Do you assent to their decision or not?'" "I abide by the creed of Nicaea," answered Carosus; "condemn me and send me into exile. Paul hath taught me, 'If any man preach any other gospel unto you than that ye have received, let him be anathema' (A.V. accursed) (Gal. i. 8). If Eutyches doth not believe what the Catholic church believes, let him be anathema."

The appeal of Faustus and other anti-Eutychian archimandrites to the emperor already mentioned, was now ordered to be read. The Eutychian archimandrite, Dorotheus, immediately asserted the orthodoxy of Eutyches. The commissioners retorted, "Eutyches teaches that the body of the Redeemer is not of like substance to ours. What say you to that?" Dorotheus avoided a direct answer by quoting the language of the Constantinopolitan creed in this form, "Incarnate of the Virgin and made man," and interpreting it in an anti-Nestorian sense; but he declined to attest the language used on this point by Leo in his tome. The commissioners were now on the point of passing judgment when the Eutychians, who had refused a space for consideration of two days, asserted that the emperor had promised them an opportunity of fair debate with their opponents in his presence. It was necessary to ascertain the truth of this and the sitting of Oct. 17 ended.

On Oct. 20 the bishops and commissioners met again. Alexander, the priest and periodont (a visitor," see Suicer, Thesaur. i. n.), who had been deputed to see the emperor, informed the council that he and the decurion John had been sent by the emperor to the monks, with a message to the effect that, had he (the emperor) considered himself able to decide the point in dispute, he would not have convened a Council. "I now charge you," continued the emperor, "to attend the Council and learn from the what you do not yet know. For what the holy general council determines, that I follow, that rest in, and that I believe." The imperial language was greeted with loud acclamations, and the more impetuous spirits present wished to enforce at once against Carosus and the Eutychians the fourth and fifth canons of the Council of Antioch (341) which deposed bishop, priest, and deacon found guilty of persistent disobedience of schismatic worship. This the commissioners rightly refused. The Eutychians were granted thirty days' consideration, at the end of which they should still remain contumacious, they would be deprived of ecclesiastical rank and office. The matter does not appear to have been brought before the council again, but from Leo's correspondence (Epp. 136, 141, 142) it would seem that Carosus and Dorotheus persisted in their views and were ejected by Marcian from their monastery.

On Oct. 22, in the fifth session, the memorable "Definition of faith agreed upon at the council of Chalcedon" was recited and received with the unanimous cry, "This is the faith of the Fathers; this is the faith of the Apostles. We all assent to it. We all think thus." It was signed by the metropolitan and by the imperial commissioners, and instructions were given that it should be laid before the emperor.

The bearing of this "definition" upon Eutychianism may be briefly noticed. After declaring "the sufficiency of the wise and saving creed" of Nicaea and Constantinople, inasmuch as that creed taught "completely the perfect doctrine concerning the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit, and fully explained the Incarnation of the Lord to those who received it faithfully," it goes on to admit that some "dare to corrupt the mystery of the Lord's Incarnation, others (i. e. the Eutychians) being in a confusion and mixture (σβυχυσμὸς καὶ πρὶς), and absurdly imagine the nature of the Father and of the Godhead to be one, and teach the monstrous doctrine that the Divine nature of the Only-Begotten was a commixture capable of suffering." "Therefore the present holy, great, and oecumenical Council . . . has added for the confirmation of the orthodox doctrines, the letter of Leo written to Flavian for the removal of the evil opinions (κακὰ νοήματα) of Eutyches. For it is directed against those who attempt to rend the mystery of the Incarnation into a duad of two: it repels from the sacred congregation those who dare to say that the Divinity of the Only-Begotten is capable of suffering; it is opposed to those who imagine a mixture or confusion of the two natures of Christ: it drives away those who fancy that the form of a servant which was taken by Him of us, is of an heavenly or any other substance; and it condemns those who speak of two natures of the Lord before the union, and feign one after the union."

"We then," was the conclusion, "following the holy Fathers, all with one consent teach men to confess one and the same Son, one Lord Jesus Christ; the same perfect in Godhead and also perfect in manhood: truly God and truly man, of a reasonable soul and body; consubstantial with the Father according to the Godhead, and consubstantial with us according to the manhood; in all things like unto us without sin; begotten before all ages of the Father according to the Godhead, and in these latter days, for us and for our salvation, born of Mary, the Virgin Mother of God, according to the Manhood; one and the same Christ, Son, Lord, Only-Begotten, to be acknowledged in two natures, inconfusedly, unchangeably, indivisibly, inseparably (ἐν ἑνὶ ὄντι καὶ ὑποστάσει, ἀτρέπτως, ἀδιάσπῳ, ἀχωρίστως ὡς ἓν), the distinction of natures being by no means taken away by the union, but rather the property of each nature being preserved, and concurring in one person and one hypostasis, not parted or divided into two persons, but one and the same Son and Only-Begotten, God the Word, the Lord Jesus Christ, as the prophets from the beginning have declared concerning Him, and the Lord Jesus Christ Himself has taught us, and the creed of the holy Fathers has delivered to us."

"Writing, composing, devising, or teaching any other creed" was declared unlawful, with the following penalties: "bishops and clergy were to be deposed, monks and laymen anathematized."

On Oct. 25, Marcian, accompanied by Pulcheria and the court, opened and closed the sixth session. In his address he explained that he appeared in person, as Constantine had done before him, not to overawe and coerce any, but to strengthen and confirm the faith: his efforts and his prayers were alike directed to one end, that all might be one in true doctrine, hold the same religion, and honour the true Catholic faith. The arch-deacon Aetius recited in his presence the confession of faith approved at the previous session, and the question then put by the emperor: "Is the opinion of all expressed in the formula just read?" was answered by a shout from all sides, "This is the belief of us all! We are unanimous, and have signed it unanimously! We are all orthodox! This is the belief of the Fathers; this is the belief of the Apostles; this is the belief of the orthodox; this belief hath saved the world! Long live Marcian, the new Constantine, the new Paul, the new David! Long live Pulcheria, the new Helena!"

Three ordinances brought by the emperor, and referring to the conduct and treatment of refractory monks (such as the Eutychian), were afterwards incorporated in the canons of the council (iii. iv. lxx.); and they, together with canons viii. and xxiii. were probably found sufficient to repress for a time monks who went "to the royal city of Constantinople, and remaining there for a long time, raised seditions and disturbed the ecclesiastical state (xxiii.)."

Imperial edicts followed speedily after the close of the council (Nov. 1). One dated March 13, 452, was especially directed against the Eutychians. They had persisted in disseminating their "foolishness," in spite of the council and the emperor. Marcian now warned them that their contumacy would be sharply punished, and this warning was presently carried into effect. On July 28, Eutychians and Apollinarians were deprived of their priests, they were forbidden to hold meetings, or to live together in monasteries; they were to be considered incapable of either inheriting property under a will or devising such property to their co-sympathizers; they were to be reckoned unfit for military service. Eutychian priests who had seceded from their post in the church and the monks from Eutyches' own monastery were banished from Roman territory. Their writings were to be burnt, and the composer and circulator of such works was to be punished with confiscation of goods, and with exile. Dioscorus and Eutyches were exiled, but the latter died probably before the sentence was carried into effect.

"With none of those who have been the authors of heresies among Christians, was blasphemy the first intention; nor did they fall from the truth in a desire to dishonour the Deity, but rather from an idea which each entertained, that he should improve upon his predecessors by upholding such and such doctrines." These words of the church historian, Evagrius (i. ch. xi.) follow his account of the second (i.e. the Robber) synod of Ephesus, which restored Eutyches. They express the belief of a judicially-trained mind within little more than 100 years after the events in question, and they are in substance reproduced by "judicious" Hooker (Eccl. Pol. v. ch. 52). Cyril "had given instance in the body and soul of man no farther than only to enforce by example against Nestorius, that a visible and invisible, a mortal and an immortal substance, may united make one person." Eutyches and his followers took those words of Cyril, "as though it had been his drift to teach, that even as in us the body and the soul, so in Christ God and man make but one nature. . . . He became unsound (in belief) by denying the difference which still continueth between the one and the other nature." It was "real, though erring reverence" which led him, in the first instance, to broach his opinions. His "narrow mind, stiffened by seclusion, and bewildered by harassing excitement" (Bright) was in no state in the day of his trial before the synod of Constantinople, to perceive to what his teaching logically conducted, nor to accept the qualifications or paraphrases kindly offered. He passed away, but Eutychianism exists still (Pusey, Councils of the Church, p. 25). It never has and never will yield to edicts like those of Marcian. The right faith has been defined by the great council which opposed both it and Nestorianism. "We must therefore," in teaching ourselves and others, "keep warily a middle course, shunning both that distraction of Persons, wherein Nestorius went away, and also this latter confusion of natures, which deceived Eutyches" (Hooker).

EUTYCHETAE. [ENTYCHITAE.]

EUTYCHIA, April 1, confessor at Thessalonica, in the Diocletian persecution. She was brought before the president Dulcetius, with six other women. These last were all put to death by burning. She, being pregnant, was remanded to prison. Their Acts are extant in Symeon Metaphrastes, and Ruinart Acta Sincera, p. 392. [G. T. S.]

EUTYCHIANISTAE. Monophysites are so called by the emperor Justinian, in an edict dated "xv. kal. April." A.D. 541 (Novell. cxxxi. 14). The edict enacts that if any one of these heretics should dare to erect a place of worship, (speluncam suae incredulitatis) it should be taken possession of by the holy church of that place as its own property. The name is also applied to them elsewhere (e.g. Timotheus Presbyter, de Receptione Haeret. Migne, Patrol. Gr. lxxxvi. pt. i. 41). [T. W. D.]

EUTYCHIANUS (1), Numidian bishop, addressed Cyp. Ep. 70; Ep. Syn. Carth. sub Cyp. de Bapt. Haer. 1. [E. W. B.]

EUTYCHIANUS (2), saluted by the martyr-bishops in the mines, Cyp. Ep. 79. [E. W. B.]

EUTYCHIANUS (3), bishop of Rome from January A.D. 275 to December A.D. 283, during a period of 8 years 11 months and 3 days, and buried in the cemetery of Callistus. These are the facts about him given in the Liberian catalogue, and comprise all that can be relied on. The truth of the record has been confirmed by the discovery by De Rossi (Rom. Scot. ii. 70), in the papal crypt of the cemetery of fragments of a slab inscribed EYTYXIANOC EPIC (Eutychianus episcopus). In the Liber Pontificalis he is said to have been martyred, and as a saint and martyr he is honoured on Dec. 1 in the Roman Calendar. But his claim to the latter title is disproved by the silence on the subject of the earliest known recension of the Lib. Pont., the Felician catalogue, and by his name occurring in the Liberian Depositio Episcoporum, not in the Depositio Martyrum. The Felician catalogue speaks of him as "nacione tuscus, ex patre marino," and says that he appointed the blessing of fruits upon the altar, and that he buried 462 martyrs. The later editions of the Pontifical record add that it was beans and grapes only that he ordered to be blessed upon the altar, that it was with his own hand that he buried so many martyrs, and that he ordered that no martyr should be buried without a dalmatic or a purple colobium. Two spurious decretals are attributed to him. One is to the Bishops of Baetica, directing the offering at the altar, and benediction there, of grapes and beans, but of other fruits at the house of the priest, and containing a long disquisition about the two natures in Christ. The other is to the Church of Sicily, regulating and controlling accusations and proceedings against the clergy, with a view to their protection and immunity. Ten decreta also appear as his in the collections of Gratian, Ivo, and others. [J. B—y.]

EUTYCHIANUS (4), the first bishop of Basti (Baza) of whom any record remains; signs the acts of the Council of Eliberi, A.D. 305. The see of Basti, one of the ancient suffragans of Toledo, may probably claim almost equal antiquity with that of Acci. The two towns are only twenty-six miles apart, and were in 1489 made one bishopric by Ferdinand and Isabella. The last bishop of Basti under the old order whose name remains is Servandus in the 10th century. (Esp. Sagr. vii. 84; Aguirre-Catalani, ii. 30.) [M. A. W.]

EUTYCHIANUS (5), bishop of Amasea. [EUTYCHIUS (6).]

EUTYCHIANUS (6), a monk who had his abode in the mountain range of Olympus separating Phrygia from Bithynia, and who gained there a great reputation, owing to the many miracles he was said to perform. He lived in the time of Constantine, and, though an adherent of the Novatian party, he appears to have enjoyed the confidence and respect of that emperor Socrates, in his Eccl. History (i. 13), has preserved one of his famous deeds, which illustrates the growth of that influence by which the clergy came at last to assert their superiority to the civil power. One of the imperial bodyguard had entered into a conspiracy against the emperor, being detected had taken to flight. He was apprehended in Mount Olympus, and put in prison with a view to execution. The people of the neighbourhood, compassionating his sufferings, flocked to Eutychianus, entreating that he would procure the prisoner's release. He at once promised to set out for Constantinople. It was represented to him that the sufferings of the prisoner were so great that he was in danger of death before he could be either executed or released. Eutychianus sent to the gaolers, requesting that the prisoner might be set free. He was answered that it could not be done except at the peril of their lives. Hereupon he took a friend with him, a young Novatian priest, the same who afterwards told Socrates the story, went to the prison, and demanded the prisoner. He was refused; then the gates of the prison spontaneously opened, and when Eutychianus and his friend Auxanion entered, the fetters immediately fell from the prisoner. Eutychianus set out without delay for Constantinople to report what had happened, and the emperor, in the great reverence he owed him, granted him his request with a willing mind."

EUTYCHIANUS (7), bishop of Patara in Lycia, celebrated for its temple of Apollo; one of the forty bishops who at the synod of Seleucia, B.C. 325, signed the heretical formula of faith drawn up by Acacius of Caesarea and George of Alexandria. (Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 977; Mansi, iii. 321.)

EUTYCHIANUS (8), prefect of the praetorian guards at Constantinople and prefect of the East, in which capacity an edict was addressed to him by Arcadius, July 13, 399, commanding him to take measures for the destruction of any pagan temples still remaining in Phoenicia (Cod. Theod. xvi. 10, c. 16, p. 283). This sentence was obtained through the influence of Chrysostom. (Theod. H. E. v. 29.) The name of Eutychianus appears among the witnesses authenticating the correctness of the inventory of the church goods presented after the conflagration by Germanus and Cassianus. (Phil. Dial. p. 27.) An edict was addressed to Eutychianus, dated Nov. 18, A.D. 404, commanding him to expel from the churches all those who refused to communicate with Arsacius, Theophilus, and Porphyry, and to prevent their going for worship elsewhere. (Cod. Theod. xvi. c. 4, c. 6, p. 103.)

[E. V.]

EUTYCHIANUS (9), bishop of Epiphania in Syria Secunda. He was present at the fourth general council at Chalcedon, A.D. 451. (Mansi, ii. 570; Le Quien, Or. Christ. ii. 917.)

[J. de S.]

EUTYCHIANUS (10), bishop of Baris, a town of uncertain position in the ecclesiastical province of the Hellespont. In the sixth session of the Council of Chalcedon, 451, Diogenes of Syra, his metropolitan, subscribed his name in his absence to the definition of the faith. (Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 769; Mansi, vii. 164.)

EUTYCHIANUS (11), first bishop of Daras in Armenia; also called Justiniana Nova, in Mesopotamia, near the confines of Persia. In

506 Thomas bishop of Amida having been employed by the emperor Anastasius in fortifying Daras, set some of his clergy to superintend the works, and among them the presbyter Eutychianus, who became the first bishop of the city. He was succeeded by Thomas of Rhaesina. (Assemani, Bibl. Or. ii. 58, from the Syriac Eccles. Hist. of Zacharias of Melitene in Armenia; Le Quien, Or. Chr. ii. 998.) [C. H.]

EUTYCHIANUS (12), a cleric of the episcopal church of Adana in Cilicia, one of the household, and a constant companion of St. Theophilus, the oeconomus or vice-dominus of that church A.D. 538. There is attributed to him a History of the Repentance and Conversion of St. Theophilus, the Greek MS. of which is described by Lambecius among those in the imperial library of Vienna (Lambec. Comment. de Biblioth. Cues. Vindob. ed. Kollar. lib. viii. cod. 11, num. 9, p. 156). Lambecius bestows much pains in sustaining the genuineness of the work, which has been doubted. A Latin translation by Paulus Diaconus of Naples is given by Surius and the Bollandists (Sur. de Probat. Hist. SS. tom. i. Feb. 4, p. 39; Boll. Acta SS. 4 Feb. i. 483; Cave, Hist. Lit. i. 519).

EUTYCHIUS (1), bishop of Melitene. [EUTYPSYCHIUS (2).]

EUTYCHIUS (2) I., sixteenth bishop of Syracuse in the third century, between Abraham and Arthemius. He died, and was buried at Palermo (Pirri, Sicilia Sacra, i. 600). [C. H.]

EUTYCHIUS (3) II., eighteenth bishop of Syracuse, between Arthemius and Chrestus III. cir. A.D. 303. He is said to have administered the Eucharist to the celebrated St. Lucia of Syracuse at her martyrdom (Pirri, Sic. Sacr. i. 601).

[C. H.]

EUTYCHIUS (4) III., twenty-fifth bishop of Syracuse, between Julianus and Januarius, cir. 500 (Pirri, Sic. Sac. i. 605). [C. H.]

EUTYCHIUS (5), bishop of Seleucia Ferrea in Pisidia, one of the Nicene fathers, A.D. 325. (Mansi, ii. 695; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 1053.)

EUTYCHIUS (6) (EUTYCHIANUS), bishop of Amasea, in the district of Helenopontus, in the province of Pontus Polemoniacus, A.D. 325; present at the council of Nicaea. (Mansi, ii. 694 d; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 525.) He is especially connected with the martyr-bishop of Amasea, his predecessor, Basilus or Basileus [BASILUS, Vol. I. p. 298], who in his last letter to the church of Amasea (Baronius, 316, xxii.) had expressed a hope that Eutychius the son of Callistratus should be named his successor.

[F. A.]

EUTYCHIUS (7), bishop of Smyrna, one of the fathers of Nicaea, A.D. 325. (Mansi, ii. 695 a; Le Quien, Or. Chr. i. 741.) [C. H.]

EUTYCHIUS (8), bishop of Satala. [EUTYTHIUS.]

EUTYCHIUS (9), bishop of Philippopolis in Thracia. Signed the epistle of the Eusebian bishops to the African church, A.D. 344. (Mansi, iii. 139, and Le Quien, Or. Christ. i. 1156.)

[J. de S.]

EUTYCHIUS (10), a bishop of an unnamed see who signed the acts of the council of Sardica, A.D. 347 (Athanas. Apolog. adv. Arian. c. iii. § 50.) [E. V.]

EUTYCHIOS (11), occurs in the Chronicon of Jerome, sub ann. 349, as the first of the bishops intruded by the Acacians into the see of Jerusalem after the deposition of Cyril by Acacius. He is mentioned by no other authority. Tillemont (Mém. Eccl. vi. 425) suggests that he may have been the same with Eutychius, bishop of Eleutheropolis [EUTYCHIUS (13)]. See Tillemont's note on the intruded bishops of Jerusalem, viii. 782. [E. V.]

EUTYCHIUS (12), a bishop deposed at the same time as Acacius, by the semi-Arian faction at Seleucia, A.D. 359 (Socr. H. E. ii. 40.) [E. V.]

355 EUTYCHIUS (13), bishop of Eleutheropolis (Hebron), in Palaestina Prima. He succeeded Theophilus on his translation to Castabali in Cilicia. Eutychius had been brought up in the orthodox faith under Maximus, bishop of Jerusalem, but the enmity he conceived for Maximus's successor, Cyril, led him to attach himself to Cyril's bitter enemy, Acacius of Caesarea, and to profess his theological views. At the synod of Seleucia, 359, he signed Acacius's semi-Arian formula (Mansi, iii. 322). After the condemnation of Athanasius by the Eusebian synod at Milan, 385, Eusebius of Vercellae, one of the three bishops who nobly refused to sign the sentence, was banished to Eleutheropolis, where he was subsequently joined by his fellow confessor to the truth, Lucifer of Cagliari, whose original place of exile had been Germanicia. Eutychius is charged with having treated both the bishops with violence and contumely. It is asserted that when Lucifer was celebrating the holy communion with a handful of orthodox believers, the doors being closed, Eutychius forcibly broke the door down, and interrupted the sacred rite, carrying off the sacred vessels and books, and dispersing the communicants. (Marcell. et Faustin. Liber Precum ad Theodosium, p. 89.) Epiphanius charges him with being a Catholic at heart, but concealing his belief for the sake of retaining his bishopric. This he seems to have done till his death, although he was excommunicated and deposed by the party opposed to him at Seleucia. In A.D. 363 he signed the synodal letter of the bishops assembled at Antioch, including Meletius, Acacius, and Eusebius of Samosata to the emperor Jovian, on the consubstantiality of the Divine Word. (Socr. H. E. iii. 25; Labbe, ii. 828.) Jerome speaks of Eutychius having been one of Epiphanius's hearers "in monasterio," while the latter was still a presbyter, i.e. before A.D. 368 (Hieron. Epist. ad Pammach. 61; i. 660; Epiphani. Haeres. lxxiii. No. 23-27.) [EUTYCHIUS (11)]. [E. V.]

EUTYCHIUS (14) (TYCHICUS), bishop of Erythrae in the province of Asia, present at the council of Ephesus A.D. 431. (Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 727; Mansi, iv. 1156, 1215.) [L. D.]

EUTYCHIOS (15), bishop of Hadrianopolis in Vetus Epirus, present both at the second council of Ephesus, "the Latrocinium," A.D. 449 (Mansi, vi. 929), and at the oecumenical council of Chal-cedon, 451. (Mansi, vii. 124; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. ii. 141.) [L. D.]

EUTYCHIUS (16), bishop of Trani, present at the fifth and sixth Roman synods under pope Symmachus in 503 and Oct. 504, according to the reckoning of Dahn (Die Könige der Germanen), who accepts, with a slight alteration, the arrangement of Hefele, § 220. See Mansi viii. 299 and 315. All subscriptions to the fifth synod must be received with caution. [A. H. D. A.]

EUTYCHIUS (17), bishop of Como, 525 Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Italia, xi. 525; Ughelli Ital. Sacr. v. 260.) [A. H. D. A.]

EUTYCHIOS (18), ST., patriarch of Constantinople. His biography, composed by his chaplain Eustathius, has been preserved entire [EUSTATHIUS (4)].

Eutychius was born at Theium in Phrygia circ. A.D. 512. His father Alexander was a general under Belisarius; his mother's name was Synesia. It is not clear whether it was to Constantinople or to Augustopolis, an episcopal city in Phrygia, that he went at the age of twelve to study under the care of his grandfather Hesychius, a presbyter and the treasurer of the cathedral. After his education was finished, he thought of becoming a monk; but the bishop of Amasea, in Helenopontus, hearing of it entered him among his clergy, and made him pass through all the degrees of the ministry intending him even for the episcopate. The bishop afterwards changed his mind, and Eutychius assumed the monastic habit at Amasea, the age of thirty, circ. A.D. 542.

At some council that was being held at Constantinople, towards the end of the patriarchate of Mennas, Eutychius, then archimandrite, attended as apocrisarius for the bishop of Amasea, who was ill. Eustathius calls this council the fifth of Constantinople; but this did not commence until 553, when Mennas was dead. Perhaps we are to understand some preliminary gathering held in preparation for the archimandrite had the honour of being lodged at the palace of the patriarch, and won his esteem that Mennas begged him not to leave him, and pointed him out to his clergy with the words, "That man will be my successor." Eutychius earned the admiration of the emperor also. One day, in a conference before Justinian, the question was discussed whether the living could pass sentence on the dead. Eutychius supported the affirmative, quoting the example of Josiah, who dug up the bones of the worshippers of the golden calf and burnt them. This opinion suiting the emperor and clergy, Eutychius was loaded with honours and became an intimate of the imperial court. Mennas died in 552, probably on August 1st, and while his body lay in state Justinian nominated Eutychius to an assembly of the senate and clergy for the patriarchate.

At the beginning of 553 Eutychius wrote pope Vigilius who was then at Rome, making his profession of the catholic faith, declaring his acceptance of the four councils and the letter of St. Leo, and requesting Vigilius to preside over the council that was to be held on the question of the Three Chapters. Vigilius refused and Eutychius shared the first place in the assembly with the patriarchs Apollinarius of Alexandria and Domnus of Antioch. In conjunction with these he even went so far as to write Vigilius again to the second session, but the pope excused himself on the ground of ill-health. The subscription of Eutychius to the Acts of this synod, which sat from May 5 to June 2, 553, is a summary of the decrees against the Three Chapters.

The next important event in the patriarchate of Eutychius was his violent collision in 564 with Justinian, when this emperor adopted the tenets of the Aphthartodocetæ. Eutychius, in a long address, demonstrated the incompatibility of that theory with Scripture; but Justinian insisted on his subscribing to it, and finding him uncompromising, ordered his arrest.

On Jan. 22, 565, Eutychius was celebrating the fast-day of St. Timothy in the church adjoining the Hormisdas palace (cf. Du Cange, Cpōlis. Gr. lib. ii. p. 96, lib. iv. p. 93, ed. 1729) and was at the holy table, engaged in the communion service, when an officer with a band of soldiers broke into the patriarchal residence, and at length entered the church, and carried the patriarch away. Eutychius was first taken to a monastery called Choracondia, and on the following day to that of St. Osias near Chalcedon.

The eighth day after this outrage, Justinian called an assembly of princes and prelates, to which he summoned Eutychius. The charges against him were trifling and absurd: that he used ointments, that he ate delicate meats, that he prayed long. Cited thrice, Eutychius replied that he would only come if he were to be judged canonically, in his own dignity, and in command of his clergy. Condemned by default, he was sent to an island in the Propontis named Princes. He landed at night in a storm, and was comforted in the morning by the circumstance that the first thing on which his eyes rested was a cross painted on the wall with the inscription, "Christ is with you: stand firm," a charm against earthquakes. He was next sent to his old monastery at Amasea, where he spent twelve years and five months.

Eustathius relates many wonderful works performed by Eutychius in his exile, all acts of healing, and possibly both the diseases and the cures are true but exaggerated.

On the death of Joannes Scholasticus, whom Justinian had put in the patriarchal chair, the people of Constantinople loudly demanded the return of Eutychius. Justinian was dead, Justin II. had succeeded, and had associated with himself the young Tiberius. The emperors immediately sent an honourable deputation to Amasea to bring back Eutychius, even if he were unwilling; but his joy was great, and, having blessed the monastery and people, he returned to Constantinople. There an immense concourse met him, shouting aloud, "Blessed is he that cometh in the name of the Lord," and "Glory to God in the highest, on earth peace." In questionable imitation of our Lord he entered the city on an ass's colt, over garments spread on the ground, the crowd carrying palms, dancing and singing. The whole city was illuminated, public banquets were held, new buildings inaugurated. Next day he was met by the two emperors with conspicuous honour at the church of the Virgin in Blachernæ. He then proceeded to the Great Church, which was filled from end to end, mounted the pulpit, and blessed the multitude. He afterwards distributed the communion during the space of six hours, as all wished to receive the elements from his own hands. The date of his restoration was October, 577.

On Sept. 26, 578, in the lifetime of Justin, Tiberius was crowned by Eutychius (Zonar. Annal. lib. xiv. § 11; Du Cange, Fam. August. p. 85), and on Oct. 5 Justin died. Theophanes makes the mistake of describing Eutychius as offering prayer on the occasion of the association of Tiberius in the empire, whereas he was not recalled till afterwards.

Towards the end of his life Eutychius maintained in a book on the resurrection, now lost, that after the resurrection the body will be more subtle than air, and no longer palpable. Gregory the Great, then residing at Constantinople as delegate of the Roman church, felt himself bound to oppose this opinion. Gregory leant on Luke xxiv. 39, "Handle me and see; for a spirit hath not flesh and bones, as ye see me have." Eutychius said this was a sign granted to prove the Resurrection to the Apostles. Gregory replied that it would be a curious sign if it was to give us a doubt. Eutychius answered that though the Body might be palpable then, it grew more subtle after. Christ being raised dieth no more, rejoined Gregory (Rom. vi. 9). Flesh and blood shall not inherit the kingdom of God, answered Eutychius (1 Cor. xv. 50). Flesh, responded Gregory, has two meanings in Scripture, human nature, and sin's corruption. The result of the discussion was that each adhered to his own opinion. The emperor Tiberius talked to the disputants separately, and tried to reconcile them; but the breach was persistent. Finally, the emperor ordered the book to be burnt. It happened immediately afterwards that both Eutychius and Gregory fell ill. Gregory recovered, but Eutychius died. He was visited by the emperor on his deathbed, and gave him his blessing. He breathed his last quietly on Sunday after Easter Day, April 5, 582, at the age of seventy. Some of his friends told Gregory that, a few minutes before his end, he touched the skin of his hand, saying, "I confess that in this flesh we shall rise again." This was probably compatible with his previous view, but at any rate Gregory availed himself of this excuse to leave the matter alone (Paul. Diac. Vit. Greg. Mag. lib. i. capp. 9, 27-30; Vit. Greg. ex ejus Script. lib. i. cap. 5, §§ 6-8; Greg. Mag. Moral. xiv. § 72-74).

The chronology of his life here followed is that fixed by Henschen in his introductory argument to the life by Eustathius (Boll. Acta SS. 6 Ap. i. 550).

The literary remains of Eutychius are his Letter to pope Vigilius already mentioned, printed in Greek and Latin by Mansi (ix. 186), and by Migne (Pat. Lat. lxxix. 63; Pat. Gr. lxxxvi. 2401), and some fragments of a Discourse on Easter and the Holy Eucharist. One portion of this, in Greek, was first published by Mai in his Classici Auctores (x. 488); two more, in Greek, afterwards appeared in his Script. Vet. Nova Collect. (ix. 623). The set of fragments, which Mai also discovered in a Cutena on St.

Luke by Nicetas, he collected under the above title, adding a Latin translation, in his Biblioth. Nov. (t. iv. p. 54), and this was reprinted by Migne, Patrol. Graec. lxxxvi. 2391). In this treatise Eutychius argues against the Quartodecimans, against the Hydroparastatae who used water only instead of wine at communion (he says that the only apostolic tradition is the mixture of both), against certain schismatic Armenians who used only wine, and against some Greeks and Armenians who adored the elements as soon as they were offered and before consecration. The lost work of Eutychius was a discourse on the manner of existence of reasonable natures in space, a sort of physical theory of the future life. It is mentioned in a treatise of Eustratius of Constantinople (De Vita Functorum Statu, cap. 14), who says the object of the work was to prove that the soul is not liable to corruption. The title, which is all that survives, runs, περί τῶν ἐν τόπῳ κατὰ δεύτερον λόγον ἐκσιωδῶς γινόμενων λογικῶν καὶ νοερῶν, which Allatius translates De iis qui secundo modo natura sua fiunt in loco, notione videlicet et sola mente praeditis. The Greek and Latin are to be found in Leo Allatius (De Utriusque Ecclesiae de Purgat. Consens. p. 433), and the Latin alone in La Bigne, Max. Bdd. Patr. xvii. 433.

The Life by Eustathius was in the Venetian Library, and was edited by Lipomanus, Surinus, and Petrus Franciscus Zinus. Another copy was in the possession of Queen Christina of Sweden, and had belonged to Paulus Rhamnusius.

Eutychius was celebrated as a saint by the Greeks on April 6. His name is found in the Metrical Ephemeris and in the Muscovite Tables. The emperor Basil's Menology has a short biography of him. Molanus mentions him in his Auctarium Usuardi.

(Patr. Graec. lxxxix. §§ 2270–2389; Bolland. AA. SS. Ap. i. 548; Ib. App. p. lix. in Greek; Surinus, de Prob. Hist. SS. Apr. p. 82; Evagr. iv. 37; Theoph. Chronogr. 193, 201, 202, 203, 210, 211, 212, 213; Cave, i. 527.) [W. M. S.]

EUTYCHIUS (19), bishop of Tyndarium (on the north coast of Sicily), is encouraged by Gregory the Great (Lib. iii. indict. xi. Epist. 62, Migne, lxxvii. 659), to persevere in the conversion of "quosdam idolorum cultores atque Angeliorum dogmatis." [A. H. D. A.]

EUTYCHIUS (20), bishop of Melos in the Aegean, present at the sixth general council, A.D. 680. (Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 945; Mansi, xi. 616.) [L. D.]

EUTYCHIUS (21), Aug. 24, legendary disciple of St. John the Apostle. He was born at Sebastopolis. Basil's Menology strangely represents Eutychius as joining St. Paul and suffering with him after the death of St. John. According to the same, he was flung into a furnace, from which he escaped unhurt, and after visiting St. John's flock at Ephesus, returned to his own city, where he died, according to Molanus, by a martyr's death. [G. T. S.]

EUTYCHIUS (22), presbyter and martyr, by some commemorated on April 15, by others on May 15, and by them named Eutitius. He lived at Ferentinum, an ancient episcopal city of Etruria, where he suffered, either about A.D. 269 or else during the Diocletian persecution, in company with the bishop Dionysius. His memory has been celebrated by Gregory the Great in his Dialog. lib. iii. c. 38, where it is related how the martyr appeared to Redemptus bishop of Ferentinum and foretold the horrors of the Lombard invasion. St. Gregory assures us that he had this story from St. Redemptus himself, who lived in his own time. The vision appeared in 560. The Lombard invasion took place in 566. Gregory wrote his Dialogues in 593. (Rom. Mart. Apr. 15; Boll. Acta SS. Ap. ii. 378.) J. S. Assemani in his De Sanctis Ferentinis (1745) has an exhaustive dissertation on this saint, his name, church, and festival, distinguishing him from other saints of the same name. [G. T. S.]

EUTYCHIUS (23), Feb. 4, martyr at Rome under Maximian, A.D. 304. He was buried in the cemetery of Callistus, where his tomb was afterwards ornamented by pope Damasus, cir. 384. [DAMASUS.] In Acta SS. Boll. Feb. i. 458, will be found a copy of an inscription on a marble tablet, erected to the memory of the martyr in the church of St. Sebastian, wherein Damasus laid down a marble pavement. (Ferrarius, Catal. SS.) [G. T. S.]

EUTYCHIUS (24), son of Polyuctus of Melitene, an Armenian martyr under the president Antiochus, A.D. 311, Maximian being emperor. (Baron. Annal. 311, xxi.) [G. T. S.]

EUTYCHIUS (25), Jan. 20, martyr with Bassus, Eusebius, and Basilides, in the Diocletian persecution. They held a high position in some one of the imperial households, where they were so impressed by the courage and steadfastness of a martyr, Theopemptus, that they too embraced the faith, for which they suffered in various ways. Eutychius was bound to four stakes which being allowed to rebound, tore him into pieces. (Bas. Men.) [G. T. S.]

EUTYCHIUS (26), A.D. 356, subdeacon of Alexandria, martyred by the Arians in the persecution of the Alexandrian church. This account is given of him by Athanasius: "Imitating the Scythians, the Arians seized Eutychius, a subdeacon, who honourably served the church; and when they had got him beaten on the back with bulls' hides almost to the point of death, they demanded that he should be sent to the mines not any mere chance mines, but in particular those that are called Phaeno, where a condemned homicide would be unable to live more than a few days. And, what is still more extraordinary they would not allow him even a few hours to be healed of his wounds, but got him sent out on the road forthwith, saying, that if that were done he would tremble and join them. But he had not gone far when, prevented by the pain of his wounds from reaching the mines, he died on the way. He died rejoicing, for he had gained the glory of martyrdom; but the impious persecutors not even then were touched with shame but as it is written, 'having cruel bowels,' after accomplishing this crime, again devised a deed of Satanic darkness. For when there came supplicants from the people to beg pity for Eutychius they ordered four excellent men of free birth to be arrested, one of whom was Hermias, who was to wash the feet of beggars; these the general crowd to be heavily scourged and thrown into prison. But the Arians, more heartless even than Scythians, seeing that they did not die of the pain of the beating, began to expostulate and threaten. We shall write, cried they, to the emperors, and tell them that you did not flog them to our taste. Frightened at these words, he was obliged to scourge them again. During the punishment, knowing why they were beaten, and of whom they had been slandered, 'It is for the truth,' they said, 'that we are beaten; we do not communicate with heretics; flog on as you will, you will be judged by God for this.' That was all they said. The persecutors wished them to be imprisoned till death released them; but the people of God, watching their opportunity, begged mercy for them; and after seven days or more they were dismissed." (Athanas. Opp. pars I, p. 300 in Patr. Graec. xxvi. 765; AA. SS. Bolland. 26 Mart. iii. p. 620.)

[W. M. S.]

EUTYCHIUS (27), a Spaniard by birth, and a martyr A.D. 437 with three others, Arcadius, Prudentius, and Paschasius, during the Vandal persecution in Africa. Refusing to join in communion with the Arians, they were put to death. (Prosper. Aquit. Chron. p. 746. Patr. Lat. li. 597; Baronii Annal. A.D. 437, i.)

[G. T. S.]

EUTYCHIUS (28), a leading person among the Quartodecimans of Philadelphia in Lydia, prevailed upon in 431, by the Nestorian Jacobus, to seek from bishop Theophanes a restoration to church communion. He also signed the symbol of Jacobus. (Labbe, Conc. iii. 675, 678, 681.) [CHARMIUS (1).]

[T. W. D.]

EUTYCHIUS (29), one of the ἀρχιμανδριτικοὶ δάξιοι, as they called themselves, who, aided by Carosus, made an appeal to the emperor Marcian in the Eutychian interest in A.D. 451, asking for a general council (Labbe, iv. 334). The orthodox archimandrites, sitting in the council of Chalcedon before their Eutychian brethren were summoned, would not recognise him as an archimandrite, but described him as belonging to the Basilica of Celerius or Celestina. (Labbe, iv. 518.)

[C. G.]

EUTYCHIUS (30), of Constantinople, founder of sect. [EUNOMIEUTYCHIANI.]

EUTYCHIUS (31), a holy man in the district of Syria, who was called to be abbat of a monastery in his neighbourhood. For a quaint and amusing story of him and his friend Florentius see Greg. Magn. Dial. lib. iii. cap. 15; Migne, lxxvi. 249. (Mabil'lon, Acta SS. O. S. B. i. 120.)

[A. H. D. A.]

EUTYCHIUS (32), a prefect, bearer of a letter of pope Gregory the Great, who calls him "vir magnificus," to Ciridanus, May 602. (Greg. Mag. Epp. lib. xii. ind. v. ep. 34; Patr. Lat. lxxvii. 1244.)

[C. H.]

EUTYCHIUS (33), the last known exarch of Ravenna. His predecessor Paul, who had been elected by the emperor to take or kill the pope in account of his resistance to the Iconoclastic emperor, had been killed, A.D. 727, in an engagement at Ravenna between his own followers and the supporters of image worship. The emperor then sent the patrician and eunuch Eutychius (who had been formerly exarch according to Anastas. Liber Pontif. Greg. ii. § 185, but it does not appear when) to Naples to carry out his designs against pope Gregory II. Eutychius sent a subordinate to Rome to take the pope's life, who was discovered, and whom the Romans desired to kill, but the pope restrained them. They then anathematized the exarch, and told him that they would willingly die for their pope. Eutychius tried to bribe the Lombard king Liutprand and the dukes to combine with him against the pope, but in vain. After this he probably went to Ravenna. The chronology of the events is here uncertain, but probably, before 729, Ravenna was attacked by Liutprand, Classis destroyed, and the town ultimately taken by his nephew Hildebrand and Peredeus duke of Vicenza. The exarch fled to Venice, and Gregory II. wrote to the doge Ursus, and to Antoninus patriarch of Grado, in the following remarkable words, "ut ad pristinum statum sanctae Reipublicae in Imperiali servitio dominorum filiorumque nostrorum Leonis et Constantini magnorum Imperatorum ipsa revocetur Ravennatum civitas." A Venetian fleet under the doge at once went to Ravenna. Hildebrand was captured, Peredeus killed, and Eutychius reinstated. At this time we are told the army of Ravenna and the Venetians, in the fervour of their faith as image-worshippers, would have elected another emperor if the pope had not forbidden them. (Andreas Danduli Chronicon, iii. 2-5 in Muratori, SS. xii. 135; Johannis Chron. Venetum in Pertz, Monum. vii. 12; Paulus Diaconus, vi. 54.)

In 729 Eutychius entered into friendly relations with Liutprand, and they combined for an expedition to the south, Eutychius to take Rome, Liutprand to subdue the dukes of Benevento and Spoleto. The dukes submitted, and the combined forces appeared before Rome. At this critical moment Gregory appeared in Liutprand's camp, and induced him to submit to the church. At the king's request the pope consented to be reconciled to the exarch, and when Tiberius Petasius, an usurper, rebelled against the empire in Tuscany, the pope sent assistance with the forces of Eutychius against him. Tiberius was defeated, and his head sent to Constantinople. (Vita Greg. II. in Liber Pontificalis, Migne, cxxviii. 981-983.)

With Gregory III. (731-741) the next pope, Eutychius was on friendly terms, and sent him six columns of onyx. These were placed in St. Peter's, and adorned with figures of Christ, the Apostles, and other saints; doubtless as a protest against the Iconoclasts. In 743 Liutprand began pressing upon the exarchate, and when he was preparing to besiege Ravenna, Eutychius and John the archbishop sent to ask help from pope Zacharias. The pope sent an embassy to Liutprand in vain, went to Ravenna where he was warmly received by the exarch and the people, and then went on to the court of Pavia. The king submitted, and agreed to restore to the empire the conquests he had made. After this we have no further certain knowledge of Eutychius. In 749 king Rachis is pressing upon the Pentapolis, and in 751 king Astolph dates a diploma at the palace of Ravenna; 751 is therefore the approximate date of the fall of the exarchate, and it is generally assumed, though without any special evidence, that Eutychius was exarch to the end. (Troya, Cod. Dipl. No. 645, iv. 382; Vita Greg. III. and Zach. in Anast. Liber Pontificalis in Pat. Lat. cxxviii. 1025, 1051-1057; Ersch und Gruber, Encycl. "Exarch und Exarchat," xxxix. 1, pp. 325-327; Gregorovius, Gesch. der Stadt Rom. ii. 232, 247, 259.) [A. H. D. A.]

EUTYCHIUS (34), martyr. [EUSTATHIUS (32).]

EUXITHEUS, bishop of Thessalonica, addressed on September 1, A.D. 457, by pope Leo the Great, in his 150th letter (formerly 119th). He urges him and three other bishops to be courageous against the Eutychians, assuring them that such conduct will confirm the goodwill of the emperor Patricius. (Leo Mag. Epist. cl. Patr. Lat. liv. 1119; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. ii. 34; Ceillier, x. 233.) [W. M. S.]

EUZOIUS, Arian bishop of Antioch, appointed by the influence of Constantius after the deposition of Meletius, A.D. 361. Euzoius was the companion and intimate friend of Arius from an early age. He was one of the eleven presbyters and deacons of that church, deposed together with Arius by Alexander, bishop of Alexandria, c. A.D. 320 (Socr. H. E. i. 6; Soz. H. E. i. 15; Theod. H. E. i. 4; ii. 311; Athanas. de Syn. p. 907). He was again condemned and banished, together with Arius, by the council of Nicaea, A.D. 325. When Arius was recalled from banishment, and summoned to the emperor's side in A.D. 330, he was accompanied by Euzoius, who by this time had been advanced to the presbyterate. They both regained the emperor's confidence by an evasive declaration of their faith and a professed acceptance of the creed of Nicaea (Socr. H. E. i. 25, 26; Soz. H. E. ii. 27). He accompanied Arius to Jerusalem at the great gathering of Eusebian bishops for the dedication of the church of the Anastasia, Sept. 13, A.D. 335, and with him was received into communion by the council then held (Soz. H. E. ii. 27; Athan. de Synod. p. 891). In A.D. 361 Constantius, having banished Meletius bishop of Antioch, summoned Euzoius from Alexandria, and commanded the bishops of the province to consecrate him. Athanasius, who calls him by the opprobrious name of "the Canaanite" (Athan. Hist. Arian. p. 858), states that he was subsequently deposed. If so, the deposition took no effect (Socr. H. E. ii. 44; Theod. H. E. ii. 27; Philost. H. E. v. 5; Athan. de Syn. p. 907). A few months later Constantius, having while in the east been seized with the fever which put an end to his life, on Nov. 3, A.D. 361, summoned the newly-appointed bishop Euzoius to his bedside, and received from his hands the sacrament of baptism. Whether this took place at Antioch or at Mopsucrene, in Cilicia, is uncertain (Athan. de Synod. 907; Philost. H. E. vi. 5). On the accession of Valens Euzoius was urged by Eudoxius to convene a synod of bishops at Antioch to take off Aetius's sentence. Euzoius replied that it was the part of Eudoxius himself to take the initiative. He, however, ultimately yielded to Eudoxius's importunity, c. A.D. 364 (Philost. H. E. vii. 5). On the death of Athanasius in A.D. 373, Euzoius was, at his own petition, despatched by Valens with Magnus the imperial treasurer, and a force of troops to instal the imperial nominee, the Arias Laicius of Samosata, in the room of Peter the duly elected and enthroned bishop. This commission was carried out with shameless brutality and persecution of the orthodox (Socr. H. E. iv. 21; Theod. iv. 21, 22). Euzoius's death is placed by Socrates in A.D. 376, and is said to have taken place at Constantinople (Socr. H. E. iv. 35). Jerome (in Lucif. c. vi. p. 144) seems to assert that he lived into the reign of Theodosius. This is improbable, and the passage is probably corrupt. (Le Quien, Or. Chr. ii. 713; Baron. Ann. ad ann. 325. lxxix.; 335, xlix.) [E. V.]

EUZOIUS, bishop of Caesarea in the latter half of the 4th century. On the death of Acacius, A.D. 366, Cyril of Jerusalem had influence enough to secure the appointment of his nominee, Philumenus, to the vacant see. A rival bishop, however, was speedily appointed by Cyril's bitter enemy, Eutychius of Scythopolis, called by Epiphanius (whose historical statements must be received with caution) Cyril "the Elder." Philumenus having disappeared from the stage, Cyril nominated his sister's son, Gelasius, to the bishopric, who in his turn was forced to make room for Euzoius, appointed by semi-Arian influence. (Epiphan. Haeres. lxxiii. No. 37.) Euzoius held his see against his rivals during the reign of Valens, but was deposed on the accession of Theodosius, A.D. 379, and Gelasius was restored. We are informed by Jerome (de Vir. illust. c. 113) that Euzoius had been originally educated at the city of which he afterwards became bishop under Thespesius, the rhetorician, having Gregory Nyssen as a fellow student. While bishop of Caesarea, he exerted himself to restore the library collected by Origen and Pamphilus. (Hieron. Epist. 141 ad Marcellan.) According to Jerome, Euzoius was a copious and popular writer, "feruntur ejus varii et multiplices tractatus quos nosse perfacile est," the whole of which have perished. [E. V.]

EUZOIUS. In the Latin list of the fathers of the council of Constantinople, A.D. 381, occurs the name INZUS bishop of Corna in Lycaonia, which is most probably a corruption for Euzoius. (Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 1085; Mansi, iii. 570.) [L. D.]

EVA (1), martyr. [DATIVUS.]

EVA (2), the fourth abbess of Gloucester. She like her predecessor, Eadburga, is said to have been a widow of Wulfhere king of Mercia. According to the Historia Glouc. (ed. Hart, i. 7) she was blessed by Wilfrid of Worcester in 735 and died in 767, after which time the rule of abbesses was discontinued. She is called in the same work, in another place, Gaffe. She seems to be a creature of legend. (Ib. p. 4.) [S.]

EVAGORAS (1), an Egyptian bishop, who signed at the council of Sardica, A.D. 347. (Athan. Opp. pars i. 133.) [J. W. S.]

EVAGORAS (2), bishop of Iluza (Eluza) in Phrygia Pacatiana; his name was subscribed in his absence by his metropolitan, Nunechius of Laodicea, to the definition of the faith that was read before the emperor Marcian at the sixth session of the council of Chalcedon, A.D. 451. (Mansi, vii. 165; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 811.) [L. D.]

EVAGRIUS (1), bishop of Heraclea, near M. Lycus in Macedonia, present at the council of Sardica, A.D. 347. (Mansi, iii. 38; Le Quien, Oris. Christ. ii. 81.) [L. D.]

EVAGRIUS (2), bishop of Mitylene in Lesbos, one of the seceding bishops at the council of Seleucia. He signed the Arian creed of Acacius of Caesarea and George of Alexandria, and was consequently ejected from his bishopric by a decree of the council, A.D. 359. (Socr. Hist. Eccl. i. 40; Le Quien, Oris. Christ. i. 955; Mansi, iii. 331.) [L. D.]

EVAGRIUS (3), one of the bishops who subscribed the synodal letter at Antioch to the emperor Jovian, A.D. 363 (Soc. H. E. iii. 25). His designation is Evagrius Sicelorum (Σικελῶν). Soz., remarks Valesius on this passage, was an oriental town of site unknown. (Patr. Graec. lvii. 454 B.) [C. H.]

EVAGRIUS (4), orthodox bishop of Constantinople for about two months during 370, between Paul and Gregory of Nazianzus; chronologically, his episcopate occurs during that of the heterodox Demophilus. In the year 370 and Eudoxius, the heterodox bishop of Constantinople, after holding the see nineteen years. Valens happened a short time previously to have left Constantinople for Antioch, so that the election was sure, in such excited times, to take place without consultation with him. Arianism was in great force at the capital of the East; the Arians at once chose Demophilus. The Catholics, or, as Socrates calls them, the Homoeians, thinking it a favourable opportunity to get a bishop of their own (they had not had one at Constantinople since the death of Paulus, twenty years before), chose Evagrius, a person otherwise unknown.

Socrates states that he was consecrated by Eustathius bishop of Antioch, supposed to be then in hiding at Constantinople. But Valesius (note 56 on Soc. iv. 14) shews that this prelate must have been dead before the end of the reign of Constantius, for Julian, and after him Jovian, recalled all the exiled bishops to their sees. The age of Eustathius would now have been between 90 and 100, and therefore remarkable enough to be mentioned. Both Victor Tununensis and Theodorus Lector state that Eustathius died at Philippi, evidently in exile. However that may be, Evagrius, by whomsoever consecrated, had a short term of office. His appointment was the signal for an outburst of persecution from the Arians. The news of the ecclesiastical turn quickly reached the emperor Valens on his travels. He feared that a tumult might be kindled such as would endanger the safety of the empire. He ordered troops to be despatched from Nicomedia to the metropolis, and banished both the new prelate and the consecrating bishop. The latter, who may have been some other Eustathius, was exiled either to Bizya or to Cyrcus, Evagrius to some other place.

The authority for the duration of his episcopate is Eutychius of Alexandria, in his Annals, translated into Latin by Pococke.

Theoph. Chronogr. 49, Patr. Graec. cviii. p. 180; Acta S. Aug. i, p. 22.)

Evagrius is believed to have been the author of some comments on St. Luke, which Nicetas, deacon of Constantinople, afterwards bishop of Serrae, included in his Catena Patrum on that evangelist, and which Mai printed in the 9th volume of his Scriptores Veteres. See also Ceillier, vi. 333. [W. M. S.]

EVAGRIUS (5), commonly known as Evagrius of Antioch (his birthplace and the chief sphere of his work) to distinguish him from others of the same name, and more especially from Evagrius the historian. The dates of his birth and his death are uncertain; but he is known to have been consecrated bishop over one of the parties in Antioch in A.D. 388 or 389, and he must have lived until at least A.D. 392.

Authorities.—Socrates, H. E. v. 15; Sozomen, H. E. vii. 15; Theodoret, H. E. v. 23; Hieronymus (St. Jerome), de Viris Illustribus, cap. 25; Ambrosius, Epist. lvi. Notices of Evagrius may be found in Trithemius (de Script. Eccles. c. 85), in Fabricius (Bibl. Graec. tom. vii. p. 434, tom. x. p. 137, ed. Harles), in Tillemont (Mémoires ecclésiastiques, tom. x. pp. 235, 536, &c., ed. Paris, 1705), and in other modern critics, to whom reference is made below.

Life.—Evagrius was the son of a citizen of Antioch named Pompeianus. He appears to have been of full age by A.D. 362, and was probably already ordained presbyter when we find him about that date travelling to Italy with Eusebius bishop of Vercelli [EUSEBIUS (93)]. On the death of Eusebius in A.D. 370, Evagrius returned to Antioch in company with Jerome. He was certainly at that time a presbyter. Some identify him (e.g. Stephen in his Life of Chrysostom, but see Fabricius ubi supra, tom. viii. p. 455) with the ascetic who trained Chrysostom in monastic discipline. This identification is probably correct, though it is remarkable that Chrysostom received ordination, first as a deacon from St. Meletius, and then as priest from Flavian, the bishops of that party in Antioch which stood opposed to the one subsequently headed by Evagrius.

For the history of the dispute in Antioch the reader must be referred to the authorities given above, more particularly Theodoret, and to the articles, FLAVIANUS, MELETIUS, PAULINUS. In this place it must suffice to comment upon two points, one involving a general question, the other having special reference to Evagrius. The first point relates to the contest at Antioch. This, though originally springing out of the Arian controversy, soon became a question partly personal and in part connected with the influence, if not the actual jurisdiction, of the Roman see. Indeed St. Jerome (among whose high and noble gifts judicial fairness cannot be reckoned) wrote a letter (No. 15, ed. Ben.) of impassioned partisanship to his friend Damasus [DAMASUS], which seems to imply that the bishop of Antioch who is accepted at Rome must of necessity be the right one, and that Meletius, with all others not so accepted, must be counted as profane. History has not in anywise sanctioned the view taken by Jerome in this affair. Meletius, as has been already observed, ordained St. Chrysostom; and, though he may have died out of communion with Rome, has been always allowed, both in the West and in the East, to have been orthodox in doctrine, most blameless in life, and in short one whose name is fully entitled to the honourable prefix of saint. It would be needless to mention this, had not the passage from St. Jerome been cited in controversy (e.g. in Dr. Newman's Essay on Development, p. 279) as if it expressed the general sentiment of the church of his age.

The second point concerns Evagrius. Our information concerning him is not sufficiently ample to enable us to use very positive language concerning his conduct and character. His consecration to the episcopate by Paulinus was, as Theodoret (l.c.) and St. Ambrose (l.c.) both assert, in many ways uncanonical. Paulinus, even if his own position had been wholly unimpeachable, had no right to make another man bishop without consultation of the other bishops of the province, nor to give solitary consecration in the teeth of the famous fourth canon of the Nicene council, which required the co-operation of at least two assisting bishops.

There is a prima facie case against anyone who accepts advancement, as Evagrius did, under such circumstances. It is, however, reasonable to bear in mind the strong influence exerted in all ages, even on good men, by the violence of party spirit, when a contest is still at its height. The fact that the combatants had no longer any doctrinal point at issue (καίτερον οὐδὲν περὶ τὸ δόγμα διαφερόμενοι, as Theodoret has it), in all probability rather increased than diminished the bitterness of the rivalry. One who is described even by Jerome (l.c.), as Evagrius is, a man acris ac ferventis ingenii, may easily have been persuaded by Paulinus that he was doing good service to the church of Christ by accepting the post of successor. The Nicene canon was understood to be indeed a matter of order, but not such a rule as actually to invalidate a consecration once effected (on the principle feri non debuit, factum valet), and the rival bishop Flavian had broken a solemn promise made by himself that he would never aspire to the see. St. Ambrose (l.c.) takes a western view of the matter, and recommends an appeal "to our holy brother, the bishop of the Roman church," but he finds even more fault with the conduct of Flavian than with that of Evagrius, and describes each of the rivals as stronger in the attack than in the defence—uterque alienae magis ordinationis vitis quam suis [bonis] fretus*. If excuses can be made for Flavian by charitable critics (e.g. Stephen in his Life of Chrysostom), it seems undeniable that the course pursued by Flavian must also have created in the minds of the large party which accepted Evagrius the impression that he too had a colourable case, and that the primal irregularity of his consecration might be condoned. On the death of Evagrius, which appears to have been sudden, no successor was appointed, and Flavian, mainly through the influence of Chrysostom (who highly eulogized him as a worthy successor of St. Meletius), succeeded in healing the division.

* This insertion, suggested in the Ed. Ben., seems fully warranted by the context. The word occurs in the very next sentence.

Writings.—Evagrius of Antioch, while still a presbyter, read to his friend St. Jerome (Jerom. l.c.) treatises on various topics (diversarum hypotheseon tractatus). These were not yet published when Jerome wrote, and if they were subsequently made public, they have not come down to us. Jerome's tone concerning them implies some admiration. He adds that Evagrius translated into Latin (in nostrum sermonem) the life of St. Antony from the Greek of Athanasius. Whether we do or do not possess this translation is a matter of considerable controversy. It depends in some degree upon the decision of the previous question, whether we have or have not got the actual biography of St. Antony which St. Athanasius composed. The point has already been discussed in this dictionary. [ANTONIUS, ATHANASIUS.] If we accept the position therein maintained (which is that of Du Pin, Newman and others) that the biography ascribed to Athanasius is substantially his, we have then to discuss whether the translation given to us as that of Evagrius of Antioch by the Benedictine editors of Athanasius (tom. i. pars 2da p. 785 et seq.) and by the Bollandists (Act. Sanctor. for Jan. tom. ii. p. 107) is genuine and authentic.

Cave (Historia Literaria, vol. i. p. 283, ed. Oxon, 1740) rejects it; and Oudin (de Script. Eccles. antiq. tom. i. pp. 358 seqq. 382) follows and supports Cave. To the present writer the arguments of these distinguished critics appear to resolve themselves into one only; namely, that the Life of Antony by Athanasius is spurious, and that consequently the translation ascribed to Evagrius is also spurious. To dogmatize where such considerable authorities are at variance would be rash. But we believe that most modern critics would consider it all but certain that the author of the Latin biography ascribed to Evagrius had before him a copy of the Greek essentially identical with that which we now possess. It is true that his version is often a very lax one. This is fully admitted by the Benedictine editors, who indeed perhaps overstate the laxity in the following words:—"Evagrii versionem quod spectat, usque adeo libera illa est, ut saepenumero verborum Athanasii nihil pensi habuisse videatur, immo ab ejus scopo frequentissime aberrat, soletque brevius Athanasiana exprimere quam in Graecis censerentur." But the notion of preserving precise strictness in the translation of a biography of some length is a comparatively modern one. What strikes us is the amount of agreement between the Greek and the Latin in the texts cited from Holy Scripture. This is surely a crucial test, as the passages in question are for the most part merely illustrative; and it would be most improbable that two independent authors should select the same. Jerome assures us that Evagrius did translate this work of Athanasius: and we incline to the belief that the translation before us is that to which he referred.

The late Professor Ramsay (Dict. of Greek and Roman Biography, art. EVAGRIUS OF ANTIOCH) mentions the existence of a MS. in the library of Worcester Cathedral, described in the Catal. MSS. Angliae et Hiberniae (vol. ii. p. 17) as containing a life of St. Antony written by Evagrius and translated by St. Jerome. He justly re-such that there probably is some error in the text itself or in the description of it.

Pompeianus, the father of Evagrius, was, according to Jerome (Chron. anno 2, Aurelian), a descendant of the general officer of the same name who commanded in the campaign of Aurelian against Zenobia, circ. 273. Evagrius belonged to the Eustathian division of the orthodox church at Antioch, of which he became a presbyter. After the unhappy schism at Antioch had been perpetrated by the rash act of the headstrong Lucifer in consecrating Paulinus, Evagrius left Antioch, and accompanied Eusebius of Vercellæ to Italy, A.D. 363 or 364. Here he mainly co-operated with Eusebius in restoring peace to the churches distracted by the results of the disastrous council of Ariminum, and re-establishing orthodoxy on the terms laid down by the synod of Alexandria of A.D. 362. He also afforded pope Damasus important aid in getting the better of his rival Ursicius and his faction, A.D. 367. At Milan he resolutely withstood the Arian bishop Auxentius. A lady of Vercellæ having been capitally condemned on the false charge of adultery, Evagrius made a hasty journey into Gaul to obtain the remission of her sentence from the emperor Valentinian. (Hieron. Epist. xlix.) After nine or ten years spent in these labours and contests in the cause of the orthodox faith, he returned to the East, with the view of healing the schism that still divided the church of Antioch. Jerome was the companion of his journey. On his way Evagrius stopped at Caesarea to visit Basil. This was in the autumn of A.D. 373. He found Basil suffering from an attack of ague fever, for which he had visited the hot springs without benefit. The visit of Evagrius must have proved anything but cheering to the invalid, for he was commissioned by the Western bishops to return to Basil the letters he had sent them, probably relating to the Meletian schism, as unsatisfactory, and to place in his hands terms dictated by them, which he was to embody in a fresh letter to be sent into the West by some duly authorized commissioners. So and so only would the Western prelates feel themselves warranted in interfering in the affairs of the Eastern church, and making a personal visit. (Basil, Epist. 138 [8].) On his return to Antioch, Evagrius wrote in harsh terms to Basil, accusing him of a love of strife and controversy, and of being unduly swayed by personal partialities. If he really desired peace let him come himself to Antioch and endeavour to re-unite the Catholics under one head. If he could not come he should at least write to them, and use his influence with Meletius to put an end to the dissensions that were rending the church. The letter Basil sent in reply is a model of courteous argument. If Evagrius was so great a lover of peace, why had he not fulfilled his promise of communicating with Dorotheus, the head of the Meletian party? Deeply seated evils could not be cured by light measures. A single letter would effect nothing. Much mutual conference and discussion was required. Even if the season had not rendered the mountains impassable, he was in too feeble a state of health to travel to Antioch. Still he would write, if Evagrius desired it. As regarded the deputation to the West, he had no one qualified to undertake the duty. It would be far better for Evagrius to depute some one from Antioch, who would know the parties to be approached, and the form the letters should take. (Basil, Epist. 156 [342].) On the death of Paulinus, A.D. 388, Evagrius manifested the hollowness of his professed desire for peace by becoming himself the instrument of prolonging the schism. He was ordained by the dying bishop Paulinus, in his sick chamber, without the presence or consent of any assisting bishops, in direct violation of the canons of the church. Flavian, it will be remembered, had been consecrated by the other party on the death of Meletius, A.D. 381. Thus the hope of healing the schism which had long been so great a scandal to the Christian world, and had caused dissension between holy men agreed on all else, was again frustrated. (Socr. H. E. v. 15; Theod. H. E. v. 23.) The Christian world being still divided, a council was summoned at Capua, A.D. 390, to determine whether Flavian or Evagrius was the lawful bishop of Antioch. At this council Evagrius appeared, but Flavian declined to attend, telling the emperor that he would rather resign the bishopric into his hands than engage in any public controversy. The bishops assembled at Capua found the question too knotty for them to solve, and after declaring their readiness to admit all orthodox bishops to communion, relegated the decision to Theophilus of Alexandria and the Egyptian bishops. In fact, the case of each was so bad that it was almost impossible to distinguish between them. Each, in the words of Ambrose, depended more on the defects of his competitor's ordination than on the validity of his own, so that if Flavian had reason to fear the trial of his cause, Evagrius had no reason to press it. (Ambr. Ep. 9, p. 150.) It was not long, however, before the death of Evagrius deprived Flavian of his rival. It is not certain when this happened; but it was not before A.D. 392, in which year Jerome speaks of him as still alive. (De Vir. illustr. c. 125.) Jerome records the acuteness and fervid character of his intellect, and speaks with praise of treatises on various subjects, which he heard him read while still a presbyter, but which he had not yet published. (Ibid.) Evagrius was the owner of the village of Maronia, twelve leagues from Antioch, rendered famous as the dwelling place of St. Malchus. (Hieron. Vit. Malchi, p. 255.) Palladius, although a partisan of the Meletian side, praised Evagrius for the many contests he endured in his labours for the church. (Pallad. Dialog. p. 51.) Notwithstanding the doubts as to the validity of his consecration, the church of Antioch enrolled the name of Evagrius in her diptychs as one of her bishops, and he stands in the list of the orthodox bishops of Antioch given by Theodoret at the end of his Ecclesiastical History. [E. V.]

EVAGRIUS (6), African bishop attending the council of Carthage against Pelagius, A.D. 416. (Aug. Epp. 175, 181; Innoc. Ep. 26 in Patr. Lat. xx. 564.) [H. W. P.]

EVAGRIUS (7), bishop of Soli, in Cyprus; present at the council of Ephesus, A.D. 431, at the seventh session of which he supported Rheginus, the archbishop of Salamis, in the claim he brought before the council for the independence of Cyprus from the patriarchate of

Antioch; this claim was allowed and confirmed by the council. (Mansi, iv. 1465; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. ii. 1072.) [L. D.]

EVAGRIUS (8), bishop of Valentia in Phrygia Pacatiana, or of Nova Valentia in Osrhoëna, a town to be identified in the latter case with Balia, near Nicephorium or Callinicum, on the Euphrates. In the subscriptions he is called bishop of Valentia. He was a supporter of Nestorius at the council of Ephesus, A.D. 431, signed the protest against the opening of the council before the arrival of John of Antioch, as also the synodal decrees and letters of the Orientals, and was consequently cut off from communion by the orthodox (Baluz. Concil. ; Synodicon, c. 7 and 13, pp. 699, 706). Some suppose two bishops of this name, but are not supported by the subscriptions. (Gams, Series Episc. 437, 446; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 817, ii. 985.) [L. D.]

EVAGRIUS (9), a monk to whom is addressed an epistle, found among the works of Gregory Nazianzen, as his "Oratio xlv." repl θεόγνητος. This ascription has been generally regarded as erroneous by the best critics, on the ground of the inferiority of its style. It has been attributed by Galland and others to Gregory of Nyssa on the authority of the Panoplia of Euthymius, and several MSS. (Tillemont, ix. p. 709, S. Grég. de Nazianze, note 28; Ceillier, v. 241; vi. 125.) [E. V.]

EVAGRIUS (10), FLAVIUS, consul, together with Flavius Eucherius, when Gregory Nazianzen made his will. (Greg. Naz. Test.) [E. V.]

EVAGRIUS (11), a deacon of Nazianzus, mentioned by Gregory Nazianzen in his will in grateful terms as the partner of his labours and his cares. In testimony of his affectionate gratitude, Gregory bequeathed some articles of apparel and thirty gold pieces. (Greg. Naz. Testam.) [E. V.]

EVAGRIUS (12) PONTIUS, anchorite and writer, born at Iborra in Pontus Galaticus, according to Tillemont, in 345. Jerome (Epist. ad Ctesiphont.) styles him Hyperborita. Valesius thinks this is an error of the copyist for Hyborita. But it is more probably a contemptuous play on the word Iborita, such as Jerome was fond of employing when dealing with his theological adversaries. The father of Evagrius was a presbyter. If, as Tillemont thinks not impossible, Gregory Nazianzen's 153rd epistle has reference to Evagrius of Pontus, his father bore the same name as himself, and he himself received instruction in rhetoric, and the first principles of religion from Basil's friend. However this may be, it is certain that he was ordained reader by Basil, and deacon by Gregory Nyssen, who took him with him to the council of Constantinople, A.D. 381. For this we have the authority of Palladius (Hist. Lausiac. c. 86, p. 1010), who was his pupil. Both Socrates (H. E. iv. 23) and Sozomen (H. E. vi. 30) state that it was Gregory Nazianzen by whom he was ordained, and whom he accompanied to Constantinople, and that he became his archdeacon. But this is an error (Tillemont, Mém. Eccl. ix. 430, x. 794; Valesius ad Sozom. vi. 30). Gregory Nyssen had so high an opinion of the powers of Evagrius as a theologian and dialectician that he left him behind in Constantinople to aid the newly appointed bishop, Nectarius (who it will be remembered before his consecration was a layman destitute of theological training), in dealing with heretics. The imperial city proved a dangerous home for the young deacon. The eloquence of his sermons, commended by the graces of a very handsome person and a scrupulous care in dress, attracted crowds of listeners, including many ladies of rank. One of these, the wife of an ex-prefect, conceived a guilty passion for him, which he returned. The husband's jealousy was awakened, and Evagrius only escaped assassination by a timely flight. It was said that he was warned of his peril by a dream (Soz. H. E. vi. 30). Jerusalem was the place of his retreat. Here he was hospitably received by Melania the elder, by whom he was nursed during a severe attack of fever, and who, perceiving the weakness of his disposition, availed herself of his sickness to lead him to give up the world altogether and embrace an ascetic life as the only safeguard against the temptations to sensual pleasure to which he had more than once almost become the prey. On his recovering Evagrius went to Egypt, the home of the ascetics, where, after two years spent in great austerities in the Nitrian desert, he plunged still deeper into the solitude, and practised severer mortifications in the cells of Scetia. Here he had the two Macarii as his instructors and models in the ascetic life. After enduring many terrible temptations, recorded by Palladius, and having obtained mastery over his bodily passions, he became qualified to be the instructor of others in asceticism. Palladius became his companion and disciple in 391. Among his other disciples were Rufinus, and Heracleides of Cyprus, afterwards bishop of Ephesus (Soz. H. E. viii. 6). Palladius gives several anecdotes illustrative of the height of ascetic virtue attained by Evagrius and his fellow hermits. On one occasion he threw into the fire a packet of letters from his parents and other near friends lest the perusal of them should entangle him in worldly thoughts once more (Cassian, v. 32; Tillemont, x. 876). His reputation for wisdom and piety led Theophilus, the metropolitan of Alexandria, to desire to make him a bishop, and Evagrius was forced to flee to resist his importunities (Socr. H. E. iv. 23).

Evagrius passed the remainder of his life in the cells of Scetia, where he died worn out with austerities in the seventeenth year of his recluse life, A.D. 398, at the age of fifty-four, "signis et prodigiis pollens" (Gennad. Illust. Vir. c. xi.). Evagrius was a zealous champion of the doctrines of Origen, for which he fell under the lash of Jerome, whose enmity towards him had been excited not only on theological grounds, but as having been the instructor of Rufinus during his sojourn in Egypt, and having enjoyed the patronage of Melania. Jerome speaks in contemptuous terms of his writings (Ad Ctesiph.), especially of his book repl ἀναθερίας, when combating the tenet ascribed to the Origenists that a man could raise himself to a superiority to temptation (i. e. as Jerome says, "becoming either a stone or god"), and live without sin. He also charges him with being a precursor of Pelagius (in Pelag. p. 260). Jerome accuses Evagrius of including in his book "de monachis" many who were monks at all; and those who were were Origenists, and had been condemned by their bishops. Evagrius was a very copious writer, and Jerome himself (u. s.) bears witness to the celebrity of his works, which, he tells us, were widely read not only in the East in the original, but also in the West, having been translated into Latin by his pupil Rufinus, as afterwards by Gennadius. Sozomen (u. s.) speaks in high terms of his learning, and eloquence, and the persuasive power of his writings. The existing remains of his writings are printed by Guibet, Bibl. Patr. vii. 551–581, and Migne, Patrolog. vol. 86.

We obtain the following list of the writings of Evagrius from Socrates, Gennadius, Palladius, and Seidas, sub voc. "Macarius."

(1) Monachus, repl rñs paxtuxñs, on "active virtues," in 100 chapters. Of this work Socrates gives two fragments (H. E. iii. 7, iv. 23), and the whole treatise is printed by Cotelierius (Mon. Eccl. Græc. tom. iii. p. 70). (2) Gnosticus, "ad os qui cognitionis munere donati sunt," in 50 chapters. A fragment is given by Socrates (H. E. ii. 23). It was translated into Latin by Gennadius. (3) Antirrheticus, a collection of passages of Scripture, with comments, distributed under eight heads, against the eight divisions of evil thoughts. This was also translated by Gennadius. It was published in Greek and Latin by Eget, together with Palladius's Life of Chrysostom, Par. 1680, 4to, and in Latin only, Bibl. Patr. Lagd. 1677, tom. 27. (4) A Century of Prayers. (5) 600 Gnostic Problems. (6) A Letter to Melania. (7) A book, repl dwabelas. (8) 100 Sentences for the use of Anchorets living simply. (9) Short Sentences, translated by Gennadius, who describes them as being of great obscurity, only intelligible to the hearts of monks. (10) Truxed, in two books, one of them addressed to monks, and the other to a virgin dedicated to God (printed without the author's name), Bibl. Patr. u. s., and among the works of Illas (ed. Suarez, pp. 613–626). (11) Liber de rationibus monachalium (Cotelier. u. s. iii. 105). (12) Scholion de tetragrammato Dei nomine (ibid. p. 116). To these may be added the passages in the various Catenæ under the name Evagrius, on Job, Proverbs, and other books of the Old and New Testament. Combefis, in his Bibliotheca Concionatoria, gives two such passages, one in the Catena on "the good Samaritan" (vol. v. p. 353), the other on the Parable of the Pounds (vol. viii. p. 812), which he ascribes to our author (vol. i. p. 11). (Oudin, i. 333; Tillemont, Mém. Eccl. x. p. 368 ff.; Fabr. Bibl. Græc. ix. 284, ed. Harles; Dupin, Hist. Eccl. iii. 1; Cave, Hist. Lit. i. 275.) [E. V.]

EVAGRIUS (13) (EVETIUS), prefect of Egypt in the reign of Theodosius I. We hear of him in connection with the disturbances at Alexandria, arising from the desecration of the heathen temples by the bishop Theophilus (Soz. H. E. vii. 15; Soz. H. E. v. 15, 16, 17). This event is placed by Socrates and Sozomen during the time of the emperor's visit to Rome, which was in 391. The pagans made an obstinate resistance, taking up a position in the temple of Serapis, but were finally dislodged. There is a law of Theodosius against the pagans dated June 17,

391, addressed to Evagrius, so that he seems to have been prefect for three years. He is mentioned by Eunapius (Vit. Aedes.) as prefect at the time of the disturbances at Alexandria, where, however, the common reading is Evetius. [M. F. A.]

EVAGRIUS (14), presbyter and monk under St. Martin of Tours, after whose death he betook himself to Sulpicius Severus, with whom he was living in 405. (Sulp. Dial. iii. 1, 2.) He is proved by Ceillier to have been the author of a dispute between Theophilus, a Christian, and Simon, a Jew (mentioned by Gennadius, de Viris Illus. cap. i. and printed by Martene in 1717), and of Deliberations between Zaccheus, a Christian, and Apollonius, a philosopher, which in an ancient MS. of the abbey of Vendome precedes the former work, and is plainly by the same author. Both works are to be found in Patr. Lat. vol. xx. (See Ceillier, viii. 424.) [R. T. S.]

EVAGRIUS (15), philosopher, the friend and fellow-student of Synesius, by whom he was converted and induced to accept the doctrines of the resurrection of the dead and eternal retribution. (Tillemont, xii. 527.) [E. V.]

EVAGRIUS (17), an ecclesiastical historian of the 6th century, who wrote a church history in six books, embracing a period of 163 years, from the council of Ephesus A.D. 431, to the twelfth year of the emperor Mauricius Tiberius, A.D. 594. He was born at Epiphania in Coele Syria, A.D. 536 or 537. His parents seem to have been Christians, for he tells us himself that they were among the multitudes who, at a time when they were expecting destruction at the hands of Chosroes, hastened to Apamea, a city not far distant from Epiphania, that they might there embrace the wood of the true cross, and thus if possible escape the fate with which they were threatened, or at all events be strengthened for their departure to a better world (iv. 25). Evagrius was a child at school at the time, but was taken with his parents to Apamea for this purpose. The incident can hardly be said to throw any particular light upon his training; but it illustrates the feelings of the age, and enables us better to understand how one who gives in his works many tokens of sobriety and judgment should have been the credulous gatherer of legends that he was. From Apamea Evagrius would seem to have gone to Antioch, the capital of Syria, and there to have entered the profession of the law. He must have prosecuted the profession with success, for he received the surname of Scholasticus, a term then applied to lawyers (Du Cange, Glossarium, s.v.), gained great favour with Gregory bishop of Antioch, and was chosen by him to assist him in his judgments. At the same time he seems to have won the esteem and goodwill of all classes, for on the occasion of his marriage, a second one, the city was filled with rejoicing, and great honours were paid him by the citizens.

The relations of Evagrius with Gregory appear, as far as this world goes, to have been among the most fortunate circumstances of his life. He accompanied that bishop to Constantinople, and advocated his cause when he was summoned to answer there for heinous crimes. The defence was successful. He also wrote for him a book containing "reports, epistles, decrees, orations, disputations, with sundry other matters," which must have been highly thought of, for he tells us that, in consequence of it, he was preferred by Tiberius Constantinus to the honour of quaestor, and by Mauricius Tiberius to that of mastership of the rolls, "where the lieutenants and magistrates with their monuments are registered" (vi. 23). This, his own account of his promotion, is more to be trusted than the insinuation contained in Gibbon's sneer that, in his praise of Maurice, he had been "so wisely indiscreet that the emperor knew and rewarded his favourable opinion" (Decline and Fall, ch. 45).

The year of his death is not known. It must have been subsequent to A.D. 594, at which date, the twelfth year of Maurice's reign, he wrote his history at the age of 58 (iv. 28).

It is the history of Evagrius that chiefly interests us, for his other works have perished. That history was intended to be a continuation of the histories of Eusebius, Socrates, Sozomen, and Theodoret. These historians had brought down their accounts of the church to the early part of the reign of Theodosius the Younger. Evagrius had been greatly delighted with their narratives, seeing in them, in their account of the incarnation and ascension of the Saviour, in the famous Acts of the Apostles, and in the struggles and persecutions of the holy martyrs, the most powerful persuasives to the Christian faith. But as the events which followed appeared to him nothing inferior to what went before, he desired to continue their labours. With this view he applied himself to all the sources of information at his command, to the writings of Eustathius the Syrian, Zosimus, Priscus, Joannes Rhetor, Procopius of Caesarea, Agathus, and other good authors. He saw that the information to be found in them was too scattered to permit of its full value being felt; and he resolved to gather it together, as previous historians had done, to the end "that the famous deeds which slumbered in the dust of forgetfulness might be revived; that they might be stirred with his pen, and presented for immortal memory; that not only every man might know what had happened until that age, when, where, in what sort, against whom, by what men, but also that no worthy act, by reckless security and languishing slothfulness the sister of oblivion, might be put clean out of remembrance" (Preface to his Hist.).

These words of his own preface indicate well not only his object but the spirit in which he pursued it, while at the same time they illustrate the unnecessarily inflated style in which perhaps his very sense of the importance of his work not unfrequently led him to indulge. It is fair, however, to allow that he largely attained his end. He is a warm, often an enthusiastic writer, orthodox in his sentiments, and if eager in his denunciations of prevailing heresies, yet not more eager than was demanded by the feelings of the time. Jortin indeed has condemned him as "in points of theological controversy an injudicious prejudiced zealot" (Jortin, Remarks on Eccl. Hist. ii. p. 120); but we cannot forget that Evagrius was a lawyer, not a theologian, and that we must look from him for the popular rather than the learned estimate of the theological controversies urged with such keenness in his time. It is not so much in this respect that his judgment fails him as in the credulous enthusiasm which led him to accept too easily the legends of the saints then constituting the spiritual nutriment of Christians. Evagrius in other respects shews many of the best qualities of a historian. He had probably learned from Eusebius the importance of quoting original documents; and not a few such, decrees of councils, supplications to emperors, letters of emperors, and bishops, &c., are preserved in his pages, forming most important authorities for the events to which they relate. He took great pains in collecting his materials, and sometimes made happy use of them. Gooss (in Herzog) especially praises his defence of the Emperor Constantine against the slanders of Zosimus.

In his general arrangement he follows the reigns of the emperors of the East from Theodosius the Younger to Maurice; but the arrangement of details is faulty, and in the loose heaping together of his materials, as well as in the failure to place much that he refers to in the light of any general aim, we see the want of the artistic skill of a historian. There is often, however, great spirit in the narrative, of which we have an excellent specimen in his account of the council of Chalcedon (ii. 18). The work is chiefly valuable in relation to the Nestorian and Eutychian heresies, and the councils of Ephesus and Chalcedon. The style, as may be gathered from the extract already given from the preface, is frequently turgid, but upon the whole it is good.

The History of Evagrius was first published by R. Stephens (Par. 1544); but the best edition is that of Valesius, with notes (Par. 1673). Still later, in 1720, it was reprinted at Cambridge in the 'Hist. Eccl. Scriptores cum notis Valesii et Reading.' There is a fair English translation by Meredith Hanmer, London, 1619, along with a translation of Eusebius and Socrates [W. M.]

EVAL, ST. (UVELUS), the patron saint of St. Eval in Cornwall. The parish feast is on the Sunday nearest Nov. 20. The Celtic names are planted thickly on this part of the coast, and the dates of the parish feasts have been mostly preserved, while on the eastern side of Cornwall the dates have been in many cases lost (see Cressy's Church History of Brittany ix. 19, 1). [C. W. B.]

EVALDUS, bishop of Vienne. [EOALDUS.]

EVANCIUS. [EVANTIUS.]

EVANDER (1), a bishop of Nicomedia, invented by "Praedestinatus" (i. 17) as an opponent of the Ophites. [G. S.]

EVANDER (2), bishop of Ursinum (Ajaccio) in Corsica, one of the nineteen bishops appointed by Constantine to hear the case submitted to him by the Donatists, A.D. 313. (Optatus, de Schism. Don. i. 23; Aug. Opp. vol. iii. 773; Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Italia, xvi. 307; Ugh. Ital. Sac. ii. 493.) [H. W. P.]

EVANDER (3), one of the solitaries of the diocese of Nazianzus, highly extolled by Gregorhimself as rich in the gifts of God, exceeding in purity of soul the whiteness of his grey hairs. (Greg. Naz. Carm. 47, p. 108.) [E. V.]

EVANDER (4), bishop of Dioclia in Phrygia Pontica, a town known only from the records of the councils; present at the council of Chalcedon, A.D. 451 (Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 824; Mansi, vii. 157). Gams (Series Episc. 393, 446), following Farlati, supposes another Evander at this council, bishop of Dioclea on the coast of Epirus, the modern Antivari, in Albania (Farlati, Albania Sacra vii. 1). [L. D.]

EVANDER (5), bishop of Cnidus or Stadia, the well-known town on the peninsula of Caria; present at the fifth general council, A.D. 553. (Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 917; Mansi, ix. 395.) [L. D.]

EVANDRIUS, an Eastern bishop of the 5th century, addressed by Firmus archbishop of Caesarea, in his 15th letter. Firmus invites him to attend a commemoration of certain saints in Apocci. In the council of Chalcedon, A.D. 451, known as Evander bishop of Dioclia in Phrygia (EVANDER (4)); but it has been thought that Stadia would be too far from Caesarea for such an invitation. (Firm. Caes. Episc. Epist. xv. Patrol. Graec. lxxvii. 1492.) [W. M. S.]

EVANGELICUS, bishop of the Scythians, referred to as "pontifex et praepositus" of the churches among that people (Vitae Patrum, cap. 16 in Pat. Lat. lxxvii. 404 c). Le Quien makes him first bishop of Tomi in the time of Diocletian, Philus being his successor (Or. Chr. i. 1211). [C. H.]

EVANGELUS (1), a presbyter, known through two letters of Jerome to him (73 and 144, ed. Vall.). Vallarsi thinks he was of Africa, and was the Evangelus bishop of Assurae mentioned in the Gesta Collationis Carthagenensis [EVANGELUS (2)], and also the Evangelus to whom Anianus Celecensis dedicated his translation of Chrysostom's Homilies (see Migne's Patrologia Lat. xxi. 1176). The first letter was caused by questions relating to Melchizedek. The second by an assertion, which Evangelus reported, that deacons and presbyters were originally equal. This leads Jerome to develop his well-known views on the three orders of the ministry. [W. H. F.]

EVANGELUS (2), bishop of Assurae in proconsular Africa, present at the conference before Marcellinus, A.D. 411. (Mon. Vet. de Don. Othobert, p. 399; Morcelli, Afr. Chr. i. 86; JONATHAN, 893.) [H. W. P.]

EVANGELUS (3) the only known bishop of Pautalia (Dictionary of Greek and Roman Geography, i. 559A), also called Pantalia (var. read, Procop. de Aedif. iv. 1), in Dacia Mediterranea (Wiltsch, Handbook, i. § 88). He was sent for by the emperor Anastasius, who was a zealous Eutychian, A.D. 516, in the hope that he might prevail upon him to renounce the communion of the Catholics. But, notwithstanding that Evangelus steadfastly refused to consent to the emperor's wish, he was allowed to return to his see in peace, Anastasius, it is said, being afraid of the Illyrian soldiers who were quartered at Pautalia and seem to have been greatly attached to their bishop. (Marcellin. Com. Chron. o. a. 516; Farlati, Illyr. Sacra viii. 77; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. ii. 307.) [T. W. D.]

EVANGELUS (4), deacon of Sipontum, who in 593 complained to Gregory the Great that his daughter had been seduced by his bishop's nephew [FELIX (154)]; and that, having been a captive of war, he was in debt for his ransom money. Gregory directed that the bishop should discharge this debt from the property of the church if the means of Evangelus were insufficient, and that the seducer should either marry the girl or be confined in a monastery. (Greg. Mag. Epp. lib. iii. ind. xi. epp. 41, 43.) [C. H.]

EVANTHIUS (1), one of the judices appointed by the emperor Constantius to hear the defence of Photinus (Epiphan. Haer. lxxi. 1. Pat. Gr. xlii. 375 b). [C. H.]

EVANTHIUS (2), ST., seventh bishop of Mende, succeeding St. Hilarius. He was present at the fourth council of Orleans in A.D. 541. His successor was Parthenius. (Greg. Tur. Vit. Patr. de S. Gallo c. iv. Migne, Pat. Lat. lxxi. 1032; Gall. Christ. i. 87; Labbe, Conc. v. 1371.) [S. A. B.]

EVANTIUS (1), ST., seventh bishop of Autun, in the first half of the 5th century. He appears in the Auctaria of Grevenus and Molanus to Usuard on Sept. 13, on which day he is commemorated. (Gall. Christ. iv. 337 Boll. Acta SS. Sept. iv. 21.) [S. A. B.]

EVANTIUS (2), ST., 27th occupant of the see of Vienne, succeeding Philippus and followed by St. Verus III. He was present at the first council of Mâcon (A.D. 581), the third of Lyons in 583, the second of Valentia in 584, and the second of Mâcon in 585. There is extant a letter on the subject of abstinence from the blood of animals which was long attributed to this Evantius, but was probably written by an archdeacon of Toledo of the same name (see the following article). He died in 586, and is commemorated by some Jan. 13, by others, including the Bollandists, Feb. 3. (Mansi, ix. 936, 943, 945, 957; Greg. Tur. Hist. Franc. viii. 39; Ado, Chronicon, aetas sexta (575) in Migne, Pat. Lat. cxxiii. 111; Gall. Christ. xvi. 27.) [S. A. B.]

EVANTIUS (3), mentioned as archdeacon of Toledo about the year 720 by Isidorus Pacensis (§ 49), who speaks in high praise of him and of his contemporaries, Frodoarius bishop of Guadix and Urban precentor (probably) of the cathedral of Toledo, three men who by their learning, wisdom, and sanctity were a great support of the church. The "doctrina" and "sapientia," of which Isidorus speaks, were displayed in a letter to the Judaizing Christians of Saragossa, who refused to eat the blood of animals (conf. Adrian's letter to Egila, art. EGILA). The letter is printed by Aguirre (Coll. Max. Conc. Hisp. iii. 87), by Migne (Pat. Lat. lxxxviii. 719), Canisius (Thesaur. Monum. tom. i. p. 522), La Bigne (Max. Bibl. Pat. tom. xi. 1092). Cave (Lit. Hist. i. 540, cf. Ceillier xi. 852) and Fabricius call the author of this letter a Spanish abbat, and he is so called in the title of the letter, but there is no ground for "abbas" in the letter itself, and Aguirre proves that it belongs to the archdeacon. It may possibly be to this letter, or at any rate to the followers of Evantius that Egila refers, when he complains to pope Adrian that certain persons in Spain stigmatize those who refuse to eat blood or things strangled as rudes aut ineruditi. Evantius and Urban are also mentioned by Cixila in his life of St. Ildefonsus (Esp. Sagr. v. p. 507) as his authorities for the miracles there described. Cixila implies that he heard from them all that he narrates, but he does not expressly say that they were eye-witnesses as Bayer reports (l. c.). Indeed, as St. Ildefonsus died in 667, and Isidorus Pacensis places the deaths of Urban and Evantius under the era 775 (A.D. 737) this, although possible, is not very probable. Isidore speaks of them as "viri doctores et sanctimoniae studio satis pollentes," an indirect testimony to the tolerance and mildness of the early Mohammedan rule.

[M. A. W.]

EVANTIUS (4), son of Dynamius Patricius, slain at Carthage, A.D. 589, while prosecuting an embassy to the court of Constantinople (Greg. Tur. Hist. Franc. x. 2).

[C. H.]

EVARESTUS—Dec. 23. An inhabitant of Heraclea in Crete, martyred with several others under Decius. (Basil. Menol.)

[G. T. S.]

EVARIC (1), king of the Visigoths. [EURIC (1).]

EVARIC (2), one of the tribe of the Rugii, who had accompanied Theodoric into Italy and always kept themselves distinct from the Ostrogoths. He was elected king by his own people after the murder of Ildibald, whom the Ostrogoths had chosen as king when Vitigis was carried prisoner to Constantinople. The Ostrogoths, however, were thoroughly discontented with the inefficiency of Evaric, and called Totila, nephew of Ildibald, to be their head, ann. 541. But Evaric entered into secret negotiations with the emperor Justinian to betray Italy to him, and receive the title of patrician. During the absence of his messengers Evaric was murdered by the Goths after a five months' reign, and Totila became sole king. His life illustrates one of several phases of disunion which existed among the followers of Theodoric after his death. (Procopius, de Bell. Goth. ii. 2, ed. Bonn. ii. pp. 287-290. Dahn, Die Könige der Germanen, ii. 227.)

EVARICUS. [EBARCIUS.]

EVARISTUS (called ARISTUS in the Liberian catalogue), bishop of Rome at the beginning of the 2nd century. With respect to the exact date and duration of his episcopate, as well as the names and order of succession of his predecessors [LINUS, ANACLETUS, CLEMENT], ancient accounts are greatly at variance. Eusebius (H. E. iii. 34, iv. 1) gives Clemens as his immediate predecessor, the third year of Trajan (101) as the date of his accession, and nine years as the duration of his episcopate: but in his Chronicle he makes the latter seven years. (Chron. iv. 1.) Irenaeus, an older authority, who probably got his information when at Rome in the time of Eleu-therus towards the end of the century, also makes Clemens his predecessor, but gives no dates (Adv. Haeres. iii. 3, 3). The Liberian (A.D. 354) and subsequent Roman catalogues, as well as Augustin and Optatus, represent him as succeeding Anacletus, and the former authorities give A.D. 96 as the commencement of his episcopate (thus beginning, according to them, in the reign of Domitian), and between thirteen and fourteen years as its duration. These discrepancies, and the absence of dates from the earliest notice by Irenaeus, suggest the conclusion that Evaristus is to be ranked in the group of early heads of the Roman church, of whom no authentic tradition was preserved. The conflicting accounts that have come down to us of his three predecessors seem certainly to imply a hazy tradition of their period; and that of Evaristus may be taken as partaking of the same dimness, it not having been till later in the 2nd century that, along with the more complete organization of episcopal government, official records of the bishops began to be preserved. Lipsius (Chronologie der römischen Bischöfe) takes this view, and adduces the fact that Irenaeus, in his letter to Victor about the observance of Easter, refers to the practice of Telesphorus and Xystus only, as evidence of the absence of any distinct tradition before the earlier of these two bishops, who succeeded the successor of Evaristus. In the Felician catalogue (530) Evaristus is described as a Greek of Antioch (his father being a Jew of Bethlehem), is said to have assigned titles (of parishes) to the presbyters of the city, to have appointed seven deacons to attend the bishop when preaching, and to have been buried near the body of St. Peter in the Vatican. Later accounts, unsupported by Irenaeus, who assigns the crown of martyrdom to Telesphorus alone among the Roman bishops before his own day, make him a martyr; and as such he is venerated now on Oct. 26.

Two decretal epistles are assigned to this bishop by the Pseudo-Isidore, both addressed to the bishops of Africa: one containing the direction about seven deacons attending the bishop when preaching, and also regulation about marriage; the other comparing the bond between a bishop and his diocese with the indissoluble one between husband and wife, providing against undue accusations of bishops, and reserving to the see of Rome the power of terminating all cases arising from such accusations.

[C. H.]

EVASINUS, bishop of Asti, c. 775. (Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Italia, xiv. 87.)

[A. H. D. A.]

EVASIUS (1) I., ST., first bishop of Asti c. A.D. 265, martyr under the praeses Astubalus with Proiectus a "levite" and Mallianus deacon. They suffered under either Gallienus or Diocletian, near the town of Sedulum, the modern Casal di S. Vaso in Liguria near the Po, and were commemorated on Dec. 1. Only two bishops of Asti of this name are recognised by Ughelli, but Cappelletti reckons three additional ones between them, belonging respectively to the years 364, 389, 419. (Ug. Ital. Sac. iv. 334)

Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Italia, xiv. 86; Mart. Rom. Dec. 1.) [C. H.]

EVASIUS (8) II., bishop of Asti, c. 740. Irps (Cod. Dipl. iv. 119) gives a record of a donation by king Liutprand to St. Evasius (ann. 743). There is some doubt as to the date of the donation and its date. It seems possible that it was made to this bishop in memory of the earlier Evasius, bishop and martyr. (Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Italia, xiv. 87; Ughelli, Ital. Sacr. iv. 334.) [A. H. D. A.]

EVASIUS (4), Donatist bishop of Girbis in opposition to Quodvultdeus the Catholic, at the conference at Carthage, 411. (Mon. Vet. de Don. p. 448; Morcelli, Afr. Chr. i. 171.) [H. W. P.]

EVE, GOSPEL OF. A book called the Gospel of Eve is said by Epiphanius (Haer. xxvi. p. 84) to have been current among some Gnostic sects; and from it apparently are taken two extracts which he proceeds to give. We are probably to take as mere sarcasm of Epiphanius his statement that this gospel was called after her for her having found the fruit of "knowledge" through the revelation of the serpent who spoke with her. It is more likely that we are to look for illustration to the Peratic use of the name of Eve "the mother of all living" (Hippol. v. 16, p. 134), and to the Ophite doctrine concerning the "first Woman" (Iren. i. 30, p. 109). [G. S.]

EVELLIUS—May 11. He was a member of Leo's council. Converted by the sufferings of St. Terpes, he was baptized, and therefore beheaded by the tyrant. This martyrdom is lacking in early and genuine authorities. (Mart. Rom. Nether.; Ferrarius, Catal. SS.; Bar. Ann. A.D. 69, num. 44.) [G. T. S.]

EVEMERUS (EMERUS), said to have been seventh archbishop of Treves, succeeding Jamninus and followed by St. Marus about A.D. 480. (Gal. Christ. xii. 379.) [S. A. B.]

EVEMERUS. [EUMERIUS.]

EVENTIUS. See also EUENTIUS.

EVENTIUS (1) (Vet. Rom. Mart. Sept. 12), bishop of Pavia. [JUVENTIUS.] [C. H.]

EVENTIUS (3), bishop of Ticinum (Pavia); who joined with Ambrose in condemning Palladius and Secundianus at the council of Aquileia, A.D. 381. (Ambrose, Opp. iii. pp. 838, 843.) He also added his signature to a letter addressed by Ambrose and a synod of Milan to Syricius, upholding his condemnation of Jovinianus and others. (Ibid. p. 1044.) [J. Ll. D.]

EVENTIUS (3), bishop of Vienne. [EVANTINUS (2).]

EVENTIUS (4), deacon of Milan, bearing a letter of Constantius, bishop of that see, to pope Gregory the Great, and the latter's reply, A.D. 599. (Greg. Mag. Epp. lib. ix. ind. ii. ep. 31. Patr. Lat. lxxvii. 992.) [C. H.]

EVERGISLUS of Cologne. [ERREGISILUS.]

EVERGISUS of Tongres. [EBREGISUS.]

EVERILDIS, virgin in England, assigned to the 7th century and the kingdom of Wessex. Her story is mixed up with the times of both Birinus and Wilfrid, but she is probably fictitious (Boll. Acta SS. 9 Jul. ii. 713). [C. H.]

EVERIUS, ST., second bishop of Catana (Catania), succeeding St. Beryllus, in the time of Valerian and Gallienus. He built the church of St. Mary of Bethlehem at Catana near the tomb of the poet Stesichorus. He was commemorated on Nov. 16. (Pirri, Sicilia Sacra, i. 516, from the ancient records of the church of Catana.) [C. H.]

EVERMARUS, martyr cir. A.D. 700, commemorated on May 1. He is said to have been a Frisian and of noble family. He longed for martyrdom in early life, and was a constant visitor of the tombs of the martyrs. He was on his way to the tomb of Servatius at Trajectum (Maestricht), when he was murdered in a wood known as Rutia, near that city. The authority for his Acts is a MS. of the church of St. Saviour at Utrecht. (Boll. Acta SS. Mai. i. 120.) [T. W. D.]

EVETHIUS. See also EUETHIUS.

EVETHIUS (1), a Bithynian bishop at the council of Nicaea in 325. His name appears in the list as "Evethius Hadrianopolis, Hadriensis" (Mansi, ii. 696 b). Le Quien understands two bishops of Hadrianople and Hadriani respectively (Or. Chr. i. 577, 625). [C. H.]

EVETHIUS (2), bishop of Satala in Lesser Armenia, one of the Nicene fathers, A.D. 325. The name is written Euty chius in some MSS. (Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 431; Mansi, ii. 694.) [L. D.]

EVETHIUS (3), bishop of Ephesus, an adherent of the Macedonian heresy; one of the thirty-six bishops of that party who attended the council of Constantinople A.D. 381, and retired without making any concessions. (Phot. Biblioth. cod. 257, p. 477; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 675; Socrates, H. E. iv. 12, 22, where his name is mentioned first in the letter of pope Liberius to the Macedonian bishops.) His name does not appear among the subscriptions to the council (Mansi, iii. 568). [L. D.]

EVETHIUS (4), a presbyter of Caesarea, sent by Pharetrius the bishop to arouse Chrysostom in the middle of the night, that he might escape from the Isaurians, who were hovering about the city (Chrysost. ep. 14, § 3, Patr. Gr. lii. 615). Chrysostom wrote to him from Cucusus in terms of affection and gratitude, and begs that he may often hear from him (Ep. 173). [T. W. D.]

EVETHIUS (5), a presbyter who joined Chrysostom in his exile at Cucusus (Chrysost. Ep. 114; Patr. Gr. lii. 670.) He may possibly be the same as the preceding, but probably not. [T. W. D.]

EVETHIUS (6), bishop of Cyzicus, the metropolis of the Hellespontic province, received letters, along with the other metropolitans from the emperor Leo I., ordering him to assemble his province in synod, and to take its opinion about the murder of St. Proterius, bishop of Alexandria, and about the faith of the council of Chalcedon. Evethius despatched a synodal letter in answer to the emperor, which is extant, A.D. 458. (Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 753; Mansi, vii. 523, 584.) [L. D.]

EVETIUS, prefect. [EVAGRIUS (13).]

EVILASIUS—Sept. 20. A palace official entrusted with the execution of the virgin martyr Fausta, converted by her patience, and executed with her. (Bar. 311. xvii. xix.) [FAUSTA (2).] [G. T. S.]

EVILLA, invoked among the holy virgins and widows in the Dunkeld Litany (Bp. Forbes, Kal. Scott. Saints, pp. lxi. 335). [J. G.]

EVIPPUS, bishop of Neocaesarea (Le Quien, Or. Chr. i. 504). In the synodal of the province of Pontus Polemoniacus to the emperor Leo I. in 458 Evippus signs as metropolitan (Mansi, vii. 605). His name however does not occur in the extant lists of the metropolitans whose communications Leo had invited (Mansi, vii. 523, 788). As far as now known, the suffragan sees of Evippus's province were Comana, Polemoniacum, Cerasus, all three represented in the synodal, and Trapezus, which had a bishop at the council of Chalcedon, 451. The sees of Rhizaeum and Pityussa are found later. [C. H.]

EVODIUS. See also EUODIUS.

EVODIUS (1), according to early tradition, first bishop of Antioch. (Euseb. Chron. ann. Abr. 2058; H. E. iii. 22.) The episcopate of Evodius has indirectly the older testimony of Origen, who speaks of Ignatius as the second bishop after Peter (in Luc. Hom. 6, vol. iii. p. 938; see also Euseb., Quaest. ad Steph. ap. Mai, Scr. Vet. i. p. 2). This tradition has all the appearance of being historical. Ignatius early acquired such celebrity that it is not likely the name of an undistinguished person would have been placed before his, if the facts did not require this arrangement. The language used about episcopacy in the Ignatian epistles agrees with the conclusion that Ignatius was not the first at Antioch to hold the office. As time went on, the fitness of things seemed more and more to demand that Ignatius should not be separated from the Apostles. Athanasius (Epist. de Synodis, i. 607) speaks of Ignatius as coming after the Apostles without mention of any one intervening; Chrysostom makes him contemporary with the Apostles (Hom. in Ignat. vol. ii. p. 593); the Apostolic Constitutions (vii. 46) have recourse to the expedient adopted in the parallel case of Clement of Rome, the hypothesis of a double ordination, Evodius being said to have been ordained by Peter, Ignatius by Paul. Theodoret (Dial. I. Immutab. iv. 82, Migne) and others represent Ignatius as ordained by Peter. The authorities on the subject are given at length by Zahn (Patres Apostol. ii. 327). Malalas, x. p. 252 (325), has a circumstantial story how Peter, happening to pass through Antioch at the time of the death of Evodius, ordained Ignatius in his room, and how about the same time Mark was succeeded in the episcopate of Alexandria by his disciple Anianus, as the learned chronologer Theophilus related. He further ascribes to Evodius the giving to the disciples the name of Christians. The Theophilus here mentioned is doubtless he who was bishop of Antioch, A.D. 170. We are not warranted in believing more on the testimony of Malalas than that Theophilus mentioned the episcopate of Anianus; an interesting fact, from which we may probably infer that he gave an account of the succession of bishops, not only at Alexandria but also at his own see, Antioch.

There is reason to believe that the earliest tradition did not include an ordination even of Evodius by Peter; for the chronicle of Eusebius places the departure of Peter from Antioch three years, or according to St. Jerome's version, two years before the ordination of Evodius. The chronology of the early bishops of Antioch has lately been investigated by Harnack (Die Zeit des Ignatius). He notices that the chronicle of Eusebius does not, as in the case of the bishops of Rome and Alexandria, accompany the name of each bishop of Antioch with a note of the length of his episcopate; but on the other hand that it does not abstain from assigning a date for the accession of each, as in the case of the bishops of Jerusalem, where Eusebius owns to having no chronological information. He infers that the earliest list must have contained only names of bishops of Antioch without any note of lengths of episcopates, but still that Eusebius must have had the work of some preceding chronologer to guide him. He tries to prove that this work was the chronicle of Africanus, and also that Africanus had without any real chronological information put down dates for the accession of each bishop on the old traditional list, according to an arbitrary scheme of his own. Harnack's supposed discovery of the principle of this scheme may be rejected as a mere ingenious fancy (see Hilgenfeld's review, Zeitschrift, 1878, p. 409); but we may well believe that Eusebius got his chronology of early bishops of Antioch from Africanus, to whom he acknowledges his obligation, and whose chronicle has generally been believed to be the basis of that of Eusebius. If the belief had been entertained at the beginning of the 3rd century that Evodius had been ordained by Peter, it is unlikely that Africanus would have omitted to mention the name of any ordainer, and incredible that he would have assigned a date to the event which absolutely excludes an ordination by Peter. It deserves to be remarked that the Clementine Recognitions do not mention Evodius, though his ordination by Peter would have been the natural termination of the work if the author had heard of any such tradition; and also that Tertullian (de Praescrip. 32) is silent about it in a place where we might have expected him to mention it. The explanation of the date assigned by the chronicle of Eusebius to the accession of Evodius is revealed, on inspecting it in the form given by Jerome, where we find three consecutive entries in three consecutive years, giving the assumption by Peter of the episcopate of Rome, and the appointment of Mark and Evodius respectively to the bishoprics of Alexandria and of Antioch. It is apparent that these dates have no historic value, and that their order merely expresses the order in dignity of the three sees in the time of the chronologer. Thus, while we accept the episcopate of Evodius as a historic fact, we have data for fixing the time of his accession; but we may safely say that it was considerably later than the year 42.

EVODIUS (2), ST., seventh bishop of Le Puy, succeeding St. Paulianus and followed by St. Scutarius. He transferred the episcopal seat from Bœcium (urbs Vellavorum) to Anicium (Le Puy) (cf. Migne, Patr. Lat. lxxi. 557, n). Here he built a church, and dedicated it to the Blessed Virgin, and later was buried there. His popular name is St. Vory, and he is commemorated on Nov. 11 and 12. (Gall. Christ. ii. 689; Le Comte, Ann. Eccl. Franc. a. 508, n. vi. tom. i. p. 340.)

EVODIUS (3), bishop of Uzalis in proconsular Africa, not far from Utica. (Aug. Civ. D. xiii. 21.) Born, as well as St. Augustine, at Tagaste, he became intimate with him at Milan, A.D. 385 or 386, and the friendship thus begun lasted through life. He was at first a soldier, but left the army on becoming a Christian, in which all-important change he preceded his friend. Having determined to return to Africa the two friends journeyed together as far as Ostia, where Monica, the mother of Augustine, died. Augustine relates how, after her death, Evodius took the lead among the assembled company in chanting Ps. c. (Aug. Conf. ix. 8, 12.)

In the course of their subsequent lives, Augustine and Evodius frequently exchanged letters, and in two treatises written in the form of dialogues, the latter is represented by Augustine as the interlocutor with himself. One of these dialogues, De Quantitate Animæ, was written A.D. 388, the other, De Libero Arbitrio, begun about the same time, was not finished till 395. Four letters of Evodius to Augustine are extant, numbered in the list 158, 160, 161, 163, all written about 414, and one is mentioned as having failed to reach its destination. No. 158 gives an account of the edifying death in the monastery in which Evodius was then living, of a youth, his secretary, the son of Armenus, a presbyter of Melita, and of an apparition of him after death to a widow named Urbica. Upon this last he propounds to Augustine various speculative questions concerning the condition of the departed. In his reply to this (Ep. 159) Augustine declares his inability to solve all his friend's questions, and refers him to his twelfth book, de Sacra, which he was intending to republish. He appeals, however, to the experience of many persons as to the reality of apparitions, especially mentioning one which occurred to a young physician named Gennadius, whose doubts concerning the future life had been removed thereby. In No. 160, Evodius proposes to Augustine an obscure metaphysical question as to the priority of time of reason or of the Deity. We cannot understand about God, he says, without the aid of reason. Therefore reason seems to be anterior in time to God, and as reason helps to demonstrate the being of God, so the Son's existence demonstrates the being of the Father. In No. 161 he propounds further questions concerning the resurrection, and finds fault with certain expressions used by Augustine in a letter to Volusianus, which he had plainly misunderstood. (Ep. 137.) In his reply to these letters (Ep. 162), Augustine complains mildly of his friend for overloading him with hard questions, some of them so difficult as scarcely to be understood even by such men as Evodius, still less by many who will read the replies to them. He refers him to books of his which he supposes he must have forgotten, explains his language in the letter to Volusianus (137), and points out the fallacies of his friend's illustrations of the points proposed by him. The treatises referred to appear to be the following: Aug. de Animæ Quantitate, i. 1035-1080, A.D. 388; de Libero Arbitrio, i. 1222-1310, A.D. 388-395; de Vera Religione, vol. iii. 122-171; de Genesi, iii. 174-485, A.D. 389, 390; de Trinitate, viii. 821-1098, A.D. 400-416. In No. 163, Evodius asks Augustine for his opinion concerning the "spirits in prison" of 1 Pet. iii. 18, 19, and on other points. In his reply (Ep. 164), Augustine says that it cannot be denied that our Lord descended "ad inferos," and released some who were there from suffering of some kind, of these no doubt Adam was one, though Scripture is silent on this point. He also replies (Ep. 169) to questions put by Evodius concerning the Trinity and the dove descending on our Lord at His baptism, and mentions in this letter books which he had addressed to St. Jerome and Orosius on other subjects.

It is evident that Evodius was a warm friend, but remarkable more for activity of mind than for soundness of judgment. In a letter to Proculianus, Donatist bishop of Hippo, Augustine mentions a discussion which took place between him and Evodius, in which the latter had shewn some heat of temper, which he requests Proculianus to forgive. (Ep. 33, A.D. c. 395.)

He is mentioned, together with a person named Comes, in a letter of Paulinus to Alypius, in reference to a MS. of the history of Eusebius. Paulinus had borrowed the MS. from St. Donat, and requests that Evodius and Comes will transcribe it in order not to deprive him of his book. (Aug. Ep. 24, A.D. 394.)

Evodius took part in the council of Carthage, A.D. 401, in which the delinquencies of Equitius bishop of Hippo Diarrhytus were condemned, and he was appointed, in conjunction with Augustine, Theasius, and eighteen other bishops to take steps for removing him and appointing a successor. At the same council and at a subsequent one held at the same place in 404, various decrees were passed concerning Donatists, and in this last named year Evodius and Theasius were deputed to request Honorius that the laws against the Donatists should be enforced, and that Equitius should be punished. (See i. 891.) The part taken by Evodius and his colleague appears to have aroused intense hatred among the Donatists, by whom they were stigmatized as habitual persecutors and murderers. (Mon. Vet. de Don. Hist. (Oberthür), p. 523.) In 408 he was sent with other bishops on a mission to the pagans and heretics of Africa, by which last term the Donatists may probably be understood. In this undertaking Restitutus and Florentius lost their lives through violence, and Evodius, Theasius, and Victor suffered personal injury. (Bruns. Cod. Eccl. Afr. 106. pl. i. p. 188.) In 416 he joined with Augustine and other bishops in a remonstrance against the Pelagians addressed to Innocent, bishop of Rome (Aug. Epp. 177, 183). In 425 he is mentioned by Augustine as a trustworthy witness to the miracles said to have been performed at Uzalis by the relics of St. Stephen. (Aug. Serm. 323, 324, vol. v. p. 1446; De Civ. Dei, xxii. S. U. vol. vii. p. 768.) About 426 we find him appealed to by Valentinus, abbat of a monastery at Adrumetum to settle some disputes among the brothers, but they declined to accept his mediation. Part of his answer, discovered by Sirmond, is printed in a note to the letter (216). A treatise De Fide, against the Manichaeans, printed in the works of St. Aug. vol. viii. p. 1140-1154, has been attributed to Evodius. [H. W. P.]

EVODIUS (4) (EVODUS), ST., bishop of Rouen, placed by the authors of the Gallia Christiana (xi. 9), on the authority of the oldest catalogues, tenth on the list, following Innocentius and succeeded by Silvester, about the middle of the 5th century. But some put him about a century later, relying on the Acta (given in Boll. Acta SS. Oct. iv. 246), which make him contemporary with Clotaire. The Acta, however, are probably spurious. He is said to have died at Andelys, and was buried in the church of St. Mary at Rouen, but his remains were later transferred to the church of St. Remigius, afterwards called St. Yved after him, at Braine, in the diocese of Soissons. He is commemorated Oct. 8. [S. A. B.]

EVODIUS (5), bishop of Sauma, who signed the synodal letter of the council of Chalcedon to Leo I. (Leo. Mag. Ep. 90, 1105, Migne). Baluze and subsequent editors of Acta Conciliorum read EVOLTIUS bishop of Zeugma. [C. G.]

EVODIUS (6) (ENNODIUS), to whom Sidonius Apollinaris writes a letter (iv. 8) sending him an epigram to be inscribed upon a silver basin which Evodius intends to present to Ragnahilda, wife of Euric, king of the Visigoths. (Ceill. x. 397.) [R. T. S.]

EVODIUS (7), fifteenth bishop of Troyes, following Lupus II., and succeeded by Modegisilus, in the first half of the 7th century. Le Cointe identifies him with a bishop Evodius, who made an exchange of some lands with St. Desiderius of Auxerre. He is omitted from Gams's list. (Le Cointe, Ann. Eccl. Franc. an. 631 n. xvi. tom. ii. 843; Gall. Christ. xii. 487; Gams, Series Episc. 643.) [S. A. B.]

EVODIUS (8), a martyr at Antioch under Galba or Otho. Commemorated May 6. (Mart. Us.) [T. S. B.]

EVODIUS (9) (EVODES), Dec. 22, martyr in Bithynia with his mother Theodota in the Diocletian persecution under Leucadius the prefect. (Basil. Menol.; Aug. 2, Mart. Us.) [G. T. S.]

EVODIUS (10), martyr at Syracuse with Hermogenes. Commemorated April 25. (Mart. Hier.; Mart. Usuard.) [T. S. B.]

EVODUS. See also EVODIUS.

EVOLDUS, bishop of Vienne. [EOALDUS.]

EVOLUSUS—May 15. Monk and martyr with Abdas and Ebedjesus, A.D. 375. [ELIABUS.] [G. T. S.]

EVOLIUS, bishop of Avignon. [EBULUS.]

EVOLIUS (Gall. Chr. ii. 509), bishop of Limoges. [EUSULUS.]

EVOLTIUS (EUORCIUS), bishop of Zeugma in the Syrian province of Euphratesia. His name appears also as Evolcius, and in Greek as Εβόκιος. The name of his see appears also on coins as Ζευγματέων (Smith's Dict. of Gr. and Rom. Geogr. s. v.) Present at the council of Antioch in A.D. 448 (Harduin, Concil. ii. 515 B), and at Chalcedon in 451. He signs the synodical letter of the latter council to Leo I. (Leo Mag. Ep. 98, 1105, Migne), but here his name appears as Evodius, bishop of Sauma, q. v. [C. G.]

EVOPTIUS, a native of Cyrene, succeeded his elder brother Synesius, as bishop of Ptolemais, the chief city of the Libyan Pentapolis, c. A.D. 430. He was one of the leading prelates at the council of Ephesus, A.D. 431 (Labbe, Concil. iv. 285), and was one of the seven bishops deputed by the Cyrillian party to lay their case before the emperor. (Labbe, Concil. iii. 784.) He sent Cyril Theodoret's condemnation of his anathematisms, for which courtesy Cyril thanked him in a gracious letter. (Ibid. iv. 887, 490; Liberat. c. ix. p. 41.) [E. V.]

EVORIC, king of the Visigoths. [EURIC.]

EVORTIUS (EVURTUS), often in the English Calendar ENURCHUS, bishop of Orleans, appearing in one Martyrology as a martyr, but in all other records as confessor. The question of his date depends on his identification with Eortius, whose name is subscribed to the acts of the council of Valence A.D. 374. The Bollandist biographer argues at great length against this identification, and places Evortius under Constantine; but the other opinion is maintained by Tillemont. The acts of this bishop, assigned by the Bollandist to the 6th, by Tillemont to the 8th century, are so filled with fables that nothing trustworthy can be extracted from them. (Acta SS. Sept. 7; Tillemont, Mém. viii. 555; Gams, Ser. Ep. 592.) [R. T. S.]

EVOTUS. [SARAGOSSA, MARTYRS OF.]

EVREMUND. [EBREMUND.]

EVRESIUS, bishop of Termessus in the second Pamphylia, one of the Nicene fathers, A.D. 325. (Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 1019; Mansi, ii. 695.) [L. D.]

EVRIKHORIUS, bishop of Lagania. [EVRICHOREUS.]

EVROU, ST. [EBRULFUS.]

EVURTUS. [EVORTIUS.]

EWA, ST., gave name to the Cornish parish of St. Ewe, west of Mevagissey. John of Timmouth, Capgrave's predecessor in collecting the lives of the saints, spells the name "Iwy" (see appendix to Ritson's Arthur, p. 166). The church sometimes has the prefix "Lan" (Prynne's Records, iii. 202, "Langewe in Poudreshire"), which seems to be prefixed in Domesday to most of the Cornish parishes of British origin that are mentioned there. [C. W. B.]

EWAIN, EWEN. In the short prose chronicle which precedes the metrical in the Chronicon Elegiacum (Skene, Chron. Picts and Scots, 177), the following obits are given of kings of the Scots in direct lineal succession, viz., Iona, A.D. 741; Murezant, A.D. 744; Ewen, A.D. 747; Hed (Abbas), A.D. 777; Fergus, A.D. 804. From this chronicon they appear to have been inserted in the Chronicle of Melrose (Gale, Ed. Angl. Script. t. i. pp. 136-7). But with the names more or less altered they appear in the other Sotic Chronicles (Skene, ib. 130, 149, 171, 287, 305). Allowing for the uncertainty of dates and nominal forms, these are evidently Echa (Achy, Eocoidh, Eugenius) III. c. A.D. 706-733; Muredach, c. A.D. 733-736; Eogan (Achy, Eugenius), c. A.D. 736-739; Aodh Fin or Edna (latinized Etfinus, by translation Hed Abbas, erroneously Abbas), c. A.D. 739-769; and Fergus, c. A.D. 769-772. [J. G.]

EWAL (Cressy, Ch. Hist. Britt. ix. 19, 1), Cornish saint. [EWAL.] [C. H.]

EWALD. [HEWALD.]

EWEN, in the anonymous fragment which forms the earliest extant life of St. Kentigern, is acknowledged to have been the basis of Jocelin's fuller narrative, is the name of the mother of St. Kentigern's mother, and the father of St. Kentigern. He is there called "Ewen filius Erwagende nobilissima Brittonum prosopis ortus"; and again, "In gestis historiarum [Brittonum?] vocatur Ewen filius regis Ulien" (Dr. Forbes, S. Nis. and S. Kent. 245). Jocelin gives no name. Brev. Aberd. has "patre Ewen Eufurell." This Ewen or Eugenius is evidently Owain, son of Urien Rheged, whose name is so familiar in the Welsh poetry of Taliesin and other bards (Skene, Four Anc. Books of Wales, pass.); he is the Ywaine, Ewen, Owen, Owain, of the Romances and Welsh Ywain, in both of which he is represented as a valiant warrior, with his father Uriance, and at last slain in battle by Flamddwyn, i.e. Theodric King of Bernicia (A.D. 580-587). Geoffrey of Monmouth (Hist. i. c. 1) calls him Eventus, and represents him as the honoured friend of king Arthur, as the nephew of Angusel, king of Abania, and of Lot, the ruler of Lothian, and as himself the ruler of Moray by special gift from Arthur. It is probably from this bardic and legendary source that the anonymous writer of the time of Herbert, bishop of Glasgow ventured to name Ewen as the father of his country patron and literary hero. (See Ritson, Met. Rom. iii. 225 sq.; Williams, Emisia. Welsh. 18; Ross, Welsh Saints, 261.) [J. G.]

EWINUS, ST., or Uni, brother of St. Ila and St. Erna, and patron saint of Uny-Lelant, in the Hayle estuary, where St. Ila landed. His feast-day was Feb. 1 (eve of the Purification), and the parish feast of Lelant is still on the Sunday nearest to Feb. 1, the tendency having been to carry the feasts on to the next Sunday. Lelant (a corruption of Lanant) is the mother church to St. Ives (Ia) and Towednack, and St. Ives has chapels in several of the neighbouring parishes (see Leland, Itin. iii. p. 10; Oliver's Antiquities Dioc. Exon. p. 75, 440, 442; Whitham's Cathedral of Cornwall, ii. p. 4 and 99).

William of Worcester says "Sanctus Vuy (misprint for Uny), frater sancti Herygh, jacet in ecclesia parochiali Sancti Vuy prope villam Lalant super mare boriale per tria miliaria de Mont-Myghell; ejus dies agitur die prime Februarii." [C. W. B.]

EXACIONITAE. [EXOCIONITAE.]

EXARNUS, bishop of Ossonoba, who signed the acts of the council of Merida, 666, in the eighteenth year of Rekesvinth. (Mansi, xi. 89; Loaisa, Concil. Hisp. ff. 523; Esp. Sagr. xiv. 219; Aguirre-Catalani, iv. 207.) [M. A. W.]

EXCALOEATI, superstitious people classed as heretics by Philaster (81), followed by Augustine (68). They counted it a duty to walk barefoot in obedience to God's command to Moses (Ex. iii. 5), and in imitation of Isaiah (xx. 3).

[G. S.]

EXCOMMUNICATION (excommunicatio) strictly construed = the judicial act excluding individuals or churches from communion, or participation in the sacrament of the Eucharist. It is thus stronger than ἀκοινωνησία, which is, in fact, its effect; and more specific than ἀφορισμός or ἀνάθεμα, though it is implied in both. For nobody was ever cast out of the church or placed under anathema who was admissible to communion; yet people were constantly refused communion without being anathematized or cast out of the church as well. Higher privileges might be suspended without involving the loss of the lower; but forfeiture of the lower presupposed that of the highest. The highest privilege to which the church could admit was the sacrament in which Christ was given and received. None with the best dispositions could be admitted to it who had not been baptized: nor any that had been baptized, but were living in unrepented sin. Probably there is no recorded instance of excommunication, as such, in the New Testament unless the command, τὸ τοιοῦτον μὴδὲ συνεισθῆναι (1 Cor. v. 11), interpreted by xi. 29, may be supposed one; and probably the first recorded of it in ecclesiastical history was supplied by Pope Victor in his dispute with the churches of Asia Minor about Easter—ἀκοινωνήτους ἔρδην πάντας τοὺς ἐκείσε ἀνακηρύττων ἀδελφούς (Euseb. E. H. v. 24). This is the more curious, as the Latin word for it has really no Greek equivalent. Hence St. Athanasius, in affirming the same thing of the bishops who met at Seleucia, has to use the same phrase—'Ακοινωνήτους πεποιήκασι 'Αστέριον, Εὐσέβιον, &c. (de Syn. § 12), there being no such word in use as ἀκοινωεῖν. The Greeks had a delicacy, no doubt, in associating ecclesiastical censure so directly with a subject of so much awe. This is, however, the point of view to which our attention should be confined here; viz. exclusion from the sacrament, and its effects, so far as they are spiritual, and concern the soul; according to the teaching of the Fathers. For explanations of the term in church-law, where it is commonly taken in a much wider sense, as Albaspinaeus has shewn (Observ. Eccl. i. 1; comp. Marii Alter. de Cens. Eccl. lib. i. disp. ii. c. 1); and for the ritual and penal consequences at different times connected with it in either sense, see the DICTIONARY OF ANTIQUITIES and of the BIBLE, s. v

Heathen, says Morinus (Exerc. ii. 1), had many ways of expressing fellowship or communion with each other in their various mysteries: Christians have but one. Their fellowship with each other is founded, and wholly depends, on their communion with Christ, that is, on His abiding presence within them. Thus the Eucharist is, spiritually, the bond of bonds that holds them together: hence called τὸ τέλειον in the Ancyran canons (4-6), τὸ ἀγαθόν by St. Basil (Ep. can. i. 4), and "pax" by St. Cyprian (Ep. liv. ed. Ben.). Persons with no bar between them and the Eucharist were said to be in full communion of the church—laity when they were free to receive: clergy when they were free to administer as well as receive. He that administered, and he that received communion, without let or hindrance of any kind, in his parish church, was in living communion with Christ, and, through Him, with the church militant throughout the world, and with the church triumphant in heaven. This was the realization of the true Passover—"in una domo comedetur"—as the Fathers say, from St. Cyprian downwards (Ep. lxxvi. ed. Ben.). There was no more favoured condition on earth than his. But, when either clergy or laity were refused communion by their bishop, or when their bishop was refused communion by his compeers, or metropolitan, or by a general council, this happy condition was always obscured, and for the most part impaired—not always impaired: for in case communion was refused on unjust grounds by any that had the power of refusing it, living communion with Christ was not held to be interrupted, though outward participation in His sacrament was for a time denied. The principle, that God has not limited His power to the sacraments, was older than the sacraments themselves; but so far as the ecclesiastical sentence was concerned, it remained in force, till it had been removed by the power inflicting it, or by a superior power. Now, what were its effects supposed to be, when it had been inflicted with justice? "Sacramentum fidelium agnoscunt fideles," says St. Augustine (Serm. cxxxi. § 1, ed. Ben.). And as they know what they get in it, so they know, likewise, what they lose, when they are refused it on just grounds, or absent themselves from it with deliberate purpose. It was this universal instinct, doubtless, that influenced the authors of the primitive liturgies everywhere to order the recital of the Lord's Prayer by all, before communion was given; and gave rise to the tradition mentioned by pope Gregory I. (Ep. lib. ix. 12) that the apostles employed no prayer in the breaking of bread but that one: the daily bread for which they asked in that prayer being, pre-eminently, "the bread from heaven," which they received then. It was intended to be the daily food of the soul, in their opinion, as what they ate and drank was of the body. Thus St. Cyprian: "Panis vitae Christus est . . . et quo modo dicimus Pater noster, quia intelligentium et credentium Pater est, sic et panem nostrum vocamus, quia Christus eorum, qui corpus Ejus contingunt, panis est. Hunc autem panem dari nobis quotidiè postulamus, ne qui in Christo sumus, et Eucharistiam quotidiè ad cibum salutis accipimus, intercedente aliquo graviore delicto, dum abstenti et non communicantes a celesti pane prohibemur, a Christi corpore sepa-

remur: Ipso praedicante et monente: 'Ego sum panis vitae, Qui de coelo descendi. Si quis ederit de Meo pane, vivet in aeternum. Panis autem, quem Ego dederò, caro mea est pro seculi vitâ' . . . Quando ergò dicit in aeternum vivere, si quis ederit de Ejus pane, ut manifestum est eos vivere, qui corpus Ejus attingunt, et Eucharistiam jure communicationis accipiunt: ita contrà timendum est et orandum, ne dum quis abstentus separatur a Christi corpore, procul remaneat a salute: comminante Ipso et dicente: 'Nisi ederitis carnem Filii Hominiæ, et biberitis Ejus sanguinem, non habebitis vitam in vobis' . . . Et idèd Panem nostrum, id est, Christum dari nobis quotidiè petimus, ut qui in Christo manemus et vivimus, a sanctificatione Ejus et corpore non recedamus" (de Orat. Dom. ad Verba). Such was the general view taken of this petition in primitive times, and irrespectively of the explanations given to the word ἐπιούσιος. This, according to St. Cyril of Jerusalem = ἐπὶ τῇ ὀψείᾳ τῆς ψυχῆς κατασπόμενος (Catech. xxiii. 15). It was rendered by the Latins in general "quotidianus," whence St. Isidore, "panis quotidianus, qui vel animæ, vel carni tribuitur, hic exposcitur" . . . (Ecc. Off. i. 15): and St. Augustine, "non miremur, si nominato pane, et cetera necessaria intelligantur" (Serm. lviii. § 5, ed. Ben.); but then he adds: "Ergò, panem nostrum, &c. quid est? Sic vivamus, ut ab altari tuo non separemur." And in another sermon (lix. § 6), he asks, in reference to the next petition: "Quid est quod oramus, nisi ne malum aliquid admittamus, unde a tali pane separemur." . . . Thus excluding a man from the Eucharist was thought in those times equivalent to depriving him of the daily bread of his soul: and this St. Cyprian tells Pope Cornelius should never be lightly done, shewing from two subjoined cases what his own practice was. The first was that of the lapsed. "Statueramus jampridem, frater carissime, participato invicem nobiscum consilio, ut qui in persecutionis infestatione supplantati ab adversario, et lapsi fuissent . . . agerent diu penitentiam plenam: et si periculum infirmitatis urgeret, pacem sub ictn mortis acciperent." . . . What he meant by "pacem" is shewn in the next case: viz. of those who had stood firm. "At verbi non infirmis, sed fortibus pax necessaria est: nec morientibus, sed viventibus, communicatio a nobis danda est: ut quos excitamus, et hortamur ad praelium, non inermes et nudos relinquamus: sed protectione sanguinis et corporis Christi muniamus. Et cum ad hoc fiat Eucharistia, ut possit accipientibus esse tutela, quos tutos esse contra adversarium volumus, munimento Dominicae salutis armemus. Nam quomodò docemus aut provocamus eos in confessione nominis sanguinem suum fundere, si iis militaturis Christi sanguinem denegamus? Aut quomodò ad martyrii poculum idoneos facimus, si non eos prius ad bibendum in ecclesiâ poculum Domini jure communicationis admittimus?" . . . He allows, indeed, that his tenderness might be abused: e.g. "Si, quod Dominus avertat a fratribus nostris, aliquis lapsorum fefellerit, ut pacem subdolè petat, et impendentis praelii tempore communicationem non praeliaturus accipiat, se ipsum fallit et decipit, qui aliud corde occultat, et aliud voce pronuntiat. Nos, in quantum nos et videre et judicare conceditur, faciem singulorum videmus: cor scrutari et mentem perire non possumus." . . . (Ep. liv. ed. Ben.). It was in this spirit that the 2nd canon of the fifth council of Orleans, A.D. 549, was conceived: "Ut nullus sacerdotum quemquam rectae fidei hominem pro parvis et levibus causis a communione suspendat: praeter eas culpas pro quibus antiqui Patres ab ecclesiis arceri jussissent committentes" (ap. Cabass. Notit. Eccl. p. 51, with the note). And by the 5th Nicene council were directed to be held in every province twice a year, expressly to prevent bishops abusing their powers (Ib. p. 111). Further, in these passages we have the "ancient and canonical law of the church, as it is called in the 13th Nicene canon, on communicating all persons in extremis" (Ib. p. 115), paraphrased and acted upon everywhere to this day: notwithstanding that another law of equal antiquity, and founded on the same principle, has been so widely departed from, that its contradictory may now be become the rule. "All the faithful," says the 7th apostolic canon (v. Cotel. ad l.), "who enter God's holy church and hear the sacred scriptures read, yet wait not for the communion office, nor for holy communion, are to be cast out (ἀποπέμψονται), as causing disorder in church." Theodore, Amalarius, and Zonaras all acknowledge the drift of this canon, though it has become a dead letter in their day, and make no attempt at reconciling it with non-communicating attendance. The practice of communicating infants, also founded on the same principle, has been laid aside with more reason. But there can be no doubt that, in the mind of the fathers, all adults who refrain from communicating when they have the opportunity, and acting in conscience to excuse their act, commit a sin worthy of excommunication, and incur a total loss of grace in proportion, each time they thus stay away. Nor was every sin held to justify non-communicating. Daily sins arising from infirmity which we cannot help, were held to be cancelled by the daily saying of the Lord's Prayer—"quotidiana nostra mundatio," as St. Augustine therefore calls it (de Nupt. et Con. i. 33; comp. de Civ. Dei, xxi. 27; de Pecc. Mer. et Rem. iii. 13; and Op. imp. c. Jul. ii. 112), if said from the heart. Sins of graver nature, as being due to deliberate purpose, required a more severe discipline: not indeed because they could be resisted even by the baptized without grace: but because grace was not forced upon the baptized against their will, and even when obtained by their prayers, it left their will free. "Quid est in libero arbitrio constitutum," asks St. Augustine, "quàm quod lex dicit, non adorandum idolum, non moechandum, non homicidium perpetrandum? Ista autem sunt, atque hujusmodi crimina, quae si quisquam commiserit, a corporis Christi communione removetur." This text shows he is speaking of the baptized alone: those for whom the Lord's Prayer was said in the sense explained by St. Cyprian. "Attamen: 'Dicimus, sanctificetur nomen Tuum, ut quod optemus Deo ut sanctificetur orationibus sanctis, sed quod petamus ab Eo ut nomen Tuum sanctificetur in nobis. Ceterum a quo Deus sanctificatur, Qui Ipse sanctificat? Sed quia Ipse dixit, Sancti estote, quoniam et Ego sanctus sum: id petimus et rogamus, ut qui in baptismo sanctificati sumus, in eo quod esse coepimus permaneamus.' . . . Numquid iste sanctus tam memorabilis ecclesiarum in verbo veritatis instructor, liberum arbitrium negat esse in hominibus, quia Deo totum tribuit quod rectè vivimus? Numquid legem Dei culpat, quia non ex ipsa justificari hominem significat: quandoquidem quod illa jubet, a Domino Deo precibus impetrandum esse declarat?" . . . (C. Ep. Pelag. iv. 9). The baptized had only to ask for grace to be kept from sin. They were, therefore, considered to be doubly responsible before God, whenever they sinned by choice; and to be barred from the Eucharist by every such sin till it had been forgiven. How, then, was forgiveness of such sins to be had? By "the ministry of that reconciliation," as the apostle calls it (2 Cor. v. 18-19), wherewith "God had reconciled the world to Himself in Christ," committed by Christ to His church. As Theodoret has paraphrased his meaning: 'Ἐδωρήσατο τῶν ἀμαρτημάτων τὴν ἄφεσιν, καὶ ἡμᾶς ὑπηρέτας τῆς εἰρήνης ἐχειροτόνησεν. Or as St. Cyril has paraphrased our Lord's (John xx. 21-3): "Summing up the institution of the apostleship in a few words, He tells them, that He sends them as the Father had sent Him: that they might thus feel it to be their duty to call sinners to repentance, and heal those that were diseased in mind or body, and ever seek in their ministry, not their own will, but the will of Him who sent them, and do their utmost to keep the world in His teaching." . . .

It was in the spirit of this injunction that a system of canonical discipline was gradually framed for those who had fallen into such sins as should exclude them from the Eucharist: for those to whom there could be no doubt those words of the apostle would apply: "Whosoever shall eat this bread, and drink this cup of the Lord unworthily, shall be guilty of the body and blood of the Lord." Such sacrilege the church owed it to herself, as well as to her members, to prevent. "Quod non statim Domini corpus inquinatis manibus accipiat, aut ore polluto Domini sanguinem bibat, sacerdotibus sacrilegus irascitur," says St. Cyprian of the lapsed of his day. And again, more fully: "Quandò occurrat Scriptura Divina, et clamet et dicat: 'Omnis mundus manducabit carnem: et anima quaecunque manducaverit ex carne sacrificii salutaris, quod est Domini, et immunditia ipsius super ipsum est, peribit anima illa de populo suo' (Lev. vii. 19, 20). Apostolus item testetur et dicat: 'Non potestis calicem Domini bibere, et calicem demoniorum: non potestis mensae Domini communicare, et mensae demoniorum' (1 Cor. x. 21). Idem contumacibus et pervicacibus comminatur et denuntiat, dicens: 'Quicumque ederit panem aut biberit calicem Domini indignè, reus erit corporis et sanguinis Domini' (Ib. xi. 27): spretis his omnibus et contemptis, ante expiata delicta, ante exomologesim factam criminis, ante purgationem conscientiam sacrificio et manu sacerdotis, ante offensam placatam indignantis Domini et minantis, vis infertur corpori Ejus et sanguini: et plus modò in Dominum manibus atque ore delinquant, quàm cum Dominum negaverunt" . . . (De Laps. circa med.). Public opinion sided unanimously with the church in putting a bar between all such offenders and the church's holiest rite: and was content that the church should decide what that bar should be. Public opinion went with the priest in all ages, though discipline might vary from age to age, when turning to the people with the sacrament ready for distribution in his hands, he proclaimed "Sancta, sanctis," meaning that such as were leading unholy lives had no right to be there, but came thither at their peril. For his words implied both a warning on the part of God, and an inhibition on the part of the church. A warning, in the words of St. Augustine: "Quam multi de altari accipiunt, et moriuntur: et accipiendo moriuntur. Unde dicit Apostolus: 'Judicium sibi manducat et bibit.' Non enim buccella Dominica venenum fuit Judae. Et tamen accepit: et cum accepit, in eum inimicus intravit. Non quia malum accepit, sed quia bonum male malus accepit. Videte ergo, fratres, Panem coelestem spiritaliter manducate, innocentiam ad altare apportate" (In Joan. Tract. xxvi. § 11). An inhibition, in the words of St. Ambrose: "Apostolus docet ut separemus nos ab omni fratre inquiete agente. Percutiamus eum gladio spirituali, qui est Verbum Dei. Non fratris, non propinqui accipiamus personam: sed omnem immundum a Christi secernamus altaribus, ut emendet et corrigat lapsus suos, quod ad sacramenta Christi redire mereatur" (De El. et Jejun. § 82). As he told the emperor Theodosius to his face: "I dare not offer the sacrifice, should you elect to be present: for how can what is unlawful for the slayer of one innocent person be conceded to the slayer of many?" . . . (Ep. 51, ed. Ben.). "Or how will you extend hands reeking with blood unjustly spilt to receive the Lord's body: or approach the mouth, that illegally sanctioned the slaughter of so many persons in wrath, to His precious blood? Withdraw, then: and far from endeavouring to aggravate one crime by another, accept the sentence which God, the Master of all things, confirms: its whole design being to promote your cure" . . . (Theodor. E. H. v. 18). Even when soldiers were sent by Valentinian, in the Arian interest, to occupy his church, his orders were: "ut abetinerentur a communionis consortio" (Ep. i. § 20). For, as he says elsewhere: "Sequestrari oportet graviter lapsum, ne modicum fermentum totam massam corrumpat. . . . Et bene dicit 'expurgandum,' non projiciendum: quod enim expurgatur, non totum judicatur inutile. Ideo enim purgatur, ut utili ab inutili separetur. Quod autem projicitur, nihil in se utile habere creditur" . . . (De Poen. i. 15). And there was yet a further limitation which was always implied: viz. that nobody should be so debarred for offences that were not either proved or owned. The acts of Theodosius, and of the soldiers of Valentinian, were public acts that proved themselves. Bishops might use too much precipitation in cases that were less obvious. "Et ita fit," as Origen says (in Lev. xiv. 3), "ut interdum ille qui foras mittitur, intus sit: et ille foris, qui intus retineri videtur." . . . Accordingly St. Augustine was most explicit on this point. "Nos a communione prohibere quoniam non possumus," he says (Serm. cccli. § 10), quavis haec prohibitio nondum sit mortalis, sed medicinalis, nisi aut sponte confessum, aut in aliquo, sive saeculari sive ecclesiastico, iudicio nominatum atque convictum. Quis enim sibi utrumque audeat assumere, ut cuiquam ipse sit et accusator et iudex." One effect of this caution on the part of the church would of course be, that three parts of the crimes committed would escape punishment, if not observation, unless voluntarily confessed: and thus every person would be left judge, in most cases, of his own fitness to communicate—in most cases: in all cases, that is, where the sin committed was not one of those proscribed in the canons, and for which consequently no canonical penance was incurred. Offenders of this sort naturally formed a limited class: and all belonging to it understood themselves to be debarred, ipso facto, not merely from communicating, but from worshipping with the faithful in any way, till they had performed their penance to the satisfaction of their bishop, which, of course, could not be done without making known their sin, and during the whole period under consideration this was a public act, and there was a set time for performing it. As St. Eligius, bishop of Noyon (A.D. 640) has it in the first of his homilies on Maundy Thursday: "Ut igitur audivit vestra dilectio, haec omnis pedum lotio nostrorum peccatorum est purgatio: unde non incongrue hac ipsa die, sicut ecclesiae tenet consuetudo, penitentium fit reconciliatio. Ut enim ante nos dictum est a Patribus, cum tanta est plaga peccati atque impetus morbi, ut medicamenta corporis et sanguinis Domini differenda sint, auctoritate antistitis debet se quisque ab altario remove ad agenda penitentiam, et eadem auctoritate reconciliari. Lectum quippe modo est: 'Qui manducat et bibit indignè,' &c. Hoc enim est indignè illud accipere qui accipiat eo tempore, quo debet penitentiam agere. Unde mihi ad vos, O fratres, nunc habendus est sermo, quos mater sancta praesens ecclesia nostro officio hodiè reconciliat Deo. . . . In reconciliatione autem vestra, nolite nos episcopos attendere ut auctores, sed ut ministros: nam quis sit auctor manifestat idem egregius gentium doctor . . . 'Omnia autem ex Deo, Qui reconciliavit nos sibi per Christum.' Ecce per Quem fit reconciliatio: scilicet per Christum. . . ." (ap. Migne, Patrol. lxxvii. 610.) However, even such offenders might at times honestly doubt whether they had actually sinned to the extent contemplated in the canons: as, for instance, where their sin had been committed under compulsion or without full purpose, or had gone no further than thought or word, or been but half executed. And for the greater number of sins by far, there would be no external standard of any sort to gauge their precise gravity. In all such cases the church was content to insist on the general duties of self-examination and repentance, leaving, or rather committing, the execution of both to the individual conscience, where consciences were willing and strong enough to act for themselves, but always giving everybody the option of having recourse to her ministers for the exercise of those powers with which they had been entrusted by Christ. For sometimes it would happen that people were more severe with themselves in particular cases than was required, or were possessed by a morbid feeling of their general unworthiness and needed to be reassured; of such St. Ambrose says, "Severiores in se iudices sunt qui poenam praescribunt sibi, declinant remedium" (De Poen. ii. 9). This remark he applies in another place to himself: "Debeo illum semper accipere, ut semper mihi peccata dimittantur. Qui semper pecco, semper debeo habere medicinam" (De Sacr

iv. 6). Besides, the invitation was to all, as Theodoret says: "He calls the Lord's sacrament the Lord's Supper, as being partaken by all equally, whether rich or poor, slaves or masters, rulers or subjects . . . open to all alike is the Lord's table" . . . (In 1 Cor. xi. 20); and St. Chrysostom: "The Lord's Supper," that is, "the Master's, ought to be common to all. For what belongs to the master is not the property of one servant more than another, but is shared by all alike (Ib. v. 21). Again, why should he remind us of that time, of that evening, when Christ was betrayed? Was it not that extra compunction might be excited in us from such remembrance? For let a person be a very stone, yet he could not think of Him on that night, first sorrowful with His disciples, then betrayed, bound, led away, condemned, and tormented to the extent He was, without feeling himself melt awfully like wax, and becoming dead to the things of this world (Ib. v. 23). If, then, you would approach for the Eucharist, see that you do nothing derogatory to the same, whether by smothering your brother, turning away from the hungry, drinking to excess, or exhibiting a want of respect to the church. You come to return thanks for all the mercies you have received; leave then accordingly, and be at one with your neighbour . . . (Ib. v. 24). Consider how the apostles employed themselves, whenever they partook of that holy feast; what time they devoted to prayer and psalm-singing; how they kept holy vigil . . . ; and do you come fasting to communion merely that you may appear in more sort fit to receive; but when you have received, instead of continuing your moderation, let it all go. Whereas, it is not of equal moment to be sober after and before, for you should be sober in both; but, of the two, most after having received the Bridegroom. You should be sober before receiving, in order to become worthy to receive; and after, in order not to appear unworthy of what you have received. What then? Should you fast after you have received? I don't say that. I would not force; I would not join it on you, though good it would be. I only exhort you not to give way to excess . . ." (Ib. v. 27). But "let a man prove himself." As he says in his 2nd Epistle: "Examine yourselves whether ye be in the faith; prove yourselves" (2 Cor. xiii. 5): not as we do now; measured rather by the time of year, than by soul of heart. For our thought is not to prepare ourselves so that we may come filled with compunction and purged from all our sins, but so that we may come on great festivals, and when everybody else comes. Such, however, was not the teaching of the apostle, whose reason for coming to communion was a pure conscience. For a festival, according to his teaching, was a manifestation of good works, uprightness of mind, and irreproachable conduct; possessed of these, you will be able to keep festival at all times, and to come to communion at all times too. It is for this reason he says: "Let a man prove himself, and so let him come," in other words, he bids each man not to have recourse to another, but to prove himself, leaving the tribunal to be without publicity and the proof without witnesses" . . . (Ib. v. 28). As Theodoret has it: "Be your own judge, and take accurate account of all the acts of your life; examine your conscience, and so receive the gift" (Ib.). One possible result of this teaching, of course, would be that the bad might frequently communicate side by side with the good. So they might, replied the Fathers, but it would be no more than Judas had done at the outset. Οὐ μόνον τοῖς ἑνδεκά ἀποστόλοις, ἀλλὰ καὶ τῷ προδότη, τοῦ τιμίου μετέδωκε σάματός τε καὶ αἵματος, as Theodoret says of our Lord on that occasion (Ib. v. 23-25), and St. Augustine was at no loss to discriminate between what each got by communicating. "Numquid Judas," he asks, "Magistri venditor et traditor impius, quamvis primum ipsum manibus ejus confectum sacramentum carnis et sanguinis Ejus cum ceteris discipulis, sicut apertius Lucas evangelista declarat, manducaret et biberet, mansit in Christo aut Christus in eo? Tam multi denique qui vel corde ficto carnem illam manducant et sanguinem bibunt, vel cum manducaverint et biberint, apostatae fiunt, numquid manent in Christo aut Christus in iis?" . . . (Serm. lxxi. § 17). For the Fathers, as they recognised two distinct parts in this sacrament, the outward and the inward, and made the Holy Ghost exclusively both the agent and dispenser of the inward, had no difficulty whatever in reconciling a real objective presence, as it is called, after His descent on the elements, with the reception of the outward part alone by every receiver, whose heart He found closed to the inward, that is, to Christ (art. EUCHARIST, near the end). Hence they denounced coming to communion for false purposes or in unrepented sin, as trifling with God in its worst form. "Not only," says Theodoret, "will you get no salvation from it by receiving unlawfully, but you will have penalties to pay for coming to it as a drunkard" (Ib. v. 29); and again, "if we took account of our actions and delivered a just verdict against ourselves, we should not receive chastisement from God; still even for the greatest offences He corrects us with mercy, to the end that we may not be given over to the destruction of the wicked" (Ib. v. 31). St. Ambrose adopts a sterner tone: "It is not sufficient for anybody to come who has been bidden, unless he has a wedding garment on, or faith combined with love. He, therefore, who brings not peace and charity with him to Christ's altar will be bound hand and foot, and thrust into outer darkness" (in Luc. vii. § 204). In the same spirit he says in another place (De Poen. i. 15): "Bene dicitur tradi Satanae, qui separatur a Christi corpore;" and in another: "Et ideo nemo in peccato positus arrogare sibi debet auctoritatem aut usurpationem sacramentorum" . . . (Ib. ii. 11), in other words, if a priest, let him not administer; if a layman, let him not receive.

There were thus, according to the Fathers, three descriptions of excommunicate persons in the sacramental, or strict, sense of the word:—
1. Persons excluded from the Eucharist by their bishop, or his superiors. 2. Persons excommunicating themselves virtually, by staying away when they were free to communicate. 3. Persons receiving in sin, whose mouths therefore received the sacrament, and yet the "res sacramenti" was never conveyed to their souls. Of these, the first might, as has been said, be debarred from the sacrament ever so long, without losing Christ, while the last could never, by receiving the sacrament ever so often, attain to Christ. Of the first, on the other hand, all who were justly debarred and of the second all who wilfully debarred themselves from it, became spiritually diseased; and unless they repented in time, spiritually dead at last. At first it was merely that their spiritual growth was arrested: but, in process of time, decay set in; the living bond that held them to Christ was detached fibre by fibre, till at length the branch and the vine parted company. "Unum de duobus palmiti congruit," as St. Augustine says: "aut vitis, aut ignis. Si in vite non est, in igne erit. Ut ergo in igne non sit, in vite sit." (In Johan. c. xv.; Tract. 81, § 3.)

In this the Fathers argued on principles of analogy from nature to grace, or from one channel of grace to another, as on kindred points. For if by a real participation of Adam's nature, we were truly liable to death: we needed a real participation of His nature, who is the second Adam, to be able truly to live again. The supernatural life sown in us at our baptism, moreover, needed supernatural alimentation to expand and grow: and must grow or wane, therefore, proportionably to the constant and copious, or the scant and stint supply that it received. Food likewise, they said, was only profitable to the body, when it was assimilated and taken up by the system: the purest and best food was powerless to impart vigour, and might be death, to a diseased frame. Water was the sacramental element under which new life was conveyed to man: bread and wine the sacramental elements under which its choicest aliment was assured to it: the Holy Ghost, finally, the agent and dispenser of both. In His hands, whatever might be the acts of His fallible ministers, neither could ever be stolen on false pretences: nor any defrauded of either, whose dispositions entitled them to their full benefit. Such were the principles by which the Fathers were guided in dispensing or withholding the Eucharist: and as long as principle and practice went hand in hand, one justified and explained the other. But such teaching was difficult to uphold, except in a non-natural sense, of which the hollowness was transparent, when practice declined: as the following instances may serve to show. It was about the end of the 6th century that St. Isidore wrote: Dicunt aliqui, nisi aliquo intercedente peccato, Eucharistiam quotidie accipiendam: hunc enim panem dari quotidie nobis, jubente Domino, postulamus dicentes. 'panem nostrum,' &c. Quod quidem bene dicunt si hoc cum religione et devotione et humilitate suscipiunt: nec, confidendo de justitia praesumptione id faciant. Ceterum, si talia sunt peccata, quae quasi mortuum ab altari removeant, prius agenda penitentia est, ac sic deinde hoc salutiferum medicamentum tunc suscipiendum, 'Qui enim manducaverit indignè,' etc. Hoc est enim indignè accipere, si eo tempore quis accipiat, quo debet agere penitentiam" . . . Church penances had their share in keeping people from communion, and making communions less frequent. Auricular confession produced similar effects later in the West. St. Isidore shews his sense of this, by repeating and supplementing St. Augustine (Ep. liv. § 4), in what follows: "Ceterum si non sunt tanta peccata, ut excommunicandus quisque judicetur, non se debet a medicinâ Domini corporis sepa-rare, ne, dum fortè diu abstinendus prohibetur, a Christi corpore separetur; manifestum est enim eos vivere, qui corpus Ejus attingunt. Unde etiam timendum est, ne, dum diu quisque separatur a Christi corpore, alienus remaneat a salute, Ipso dicente, 'Nisi comederitis carnem Filii hominis,' etc. Qui enim jam peccare quievit, communicare non desinat." . . . (De Eccl. Off. l. 18). A later writer of the same school (append. ad op. St. Isid. ed. Migne, de Eccl. Dogm. c. 53), says: "Quotidiè Eucharistiae communionem percipere non laudo, nec reprehendo. Omnibus tamen Dominicis diebus communicandum suadeo et hortor: si tamen mens sine affectu peccandi sit. . . . Sed hoc de illo dico, quem capitalia et mortalia peccata non gravant. Nam quem mortalia crimine post baptismum commissa premunt, hortor prius publicâ penitentia satisfacere: et ita sacerdotis judicio reconciliatum, communioni sociari: si vult non ad judicium et condemnationem sui Eucharistiam percipere" . . . as though the judgment of any priest could certify to the state of the heart. St. Eligius is much more primitive both in owning and meeting the difficulty. Starting from the well-known passage of St. Augustine, which St. Isidore dovetails, but which he quotes in full, he comments on it as follows: "Videte ergo, fratres, quia si separemini a corpore Domini, qui fideles estis, metuendum est ne fame moriamini. Si autem recipitis indignè, metuendum est ne iudicium manducetis et bibatis—angustiae vobis undique. Veritas dicit: si malè vivitis, in aeternum moriemini: at non potestis bene vivere, nisi Ille adjuverit, nisi Ille dederit. Ideò orate, et manducate; et implebitur os vestrum, laude Dei et exultatione, et dicetis Illi de magnis angustis liberati: 'Liberasti gressus meos subtus me, et non infirmata vestigia mea' " . . . Yet even he relapses into the spirit of the age in what follows, unless this was added by a later hand (Hom. viii. ad fin.). In one of the chapters attributed to St. Theodore we read: "Graeci omni Dominicâ die communicant, sive clerici sive laici: et qui tribus Dominicis non communicaverint, excommunicantur. Romani similiter communicant qui volunt: qui autem noluerint, non excommunicantur" . . . (Capit. collect. ex Frag. in Migne, Patrol. xcix. 955). And Amalarius, presbyter of Metz, as late as the 9th century, writes to his friend Guntrad: "It is ordered in the canons that all who come to church should communicate; or failing to do so, should state their reason: which being found satisfactory should excuse them, otherwise they should be excommunicated. Now I learn that you have cast your anchor at sea, and not in port. For you have fixed it in Gennadius, bishop of Marseilles. Let me beg of you to fix it in the safer harbour of St. Augustine, as is confessed by all the churches. Gennadius counselled your communicating on Sundays chiefly, because, perhaps, it was not his custom to celebrate the Eucharist every day. . . . Juxta Augustinum, quando videbis pium affectum esse in te, sume corpus Domini, ut tibi praestet vitam sempiternam. Noli differre ad diem Dominicum, quia nescis si contingas illum." (Ep. vi. in Migne, Patrol. c. v. 1339.) Balsamon, on the other hand, in the 12th century, prefers quibbling at any length, to giving the 7th Apostolic canon the only natural meaning its words will bear. But Balsamen lived in an age when excommunication had been degraded almost to the level of impounding cattle: and when people were refused the Eucharist for personal disputes about the goods of this world, oftener than for anything else: or for a thousand things, at any rate, besides sin. The president of the 4th Lateran council takes credit for the "salutary statute" as he terms it, which he there promulgated, and ordered to be published in all churches, lest any should excuse themselves through ignorance from conforming to it; his behest being, that all the faithful of either sex should make their Easter communion at least in every year: still even so, they must all have previously confessed in private to their priest: who might, at his discretion, bid them abstain from communicating even then: and nobody could pronounce on their fitness, but one licensed by him (can. 21). The broadest way, and the widest gate, as the other canons testify, for gaining or regaining admission to the highest privileges of the church militant then was to take prominent part in a holy war.

EXHILARATUS (1), 'episcopus Metaurenus,' according to Cappelletti (Le Chiese d'Italia, ii. 169), bishop of Urbino, signing the second letter of pope Agatho, sent in 680 after a synod in Rome to the third council of Constantinople. (Mansi, xi. 314.)

[A. H. D. A.]

EXHILARATUS (2), a Sicilian bishop, concerning whom pope Gregory the Great writes to Patiens, the defensor at Panormus in 603. The proceedings of Exhilaratus had been frequently reported to Gregory; bishop Leo, who had been judge in his cause, had twice lightened his punishment; Gregory had summoned him to Rome, and dealt severely with him. On sending him back to his church Gregory directs Patiens to keep an eye upon him, and admonish him to behave with charity towards his clergy while correcting their faults; the clergy on their part were to be warned against insolent and unsubmitive behaviour towards their bishop. Exhilaratus had evidently been a tyrannical bishop. (Greg. Mag. Epp. lib. xiv. ind. vii. ep. 4. Patr. Lat. lxxvii. 1306.)

[C. H.]

EXHILARATUS (3), duke of Naples, which in his time was almost the only place in Italy not entirely under the power of the Byzantine emperor. In A.D. 726 or 727, during the time when Italy generally was in a state of revolt against the emperor Leo, on account of his denials against image worship, Exhilaratus, with his son Hadrian, made an attack on Campania, and tried to persuade the inhabitants to join him in an attempt upon the pope Gregory II.'s life. A body of Romans came out against him and took him and killed him with his son. (Vita Gregorii II. in Liber Pontificalis, Migne, cxxviii. 981.)

EXHILARATUS (4), an official whom Gregory the Great in 594 was going to employ in the affair of Maximus the intruding bishop of Salona (Greg. Mag. Epp. lib. iv. ind. xii. ep. 47). He appears to be the person whom in another letter (lib. vii. ind. xv. ep. 32) Gregory, 597, terms a "secundicerius" (vid. Du Cange, Glossar. sub voc.), through whom the presbyter Anastasius sends Gregory his benediction (Patr. Lat. lxxvii. 772, 890 c).

EXOOHIUS. [EXOTIUS.]

EXOCIONITAE (Ἐξωκίωνιται, 'Ἐξωκίωνιται' in Theod. Haer. Fab. iv. 3), an Arian sect, so called from the district of Constantinople where they had churches outside (ἔξω) the pillar (κίων) of Constantine, and hence called 'Ἐξωκίωνιον or 'Ἐξωκίωνιον (Codinus, de Signis Constantin. p. 46, ed. Bonn; Du Cange, Constantinop. Christ. lib. ii. p. 133; Suicer, Thesaur. s. v. 'Ἐξωκίωνιται). They seem to have been Eunomians. A.D. 379 Theodosius expelled them from the churches which they had hitherto occupied, and bestowed them upon the Catholics (Socrates, H. E. v. 20 Chron. Pasch. s. a.). In 468 the emperor Leo I. treated them with still greater severity. He not only forbade their having churches, but also interdicted them from meeting in any other places (Chron. Pasch. s. a.; cf. Cod. Just. i. v. 20). Justinian, however, made an exception in their favour when he suppressed the assemblies of all other heretics (Cedrenus, Hist. Compend. p. 645 ed. Bonn). Alaric, the son and successor of Theodoric, is called an Exocionite as being an Arian (Chr. Pasch. s. a. 485).

[T. W. D.]

EXOTIUS (EXOCHIUS, ESOTIUS), thirteenth bishop of Limoges, following Ruricius II. and succeeded by St. Ferreolus, or, according to some, tenth. He is only known as the subject of a most laudatory epitaph by Venantius Fortunatus, from which we learn that he sat fifteen years. (Venant. Fort. Miscell. iv. 6; Migne, Patrol. Lat. lxxxviii. 157; Gall. Christ. ii. 503.)

[S. A. B.]

EXPECTATUS, ninth bishop of Fréjus, succeeding Desiderius, and followed by Asterius, or, according to a conjecture of Le Cointe, by Epiphanius. (Cf. Greg. Tur. Hist. Franc. vi. 24.) At the fifth council of Orleans (A.D. 549) he was represented by this Epiphanius, a priest, and was present in person at the fifth of Arles (A.D. 554) and the second of Paris (circ. A.D. 555). Nothing further is known of him. (Le Cointe, Ann. Eccl. Franc. an. 582, n. xii. tom. ii. p. 233 Mansi, ix. 137, 703, 740; Gall. Christ. i. 424.)

EXPEDITUS, April 19, martyr at Melitene in Armenia, with Gaius, Aristonicus, Rufus, and Hermogenes, of whom nothing further is known, though their names appear in all the best Martyrologies (Mart. Rom. Vet., Hieron., Adon., Usuard., Rom. Mart.). [G. T. S.]

EXPLECIUS (AEPLETIUS, AEPLITIUS, EPLECIUS, EPLETUS, and EPHETIUS), fourteenth bishop of Metz, succeeding Auctor and followed by Urbicius. The authors of the Gallia Christiana (xiii. 686) quote the Codes Beluensis to the effect that he sat for sixteen years, and died in the pontificate of Siricius and the sixth year of the reign of Gratian and Valentinian (A.D. 381). He is said to have died on July 30, and in the later martyrologies he appears among the saints. He was buried in the church of St. Clement, the first bishop of the diocese. [S. A. B.]

EXPLICIUS, addressed by Sidonius Apollinaris (Epp. ii. 7), who prays him to end a dispute between Alethius and Paulus. [R. T. S.]

EXPULSION, Spanish prince. [ERPULION.]

EXSUPERIUS. [EXUPERIUS.]

EXUCONTIL, 'Εξουκόντιος, a designation first applied to the Arians generally (Ep. Alex. ap. Theod. H. E. i. 3, p. 740 in Pat. Gr. lxxxii. 901 A), and afterwards especially to the Acacians (Socrates, H. E. ii. 45; Athanas. Treatises ag. Arian. Oxf. trans. 127) and the followers of Aetius (Sozomen, H. E. iv. 29; AETIUS, Vol. I. 51 A). [T. W. D.]

EXUPERANTIUS (1), reputed second bishop of Tudertum (Todi), cir. A.D. 139. (Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Italia, v. 242.) [C. H.]

EXUPERANTIUS (2), one of twelve clergy of Rome martyred under Valerian and commemorated on Aug. 1. (Baron. Annal. ann. 260. iii.) [C. H.]

EXUPERANTIUS (3), Dec. 30, upon which day he was buried, though he suffered on Dec. 7, a deacon and martyr at Spoleto, with Sabinus his bishop, and another deacon, one Marcellus, in the Diocletian persecution. They were arrested by Venustianus, president of Etruria, who offered the bishop an image of Jupiter, desiring him to adore it. He took it and dashed it to pieces, whereupon his hands were cut off, and tortures were applied to the deacons, under which they expired. The bishop was relegated to prison, where he healed a blind boy, one Priscianus, a nephew of a Christian widow named Serena, who waited on the bishop. By this miracle a number of persons were converted, including the president himself and his family. Soon after, the bishop, the president, his wife and two sons, were beheaded by order of the emperor himself, the bishop at Spoleto, the others at Asisium (Assisi). The bodies of the deacons were thrown into a river, but rescued by a fisherman, who was also a presbyter. The bishop's body was buried near Spoleto, by Serena, who had already embalmed his hands. Baronius and Baluze both consider the Acts of these martyrs to be genuine and trustworthy. (Mart. Rom. Vet.; Mart. Adon., Usuard.; Baluze, Miscell. ii. 47, 465; Tillemont, Mém. v. 603, 604.) [G. T. S.]

EXUPERANTIUS (4), ST., said to have been 20th bishop of Ravenna, cir. A.D. 398-418, placed by Agnellus between Neo and Joannes Angeloptes. He was buried in the church of St. Agnes at Ravenna, built during his episcopate. [GEMELLUS, subdeacon.] (Agnellus, Liber Pontif. Ravenn. in Muratori, Rer. Ital. Scr. ii. 62, Pat. L. cvi. 525; Ughelli, Ital. Sac. ii. 351; Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Italia, ii. 28, 183.) [C. H.]

EXUPERANTIUS (5), bishop of Derthona, present at the council of Aquileia, A.D. 381 (Mansi, iii. 600). He was thirteenth bishop, and succeeded Joannes. His first known successor was Martinianus II. (Ughelli, Ital. Sac. iv. 627; Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Italia, xiii. 692.) [C. H.]

EXUPERANTIUS (6), a Roman soldier, to whom Jerome wrote (Ep. 145), exhorting him to give up his calling and to come with his brother Quintilian and follow the more perfect life of monachism at Bethlehem. Palladius says that Exuperantius came to Bethlehem, but was, after a time, driven away by the violence and envy of Jerome. (Palladius, Hist. Lausiac. c. 80.) [W. H. F.]

EXUPERANTIUS (7). One of the nineteen bishops who assisted at the first council of Toledo A.D. 400, against the Priscillianists. He was for some time considered as bishop of Celenis (a municipium in the Conventus Juridicus of Lugo, in the province of Galicia), on the faith of the opening paragraph of the council, which is found in a corrupt state in the old editions of Surius and Loaysa. After a careful examination of MSS., however, and supported by a passage from Idatius, Florez has succeeded in re-establishing the correct order and in shewing that Ortigius (q. v.) was at the time bishop of Celenis, and not Exuperantius. The see of Exuperantius, therefore, remains unknown, as except in the case of Celenis, for which there was a special reason [ORTIGIUS], the names of the sees are not given in the MSS. In the most recent edition of the council, Tejada y Ramiro clears up the matter still further (Coll. de los Can. de la Igl. Esp. Madrid, 1850, ii. 167; Esp. Sagr. vi. 65, xl. 48; Aguirre-Catalani). [M. A. W.]

EXUPERANTIUS (8), a bishop in Lucania, who sent a presbyter with a gift of money to Paulinus bishop of Nola, in 431. (Vita S. Paulin. cap. 53, p. 95, Pat. L. lxi. 122 a; Baron. Annal. ann. 431, cxcvi. ed. Theiner.) [C. H.]

EXUPERANTIUS (9), bishop of Como, 495. (Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Italia, xi. 313; Ughelli, Ital. Sacr. v. 260.) [A. H. D. A.]

EXUPERANTIUS (10), a certain bishop who had the rashness to erect and dedicate an oratory in the diocese of another bishop, Joannes. On this subject pope Gregory the Great writes to Joannes the subdeacon of Ravenna. (Greg. Mag. Epp. lib. xiii. ind. vi. ep. 17. Patr. Lat. lxxvii. 1272.) Cappelletti (Le Chiese d'Italia, xv. 94) places him among the bishops of Parma. [C. H.]

EXUPERIA, martyr at Rome under Valerian in 259, with Sempronius, Olympius, and others; commemorated July 26 and October 31. (Rom. Mart.; Baronius, Annal. ann. 259, xxx. ed. Theiner.) [C. H.]

EXUPERIUS (1), martyr under Hadrian, with Zos and others, A.D. 140; commemorated on May 2. (Rom. Mart.; Baron. Annal. ann. 144, v. ed. Theiner.) [C. H.]

EXUPERIUS (2), the standard-bearer and companion in martyrdom of St. Maurice, the leader of the Theban legion, A.D. 286, commemorated on Sept. 22 (Usuard.; Rom. Mart.). [MAURICE.] His body was translated in the 10th century to the monastery of Gembloux, by Guibertus the friar, by whom it was dedicated in honour of St. Peter and St. Exuperius (Molan. Nat. 88. Sept. 22). [G. T. S.]

EXUPERIUS (3), first bishop of Bayeux, is reported to have been sent by St. Clement. But this is only an instance of the tendency of the Gallic churches to claim an apostolic or sub-apostolic origin. Exuperius really belongs to the latter part of the 4th century, when the sees of Evreux, Lisieux, and Coutances were formed, with Rouen for metropolitan. In the disturbed times of the invasions of the Northmen the body of the saint was removed to a quieter resting-place, and finally deposited at Corbolum (Corbeil), where, as well as at Bayeux and other places, he is invoked under the names of Suspirius, Spirius, or Spire. Many miraculous deeds are given in biographies of later centuries. He appears in the title of the Bollandist life (and twice in Potthast) as bishop of Corbolum. (Act. SS. Aug. 1; Gall. Christ. xi. 347.)

EXUPERIUS (4), a rhetor at Bordeaux, Toulouse, and Narbonne. He was made praefect of Spain by the Dalmatian Caesars, whom he had attracted. Baronius (A. E. ann. 406. xxxv.) maintains that he was the bishop of Toulouse mentioned by St. Jerome. Others, however, maintain that he was made bishop of Cahors, where according to Ausonius (Profess. Burdig. ii, Pat. L. xix. 858) he died. But the words of Ausonius do not imply that he was bishop in Cahors, and the Sammarthani believe that the bishop was a different person from the rhetor, who made a fortune in Spain, and simply went to Cahors for tranquillity. (Gall. Christ. i. 114; Tillemont, Mém. x. 825.) [R. T. S.]

EXUPERIUS (5), bishop of Toulouse in the opening of the 5th century. He was known to Jerome, who dedicated to him his Commentary on Zechariah, and who urges his friend Iura (Ep. liv. 11), A.D. 394, to profit by his instructions, as one "probatae aetatis et fidei." We infer from this that he lived at Rome before his episcopate. He was a man of great simplicity of life, and carried this simplicity also into the appliances of Christian worship, so that Jerome praises him (Ep. cxxv. 20) as the center out of avarice from the temple. Jerome also (ibid.) sets him forth as an example to Rusticus, afterwards bishop of Arles, who was leading an ascetic life in his diocese. He applied to pope Innocent for advice on various points of discipline, and on the question what books should be held to be canonical. The pope replied in a letter dated A.D. 405 (Inn. Ep. vi.), answering his questions fully, and giving the scriptural books as they are now received, excluding the Apocrypha. Exuperius appears to have suffered great losses, but to have made them the means of a noble Christian independence (Jerome, Ep. cxxv. 20). He was held in high esteem, and is reckoned as a saint by the Roman church. (Ceillier, vii. 511.) [W. H. F.]

EXUPERIUS (6), eighth bishop of Limoges, following Dativus and succeeded by Astidius, or according to Gams (Ser. Episc. 564), tenth, succeeding Adelfius II. The authors of the Gallia Christiana (ii. 501) quote a catalogue to the effect that he suffered much from the Arians during the thirty-five years of his episcopate in the reign of Constantius. [S. A. B.]

EXUPERIUS (7), follows Ereptiolus in the list of bishops of Coutances, c. A.D. 475. (Gall. Christ. xi. 864.) [R. T. S.]

EYNARDUS. [EINHARD.]

EZEKIEL, a Jewish writer, the author of a dramatic work in Greek iambica, called the Ἐξάγωγῃ, the subject being the exodus of the Israelites from Egypt. All that can be asserted with certainty as to his date is that he was anterior to Clement of Alexandria, who quotes some fragments (Strom. i. 23, p. 414). Eusebius (Præp. Ev. ix. 28, 29) also gives these fragments, together with several others. The last, which contains an account of the appearance of a wonderful bird (apparently suggested by the ambiguity of the word φοῖνιξ, Ex. xv. 27), is copied also by Eustathius (ad Hexæm. p. 25). It has been conjectured that an anonymous fragment in iambica, given by Epiphanius (Haer. 64, p. 544), may have formed part of the prologue to the same work. The fragments have been well restored by Gaisford in his edition of the Præp. Ev. For earlier editions see Fabricius's Bibl. Gr. ii. 305, ed. Harles, and Heinichen's note ad loc. The fragments are given also in Didot's Auctores Classici, forming part of the appendix to Euripides. [G. S.]

EZIUS (IZZIUS, EZZIUS), abbat of St. Peter's at Juvavia (Salzburg). According to Hund he was consecrated in 696 as fifth bishop of Salzburg, ruled twenty-five years, and was buried in the church of his monastery. (Hund, Metrop. Salzburg. i. 2.) Potthast and Hansiz follow Mabillon in excluding him from the list of bishops (Hansiz, Germ. Sacr. ii. 68, 70; Potth. Bibl. suppl. p. 398). [C. H.]

EZNIK (EZNIK, ESNIG) is the name of an Armenian doctor of the church in the 5th century. His native place was Koghb or Kolp (whence he was called the Kolpensian), and he himself a disciple of the patriarch Sahak (Isaac) and Mjesrop, the praeceptor Armeniae. Besides his mother tongue he understood Persian, Greek, and Syriac. In the course of long journeys through Syria, Mesopotamia, and Greece he added to his stores of theological learning, and made himself thoroughly acquainted with ecclesiastical literature. We find him later raised to the rank of bishop. In this capacity he took part in the synod of Artashast, A.D. 450, which repelled the demands of the Persian viceroy, Mihr-Nersh, that the Armenians should adopt the Zoroastrian religion, in an epistle marked with dignity, courage, and faith.

He died an aged man, as bishop of Bagrewand

(Pakrewand) in the province of Aïrerat (compare Neumann, Geschichte der Armenischen Literatur, p. 42 sq.). His main work is The Destruction of False Doctrines, which is still preserved in the Armenian original (first published in 1762 at Smyrna, and then in a better form by the Mechitarists of St. Lazarus in the collection of Armenian classics, Venice, 1826). A complete but unreliable French translation was made by Le Vaillant de Florival (Refutation des différentes Sectes des Patens by Eznik the Doctor, Paris, 1833). Various pieces of the work have been translated into German by Neumann (Hermes, vol. xxxiii. p. 201, and Zeitschrift für die historische Theologie, 1834, iv. 71 sqq.), by Petermann (Gramm. Linguae Armen. p. 44 sq.), and Windischmann (Bavarian Annals, Jan. 23, 1834). The whole is divided into four books; the first combats the Gentile doctrine of the eternity of matter, the second the Zoroastrian religion, the third Greek philosophy, the fourth the Gnostic sect of the Marcionites. The immediate occasion of the work was the conflict between Armenian Christianity and Parsism. The sources whence he derived his knowledge of the latter appear to have been not the sacred literature of the Parsees themselves, but the popular form which the Zoroastrian faith had at that time assumed in Persia. The fourth book is moreover of interest and value for the history of heresy. The representation here given of the Marcionite doctrine of Principias, and the various myths concerning the origin of the human race, its corruption by matter, the mission of Christ, His crucifixion, descent into hell, and victory over the Demiurg, contain much that is peculiar and characteristic, but much also that belongs not to the original forms of Marcionitism but to some of its later developments. Of Eznik's Homilies nothing has been preserved, while on the other hand a whole series of Exhortations or Moral Sentences exist as a kind of appendix to his Destruction of False Doctrines. These are by others attributed to Nilus.

FABIANUS (1), (called by the Greeks and in the Liberian Catalogue FABIUS, by Eutychius and in the Alexandrian Chronicle FLAVIANUS), bishop of Rome early in February, A.D. 236 to January 20, A.D. 250, and contemporary with the emperors Maximin, Gordian, Philip the Arabian, and Decius, under the last of whom he suffered martyrdom. Eusebius relates that, all the brethren being assembled in the church to choose a successor to Anteros, Fabianus, then a layman lately come to Rome from the country, was pointed out as the chosen of Heaven by a dove settling on his head, whereupon all the people, moved with one divine inspiration, declared him worthy by acclamation, and at once placed him on the episcopal throne (H. E. vi. 29). A similar story was told also in connexion with the election of Zephyrinus (Rufin. vi. 21).

That the choice proved a good one may be concluded from the testimony of Cyprian, who, in his answer to a letter from the Roman clergy informing him of their bishop's martyrdom, speaks of the "glorious departure of the good man, his colleague," and rejoices that "his honourable consummation had corresponded to the integrity of his administration" (Ep. 39). The Roman clergy also, writing to Cyprian, deplore their want of a bishop "for controlling all things in those times of difficulty, and for treating the lapsed with authority and judgment, since the departure of Fabian of most noble memory" (Cypr. Ep. 30).

In the Liberian Catalogue (A.D. 354) he is said to have divided the regions (of the city of Rome) among the deacons, to have caused many fabrics to be made through the cemeteries, and to have suffered martyrdom on the 20th January, 250. In the Felician Catalogue (A.D. 530), and in later editions of the Liber Pontificalis, it is added that he made also seven subdeacons to superintend the seven notaries, who are previously mentioned as having been appointed by the earlier bishop Clemens for collecting and faithfully recording the acts of the martyrs; also that he caused to be brought to Rome by sea the body of Pontianus (the predecessor of his predecessor Anteros), who had been martyred in Sardinia and buried it in the cemetery of Callixtus on the Appian Way; in which cemetery he too is described as buried after his own martyrdom. Among these statements those referring to the bringing from Sardinia and the burial of Pontianus, and to the martyrdom and burial of Fabianus himself, may be accepted without hesitation. The deportation of Pontianus to Sardinia is attested by the sufficient authority of the Liberian Catalogue (on Pontianus); and the removal of his body to Rome could not probably be accomplished during the short episcopate (2 months and 12 days) of his successor Anteros, nor indeed till the date of an extant imperial edict (A.D. 237) ordering the transference and burial of the deportati. As to the martyrdom of Fabianus himself, it is remarkable that, though the Roman calendar designates all the first thirty bishops of Rome, except two, as saints and martyrs, he is the first, with the exception of Telesphorus and Pontianus, whose martyrdom rests on any good authority. (Cf. also Euseb. H. E. vi. 39; Hieron. de Illustr. Vir. c. 54, and Cypr. Epp. 39 and 30.) Decius having become emperor on the assassination of Philip at the close of the year 249, Fabianus, who suffered on the 20th of January in the following year, was thus among the earliest victims of the Decian persecution. Fragments of a slab bearing the inscription Φ ABIANOC + EΠΙ + ΜΡ. (Fabianus episcopus martyr), together with others inscribed with the names of Anteros, Lucius, and Eutychianus, Roman bishops of the same period, have been lately found in what is called the papal crypt of the above-mentioned cemetery of Callixtus on the Appian Way, thus attesting the accounts given of the place of his burial. The monogram ΜΡ. (denoting martyr) being less deeply cut than the rest of the inscription, and hence supposed to have been added afterwards, De Rossi accounts for by the vacancy of the Roman see for eighteen months after the death of Fabianus in consequence of the continued persecution, and the supposition that the authority of a successor was required to sanction the adation of the title (Roma Sotterranea, by Northcote and Brownlow).

In connexion with the buildings (fabricae) assigned by the good authority of the Liberian Catalogue to Fabianus may be quoted the statement contained in the Philosophumena, attributed to Hippolytus, to the effect that Zephyrinus (his own contemporary, and Bishop of Rome, some 20 years before Fabianus) "had entrusted Callixtus with the government of the clergy, and set him over the cemetery." (Philosoph. ix. 11.) This is a further evidence of the careful provisions made by the bishops of the 3rd century for the decent burial of Christians. The cemetery entrusted to Callixtus is supposed by De Rossi to have been one common to all the Christians of Rome, at that time given to the church by some noble family, and to be clearly identified with the catacomb called the Coemiterium Callixti, already alluded to, on the Appian Way. Over this newly acquired burial-place De Rossi concludes the pope to have placed Callixtus (who as archdeacon also had supervision of the clergy), as to satisfy the law which required recognised burial confraternities to be represented by a agent or syndic. This view is confirmed by the fact of Victor, the predecessor of Zephyrinus, being the last pope said to have been buried on the Vatican, thirteen out of his eighteen successors having been deposited in this new cemetery. The cemeteries which Fabianus provided with buildings may have been others given afterwards by wealthy individuals after the example thus set, the buildings being oratories, or structures in provision for the guardianship of the tombs. The further statement, above mentioned, about the seven deacons, subdeacons, and notaries, though but partially supported by the early authority of the Liberian Catalogue, may still be regarded as expressing a true tradition of the early provision made for preserving records of martyrdoms.

Fabianus is specially named by Eusebius (H. E. vi. 35) as one among many other bishops to whom Origen wrote in defence of his own orthodoxy. Cyprian mentions him (Ep. 59) as having, with Donatus bishop of Carthage, written a letter severely censuring one Privatus, an heretical bishop of Lambaesa in Numidia, who had been condemned by a synod of ninety bishops at Lambaesa for "many and grievous faults."

What has been so far mentioned comprises all that is known about Fabianus with certainty. Doubt, and more than doubt, rests on the story (accepted by Andreas du Chesne, in Vit. Pontif., and in the main by the Bollandists) of his having been the founder of the seven Gallic churches of Toulouse, Arles, Tours, Paris, Narbonne, Clermont, Limoges; to which he is said to have sent respectively, Saturninus, Trophimus, Gratianus, Irenaeus, Paulus, Astremonius, and Martialis, as missionary bishops. Tillemont regards the story with suspicion, as being absent from early records. It is disputable also on other grounds. The following are the ancient testimonies. In the Passio St. Saturnini Episc. Tolosani (c. 2, and Eusebius) it is stated that Saturninus went to Toulouse 'Decio et Grato consulibus,' i.e. A.D. 250, the first year of Decius. Gregory of Tours (about 590) refers to this statement, and adds that the other missionary bishops above referred to were sent at the same time (Hist. Franc. i. 28); and elsewhere (x. 30), that one of these, Gratianus of Tours, was sent in the first year of Decius by Sixtus the Pope of Rome. Now, since Fabianus was martyred in the January of the year assigned to the mission, it seems improbable that he was its organizer; and who was Sixtus, named by the historian as the then existing pope? The Bollandists meet these difficulties by supposing the mission to have been designed by Fabian before his martyrdom, and carried out after it by Sixtus, a leading presbyter at Rome, erroneously described as pope. But, further, there is an evident error in the statement about Trophimus having been then sent to Arles. We have the testimony of Pope Zosimus (Ep. 1. ad Episc. Gall.) that the church of Arles had been founded by Trophimus sent from Rome; but this must have been before 250, since it appears from Cyprian (Ep. vi. 7) that in 254 Marcion had long been bishop of that see. It would seem then that at any rate the additions made by Gregory of Tours to his extract from the 'Passion of Saturninus,' rested only on vague and uncertain traditions, and that there are no valid grounds for attributing the foundation of those Gallic churches to Fabianus.

Still more improbable is the story, accepted by the Bollandists and Baronius, and resting mainly on the authority of the Acts of St. Pontius, that the Emperor Philip and his son became Christians, and were baptized by Fabianus. [PHILIPPUS.]

Three spurious decretals are attributed to Fabianus. One forbids all communication with excommunicated persons, quoting the apostolic precept. Another, addressed to all the bishops of the East, orders the annual consecration of new chrism, tracing the order from the Apostles, and contains stringent rules, having for their object the protection of the clergy from accusations by persons of bad character or suspected of heresy, and even by the faithful of their own flocks, except on the ground of heresy. A third has the same drift as the last mentioned, with further provision for appeals exclusively to the see of Rome. There are also ten Decreta assigned to him by Gratian and others, on matters of discipline; in which, among other things, fasting, communion three times a year, and oblations of bread and wine every Sunday at the altar, are enjoined; perjury, marriage within the prohibited degrees, and of insane persons, are forbidden; the age of thirty is fixed for ordination, and illiterate priests are prohibited from saying Mass.

His festival is kept on the 20th January, the day of his martyrdom. The Greeks commemorate him by the name of Fabius on the 6th of August. [J. B—y.]

FABIANUS (2), bishop of Antioch. [FABIUS (1).]

FABIANUS (3) (FABIUS), prefect of Rome, mentioned in the acts of the martyr Sebastian and his companions (Baron. Ann. 286, xv. sq.). The lists of the prefects do not mention this name, and give Ceionius Varius 285, Junius Maximus (bis) 286–287, Pomponius Januarius, 288. Baronius suggests that Fabianus in the text should be altered to Fabius Maximus, or to Junius Fabius Maximus, though he allows the possibility that Fabius was the magistrate of another prefecture. Tillemont (H. E. iv. p. 744, 2nd ed. notes sur St. Sébastien IV.) conjectures that Fabius was prefect of the city from July 286 to August 287, and that he was preceded in the first year and followed in the second by Junius Maximus. Corsini (Series Praef. 284-286) adopts this ingenious supposition, for which a precedent exists. Tiburtius the martyr, when about to be tortured under Fabianus, challenged the prefect to thrust his hand into boiling water in the name of Jupiter and see if the water would scald. "I," he added, "shall tread upon these burning cinders as upon roses, in the name of Jesus Christ their creator." Fabianus replied, "Everyone knows that your Christ taught you the art of magic." (Acta S. Sebast. xxi. 81, 82 in Boll. Acta SS. Jan. ii. 277.) [L. D.]

FABIANUS (4), bishop of Eliberi. [FLAVIANUS (1).]

FABIANUS (5), an Arian who lived at the commencement of the 6th century, in the north of Africa, probably Carthage, and who not only caused great annoyance to Fulgentius of Ruspe, but elicited from him a great work, the fragments of which alone are now extant. This work is entitled, Fidei Catholicae instrumenta excerpta de libris S. Fulgentii contra gesta quas adversus eum Fabianus haereticus falsa confinxit. It was originally divided into ten books. The Père Chifflet discovered and preserved in his Recueil des Œuvres de saint Fulgence thirty-nine fragments of these books, which may still be read (Migne, Patrol. Lat. lrv. pp. 750-834, Ben. ed. p. 577 ff.). Cave refers, among the lost works of Fulgentius, to nineteen books, de Veritate Praedestinationis et gratiae contra Fabianum, and says that seven fragments from this work were included by Theodulphus Aurelianensis, "in collectaneis suis de processione Spiritus Sancti," and that J. Sirmond published, among the works of Alcimius Avitus other fragments of this work, Paris, 1643; and says that Chifflet published thirty-nine fragments from a very ancient MS. of the same books (Hist. Litteraria, p. 386). The confusing statement of Cave arises from his inaccurate quotation from Baronius, who had written of Fulgentius, "Jam reversus de exilio novem et decem libros Fabiani mentientis falsa gesta convincens, de veritate praedestinationis et gratia libros confecit tres." Deprez has corrected the text, reading nova for novem. Baronius therefore stated the number of books as ten, and also referred to the well-known three books on predestination, which had nothing to do with Fabian. Cave omitted the closing words, confecit tres, and therefore misunderstood the sentence. The fragments preserved by Chifflet are entirely occupied by the most subtle disquisitions on the internal relations of the Godhead, e.g. on "The one Highest Paraclete, Messenger, Teacher, and Judge," "The functions of praying, groaning, interceding in Christ and the Holy Spirit;" "On the One Infinite," in three personalities; on "The Worship of the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit," and the like. The fragments contain no personal references. Ceillier suggests that at Carthage, after the return of Fulgentius from exile, Fabianus, an Arian of reputation, secured an interview with the bishop of Ruspe, and then, with a view to undermine his influence, published numerous discourses under the name of his rival. Fulgentius, to free himself from these false representations of his views, produced the work in question. The author of the Vita Fulgentii supposes that Fabianus is the anonymous slanderer to whom Fulgentius refers in his preface to the work Ad Monimum, de duplici Praedestinatione Dei. If so, Fabianus must have endeavoured to shew the contrariety between the thoughts of Augustine and Jerome on the one hand and Fulgentius on the other. The fragments that remain are exclusively occupied with the Arian controversy, and are remarkably free from personal bitterness or local colouring (cf. Baronius, ann. 523, xxvi.). [FULGENTIUS (3).] [H. R. R.]

FABIOLA (1), a noble Roman lady, a friend of St. Jerome, who wrote for her two dissertations (Ep. lxiv. and lxxviii. ed. Vall.) on the dress of the high priest, and on the stations of the Israelites in their march through the desert. Jerome also wrote a memoir of her in his touching letter to Oceanus (Ep. lxxvii. ed. Vall.) in the year of her death, 399. Thierry (St. Jerome, ii. 11) has worked up the intimations about her into an interesting and dramatic story.

She was descended from Julius Maximus and was extremely wealthy. She was a woman of a lively and passionate nature, the subjugation and direction of which was a triumph to the church. She had married a man whose vices were such that she was forced to divorce him. She then, to escape the temptations of an unprotected state, accepted a second husband, the first being still alive. It is probable that this separated her from Paula and the other friends of Jerome, and from church communion. (On this point Thierry, who inverts the order of the facts as given by Jerome, is at issue with Jerome's statement that she received the communion again immediately after her penitence.) This may account for the fact that we hear nothing of her during Jerome's stay at Rome. But, after the death of her second husband, she voluntarily went through a public penance. At the church of the Lateran, on Easter eve, in the presence of the bishop and clergy, and all the people, who were deeply affected by the scene she appeared in the porch amongst the penitents with tears and cries, with rent garments and bare feet and head, casting away her jewels and disfiguring her face. After this, having publicly renewed her communion with the church she sold all her possessions, and determined to administer the vast sums thus acquired for the good of the poor. She supported monasteries in various parts of Italy and the adjacent islands and she joined Pammachius in the institution of an hospital (νοσοκομείον), where she gathered the sick and the outcasts and tended them with her own hands.

In the year 395 she suddenly appeared at Bethlehem, and seemed to wish to remain there. She made the journey with her kinsman Oceanus who also returned with her to Rome the following year. But several causes concurred to prevent Bethlehem from becoming her home. The Origenistic strife had lately broken out which divided Jerome and his friends from Rufinus and Melania, and the new-comers at escape the discord. Oceanus warmly opened the side of Jerome; Fabiola seems to have stood aloof. But efforts were made, if we may believe Jerome (Cont. Ruf. iii. 14), to draw them into the camp of his adversary. Letters which had been fraudulently taken from the cell of Jerome's friend Eusebius, and in which Rufinus was praised, were found in the rooms of Fabiola and Oceanus. If this proceeding was intended to cause a breach between Fabiola and Jerome it entirely failed. Jerome bears witness to the earnestness with which she attached herself to his teaching, her eagerness and restlessness in asking questions, her unwillingness to believe in his confessions of ignorance of many things which she put before him. The two treatises above mentioned are the results of her importunity. He describes how on one occasion she recited from memory the letter which he had written to Heliodorus from the desert twenty years before (Ep. 14, ed. Vall.).

It is not likely that Fabiola would have stayed long at Bethlehem. Jerome represents her as liking to be surrounded by a crowd. Her idea of the solitude of Bethlehem, he says, was that she should not be cut off from Mary's inn. But little time was given for the experiment. Jerome was still seeking a suitable dwelling-place for her, and was at the same time engaged in writing for her his treatise on the mystical meaning of the high priest's garments, when the inroad of the Huns into the Roman empire, the consequence of the treachery of the praetorian prefect Rufinus, caused a panic in Palestine. The Huns had taken Antioch, and were threatening to burst upon Jerusalem. Jerome and his friends hurried to the sea-coast at Joppa, and had hired vessels for Egypt, when, as they were on the point of sailing, the situation suddenly changed. The Huns abandoned their purpose, and turned back without crossing the Lebanon. Jerome, with Paula and Eustochium, returned to Bethlehem; but Fabiola, less in love with Palestine, continued her journey to Rome. Jerome records how he finished the treatise on which he was engaged for her while the cables were being loosed and the sailors shouting for the voyage.

It is possible that, as Thierry supposes, the epistle to which Jerome's letter to Amandus (Ep. 55, ed. Vall.) relates has to do with Fabiola, and is to be placed here. Amandus, a Roman presbyter, afterwards bishop of Burdigala, wrote to Jerome for an answer to three questions on difficulties in the New Testament, and Jerome found added to this letter a little paper containing these words, which purported to come from a "sister" of Amandus. "Ask me whether a woman who has left a husband of the vilest character and has accepted a second through violence (per vim) can, without doing penitence, communicate with the church, while the first husband is living." Thierry supposes that this question was really put on behalf of Fabiola, and that, not liking to speak to Jerome directly on the subject, she took care that he should find the letter at Bethlehem after her departure. If so, and if it implied that she meditated some third marriage and wished not to renew her public penitence, she gained no comfort from Jerome. His answer was cautious but decided. He suspected that the "vis" under which she had taken the second husband was simply that of passion, and he declared that no woman during her husband's life could marry again. With this decision, if indeed it related to her, Fabiola seems to have been satisfied, and worldly desires stirred in her no more.

The last three years of her life were occupied with incessant activity in good works. She considered all her property as given to Christ, and herself as merely a stipendiary and an administrator of what was His. In conjunction with Pammachius, she instituted at Portus a hospice (xenodochium), perhaps taking her model from that established by Jerome at Bethlehem; and it was so successful that, as Jerome says, in one year it became known from Parthia to Britain. But to the last her disposition was restless. She found Rome and Italy too small for her charities; and she was purposing some long journey or change of habitation when death overtook her in the year 399. Her funeral was celebrated as a Christian triumph. The whole city came forth to see it, the streets were crowded, the hallelujahs reached the golden roofs of the temples. Jerome's book on the forty-two stations (mansiones) of the Israelites in the desert, which he had been composing for her, but had been unable to complete till after her death, was dedicated to her memory, and became to its author a counterpart of the memoir of her life which he sent with it to Oceanus, an image of her progress to the heavenly rest. [W. H. F.]

FABIOLA (2), a lady who wrote to St. Augustine, regretting the separation from heaven and from personal intercourse with the saints, which the conditions of the present life necessitate. In his reply Augustine points out that absence and separation are corporeal only and not real, for that real intercourse is carried on through the mind and spirit. As every one is more nearly present to himself than to anyone else, so also two persons at a distance from each other can converse more effectively in this way than if in the presence of each other they both remained silent. Fabiola appears to be the same person to whom St. Jerome sent two volumes of his commentary of Ezekiel, A.D. 411. Aug. Ep. 267; Hieron. Ep. 126; Tillemont. (102, vol. xiii. p. 265.) [H. W. P.]

FABIUS, bishop of Rome. [FABIANUS (1).]

FABIUS (1), bishop of Antioch, succeeding on the martyrdom of Babylas in the Decian persecution A.D. 250. (Euseb. H. E. vi. 39; Chron. sub ann.) There is uncertainty as to the correct form of his name. He is called FABIUS by Eusebius, FLAVIUS by Nicephorus, FABIANUS by Rufinus, and FLAVIANUS by Syncellus and Jerome. Fabius was disposed to look favourably on the Novatian schism, which had extended to Antioch, and Novatian having sent him notice of his consecration as bishop of Rome, it seemed not improbable that Fabius would acknowledge him as a canonical bishop. (Euseb. H. E. vi. 44.) Cornelius bishop of Rome, fearing the consequences of such a step on the part of the bishop of one of the chief sees of Christendom, entered into a long correspondence with Fabius on the subject. (Hieron. de Vir. Ill. Cornelius,

c. 66.) Eusebius mentions this correspondence (Euseb. H. E. vi. 43). Dionysius of Alexandria likewise wrote to Fabius on the case of the "lapsi," shewing by the example of Serapion, that it was not right to exclude penitents from communion (ib. c. 44). Eusebius preserves another letter of the same prelate to Fabius, narrating the sufferings of the martyrs during the Decian persecution at Alexandria (ib. c. 41). Fabius still continuing favourably inclined towards Novatian, it was proposed to hold a council at Antioch, which was prevented by the death of Fabius after an episcopate of only two years. He was succeeded by Demetrianus (ib. c. 46). [E. V.]

FABIUS, prefect of Rome. [FABIANUS (3).]

FABIUS (2) VICTOR, a soldier and martyr at Marseilles. The authorities vary as to the date of his passion. Ceillier fixes A.D. 290; Ruinart, A.D. 290 or 303. The former date is the more probable, as there were several martyrdoms in the army in the early portion of Maximian's reign, and long before the persecution became general upon Diocletian's first edict. All these martyrdoms took place in the western portion of the empire and under the operation of martial law. [CASSIANUS (3).] (Eusebius, Hist. Eccl. viii. 4.) Fabius made himself notorious by his activity, and was therefore called upon to sacrifice. Upon his refusal, which he accompanied with acts of insolence very common at that time, going so far even as to upset the altar in the emperor's presence, he was tortured, and condemned to be ground to death in a hand-mill. The machinery having broken down, however, he was decapitated, when a celestial voice was heard crying, "Vicisti, beate Victor, vicisti." During the tortures, which lasted several days, his steadfastness converted his guards Alexander, Longinus, and Felicianus, who brought him by night from his prison to the seaside, where they received baptism at his hands. This action being reported to the emperor, he at once beheaded them. All the bodies were cast into the sea, but recovered by the Christians and buried in a crypt. The acts of Fabius Victor are not original; they are attributed to Cassian, or some other author of the 5th century. (Ceillier, iii. 366; Ruinart, 292-97.) [G. T. S.]

FABIUS (3), martyr at Caesarea in Mauritania; commemorated July 31. He refused to bear the standard, and was beheaded, probably under Maximian and about the year 295, when there were several military martyrdoms in North Africa. We possess in Ruinart the genuine acts of St. Cassian, St. Maximilian, and St. Marcellus of that date, and all from the same district. (AA. SS. Boll. vii. 179; Mart. Vet. Rom., Adonis, Usuardi; Rom. Mart.). [G. T. S.]

FABIUS (4), martyr at Rome with Maximus and Bassus in the Diocletian persecution. Commemorated May 11. (Rom. Mart.; Baron. Annal. ann. 302, cxii.) [C. H.]

FABIUS (5), martyr at Faesulae in Umbria, period uncertain; commemorated May 17 (Acta SS. Maii iv. 132.) The Bollandist suspects he is the same Fabius who is commemorated in Rom. Martyrol. with Anthimus on May 11.

They were martyred in the Diocletian persecution at the 22nd milestone on the Via Salaria. The Martyr. Hieron. and Mart. Usuardi commemorate Anthimus without any mention of Fabius. [G. T. S.]

FABIUS (6), a shorthand writer under the vicar of Africa at Carth. Conf. A.D. 411. (Mon. Vet. Don. p. 344, ed. Oberthür.) [H. W. P.]

FABIUS (7), twenty-fifth bishop of Auch, succeeding Faustus, A.D. 585, and followed by Cithorius. (Greg. Tur. Hist. Franc. viii. 22; Gall. Christ. i. 975.) [S. A. B.]

FABIUS (8), bishop of Fermo, predecessor of Passivus, the latter a contemporary of Gregory the Great mentioned in Epist. lib. ix. indict. ii. ep. 16. (Migne, lxxvii. 960.) [A. H. D. A.]

FABRICIANUS, bishop of Epidaurus (Ragusa) in Dalmatia, A.D. 530. (Farlati, Illyric. Sacr. vi. 410.) [J. de S.]

FACHTNA, apparently the same name as FACHNAN, latinized FACUNDUS, and used interchangeably with it, yet not so freely but that it clings more closely to some individuals. (1) The best known Fachtna was bishop of Ross, Aug. 14, surnamed Mongach. He was first abbat of Molana, a small island near the mouth of the Blackwater. His chief dedication, however, is that of Ross in the county of Cork. He not only was bishop there, but he gathered round him a large school, one of the most famous of that age, for studying the liberal arts (Ussher, Eccl. Ant. vi. 471-72). Fachtna probably died towards the end of the 6th century. (Lanigan, Eccl. Hist. Ir. ii. 192-8, 317-8; Colgan, Acta SS. 589, cc. 3, 4, 579, n. 1; Kelly, Cal. Irish Saints, 131-2; Ware, Ir. Ant. c. 26, 29, and Irish Bps. by Harris, 583-4.)

(2) Son of Folachtan (Tolochtag, Ann. Tig.), was abbat of Clonfert, co. Longford, and died 729 (Ann. Tig.; Four Mast. A.D. 723). [J. G.]

FACUNDINUS, bishop of Tadinum (now Gualdo Tadino in Umbria), c. 599. (Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Italia, v. 42; Ughelli, Ital. Sacr. i. 1065.) [A. H. D. A.]

FACUNDUS, bishop of Ermiana or Hermiana, in the province of Byzacena.

In 546 he was at Constantinople, and apparently at the council which Mennas convened in the autumn of that year on the subject of the "Three Chapters." He, however, refused to subscribe, and withdrew from communion with those who did (Contr. Mocian. Migne, u. s. 859). After the dismissal of the council, and at the request of the unwilling signatories, he set himself to the preparation of a defence of the condemned "Chapters," but before he had completed the task, he was interrupted by the arrival of Vigilius the bishop of Rome, who required all further proceedings on the subject to be suspended (Pro Defens. Tr. Capitul. praef. u. s. 527, xii. 1, 823). This was in January, A.D. 547 (viii. Kal. Febr. Marcellin. Com. Chron. s. a. 547. Migne, Patrol. li. 946). The next year, A.D. 548, Vigilius also convened a council on the subject at Constantinople, consisting of about seventy bishops, in which Facundus took an active part (Pro Defens.

ap. pref.; Lib. contr. Mocian.). After that council Facundus resumed his "Defence," but was compelled to complete it hurriedly at the command of the emperor who had called him to account for refusing to subscribe his edict (Contr. Mocian. u. s. 860; Pro Defens. Praef. u. s. 527). The work was then presented to Justinian. In that, in its original form, it seems to have consisted of only two books, which were afterwards expanded into seven, and then again into the twelve in which it now appears. ("Facundus . . . nuper ad Justinian princip. scribens, de duabus naturis Dom. Christ. duos libellos." Cassiodorus, Exp. a. Post. Pa. cxxxviii. in Migne, Patrol. lxx. 994, "Et tempore vii. libri Facundi refulsere," Victor. Tununens. Chron. a. a. 550 in Migne, Patrol. lxxviii. 659.)

Soon after this Facundus returned to Africa, and was present at a council of the bishops of the prefecture, A.D. 550, when Vigilius was excommunicated for having condemned the "Three Chapters" (Victor. Tun. u. s.). These proceedings gave great offence to Justinian, and numbers of the African bishops were deprived and imprisoned or sent into exile, while others were compelled to seek refuge in flight. Among these last was Facundus (Victor. Tununens. u. s. a. a. 551, 552, 553, 554; Fac. Contr. Mocian. u. s. lxx. 855). He remained in concealment for several years, and nothing more is heard of him until A.D. 571, when Mocianus, a "scholasticus," writing in severe reprehension of those who still withheld themselves from communion with the signatories to the condemnation of the "Three Chapters," his brethren again requested him to take up his pen in their defence. Though very ill at the time he readily complied, and prepared a treatise mainly for their use, which is of great value for the history of the whole controversy (u. s. p. 853-859), "nunc in praedictum magne Synod. Chalced. resuscitatur quaestio inter centum et viginti annos finita" (u. s. 866). At the same time he also published a Letter on the subject, apparently designed for more general use (Ep. Fid. Cathol. in Defens. Tr. Capit. Migne, u. s. 867). After this we hear no more of him. [T. W. D.]

FAEBHARDAITH (FEBORDAIT), abbat of Tulana, now Dulane, in the barony of Upper Kells, co. Meath. He seems to have been put to death in A.D. 786, during a raid from Ossory. (Four Mast. by O'Donovan, i. 387-9, A.D. 781; Ann. Ult. A.D. 785.) [J. G.]

FAEGADIUS, bishop. [FOEGADIUS.]

FAEILENN. [FAILA.]

FAELAN (FAOLAN, FILLAN, FOILLAN, FUILEX, PHILLAN). Faelan, the diminutive of Fael, a wolf, has assumed a great variety of forms. In Ireland the favourite form seems to be Faelan, and in Scotland Fillan. It gave the family name O'Faeláin, and is now Phelan and Whelan (Joyce, Ir. Names of Places, 2 ser. 153). Colgan adopts Foilanus, and gives a list of twenty bearing the name (Acta SS. 104, c. i.; see Bishop Forbes's 'Notice of the Bell of St. Fillan' in Proc. Soc. Antiq. Scotl. viii. 267 sq.).

(1) Amhlobar (the Stammerer, or rather the Leper) of Rath Erann and Kill-faelan, commemorated June 20. He is said to have been son of king Aenghus by his second wife Eithne, who died with her husband in battle, A.D. 489. He is also said to have been a disciple of St. Ailbhe, and when St. Ailbhe wished to go to Tyle (Thule), but sent out instead twenty-two disciples, one of these was Faelan of Ratherrann. This place is now called Dundurn, and is in the parish of Comrie, Perthshire, in the immediate vicinity of the present village of St. Fillan's, which lies at the east end of Loch Earn. (Scotl. Illust. 138). Regarding his Irish dedication, Dr. Reeves says, "His Irish church is situate in the Queen's County, in that part of the parish which is in the barony of Cullenagh (Ord. Surv. Sheet, 18). In 1623 it was called Killhelan [i. e. Cill-Fhaelain] (Leinster Inquis. Com. Reginae, Nos. 24, 25, Jac. I.), which name is now disguised in Ballyheyland." The church of Aberdour in Fife was dedicated to him, and so probably was that of Forgan or St. Phellan's, Fifeshire, but it is hardly possible to distribute the dedications fairly between the two Fillans, so near in time and locality. (Bishop Forbes, Kal. Scot. Saints, 341; Skene, Celt. Scot. ii. 83.)

(2) Brother of St. Fursey. [FULLANUS (2).]

(3) Son of Aedh, commemorated Mar. 31 (Mart. Doneg.; Mart. Tall.). Colgan (Acta SS. 799) thinks that Faelan was son of Aidh Damianus or Bennanius, and thus of the royal stock of Munster. [FAITHLENN.]

(4) Son of Ceallach, abbat of Kildare, perished in an attack of the Hy-Neill upon the Leinstermen in the year 804. (Four Mast. by O'Donovan, i. 407-9, A.D. 799; Ann. Ult. A.D. 803.)

(5) Abbat of Martartaigi, "House of the Martyrs," died A.D. 722. (Ann. Ult. A.D. 721.)

[J. G.]

FAELCHU. (1) Of Finglas, commemorated Sept. 24. In the Life of St. Abban in Colgan (Acta SS. 615, c. 20, 623, n. 24) an account is given of St. Abban founding churches and monasteries in the south of Ireland; he passed southward from Connaught as far as Muskerry in Cork, then, turning east and north, proceeded through Tipperary till he reached Killculen, on the banks of the Liffey, where he built a most regular monastery at Cluain-find-glasse, probably Finglas beside Dublin, and there Faelchu died A.D. 763 (Ann. Tig.) Colgan would place it in Munster.

(2) Abbat of Iona, A.D. 716-724, having his feast on April 3. He was son of Dorbene and of the race of Conall Gulban. At seventy-four he was appointed to Iona, A.D. 716 (Ann. Tig.), the only year which would meet the condition "in iv. Kal. Sept., die Sabbati suscepit." He succeeded Dunchadh, and appears to have been chosen, perhaps as coadjutor, or as rival abbat, the year before Dunchadh died. In A.D. 724, at a ripe old age, he died, and was succeeded by Cillene Fada. Skene thinks it probable that he had been at the head of a Columban monastery in the territory of the northern Picts before his election to the abbacy, and that he is the same as Volocus, the patron saint of Dunmeth and Logy, in Mar, both in Aberdeenshire. Skene is also of opinion that he represented the conservative party at Iona. (Four Mast. by O'Donovan, i. 313, 319; O'Connor, Rer. Hib. Script. ii. 228 n. ²², 234 n. ⁴², iv. 72 n. ¹; Colgan, Acta SS. 745, col. 2, n. ¹², and Tr. Thaum. 481 n. ²², 499, col. 1; Lanigan, Eccl. Hist. Ir. iii. 157-9; Reeves, Adamnan, 381; Skene, Celt. Scot. ii. 177-8, 278 sq.; Grub, Eccl. Hist. Scot. i. 114, 119; Innes, Orig. Par. Scot. ii. pt. ⁷, 288.) The two chief events of his primacy were, as related in the Annals of Tigernach, (a) the driving of the family of Hy by king Nectan across the Grampian range in A.D. 717, on account, probably, of their not obeying the orders of that Pictish king regarding the newly adopted usages; and (b) the adoption of the coronal tonsure in A.D. 718. (O'Connor, Rer. Hib. Script. ii. 229.) [J. G.]

FAELDOBAIR (1) Of Clochar, bishop, June 29 (Mart. Doneg.; Mart. Tall.). He died A.D. 702 (Ann. Tig.), but has been confounded by Ware, Colgan, and Lanigan with Faeldobair Beg as regards his date.

(2) Beg, called also The Wise, died at Fobhar, or Fore, in Westmeath, in the year 731. (Four Mast. A.D. 725; Ann. Ult. A.D. 730.) [J. G.]

FAELGHUS. (1) Abbat of Killeigh, in King's County, died A.D. 808. (Four Mast. by O'Donovan, i. 186 n. ⁷, 413, A.D. 803; Ann. Ult. A.D. 807, calling him "princeps.")

(2) Son of Tnuthghal or Tunthgaile, a wise man of Clonard, in Meath, died A.D. 784. (Four Mast. A.D. 779; Ann. Ult. A.D. 783.) [J. G.]

FAENDELACH (FAINDEALACH). Commemorated on Sept. 18. There was a Faendelech, son of Maenach, who was abbat and bishop of Armagh, and whose sudden death is entered the Ann. Ult. A.D. 794 (O'Connor, Rer. Hib. in Scriptor. iv. 117). He seems to have succeeded Ferdacrich in A.D. 768, but there appear to have been many claimants to the episcopal dignity and a consequent confusion in the succession. Faendelach probably resigned his abbacy in 771, and the vacancy continued till 778, when Dubhdalethe was appointed. During his rule the city of Armagh in A.D. 770 was twice burned. (Four Mast. by O'Donovan, i. 403 n. ⁸; Lanigan, Eccl. Hist. Ir. iii. 194, 233, 234; Stuart, Armagh, 94-5.) [J. G.]

FAFILA (1) (FAVILA), the father of the famous PELAYO, according to certain chroniclers. [PELAGIUS.] [M. A. W.]

FAFILA (2), son of Pelayo, and king of the Asturias after his father's death. He reigned two years (737-739), and built the church of the Holy Cross at Cangas. In 739 he was killed by a bear (Seb. Sal. c. 12), and was buried in the church he had built. For the famous inscription still existing in the church of the Santa Cruz at Cangas, which professes to date from Fafila's lifetime, and contains the names of himself and his queen Froiluba, see Hübner's Inscr. Hispan. Christ. no. 149. An amended text of it, as transcribed by the Spanish scholar Fernandez Guerra y Orbe, will be found among the Addimenta to the Inscr. Brit. Christ. [M. A. W.]

FAGAN (FFAGAN), usually represented in the legend of king Lucius as sent with Dyfan by pope Eleutherus to Britain, where they instructed and baptized at the end of the second century. Geoffrey of Monmouth (Hist. iv. cc. 19, 20) boldly affirms that they "almost extinguished paganism over the whole island, dedicated the temples that had been founded in honour of many gods to the one only God and his saints, and filled them with congregations of Christians." There is a parish in Glamorganshire still bearing the name of St. Fagan, four miles from Cardiff. In Leland's time (Lel. Itin. vol. iv. pt. 1, fol. 63) the parish church had been rebuilt and was dedicated to St. Mary, but the older parish church bearing the name of St. Fagan survived. (Rees, Welsh Saints, 82-7, 338; Haddan and Stubbs, i. 26; Bp. Forbes, SS. Nin. and Kent, 83, 354-55; Girald. Camb. Descrip. Kamb. i. c. 18, wks. vi. 202; Ussher, Eccl. Ant. cc. 4-5, wks. v. 53-77, 126-27.) He is placed among the chorepiscopi of Llandaff prior to the time of St. Dubricius (Lib. Landav. 623), and is reputed as the founder, with Duman, of the ancient see of Congresbury (Stubbs, Reg. Sac. Angl. 153, 154. See also W. J. Rees, Cambro-Briton Saints, 613). His day is, perhaps, Feb. 10, but a "Faganus confessor" occurs in some English books under Aug. 8. [DERUVIANUS.] [J. G. and C. W. B.]

FAILA (FAILENNA, FAOILEANN, FOILENNA). (1) Virgin, March 8. She was descended from the illustrious house of the Hy-Fiachrach; her mother was Cuillenn or Cuillenda, and her three brothers, Colga, Aedh, and Sorar. Her church was at Kil-faile, now Killealy, noted for pilgrimages. St. Faila must have flourished about A.D. 580. (Colgan, Acta SS. 248, c. 2, 381, c. 3, and n. ⁴, 456; Lanigan, Eccl. Hist. Ir. ii. 326-9; Kelly, Cal. Ir. Saints, 82.)

(2) Virgin, Nov. 13. She was daughter of Eoghan (Mart. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, 309), and, like the preceding Faila, belonged to the house of the Hy-Fiachrach, but through a different son of Dathi, and thence to a different sept, which was named from her father, Hy-Fiachrach Aidne (Reeves, Adamnan, 45.) [J. G.]

FAILBHE (FALVEUS). (1) Son of Pipan, abbat of Iona, March 22 (Mart. Doneg.) He was of the noble race of Conall Gulban, in Tyrconnel, and, like so many of his family, sought voluntary exile in the arch-monastery of Iona. There he spent many years, till at the death of Cuimine Ailbhe in A.D. 669 he was himself called on to rule, which he did for ten years, when St. Adamnan succeeded him. In the Felire of Aengus it is said that during his primacy he twice revisited Ireland, and Colgan imagines that the most probable occasion for these journeys was the Paschal controversy, but Skene thinks it is as likely to have been in connexion with missionary enterprise, St. Maelrubha about that time having carried the Gospel to the north-western shores of Scotland. The journeys were evidently considered very important, as all the annals record a visit to Ireland in the year 673, and his return in 676 (Ann. Tig.). He died A.D. 679. He is referred to by St. Adamnan (Vit. S. Columb. i. c. 1) as "meus decessor, noster abbas Failbeus." (Lanigan, Eccl. Hist. Ir. 97 sq.; Grub, Eccl. Hist. Scot. i. 98, 102; Reeves, Adamnan, 16, 26, 376; Ussher, Eccl. Ant. vi. 245, and Ind. Chron. A.D. 679; O'Connor, Rer. Hib. Script. ii. 209 n. ²¹)

110 n. ²; Bp. Forbes, Kal. Scott. Saints 191 (Apr. 25), 201 (June 3), 214 (Oct. 6), 335; Ann. Celt. Scot. ii. 168 sq.; C. Innes, Orig. Par. Scot. ii. pt. i. 287; Haddan and Stubbs, Councils, i. pt. i. 135.)

(3) Beg, abbat of Iona, also called Fedhlimidh, March 10. His obit appears in the Four Mast. A.D. 754, "Feidhlimidh or Failbhe, abbat of Iona, after the 87th year of his age." Reeves (Ann. Scot., 385) does not count this Failbhe among the abbats of Iona, but only coadjutor-abbat, or set up as a rival abbat in the confusion caused by the paschal controversies. He held this office from the primacy of Faelcu, as the Ann. Tigernach, A.D. 722, have the entry "Fedlimidius Principatum Hionae tenet." He thus held an abbacy there while Cillene Foda (A.D. 724-728), Cillene Droicteach (A.D. 726-752), and Slebhine (A.D. 752-767), were more generally accepted as the abbats of the Columban brotherhood. Failbhe may have headed the conservative or traditional party, which was then certainly on the decline (O'Connor, Rev. Hib. Script. ii. 231 n. ²; Bp. Forbes, Kal. Scott. Saints, 335-6; Skene, Celt. Scot. ii. 281-88).

(3) Of Erdomh or Erdaimh, commemorated Feb. 8, April 8. There is entered on these two days in the Irish Kalendars "Failbhe of Erdomh," referring probably to the same individual (Mart. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, 43, 98 n. ¹, 99; Mart. Tallaght, in Kelly, Cal. Ir. SS. xv. xx.) The Four Mast. (by Donovan, i. 368) have his obit A.D. 766; but the place, the Irish Erdamh or side chapel, is unidentified (Colgan, Acta SS. 576, col. 1 and n. ⁴; O'Hanlon, Irish Saints, ii. 410).

(4) Son of Guaire, of Applecross. He succeeded Maelrubha in 722 (Ann. Tig.), and in the course of some years met his death in a way which was very characteristic of the working of the ancient Celtic church. In the Four Mast. (by O'Donovan, i. 329) is the entry: "A.D. 732, Faibhe, son of Guaire, successor of Maelrubha, was assailed, and the crew of his ship along with him; they were twenty-two in number." The true date is probably 737 (Ann. Tig.). (Reeves, Ann. Scot., 385; Skene, Celt. Scot. ii. 285 sq.; O'Connor, Rev. Hib. Script. ii. 241, iv. 86; Colgan, Acta SS. 576; Grub, Eccl. Hist. Scot. i. 130; Bp. Forbes, Kal. Scott. Saints, 335.) Applecross is a parish on the west coast of Ross-shire, and lies between Loch Torridon and Loch Carron (see Cassin Innes, Orig. Par. Scot. ii. pt. ii. 402).

(5) Beg (modicus, Ann. Ult.) is said in the Four Mast. A.D. 711, and Ann. Ult. A.D. 712, to have been abbat of Clonmacnoise, in King's County, and the former adds that he was "of the Gailenga of Coraun," that is, as interpreted by O'Donovan (Four Mast. i. 311 n. ⁶), of a sept of the race of Oilill Olum, king of Munster, seated in the diocese of Achonry, in the province of Connaught, Corann being the name of a barony, in the county of Sligo. The Ann. Tig. place his death at probably its true date, A.D. 713, and say he is of the Gailenga in Coraund (CO GAILENGA) in CORAUNDO to which O'Connor has erroneously prefixed "bishop" (O'Connor, Rev. Hib. Script. ii. 226). [J. G.]

FADNA. [SEVEN MARTYRS OF ANCYRA.]

FAINCHE GARBHE, virgin, of Rosairthir, commemorated Jan. 1. Her name is variously written Fainc, Fainche, Fanchea, Fuinche, Funches and Funchea, but why Garbh (rough) is added is unknown. Being sister of St. Enna (Mar. 21) of Aran, this virgin-saint was daughter of Conall Derg, son of Coirpre, and belonged to the noble race of the Oriels in Ulster. Her mother was Aebfinn or Briga, daughter of Ainmire, son of Ronan, king of the Ards, and St. Fainche was born at Rathmore in Magh-Leamhna near Clogher (which is to be distinguished from the famous Rathmore in Antrim. Reeves, Eccl. Antiq. 278-81; Four Mast. by O'Donovan, i. 102 n. ²). Her monastery was at Rosairthir, now Rossory, on the banks of Lough Erne, co. Fermanagh. In the memoir given by Colgan (Acta SS. 1-3), which is reproduced in substance, with notes, by O'Hanlon (Irish Saints, i. 1 sq.), an account is given of her and her sisters, Lochinna, Carecha, and Darenia, and a long extract is added from the Life of St. Enna, relating how she converted St. Enna, and, afterwards seeking him at Rome, induced him to return to Ireland. In fact, she is represented as his monitor and guide throughout almost all his career, as it was to her, under God, that he owed his religious vocation. It is said that she died at sea on her homeward journey from Rome, and that on a dispute arising as to the custody of her body, two bodies appeared and were carried, the one to Kilhaine, in Meath, and the other to Ballybarrigh, on the banks of the Liffey, in the county and diocese of Kildare. Another legend would connect her or one of her name with the weird tale in the Leabhar-na-h Uidhur of Liban the mermaid in Lough Neagh (Four Mast. by O'Donovan, i. 201 n. ²; Reeves, Eccl. Ant. 377-8). Colgan (Acta SS. Ind. Chron.) says she died about A.D. 480, but it was probably rather later, in the beginning of the sixth century. (Butler, Lives of the Saints, Jan. 1, i. 70; Lanigan, Eccl. Hist. Ir. i. 400; Kelly, Cal. Ir. SS. 50; Todd, S. Patrick, 117, 125-6 n. ².)

FAINDEALACH. [FAENDELACH.]

FAIRCHELLACH (FOIRCHEALLACH), of Fobhar (Fore), is commemorated in Mart. Doneg. and Mart. Tallaght on June 10. Colgan (Acta SS. 144, c. 3) quotes him among the prelates of Fobhar, now called St. Feighins or Fore, in the barony of Fore and county of Westmeath. The Four Mast. (by O'Donovan, i. 421) in A.D. 809 (recte 814) and Ann. Ult. in A.D. 813, have the obit of "Foircheallach of Fobhar, abbat of Cluan-mic-Nois, one of the Gaileanga-Mora;" that is, says O'Donovan, "the inhabitants of the barony of Morgallion, in the county of Meath."

FAITH, ST. [FIDES (2).]

FAITH (fides = πίστις), in which last language that twofold meaning was acquired to which the spread of the gospel has given such prominence in all three. 1. The theological virtue called faith, subsisting in the individual or the church at large; and 2, the dogmatic formula summing up the objective faith of all and each, called the creed. As St. Augustine tells his catechumens: "Quod audituri estis, hoc credituri: et quod credideritis, hoc etiam lingua reddaturi. Ait enim Apostolus: 'Corde creditur ad justitiam, ore autem confessio fit ad salutem.' (Serm. ad Catech. de Symb. § 1.) Of these the latter will require but a passing notice in this place, shewing how it affected, and still affects, the first. It is the virtue that stands for special treatment here.

I. "Whatever be the particular faculty or frame of mind denoted by the word," says Dr. Newman, "certainly faith is regarded in Scripture as the chosen instrument connecting heaven and earth, as a novel principle of action, most powerful in the influence which it exerts both on the heart and on the Divine view of us, and yet in itself of a nature to excite the contempt or ridicule of the world" (Univ. Sermons, Serm. ix. p. 169). These characteristics, here so well summarized, "its apparent weakness, its novelty, its special adoption, and its efficacy," were precisely the points on which the fathers had to enlarge in meeting objections urged against it in pagan times. "Credo stands first of all in the creed," says Rufinus, "agreeably with what the apostle Paul, writing to the Hebrews, says: 'He that cometh to God must first of all believe that He is, and that He is a rewarder of those who diligently seek Him.' The prophet, too, says: 'If ye will not believe, neither shall ye understand' (Is. vii. 9, LXX). This he proves in detail is so far from being peculiar to religion that it is an accepted principle in every walk of life, to start from faith. All we cannot see for ourselves, but must learn from others, whether past, present, or future, is an object of faith. Many truths we cannot understand we accept on faith. What wonder then if, in approaching God, we are required to accord to Him what ordinary routine exacts from all? "Haec autem idcirco in principiis praemisimus," he continues, "quia pagani nobis objicere solent, quod religio nostra, quia rationibus deficit, in solâ credendi persuasionem consistat" (in Symb. Apost. § 3). Here Rufinus may have been epitomizing St. Cyril of Jerusalem, whose fifth catechetical lecture formally treats of faith: "the eye of the whole conscience that creates in it understanding," as it is there called: and St. Cyril in turn, drawing from Origen, who quotes Celsus, saying, "Some there are who will neither give nor accept account of those things they believe, but always meet you with, 'Don't inquire, only believe: and, thy faith will save thee:' who maintain, further, that worldly wisdom is an evil, and folly a good" (c. Cels. i. 9-11): and even Origen in this passage, repeating much of what his master, St. Clement of Alexandria, had said before him in his fifth book of Stromateis or Miscellanies, where there is much also worth remembering that is didactic. As, for instance, the following: "Remove every ground for inquiring, and faith is made firm and sure. Our position accordingly, which cannot be gainsaid, is, that it is God who speaks, and has declared Himself in His word on every point that we had selected for inquiry. Who, then, is so absurd and so godless as not to believe God when He speaks, or to require proof from God as from men?" (v. p. 546). This brings us back to Rufinus again. He draws attention to a distinction of form in the creed, for which he certainly has a consensus patrum on his side, though bishop Pearson seems sceptical of its intrinsic worth (On the Creed, vol. i. p. 22; Burton's ed. with the notes). Of the concluding articles of the creed, then, Rufinus observes: "Non dixit in sanctam ecclesiam, nec, in remissionem peccatorum, nec, in carnis resurrectionem. Si enim addidisset in praepositionem, una cum superioribus eademque vis fieret, nunc autem in illis quidem vocabulis ubi de Divinitate ordinatur fides, in . . . dicitur . . . in caeteris verò, ubi non de divinitate, sed de creaturis ac mysteriis sermo est, in praepositio non additur . . . Hæc itaque praepositionis syllabâ Creator a creaturis secernitur, et Divina separantur ab humanis" (§ 36). Nothing can be more certain than this. Faith in the Infinite is the only faith that can be without reserve. A Being of infinite power, wisdom, and goodness is the only being who can neither deceive nor be deceived. Faith in Him is the only faith that can be called "divine." To place the same faith in any being short of the Infinite is creature-worship. We may believe man: it is our duty. We may not believe in man: that is idolatry. "Verax Christus, mendax Petrus," says St. Augustine (Serm. de Verb. Ev. cxlvii. § 1). And again, "Quod nemo potest in Paulo, nemo in Petro, nemo in alio ullo apostolorum, hoc potest in Domino" (Serm. lxxvi. § 5, 3b.). And again, "Credimus Apostolo, sed non credimus in Apostolum; non enim Apostolus justificat impium . . ." (Tract. in Joan. liv. 3).

Here we must remark, in passing, on the Latin and Greek form of the Nicene creed as now used. It is the Latin form, "Et unam sanctam catholicam et apostolicam ecclesiam," which has, in all probability, preserved the reading of primitive times. The Greek, "ἐν μιᾷ ἐκκλησίᾳ" etc., was either meant to be construed with the preceding clause—viz. "The Holy Ghost . . . who spake by the prophets to one holy Catholic" etc., as was all but demonstrated by professor Baletta some few years back: or else the word ἐν is a corrupt—perhaps an Arian—substitution for καὶ. The English, "And I believe one Catholic" etc. is as strictly orthodox as the Latin. All the articles of the creed agree so far, indeed, that we believe them on the authority of God Himself. We should be justified in disbelieving them, we should err in believing them, if they came to us vouched for only by man. Who but God, for instance, could guarantee to us remission of sins or eternal life? As St. Irenaeus says of the Incarnation itself, "Propter hoc, generationem ejus quis enarrabit? Quoniam: homo est, et quis agnoscat Eum? Cognoscit autem illum is, cui Pater Qui est in coelis revelavit, quoniam Is, Qui non ex voluntate carnis, neque ex voluntate viri, natus est Filius hominis, Hic est Christus, Filius Dei vivi" (Haer. iii. 19). But again, believing even an eternal truth, is intrinsically different from believing in God. "Quid est credere in Deum?" asks St. Augustine. "Credendo amare, credendo diligere, credendo in Eum ire, et Ejus membris incorporari" (Tract. in Joan. xxix. 6). In other words, believing in God, includes loving Him to the same extent.

Hence, to resume the teaching of the fathers up to this point, we find two characteristics of divine faith, radically distinguishing it from human, to be: first, that it has God alone for its object; and secondly, truth authenticated by God alone for its subject-matter. It is, therefore, illimitable and beyond argument, in both respects. Its foundations, from whichever side you regard them, are unassailable. Its remaining characteristic, on which the fathers are no less agreed, is that it has God for its author; in other words, that it is His inward gift: not a habit, which man by himself can acquire. Curiously enough, it was some time before St. Augustine realized this fact to the full, as he tells us himself. He was, in short, a concealed semi-Pelagian, till Pelagius arose. "Quem meum errorem," he says, in his latest work, "nonnulla opuscula mea satis indicant ante episcopatum meum scripta. . . . (De Praed. 7.) For, as he has confessed in his Retractations: "Nondum diligentius quaesieram, nec adhuc inveneram qualis sit electio gratiae . . . quae utique non est gratia, si eam merita ulla praecedant." . . . (I. 23, n. 2). What his error was he explains further on, when he quotes the noble words of St. Cyprian: "In nullo gloriantur, quando nostrum nihil sit" (Test. iii. 4), against himself. "Quo praecipue testimonio etiam ipse convictus sum, cum similiter errarem, putans fidem quae in Deum credimus, non esse donum Dei, sed a nobis esse in nobis: et per eam nos impetrare Dei dona, quibus temperanter et juste et pie vivamus in hoc saeculo." . . . (De Praed. ib.) The passages of the New Testament named by him as having opened his eyes to this error are, I. Cor. vii. 25: "Ubi non se ipsum misericordiam consecutum dixit ut fidelior, sed ut fidelis esset;" II. Cor. iii. 5; Rom. xii. 3; Eph. vi. 23. Of II. Thess. iii. 2: "All men have not faith,"—he remarks, "have not" is not synonymous with "cannot have." "Proinde posse habere fidem, sicut posse habere caritatem, naturae est hominum; habere autem fidem, quomodo habere caritatem, gratiae est fidelium. . . . Non quia credere, vel non credere, est in arbitrio voluntatis humanae; sed in electis praeparatur voluntas a Domino" . . . (Ib. 10.) By the elect, he understands elsewhere, all who have never refused grace. "Ex fide autem ideo dicit (Apostolus) justificari hominem, non ex operibus; quia ipsa prima datur, ex qua impetratur caetera, quae proprie opera nuncupantur, in quibus juste vivitur." . . . (Ib. 12.) These passages are quoted in the original for their lucidity. It is not because they contain anything really new. The earlier fathers had expressed themselves in the main to the same effect. Thus, St. Clement of Rome says pointedly: "We are not justified through ourselves, nor through our own wisdom, understanding, or piety; nor works done by us in holiness of heart, but through faith: through which Almighty God justified all that ever were (justified) since the world began" (Ep. i. 32). And St. Ignatius in his epistle to the Ephesians: "Neither of which things escape you, if your faith and love in Jesus Christ are what they should be: the beginning and end of life—faith the beginning, and love the end. And these two, blended in one, are from God. All other things leading to righteousness are their consequents. Nobody professing faith sins; nobody possessing love cherishes hate" (c. 14). And St. Irenaeus: "Faith, which is towards God, justifies man." (Adv. Haer. iv. 5.) And St. Clement of Alexandria, in his Miscellanies, already cited: "Faith is the mother of most virtues." And St. Cyprian, in his Testimonies (§ 42): "Faith is profitable from every point of view; and our ability to act is in exact proportion to our believing." Finally, St. Isidore of Seville—to quote from a writer as long after St. Augustine, as the rest were before him—in the second book of his Sentences: "It is impossible to arrive at true blessedness, except through faith; and he is blessed, who, by believing rightly, leads a virtuous life: and by living virtuously, cleaves to the right faith. . . . Faith is in no case extorted by force, but instilled by persuasive arguments and examples . . ." (c. 2.) The sterlingness of the last remark is enhanced doubly by coming from Spain. "Yet neither St. Ambrose nor St. Martin, in their day," says Butler, "would communicate with Ithacius, bishop of Ossobona, or those bishops who held communion with him, because they sought to put heretics to death" (Lives of the Saints, Sept. 11).

Faith, then, according to the teaching of the fathers, is a new graft on an old stock; a supernatural virtue developed out of a natural instinct; belief in God educed from the ready-made habit that exists in all men of believing each other. Furthermore, being a gift of the Holy Ghost, it carries with it its own evidence, which is love—all-powerful, if accepted, to inspire conviction when either external evidences are wholly wanting, or of the slenderest kind, or even point the other way.

What Aristotle calls the moral proof, depending on the character of the speaker, needs no confirming, when that person is God. For the same reason, though divine faith, equally with human, is an act of the whole man, assent must always be dictated in the former by trust; and understanding a thing, never be made a condition of believing it. Faith in the Infinite, rightly requires us to believe many things we cannot fathom, or only fathom after believing them. "Through faith," says the apostle, "we understand that the worlds were framed by the Word of God, so that things which are seen were not made of things which do appear" (Heb. xi. 3). Whence St. Augustine: "Prius credite, postea intelligite; cui autem donat Deus, ut cum crediderit, cito intelligat, Dei donum est, non humana fragilitas" (Serm. de Symb. ad Catech. § 4).

One more speciality which the Fathers attribute to divine faith is its expansive character; deepening and widening in harmonious symphony with the revelation of His benign purpose, which it has pleased God to unfold gradually to man. Thus, what used in primitive times to be simple belief in God—and in heathen lands is no more still—has long been heightened and expanded under the Gospel into full-blown belief in Three Divine Persons, now known to constitute the Godhead; of the redemption of man by the second Person, Who became flesh for his sake, and of the sanctification of man by the third, shed abroad in his heart. As St. Augustine puts it: "Superioribus temporibus omni modo latuit sacramentum justificationis ex fide. Eadem tamen fides mediatoris salvos justos faciebat antiquos—puillos cum magnis" . . . (De Concup. et Nupt. ii. 24) "sive in iis justis quos sacra Scriptura commemorat, sive in iis justis quos quidem illa non commemorat, sed tamen fuisse credendi sunt: vel ante diluvium, vel inde usque ad legem datam, vel ipsius legis tempore, non solum in filiis Israel, sicut fuerunt Prophetæ, sed etiam extra eundem populum, sicut fuit Job. Et ipsorum enim corda eadem mundabantur mediatoris fide, et diffundebatur in eis caritas per Spiritum Sanctum, Qui ubi vult spirat, non merita sequens, sed etiam ipsa merita faciens. Non enim Dei gratia gratia erit ullo modo, nisi gratuita fuerit omni modo" (De Grat. ii. 28.) And St. Gregory the Great on Ezekiel (ii. 5, 2): "Et qui praeibant, et qui sequebantur, clamabant Hosanna—Praecessit quippe Judaicus populus, secutus est Gentilis. Et quia omnes electi, quia in Iudaea esse potuerunt, sive qui in ecclesia sunt, in mediatorum Dei et hominum crediderunt et credunt, qui praeunt, et qui sequuntur, Hosanna clamant." (Comp. St. Chrysost. on Romans i. 17, Hom. II. and Galat. iii. 11, with Theodoret on Heb. x. 38, 39, and Peter Lombard, B. iii. Dist. 25 of the Sentences.)

It follows from these passages, and many more too long to cite, that faith, the gift of God, or divine faith, in the opinion of the Fathers, is as ancient as the promise made to the seed of the woman, and has been used by man with saving effect all over the world in every age since then, and never withheld from any who would accept and co-operate with it in the best way they could. It has been held in solitude, and held in company; nurtured by ordinances in prescribed form, or fed in secret direct from heaven itself. Ordinances have never availed anything at any time without it; but it has availed everything at all times without them, where they could not be had. Virtues without it have availed for this world alone—or, to put the case somewhat differently—through the merits of the Incarnation, belief in God has been made possible to man in every age, and counted to him for righteousness, whenever it has been accepted, so that it might be acted upon through life to the saving of his soul. It has been made possible, but never forced upon him against his will, and it has been at all times liable to be withdrawn, on being sinned against or abandoned by him; so that it may be had and lost. If the Fathers seem occasionally to distinguish between a dead faith and a lively; between a faith that can move mountains, and a faith which hesitates between doubt and assent; their real meaning is, not that divine faith ever changes in itself, but, according to the amount of subjective co-operation it receives, it either bears fruit or dies out; works miracles or effects nothing, either in the heart or outer world. Human faith, on the contrary, both admits of degrees, and may be possessed by atheists.

II. Passing to the secondary sense given to faith in Christian times, let us first hear bishop Pearson on its relevancy: "He who put their writings (i.e. the Scriptures) into the definition of faith; considering faith, as it now stands with us, is none of the least of the schoolmen" (i. 22, Burton's ed. with the note). Perhaps it was St. Augustine who first associated the two ideas in a formal treatise, called De Fide et Symbolo by himself; but the connexion between them had been recognised long before this, when such phrases began to be current as "the faith (πίστις) of the 318 Fathers who met at Nicaea; the faith of the 150 who met at Constantinople; the Catholic faith set forth at Sirmium on the 23rd of May," &c., and when each bishop, on his consecration, sent "communicatory letters," containing a profession of faith, round to his brother bishops, of which there are traces 100 years earlier (Euseb. E. H. vii. 30, 8), in proof of his orthodoxy.

All such professions, orthodox or heretical, public or private, purported to be compendiums of Scripture; either drawn up in its very words or embodying its substance, intact and complete. "Hoc est enim symbolum," St. Augustine tells his catechumens: "quod recensuri estis, et reddaturi, ista verba quae audistis, per divinas Scripturas sparsa sunt: sed inde collecta et ad unum redacta, ne tardorum hominum memoria laboraret, ut omnis homo possit dicere, possit tenere, quod credit" (De Symb. Serm. ad Catech. § 1.) In other words, the subject-matter of divine faith was held by the Fathers to be contained in Holy Scripture, and thence drawn out into creeds; and as long as creeds aspired to be no more than a collection of Scriptural truths expressed in Scriptural language, they were so completely the outpourings of divine faith all through, that they might well be called by the same name. Subsequently, when human inferences from Scripture came to be placed on the same footing as Scriptural statements themselves, and the conclusions of theologians elevated into matters of faith by the living authorities of the church, belief in the church militant obtained as a practical principle, to the obscuration of belief in God; and divine faith waned in the individual, while ecclesiastical formularies, enlarged and multiplied, were forced on his acceptance. The beginning of this change dates, indeed, from the 9th century. To dwell further on it, therefore, would be to exceed our limits. It has been glanced at, however, because the contrast brings out how exclusively the subject-matter of divine faith was maintained by the Fathers to be the written Word; and its object, as well as its author, to be God alone.

Besides the minor treatises of St. Augustine, De fide et operibus; De Fide eorum quae non videntur; De fide et symbolo: Serm. ad Catechum.; Enchiridion; his more important works against Pelagianism (vol. x. of the Ben. ed.) should be consulted; also, treatises De Fide, by St. Ambrose, St. Fulgentius, and St. Isidore; Gennadius, de Ecol. Dogm. ca. 42 and 49; Mareschal, Concord. Patrum, generally, continued in Schramm's Analysis; Fessler, Inst. Patrol. Estius and the older schoolmen on Book iii. Dist. 22–25 of the Sentences; Suarez, de Tripl. Virt. Theol. Fide, Spe, et Caritate; Pearson, On the Creed, Art. I.; Waterland, Faber, and Newman On Justification; bishop Harold Brown, on Art. XI., and Art. JUSTIFICATION. [E. S. Ff.]

FAITH, RULE OF. It is clear that over and above the short CREEDS which furnished the test to the candidate for baptism, there were handed down, in the various apostolical churches, traditional rules both of practice and teaching, to which the teachers and members of these churches were expected to conform. These were designated as rules: Regulae; κανόνας. Thus the words ὁ κανὼν τῆς πίστεως occur in the letter which Polycrates, bishop of Ephesus, wrote to Victor of Rome (A.D. 192–201), Euseb. H. E. v. 24. He claimed that he was following this with his observance of Easter. Irenaeus, in a passage quoted under CREEDS (Vol. I. p. 696, § 10), applies the words "Rule of Faith" to the traditional belief of the church. To this traditional belief he refers in numerous passages. So does Tertullian, using the title Regula Fidei in his tracts de Virgin. velandis, c. 1; de Monogamia, c. 2; de Praescript. c. 13. The last passage refers to several points not mentioned explicitly in the baptismal creed. There are passages in the work of Novatian de Trinitate which run thus: "The Rule of Truth requires that we should believe. . . . The same Rule of Truth teaches us to believe" where the Rule of Truth must be equivalent to the church's order, requiring a belief in the church's teaching, this teaching furnishing the standard by which every statement was to be measured. Once more, Victorinus of Petavium (Hahn, § 12) speaks of the cardo et mensura fidei, the measuring rod of the faith. So far the statement of Bingham (Antiq. x. iii. 2) that the word κανὼν (rule) was one of the many titles given to the symbol or creed requires enlargement.

This distinction was fully recognised in later years. At present, we may refer to the large mass of teaching put forward confidently by Irenaeus, not only in the passages quoted in the article on the CREEDS, but throughout his great work. Thus he says, i. 22. 1: "if we hold the rule of truth we can detect and confute" such and such assertions of the Valentinians; in i. 27. 4, he speaks of people adulterating the truth and teaching of the church; in ii. 30. 9, of the advantage we possess in standing by Him "whom the law announces, whom the prophets proclaim, whom Christ reveals, whom the apostles hand down, whom the church believes." In iii. (Introduction) we read of the duty of contending for the true and life-giving faith which the church received from the Apostles and delivered to her children. On this faith he enlarges much, especially in chap. 3, in which he appeals to the churches of Christendom, and especially to the churches of Rome, Smyrna, and Ephesus. He claims that what was contrary to the teaching of these churches must be false, for "the apostles have poured into the church, as into a rich depository, all things that belong to the truth, so that every one that wills may drink out of it the water of life." Compare chap. 5. 1. In book v. he confirms all his teaching out of the discourses of our Saviour. Such was the Faith which the Apostles handed down, and which was sufficient to "measure" the early heresies.

Passing from Irenaeus to Origen we have, in the latter's work, περὶ ἀρχῶν, indications of other points which were considered to be part of the faith handed down by the Apostles. He enumerates these among others: that every rational soul possesses freewill and choice, and that we have to pass through a struggle with the devil and his angels; again, that this world was made at a certain time, and is hereafter to be dissolved; that the Scriptures were written per Spiritum Dei et verbum hominum, non cum solum qui in manifestis est, sed et aliam quandam latentem plurimos. Of course these subjects were never introduced into the Baptismal Creed. Further illustration of the same distinction is given by St. Cyril of Jerusalem. His fourth lecture is devoted to a brief summary (ἀνακεφαλαιώσις σύντομος) of the doctrines which are necessary to be believed, and he introduces much that is deeply interesting on the following subjects:—God, Christ, the Birth from the Virgin, the Cross, the Burial, Resurrection, Assumption, the Future Judgment, and the Holy Spirit. But these lessons are followed by others on the condition of man, his soul, his body, on his food, his clothing, his resurrection, the laver, the Holy Scriptures, including a list of the books "which we read confidently in the church." In Saint Augustine's Enchiridion (15, vol. vi. col. 375) the Regula Fidei is the creed. But in his Letters this phrase (as well as the corresponding Regula Veritatis) is used of the general or traditional teaching of the church. Thus (Ep. xciii. § 40) in discussing the conduct of Cyprian as to the rebaptizing of heretics, Augustine says that "if Cyprian's opinions were wrong at one time, he afterwards corrected them by the rule of truth." In another letter (Ep. cclxv.) he says that "they who deny the locus poenitentiae to persons after baptism, are utterly alien from the rule of the Catholic faith, and from the teaching of Christ and His Apostles." (See, too, Ep. cxlvii. § 34. In Epp. clxxxvii. § 29, and cxci. § 11, regula fidei stands for the baptismal creed.)

As time passed along, the rule of the faith was considered to include the decisions of the councils which were generally received. Thus the council of Chalcedon did not only confirm the creeds of Nicaea and Constantinople, but it also adopted the synodical letters of Cyril of Alexandria, and the letter of Leo to Flavian, and, by way of addition or explanation, it put out its own confession. This confession was substantially incorporated with the document which Quesnel conceived to be the letter on the faith which used to be addressed by the popes of Rome on their election to the bishops of the East. Again, the collections of councils give, under the first council of Toledo, "the rule of faith which the bishops of Tarragona and others transmitted to Balconius, bishop of Galicia, against all heresies, and especially against the Priscillianists." (Labbe, ii. 1227; Mansi, iii. 1003.) In the preface to the canons of the second council of Orange (C. Arausicanum ii. anno 529; Labbe, iv. 1666; Mansi, viii. 711) we read that some persons, had wandered from the rule of the faith in regard to grace and free-will. The language quoted above as from the first council of Toledo was repeated at Braga in 563 (Labbe, v. 836; Mansi, ix. 774). The well-known councils of Toledo (No. III. anno 589; No. IV. anno 633; No. VI. anno 638; No. XI. anno 675) put forth representations of "the Catholic faith" in ever-increasing volume, but it is only in the last (apparently) that the bishops used the phrase "Rule of Faith." They said that for three days they consulted together in order that they might lay down "hanc ipsam regulam fidei verbis simplicibus." (The result of their deliberations occupies four columns in Labbe's folio, vi. 541-545.) A similar desire to expand the rule according as necessity seemed to arise, may be observed in other councils, as in Milan A.D. 680, and in Rome the same year. About the year 680 St. Isidore of Seville wrote a work on the offices of the church (Migne, lxxxiii.), in which we find (p. 817) a long chapter entitled De Regula Fidei. The articles enumerated in it refer to the Persons of the Holy Trinity, the nature of the Incarnate Son of God, the creation, the origin of the soul, its original righteousness, marriage, baptism, repentance, worldly property, our resurrection, eternal punishment. This is the more interesting because it was adopted almost verbatim as his "rule of faith" by Rabanus Maurus, the pupil of Alcuin and teacher of Walafrid Strabo and others, who died archbishop of Mayence 856. The council of Arles in 813 put forth as its confession the rule of the fourth council of Toledo held in 633. The subjects of this were limited, as are the subjects of our "Athanasian Creed," to the Trinity and to the Person and work of our Lord. [C. A. S.]

FAITHLEC (FAITHLEE) founded the abbey of Clontuskert, in the barony of South Ballintober, co. Roscommon (Ware, Ir. Ant. c. 26; Mon. Hib. 90). [J. G.]

FAITHLENN, "son of Aedh Diamhan, of the race of Corc, son of Lugaidh," &c., traced up to Oilill Olum, is commemorated in Mart. Doneg. at June 4. He may be the same as Faelan, son of Aedus Damanius or Bennanius, of the royal house of Munster, of whom, along with Colman and Fethadius, Colgan gives a short account at March 31. [FAELAN (4).] If they are not the same, they are brothers, and flourished in the first half of the 7th century, Aedh Beannan, king of West Munster, having died in A.D. 619, at which year the Ann. Tigernach have the death of Aedh Bendan, king of Munster (O'Connor, Rer. Hib. Scriptor. ii. 184). At Sept. 5 there is a Faithlenn, whom Mart. Tallaght calls "Faithlenn Deochoin," and O'Clery (in Mart. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, 237) suggests that he may be this Faithlenn. [J. G.]

FALCIDIUS, a person, apparently a deacon of Rome, who endeavoured to shew (1) that in the Old Testament Levites were on an equality with priests; (2) that under the New Testament deacons were to be so regarded in reference to presbyters. This presumptuous claim a writer, formerly supposed to have been St. Augustine, confutes in a treatise entitled, De Sactantiâ Romanorum Levitarum. It is contained in a work entitled Quaestiones ex utroque mixtim, i.e. gathered both from the Old Testament and the New Testament, and is now placed in the appendix to vol. iii. of the works of Augustine, but it is no longer ascribed to him as its author. The writer shews conclusively enough that as the greater contains the less, so the presbyterate contains the diaconate, but that this does not imply that the two orders are identical. (Aug. Opp. vol. iii. App. p. 2301, qu. 101.)

[H. W. P.]

FALCO (FOULQES), 19th bishop of Maestricht (afds. Liège), succeeding his brother Eucherius I. about A.D. 495, and followed by Eucharis II. upon his death, about A.D. 512. Upon his consecration he appears to have usurped episcopal rights over the church of Mouzon, which belonged to the see of Rheims, ordaining priests and deacons to it, and appointing an archdeacon and a precentor (primicerius scholae clarissimae), and appropriating the church revenues. These proceedings drew from St. Remigius, the archbishop of Rheims, a letter of remonstrance, to be found in Migne, Patr. Lat. lxxv. 968. (Gesta Pontificum Leodiensium, i. 54, Liège, 1612, ed. Chapeauville; Gall. Christ. iii. 817; cf. Ceillier, Hist. des Auteurs sacrés, xi. 81.) [S. A. B.]

FALCONIA (FALTONIA) PROBA, of much esteem in the middle ages as a Christian poetess, but of uncertain name, place, and family. Of her works there is but one extant, Centones Virgiliani (Bibl. Vet. Patr. 708-716, Paris, 1624; Virgil. Cent. exc. Henr. Steph. an. 1578; Migne, Patr. Lat. t. xix. 802-818). She uses Virgil's words, after a short original preface, to tell the events of the Bible from the creation to the ascension of Christ, but her hexameters have little point in Christian teaching, and, from the very exigencies of the case, breathe little of Virgil. Her own identity is much disputed, and she is wholly unknown if she be not (and this identification appears to be generally assumed for want of information to the contrary) Anicia (or Valeria) Faltonia Proba, the pious wife of Sextus Anicius Petronius Probus (called by Isidorus, "Adelfius the proconsul"), whose nobility, wealth, and liberality made him one of the most honoured Romans in the end of the 4th century. [FALCONIA PROBA, in Dict. Greek and Roman Biography.] Her husband was consul with Gratian, and a Christian, though late in life; and her three sons, Olybrius, Probinus, and Probus, were also consuls. She had great influence at Rome, and used it in favour of the Christians; her daughter-in-law, Juliana, was the friend of St. Augustine, and her grand-daughter, Demetrias, the friend of St. Jerome. [DEMETRIAS.] From Cucusus in Armenia the exiled St. Chrysostom, in A.D. 406, wrote a letter (Ep. 168 al. 188) to her in reference to the persecutions and disorders at Rome, recommending the confessors to her charity; and when Alaric had taken Rome (A.D. 410), and the widowed Proba had found refuge in Africa, she came more immediately under the influence of St. Augustine of Hippo, and received from him (Ep. 130 al. 121) a letter in which, recognising her widowhood and wealth, he specially recommends to her the great duty of prayer. The time and place of Proba Falconia's death are unknown, and the above attempt at identification, though common, is very doubtful. (Baronius, Ann. Eccl. A.D. 395, i. ii. and 410, iv.; Cave, Script. Eccl. Hist. Lit. i. 255; Lindemannus, Corp. Gram. Lat. Vet. iii. 65; Montfaucon, Diar. Ital. 36.) [J. G.]

FALDUS, bishop of Lyons. [FULCOALDUS.]

FALE, ST. [FIDOLUS.]

FALLAMHAIN (FOLLOMAN), bishop, is commemorated on July 31, along with his brothers Colman, Jarnog, Natal or Naile, and Papan, who are said to have been the sons of Nadfraech, or rather the sons of that Aengus, son of Nadfraech, king of Cashel or Munster, whom St. Patrick converted and baptized, and who was slain at Cillofnadh, now Kellistown, co. Carlow, in A.D. 489. Fallamhain was bishop of Santry, now a village in the barony of Coolock, co. Dublin. (Mart. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, 207; Colgan, Acta SS. 169, c. 2, 174 n. 12; Journ. Roy. Hist. and Arch. Assoc. 4 ser. iii. 185.) [NAILE.] [J. G.]

FALTONIUS PINIANUS. [PINIANUS.]

FALVAX. The standard catalogue of the bishops of Tarragona contains the death of Falvax, A.D. 578; but in most lists the name is marked as doubtful, and even placed at the end of the catalogue from uncertainty where it ought to stand. Domenica, in his life of Cyprian, archbishop of Tanagmā, places him before that bishop, and says that he died "cum aequi nomine et pietate." (Florez, España Sagrada, xiv. 77; Gams, Series Episc. 76.)

FANTINUS (1), confessor. [FANTIUS.]

FANTINUS (2), defensor, who in 599 received letters from Gregory the Great in behalf of the Jews turned out of their synagogue, and on many other subjects. He is called defensor of Palermo in one place, in another of Naples. (Greg. Magn. Epist. lib. ix. indict. ii. ep. 55; lib. x. indict. iii. ep. 14, etc.; Migne, lxxvii. 993-1076.)

[FANTINUS (38).]

[A. H. D. A.]

FANTIUS, martyr, July 31, with Deodata his wife, under Diocletian. They were rich and of noble birth, living at Syracuse. While still youths they were charitable and devout, earnestly supplicating the gods to send them a child. In due time the child was born and named Fantinus, and they continued pagans till he reached the age of twelve. One day, when hunting, the boy pursued a deer into a cave where dwelt a hermit, by whom he was converted and baptized. Returning home he led his parents to embrace the faith. On making a public profession they were arrested, severely scourged, and cast with their child into prison. There in the middle of the night an angel appeared with a light, who encouraged the parents to endure, and allowed the boy to escape. A short time after, the parents suffered martyrdom. (Boll. Acta SS. Jul. vii. 177; Guetanus, Vitas SS. Sicul. i. 149.)

FAOILEANN. [FAILA.]

FAOILENN, FAOLAN. [FAELAN.]

FARA, ST. (BURGUNDOFARA), daughter of Cyneric, a high official at the court of Theobert king of Austrasia. Her mother was Leodegunda. She was at an early age consecrated to a conventual life by St. Columbanus, but being opposed by her father she fell ill. Her father relented at the earnest representations of Columbanus and Eustasius. She then recovered, and took the veil at Meaux in 614. She was afterwards elected abbess of a convent called after her, Fère-moutier, near Meaux. Here she established the rule of St. Columbanus, and died in 655. Her festival was kept on Dec. 7. An account of her will be found in Mabillon (Acta SS. O. S. B. tom. ii. p. 420), based upon the earliest mention of her by Jonas of Bobbio in his lives of Columbanus (sec. 50) and Eustathius (sec. 13) which are also given by Mabillon (ibid. pp. 22, 113).

[I. G. S.]

FARAMUNDUS (1) (FARAMODUS), twenty-third bishop of Paris, succeeding Eusebius II. and followed by Simplicius. He was a brother of Lepemodus, the twenty-first bishop, on whose death he sought the bishopric, but was postponed in favour of the Syrian Eusebius II. (circ. A.D. 591). On the latter's death, however, which was not long delayed, he succeeded him according to the catalogues. (Greg. Tur. Hist. Fr. x. 26; Gall. Chr. vii. 22; Gams, Series Episc. 596.)

FARAMUNDUS (2), usurping bishop of Liège, or, as the see was then called, Maestricht. Upon the death of Childeric II. in 673, St. Lambert was driven from the city and Faramundus put in his place. But after an exile of seven years, St. Lambert was restored by Pippin, and Faramund ejected from the province. (Vita S. Landeberti, auct. Godescalco, in Mabillon, Acta SS. Ord. S. Bened. saec. iii. pt. i. pp. 71-2; Paris, 1668-1701.)

[S. A. B.]

FARAMUNDUS (3), seventeenth bishop of Cologne, succeeding Anno I. and followed by Raginfredus. His exact date is uncertain, but he sat early in the 8th century. Some have identified him with the preceding, but without authority. (Gall. Christ. iii. 629.)

[S. A. B.]

FARANN was one of the three brothers, called O'Burchan, viz., Farann, Boethgal, and Maoltuile, in the time of Cathal, son of Finghin, king of Munster, who died A.D. 742 (Ann. Tig.). These three are said to have been respectively bishop, judge, and poet, and to have made a digest of laws under the title Judicia Coelestia. (O'Reilly, Irish Writers, p. lii.; O'Flaherty, Ogygia, ii. pt. iii. 78; Tanner, Bibl. 273; O'Connor, Proleg. ii. 67.)

FARANNAN. [FORANNAN.]

FARDULFUS, a native of Lombardy, whom Charles the Great carried into France along with king Didier, after the capture of Pavia. While in exile he became the fortunate discoverer of a plot formed against the life of Charles by his eldest son, Pepin, and upon the death of Maginarius, A.D. 790, was preferred, in consequence of this service, to the abbacy of St. Denys. Gratitude for his promotion led him to enlarge the monastery by the addition of a magnificent hall in which to entertain his patron. In a short poem ascribed to Alcuin (Migne, Patrol. vol. ci. p. 552), he is eulogized on account of his munificence in this and other respects. An ancient MS. belonging to the abbey records that he accompanied the king in his expedition against the Saxons in 795, and was likewise one of the delegates whom Charles appointed to visit and report upon the various provinces of his realm, with a view to the better enforcement of law. He died in 806, and was buried within the walls of the abbey of St. Denys. His only extant writings are three short elegiac poems, (1) An inscription written for the façade of the hall above mentioned. (2) An inscription for a chapel dedicated to St. John the Baptist, which he built in performance of a vow made in the first year of his exile. (3) A fragment addressed in all probability to his royal patron. (Migne, Patrol. vol. xcix. p. 825.)

[E. M. Y.]

FARMUS, bishop of Viseo. [FIRMUS.]

FARNAN. [FORANNAN.]

FARO (BURGUNDOFARO), ST., nineteenth bishop of Meaux. There are three lives of him extant, the chief and oldest of which, written by Hildegard, bishop of the same diocese, in the 9th century, in a diffuse and wearisome style, and by no means free from errors, is to be found in Mabillon, Acta SS. Ord. S. Bened. ii. 606-625, Paris, 1668-1701. He was born in the district of Brie (Pagus Briegius), in Burgundy. Agnericus, his father, was a noble of the court of Theodebert of Austrasia, who entertained St. Columban, and received the saint's blessing on his house and daughter (Vita S. Columbani, Mabillon, ii. 25). His mother's name was Leudegundia. Chagnoaldus bishop of Laon was his brother, and the famous St. Fara and Agnetrudis were his sisters. His biographer quaintly derives his name from fumen and ros, quod caelestis doctrina fando sicut ros manabat ejus ab ore, but it appears to have been the equivalent for a noble in the Burgundian language. The first part of his life was spent in courts. Theodebert, Theodoric, Clotaire II. and Dagobert II. were successively his patrons. His biographer asserts, though incorrectly (see Greg. Tur. Hist. Franc. x. 28), that he was the godfather of Clotaire II. Influenced, probably, in part by his sister St. Fara, he became a priest, after persuading his wife to take the veil. With his wealth he enriched the church of St. Stephen at Meaux, and was remarkable for his hospitality to the English and Irish missionaries. To St. Fiacrus, or Fefrus, he gave land of his own for a monastery in the forest of Breuil, and St. Chilleus, or Kilian, another Irishman, he received into his monastery and sent on a mission to the Atrebatenses (Artois). Under Dagobert I., son of Clotaire, he held the office of chancellor, or referendarius, in which capacity his signature is appended to a charter of the year 628 (Migne, Patr. Lat. lxxx. 507). About this last date he became bishop of Meaux, succeeding Gundold, and not Walbert, as his biographer supposes (see Mabillon ut supr. n. and Le Cointe, Ann. Eccl. Franc. an. 642, n. xiv. tom. iii. p. 647). His career as bishop is outlined by the dates of the charters he signed, but beyond them we have few details. In A.D. 635 or 636, he consecrated, in company with Audoenus, an altar at the monastery of Rebais, which Audoenus had built by Dagobert's command (Le Cointe, Ann. Eccl. Franc. an. 636, n. ii. tom. iii. p. 30). In 649 he was present at the translation of the bodies of St. Crispin and St. Crispinian (Le Cointe, an. 649, n. xii. tom. iii. 240). In 652 he subscribed a charter of Landericus, bishop of Paris, for the monastery of St. Dionysius (Migne, Patr. Lat. lxxxvii. 299). In 657 he was at the second council of Sens (Le Cointe an. 657 n. 16, tom. iii. 450). In 659 he subscribed the charter of Emmo, bishop of Sens, for the monastery of St. Pierre le Vif (Patr. Lat. lxxxviii. 1171); and in 662 he was one of the bishops to whom Berthefridus of Amiens addressed his concession for the monastery of Corbie (Patr. Lat. lxxxviii. 1178). In 666 he signed that of Drausius, bishop of Soissons, for the convent of the Blessed Virgin in that city (Patr. Lat. lxxxviii. 1183). He was himself the builder of a monastery on his own land, which he dedicated to the Holy Cross, John the Baptist, and all the Apostles, according to Le Cointe (an. 642, n. lxiii. tom. iii. 162) in A.D. 642, and in which he entertained St. Adrian, the companion of Theodore, on his way to England, in 668 (Beda, Hist.

Eccl. iv. 1). In his biography are found several miracles. He died, according to Mabillon, in 672, and was buried in the church of the monastery he had built. His successor in the see was St. Hildevertus. His day of commemoration is the 28th of Oct. (Usuard. Mart. Migne, Patr. Lat. cxxiv. 629; Boll. Acta SS. Oct. xii. 593; Gall. Christ. viii. 1599.) [S. A. B.]

FAROALDUS I., the first Lombard duke of Spoleto, c. 580. According to Paulus Diaconus (iii. 13) he attacked and devastated Classis, the port of Ravenna. This is improbable. (Note by Waitz, Monum. Rerum Langob. 1878, p. 100. Catalogus Imperatorum Ducum, etc. in Mon. Lang. p. 521.) [A. H. D. A.]

FAROALDUS II., duke of Spoleto, c. 703, son of Thrasamund. He invaded Classis, the port of Ravenna, but at the command of king Liutprand restored it to the Greeks. His son Thrasamund rebelled against him, c. 724, deposed him and made him a cleric. (Paulus Diac. vi. 30-41, Catalogus Imperatorum Ducum, etc. in Monum. Rerum Langob. 1878, p. 522.) Pope John VII. confirmed the privileges and property of the abbey of Farfa at the request of Faroald (Jaffé, Regesta Pont. p. 173; Troya, Cod. Dipl. no. 374, iii. 61). He is also mentioned in Historias Furfenses (Pertz, Monum. Scriptores, xi. 524.) [A. H. D. A.]

FASCIUS (FASTIUS), a Christian of Hippo Regius, who, having incurred a debt of fifteen solidi [about £17 19s. 1½d., Smith, Dict. of Antiq. pp. 182, 1240], being pressed by his creditors, and afraid of incurring the personal punishment to which he was liable, took refuge in the church. But by the law of Theodosius he was liable to removal thence unless the bishop should defray the amount due (Cod. Theod. ix. 45, 1-3). In order to avoid the disgrace of a public appeal to the congregation to meet this difficulty, Augustine was obliged to borrow the money from Macedonius [MACEDONIUS], under promise on the part of Fascius of repayment by a certain day. But when the time had elapsed for the fulfilment of this promise, and he himself had not been reminded of it on the Whitsunday lately passed, Augustine being absent, wrote to his flock, requesting them to make a collection for the purpose, and undertaking that the deficiency, if any, should be made up from the property of the church, assuring them at the same time that whatever was given in this way was really offered to God. (Aug. Ep. 248; Bingham, Orig. viii. 11, 4; Tillemont, 93, vol. xiii. p. 238.) [H. W. P.]

FASIR, one of the leaders of the Circumcellions, whom their followers dignified with the title of "leaders of the saints." (Opt. iii. 4.) [DONATISM, Vol. I. p. 883; AXIDUS.] [H. W. P.]

FASTI SICULL [CHRONICON PASCHALE.]

FASTIDIOSUS. A monk and presbyter in the north African church at the commencement of the 6th century, at the time when the persecuting zeal of the Arians under their Vandal princes had desolated the church and exiled her bishops. Fastidiosus, according to the strongly-worded accusations of Fulgentius of Ruspe, deser-his ecclesiastical functions and fell into gross profligacy (S. Fulgentii contra Sermone Fastidiosi Arianum Victoris, cc. 21, 22; Migne, Patrol. lxx. pp. 507-528). He subsequently identified himself with the Arians, and openly proclaimed their view. One of the sermons of Fastidiosus fell into the hands of Victor, who wrote to Fulgentius enclosing a copy, and asking for light. Fastidiosus (Sermo Fastidiosi Arianum, appended to Epistola ix.; Fulg. Opp. Migne, Patr. lxx. p. 375) had involved himself in a monophysite Arianism, which drove him to assert the separability as well as the individuality of the Persons of the Holy Trinity, and to urge that the Lord Christ, having been factus, creatus, natus, before the ages, had also been born of the Virgin in time, and thus was "separated" from the Father and the Spirit. He argued that unless the Trinity be "inseparable," the whole Trinity was incarnated, suffered, died, and rose again. Fastidiosus reasoned with much subtlety, and was replied to by Fulgentius in twenty-two chapters of ingenious argument and exposition. The virulence and wrath of the closing chapters, referring to the private life of Fastidiosus, is extraordinary and almost terrible. [Fulgentius (3).] [H. R. R.]

FASTIDIUS, of whom Gennadius of Marcellian, in his book De Illustribus Viris (written about A.D. 480, see Ebert's Geschichte der Christlich-Lateinischen Literatur, i. 427), c. 56, says—"Fastidius Britanniarum episcopus scripsit ad Fatalam [quendam] de Vita Christiana librum unum, et alium de Viduitate servanda, sana et de digna doctrina." The Corbey MS. of Gennadius has merely "Fastidius Britto," but the other MSS. read as above, and Fastidius may have been one of the numerous Celtic bishops without fixed sees. He only wrote one book, addressed to a widow Fatalis, whom he calls "dilectissima soror," but the last chapter is headed "Viduarum triplex genus;" the book itself he compares to country bread, which is better for the hungry than that made of very fine flour. It is printed in Galland, ix. p. 481-489, as a separate work, after Holstenius's example, having been previously assigned to St. Augustine. In literary tradition the great name swallows up all the little names, and some semi-Pelagian works have been thus assigned to the very father who combated Pelagianism. Fastidius actually quotes his fellow-countryman Pelagius twice, though without naming him, and Gennadius, himself a semi-Pelagian, praises him for his sound doctrine. In one place Fastidius speaks of those who sin "after Adam's example," the very phrase of Pelagius; in another he copies Pelagius's advice as to how the saints should pray, words similarly addressed to a noble Juliana, the mother of Demetrias. FASTIUS of Hippo Regius. [FASCIUS.]

FASTRADA, the third wife of Charles the Great, married to him a few months after the death of Hildegardis in A.D. 783. She was the daughter of Radolfus, a count of the Eastern Franks, that is, according to Einhard, Germans. She was notorious for her cruelty, and her evil influence perverted the naturally benign and mild disposition of her husband. Pippin the Hunchback, a son of Charles by Himiltrudis a concubine, was driven by her oppression to revolt, 792. Fastrada died in 794 at Frankfort on the Main, and was buried in the church of St. Albanus at Mainz, but on the burning of that church her remains were transported to the metropolitan church of the city. She left two daughters, Theoderada and Hiltrudis. There is extant a letter written to her by Charles in 792 announcing a victory over the Avars and the litanies and fasts ordained by the clergy on the occasion. It is to be found in Patr. Lat. xcvi. 897, and in Einhard, Leben und Wandel Karls des Grossen, ii. 76, ed. Ideler. (See the Annales in Pertz, Mon. Germ. Hist. i. 164, 165, 179, 180, 181, 299, 300; Einhardi Vita Karoli M. Pertz, ii. 453-5.)

Three epitaphs on Fastrada are extant, the first by Theodulfus bishop of Orleans (lib. ii. carm. 11; in Patr. Lat. cv. 314) was engraved on her tomb in the church of St. Albanus. Two others are given by Serarius (Rerum Mogunt. lib. i. c. 31, tom. i. p. 72), one put up when her remains were moved after the fire, the other more modern. [S. A. B.]

FATHERS, THE. This term has been applied variously, both in classical and Christian times (see Dict. of Christian Ant. i. 665). It is here considered with reference to those primeval writers of the Christian church whose remains constitute what is called Patristic literature—a literature commencing with the 1st but ending practically with the 7th century, there having been few representatives of it acknowledged in the West and East alike subsequently to the sixth council, A.D. 680, when the last of the great heresies relating to the Incarnation—viz., Monothelism—was condemned. And, in truth, when we come to inquire when and where the application of the term in this sense commenced, we shall find that whatever instances might be cited of its earlier application, it dates as a phrase from the time when the bishops who met in oecumenical synod at Nicaea for the first time began to be so designated by their supporters and admirers in the struggle that ensued. Previously to this, appeal was made rather to men than books; to lives and deaths in defence of the faith rather than logic or rhetoric. Those who had lived for it were called brethren; those who had suffered for it, athletes or confessors; and those who had died for it, martyrs; even in referring to their works for what was held and taught in primitive times (Comp. Euseb. E. H. v. 28, 2.) Tertullian himself founds his rule, not on the consent of fathers, but of churches (De Praes. c. 32-6). It is St. Athanasius who first quotes "fathers" as witnesses to the faith. "If the faith," he says, "commenced with the present consulship,"—as the Ecthesis emanating from his opponents was dated—"how will the fathers and the blessed martyrs fare?" (ap. Soc. E. H. ii. 37). And again, "It is not only now that the canons and formularies of the church were placed in our hands; but they were handed down to us securely and faithfully by the fathers" (Ep. Encycl. § 1). Further, it was he mainly who procured for the council of Nicaea that prerogative which it retains to this day. The first fathers to be quoted as a distinct authority were "the τιν' (318) fathers." All earlier or later writers upholding the doctrine set forth in their creed were by degrees admitted to the same distinction and style by succeeding councils and controversialists, in quoting from their works. "We pronounce," say the bishops of the fourth council in their first canon, "it to be befitting and just that the canons of the holy fathers made in every synod to this time remain in full force." The canons of Arian synods are not confirmed, nor their framers classed with fathers in this pronouncement. Subsequently the fathers were distinguished according to the age in which they lived by the epithets apostolic, ante-Nicene, post-Nicene, &c.; or, with reference to their writings, apologists, doctors, commentators, &c.; or, with reference to their country, Greek, Latin, African, Gallican, Anglican, &c. Of African fathers, St. Fulgentius in the 6th century was the latest; of Greek, St. John Damascene in the 8th; of Latin, St. Gregory the Great in the 6th, Venerable Bede in the 8th, St. Peter Damian in the 11th, and St. Bernard in the 12th. Another distinction ought also to be pointed out and remarked upon: viz., into sainted and unsainted. For as there are numerous saints in the calendar who were never styled fathers, so there are several of the fathers who were never styled saints. Origen and Tertullian, in particular, have been placed in this latter class, all the world over, as being unsound on some points, though, for general purposes, their authority ranks high even among the fathers. Further, as it was no pope, but common consent, which qualified the honour in which their names should be held, so neither was it any pope, but common consent, that dictated which of the fathers should also be styled saints. Canonization, in the modern sense of the word, was a process unknown in their day. The epithets ante-Nicene and post-Nicene explain themselves, as a chronological division of fathers who lived anterior or posterior to the first council of Nicaea, A.D. 325. Apostolical, viz., such as were personally known to the apostles, or anyhow flourished in the same age, form a subdivision of group I., with St. Clement of Rome, St. Ignatius of Antioch, and St. Polycarp of Smyrna, for its representatives. All that can be said about them personally, or their extant letters—the only species of composition remaining to us certainly belonging to this period—will be found in this work under their respective names. Under "Barnabas," similarly, will be found all that can be said of the epistle ascribed to him; and under 'Hermas,' of the allegorical work bearing his name, called 'The Shepherd.' The authorship and character of the 'Epistle to Diognettus' is discussed under that title.

At first the writings of the fathers were for the most part "apologetic," that is, of a defensive character. Even the epistles of St. Ignatius, and of St. Clement of Rome, so far as they are deprecatory, though addressed to believers, might be so classed. For St. Clement deprecates divisions as being against Christian brotherhood; St. Ignatius as being against church-order. Indeed, it should be pointed out that though, popularly, by Apologists are meant such as vindicated Christianity from attacks made against it by Jews or heathen; still, so far as argument is concerned, even the controversial works of the next period must be characterized as defensive too; and, in point of fact, Apologists and Controversialists are separated from each other solely by their subject-matter and address. Hence, to prevent confusion, those who defended the faith against Jews and heathens should be designated "Apologists proper;" and those who defended it against heretics, "Apologists special." The former of these having had a separate article assigned to them already, very little could be said about their works here that would not involve repetition. Thus much it may, however, be well to add: 1. These treatises have, generally speaking, a two-fold value for us, which is more than can be said of half the mere controversial works of the next period. For they are valuable, both as shewing the objections urged against Christianity by contemporaries with the living fact in full view; and as answering by anticipation objections of the same kind recast and repeated in modern times. Greeks, Romans and Jews of the 1st, 2nd, and 3rd centuries were far able judges of the intrinsic merits of the cause then defended by the Apologists than the acutest thinkers and subtlest reasoners in lands permeated by Christian influences can be now; and the whole sale conversion of the vastest, most civilized most heterogeneous empire that the world has yet seen by Christianity, is a homage to the weight of argument in its favour at its commencement, and antecedently to its achievements, such as we may fairly say no other cause can be shewn to have received before or since. Further, in estimating their collective value, we must never forget that the greater proportion of these treatises has not come down to us. 2. It must be remembered that, from the nature of the case, Christian Apologists, when they had pagan for their opponents, could only base their arguments on such grounds as paganism would admit. Pagan superstitions and pagan mythology supplied them, of course, with topics in abundance for retorting on their opponents; but the principles of morality and natural theology were the sole topics to which they could appeal of a positive kind. In reasoning with the Jews again, the Scriptures of the Old Testament set bounds to the argument from the Revelation. It was first in controversy with heretics, that the New, as well as the Old Testament, formed the stand-point on both sides. Heretics attacked the interpretation put upon the whole Bible by the Church, and the fathers defended it. As, therefore, St. Justin Martyr was the earliest of the extant Apologists proper, so the great work of St. Irenaeus may be called the earliest of the Apologies special. And these two classes of works may be compared with profit. For this distinction is of the utmost importance to ourselves, in estimating their respective references to Scripture. Tertullian supplies us with some treatises of each kind, for example: Now throughout his Apology, and his work addressed To the Nations, though descanting on Jewish history and Christian customs in both, he never once quotes Scripture as Scripture. In a single passage of his work Against the Jews, he is surprised into saying: "Et merito evangelista"—whom, however, he will not name—"Lex prophetarum usque ad Joannem." (c. 8). In the very next chapter, as though conscious of having gone too far, he quotes sayings of the Jews and of Christ recorded in the Gospels, but without specifying where they are to be found. "Sic et Babylon apud Joannem nostrum Romae urbis signa est" (ib.) is his sole remaining explicit reference to the New Testament; but, again, the work to which he refers is not named. In his treatise, De Praescrpt. Haereticorum, on the other hand, the New Testament is quoted professedly more than one hundred times, with the books as often as not named, from which he quotes. St. Irenaeus was contemporary with Tertullian, and St. Justin Martyr, about a quarter of a century prior to both. The Refutation of all Heresies contains quotations from heretics about as much earlier than St. Justin, as St. Hippolytus, its reputed author, was later than St. Irenaeus.

These quotations from heretics we class for convenience with the Apologies and work against Typhus by St. Justin: their Refutation, whether by St. Hippolytus or not, with the well-known work of St. Irenaeus on the same subject. On comparing them, we get a repetition of the same phenomena noticed in the treatises corresponding to them by Tertullian, for which a cause must be sought.

That is to say: (1) St. Justin, in his first Apology, produces a number of the sayings of Christ as the sayings of Christ, but omits pointedly to state where they are to be found. In quoting from the books of the Old Testament on the contrary, he names their authors without reserve. First in one passage, speaking of the institution of the Eucharist, he ventures on referring to what the apostles had handed down, ὅ τὰς ἐν' αὐτῶν ἀπομνημονεύμασιν—using a word familiarized already to his hearers in the 'Memoirs of Socrates' by Xenophon, as Grabe points out—ἡ καλεῖται εὐαγγέλια, as if apologizing for having named them. And in the next section he contrasts these 'Memoirs of the Apostles' with the 'Writings of the Prophets;' as though covering his reference to the first by the last. In his Second Apology there is no reference to them whatever. In his dialogue with Trypho the Jew, Moses, Isaiah, Hosea, David, Ezekiel, Amos, Malachi, Zachariah, Daniel, are frequently quoted by name; whereas, out of about twenty passages where the sayings of Christ are quoted as His, there is but one where the alleged saying is said to be found written in the Gospel generally (ἐν τῷ εὐαγγελίῳ γέγραπται ibid., § 100), but four, where they are said to be written in the 'Memoirs of the Apostles,' and in one of these, the last, where the writer admits having learnt it from thence (§§ 101, 102, 104, 105). (2) Of all the citations from the works of heretics in their Refutation, but one, viz., from Basilides, refers to 'the Gospels' by name (vii. 10), though there are numbers where the sayings of Christ are quoted as His.

Reserve so studied cannot have been accidental, neither should we be justified in affirming it proceeded from ignorance of the Gospels in the sense they now bear, for Tertullian, who maintains equal reserve throughout his works against heretics and Jews, in his single work on Praescrpt., could have scarce shewn more intimate familiarity with the canonical books of the New Testament: had he now been alive. Christians had been authoritatively warned against "casting their pearls before swine," and this, and not lack of materials to refer to, prompted their reserve, when arguing with outsiders—a reserve which even heretics shared more or less. If Origen, writing against Celsus, is more explicit at times, it is due to the fact that he was really writing for Christians whose minds had been shaken by the vigorous onslaught upon their sacred books of one conversant with their contents. Nevertheless, compare this work of Origen with that of St. Irenaeus against heresies, and the contrast is plain. The Gospels were no authority for Celsus, nor did he raise questions, or expend criticism, about their authors. He disputed their facts, reviled their doctrines, imputed their miracles to occult arts. Origen, accordingly, referred to them from the standpoint of his opponent, and no further. The heretics, refuted by St. Irenaeus, appealed to them, and to works which they placed on the same footing, in confirmation of their own peculiar views. St. Irenaeus was, therefore, called upon not merely to quote Scripture, but to shew distinctly what interpretations had been put upon it by the church, and what books received into the canon. Such was the diligence, and such the prophetic instinct, with which he performed his task; that, as if purposely to meet an exception to their genuineness, made 1700 years after his time, he quotes not only the opening but the concluding words of the Gospel of St. Mark, as they stand now (c. Haer. iii. 10).

(3) It has been often observed, as of the fathers in general, so of the apologists in particular, that they repeat each other. This is true, but it is not peculiar to either by any means. All it proves is: 1, that they were literary men—readers, as well as writers, that is. And, 2, that they had a literature of their own. Tertullian and St. Irenaeus lived in the same age so completely that each may well have read and pondered over the writings of the other. Yet there is little or no ground for saying that Tertullian was indebted to St. Irenaeus for his masterly treatise, De Praesc., though considerably more than the germ of it is contained in the second and third chapters of the third book of the latter against Heresies. St. Vincentius of Lerins, again, in the 5th century, could scarce be supposed unacquainted with the writings of both; but his Commonitorics could not, with any justice, be stigmatized as the work of a plagiarist. A literature circumscribed in its range by the same facts, and inspired to overflowing by the same principles and aspirations, must necessarily repeat itself again and again in varying degrees, as occasion may require. Men who think alike, and put pen to paper on the same subjects, must inevitably write alike, whether professing to quote from each other or not. Floating ideas are inseparable from every such literature. Now, that there was such a thing as patristic literature, from the earliest times downwards, is a fact which cannot be denied, though probably nine-tenths of it have been lost. Of the great work of St. Irenaeus against heresies, and of the commentaries of Origen on the Old and New Testament for instance, what have we now remaining but fragments or translation? How many more works by them and by others have totally disappeared, that Eusebius names as being extant in his day, besides as many again, which he says expressly circumstances obliged him to pass over (E. H. v. 27), an assertion which the eloquent specimen of them given in his next chapter abundantly bears out.

Apologists special, or controversialists, bloomed, of the two, rather in post-Nicene than ante-Nicene times, and in turn overlap the dogmatic period, which again more properly belongs to the schools than to the Fathers; though, indirectly, the more important of the controversial works of the latter have likewise their dogmatic side. The great work of St. Epiphanius against heresies, for instance, closes with a lucid exposition of the faith and practice of the church of his own day, which is anything but controversial; and several of the controversial pieces of St. Augustine supplied Peter Lombard with dogmatic extracts for his books of the Sentences.

Controversialists have their order fixed generally by the heresies against which they wrote, with St. Irenaeus at their head. All the principal heresies of the two first centuries are reviewed, and earnestly, as well as ably, refuted in his work against them, invaluable to us for the information it contains of those early times and schools of thought alone. Scarcely less so, but for the doubts still hanging about its authorship, is the work entitled similarly to his, and latterly thought to have been written at Rome by one contemporary with St. Hippolytus, bishop and martyr, if not by himself. (Westcott on the Canon, 4th ed. p. 271, note.) The work of Tertullian, on the same subject, has an argumentative value for all ages alike, and, whether original or not, the credit of the terseness with which the argument is stated must remain with him. His work against Marcion is full of interest, again, on historical and biblical grounds; all the other works against Marcion or his followers by St. Justin Martyr, Theophilus of Antioch, Philip of Gortyna, Dionysius of Corinth, Bardesanes, Rhodon, and Hippolytus, mentioned by Eusebius, being no longer extant. From this work, then, we learn that broad distinctions were drawn in the earlier half of the 2nd century, not between the three first Gospels and the fourth, but between the third and the other three. Likewise, that of the 14 Epistles of St. Paul, ten were received by a heretic, who thought it worth his while to tamper with nine, and maintained only the shortest of them, that to Philemon, intact—"Miror, tamen," observes Tertullian (v. 21), "cum ad unum hominem literas factas receperit, quod ad Timotheum duas et unam ad Titum, de ecclesiastico statu compositas recusaverit" . . . The work against Praxeas, though mainly refutative, may be called a forerunner of the dogmatic treatises of St. Augustine on the Trinity and Incarnation. It is worthy of notice how tentatively the word "Trinitas" is used in this treatise throughout. The Godhead is never once directly called by that name. The tract formerly printed among his works, but now assigned to Novatus or Novatian, the schismatic bishop of Rome, is a sorry performance, and one, curiously enough, in which that word is not found elsewhere than in its title. St. Cyprian, who writes as a controversialist on heretical baptism, writes as a dogmatist on church-unity, compromised by Novatian. It has been the fashion to charge the ante-Nicene fathers with either entertaining confused notions of what they professed to believe, or with believing some things which their successors pronounced heterodox. Now, first, as regards their personal orthodoxy, it has been too solidly vindicated by bishop Bull against Petavius, ever to be called in question again. Next, as regards definite thought and formulated expression, it is a charge which would apply with as much force to the post-Nicene fathers as to ante-Nicene, to the present as to all past ages alike. It is a simple fact, that all truth gains by discussion amongst men. And if the ante-Nicene fathers merely permitted themselves language that was subsequently revised, and expressed views that were subsequently qualified, after careful analysis by all of what they taught or believed, and authoritative declaration by the church of the boundaries between truth and error; they could not, without manifest unfairness, be contrasted unfavourably with any that followed them on that ground alone. When St. Athanasius, for instance, vindicates certain expressions of his predecessor, St. Dionysius against the Arians; and St. Augustine certain passages in St. Cyprian, St. Ambrose, and Rufinus, against the Pelagians; are we not reminded of words like "hypostasis," and phrases like "Dominicus homo," requiring no less explanation in St. Athanasius himself, and of the two books of Retractations forming a preface to the voluminous works of St. Augustine by his own request? "Quid igitur opus est," as he nobly says of his predecessors, "ut eorum scrutemur opuscula, qui prius quam haeresis ista oriretur, non habuerunt necessitatem in hac difficili ad solvendum quaestione versari: quod procul dubio facerent, si respondere talibus cogerentur" . . . (De Praed. c. 14.) Or, again, as if apologizing for his own shortcomings:—"Didicimus enim singulas quasque haereses intulisse ecclesiae proprias quaestiones, contra quas diligentius defenderetur Scriptura Divina, quam si nulla necessitas cogeret" . . . (De Dono Persev. c. 20.) Or, again, in the same spirit, but on another subject:—"Et de Patre quidem ac Filio multis libris disseruerunt docti et spirituales viri . . . de Spiritu Sancto autem nondum tam copiose ac diligenter disputatum est a doctis et magnis Divinarum Scripturarum tractatoribus, ut intelligi facile possit et Ejus proprium, quo proprio fit ut Eum neque Filium neque Patrem dicere possimus, sed tantum Spiritum Sanctum" . . . (De Fide et Symb. § 18, 19.) Yet this treatise was delivered as a discourse, "in the presence of the whole African episcopate," just twenty years after the publication of the well-known treatise, De Spiritu Sancto, by St. Basil.

The fact is, the fathers in all ages had their attention concentrated on the controversies of their own day, and seldom either raked up exploded errors, or refuted new by anticipation. Truth was drawn out by them in logical sequence, but without any design on their part, by being asserted against one error after another in succession. From the 1st to the end of the 4th century, all heresies, beginning with Gnosticism and ending with Macedonianism, were directed against the fact of the Incarnation or of the Trinity, and embodied a denial either of the reality of the Human and Divine Natures in the Incarnate Word, or of the existence of three Persons of one substance, power, and eternity in the Godhead: of these, Gnosticism and Docetism were died out. And even Sabellianism was discredited in ante-Nicene times by being simply called "Patripassiana." As Tertullian says of Arius, "Ipsit dicit Patrem descendisse in virginem, ipsum ex eâ natum, ipsum passum, et ipse ipsum esse Jesum Christum" (c. 1). In other contemporary works against it have been preserved entire. Arius distinguished between the Father and Him who became man, and refused to follow Artemon and Paul of Samosata, who had pronounced Him to be no more than man, yet denied Him to be very God. This, then, was the thesis which the first council of Nicaea resolved on maintaining under anathema, and which all the earlier post-Nicene fathers defended with their pens and lives, beginning with St. Athanasius. It is to his works, indeed almost exclusively, that we must go for a refutation of Arianism proper. St. Hilary supplies historical facts: in some cases of great value. St. Gregory Nazianzen, fervid orations; St. Phoebeadius, two or three tracts; and the five books of St. Basil against Eunomius expose the impious tenets of the party called Anomoeans. But of other then renowned controversialists and champions of orthodoxy, Hosius of Cordova, Alexander of Alexandria, Eustathius of Antioch, Eusebius of Vercelli, Meletius, and Paulinus, only fragments or letters remain. Eusebius the historian has left a work against Marcellus, bishop of Ancyra, who was thought, in opposing Arianism, to have fallen into Sabellianism. Of his own orthodoxy the truest monument seems to be, that he was no follower of Arius any more than of St. Athanasius. Foiled in their attacks on the Second Person in the Trinity, but unable to recover their equilibrium, a section of the semi-Arians, headed by Macedonius, patriarch of Constantinople, called in question the Godhead of the Third. This caused a further addition to the creed on that head, which, though put into form, and accepted at Constantinople, was first promulgated at Chalcedon. Didymus of Alexandria, St. Basil, and St. Ambrose, left treatises on the subject, but they went no deeper than to the point which had been assailed, leaving a wide field open to St. Augustine, and the theologians of Charlemagne.

The manner of the Incarnation—in other words, how God became man—was the last point controverted. Apollinarius, father and son, started the idea that the Word had been made flesh without assuming a human soul. Nestorius, that He had assumed not merely soul and body, but a human person. Eutyches, that He had united both natures in His own Person, but that after their union they were no longer two. Monothelism, that there were no longer two wills. It was easy to see that all these positions were met by the simple words of the word, "was made man," in their full, obvious, and abiding acceptance. As St. Augustine puts it: "Cui temporali dispensationi multis modis imitantur haeretici. Sed si quis tenuerit catholicam fidem, ut totum hominem credat a Verbo Dei esse susceptum: id est, corpus, animam, spiritum—satis contra illos munitus est" . . . (De Fid. et Symb. § 8). Nevertheless each point was contested and had to be made good in succession. St. Athanasius himself wrote two books against the Apollinarians. They were met also decisively by the doctrine of the descent of Christ into hell, which was acknowledged on all hands, and understood to mean the descent of His human soul. "Unde et ipse Dominus per prophetam dixit, tamquam de futuro: 'Quia non derelinques animam meam in inferno, nec dabis Sanctum Tuum videre corruptionem.' Quod rursus propheticè nihilominus ostendit impletum, cum dicit: 'Domine, eduxisti animam meam ab inferno: salvasti me a descendentibus in locum:'" as Rufinus says (in Symb. § 28). In short, as bishop Pearson well observes, "The true doctrine of the Incarnation, against all the enemies thereof—Apollinarians, Nestorians, Eutychians, and the like—was generally expressed by declaring the verity of the soul of Christ really present in hell, and the verity of His body at the same time really present in the grave: as it is excellently observed by Fulgentius—'Humanitas vera Filii Dei nec tota in sepulchro fuit, nec tota in inferno; sed in sepulchro secundum veram carnem Christus mortuus jacuit, et secundum animam Christus ad infernum descendit: ac secundum eandem animam ab inferno ad carnem (quam in sepulchro reliquerat) rediit; secundum Divinitatem vero suam, quae nec loco tenetur, nec fine concluditur, totus fuit in sepulchro cum carne: totus in inferno cum animâ: ac per hoc plenus fuit ubique Christus: quia non est Deus ab humanitate, quam susceperat, separatus: Qui et in animâ suâ fuit, ut solutis inferni doloribus victrix rediret: et in carne suâ fuit, ut celeri resurrectione corrumpi non posset'" . . . (ad Thrasim. iii. 34; On the Creed, note 281, 10.) This passage, besides its own intrinsic merits, supplies a further illustration of the principle laid down already, that truth gains by discussion. It was penned in the century between that of the third and fourth councils, and that of the sixth; and it is a fuller and more complete statement in a few words of the doctrine of the Hypostatical Union than is to be found in either of the letters of St. Cyril of Alexandria, and St. Leo of Rome, received and approved by the fourth council, or even in the definition of that council itself. Yet even this passes over unnoticed the subtler question of the two wills, dealt with in it of course by implication, but afterwards brought out triumphantly by St. Maximus and St. Sophronius, and formally ratified by the Fathers of the sixth council in condemning Monothelism.

St. Augustine, so far as his controversial works are concerned, offers no exception to this rule, save that he was openly conscious of his own shortcomings. In this respect he stands on a pinnacle by himself. Occupying a very first rank as an apologist, a controversialist, and a dogmatist, without alluding to his other performances at present, it is difficult to decide in which department he excelled most—in his single work, De Civitate Dei, which is a landmark amongst apologies, though but half of it is strictly such; in his volumes of works against the Manicheans and Arians, against the Donatists, and against the Pelagians; or his treatises, De Trinitate, de Doct. Christianâ, and a host of smaller tracts. But it is in his controversial works—nine-tenths of them anthropological, not theological—that we find him modifying his views most, as time went on, and failing at last to get to the bottom of some questions raised at himself. He began life with the Manicheans, whose errors he exposed subsequently with so much force. He was a semi-Pelagian on some points himself, till he commenced refuting Pelagius; and had he lived on till the schism of the Eastern and Western churches had become fact, he would have found his famous argument against the Donatists—"Securus judicat orbis terrarum"—crumble away under his feet.

Dogmatism was not the creation of St. Augustine: yet neither is his dogmatic tone different from his with whom it originated, as we shall see. In the work of the renowned Origen, de Principiis, we have the earliest specimen of a dogmatic work on revealed truth in the Christian church; and these are the lines on which it was constructed, unless Rufinus misrepresents them: "Sicut enim multis apud Graecos et barbaros pollicentibus virtutem, desivimus apud omnes eam quaerere, qui eam falsis opinionibus asserebant, posteaquam credidimus Filium Dei esse Christum, et ab ipso nobis hanc discendam esse persuasimus: ita cum multi sint, qui se putant sentire quae Christi sunt, et nonnulli eorum diversa a prioribus sentiant: serretur vero ecclesiastica praedicatio per successionis ordinem ab apostolis tradita, et usque ad praesens in ecclesiis permanens: illa sola credenda est veritas, quae in nullo ab ecclesiastica et apostolica discordet traditione". . . (§ 2). Within these limits, and no further, he conceived himself at liberty to speculate, or form conclusions of his own. Whether he never exceeded these limits is another question. But the ground was untrod, and he was a pioneer of such amazing insight and energy, that, right or wrong, he has been a luminous beacon in each case for all who followed. But it was only by degrees that any fresh advance was made. Creeds had to be got into shape before they could be systematically expounded. This, in reality, was the earliest shape which dogmatism assumed in the church; and of this, St. Cyril of Jerusalem, in his fourth catechetical lecture, supplies not merely the first but one of the best specimens we possess. The commentary now given to Rufinus is another of the same kind. Many such tracts or sermons occur among the works of St. Augustine; and after his time it became a literature. Expositions of faith were published by St. Athanasius and St. Cyril, and there are letters of each highly prized for their dogmatic character, particularly the third letter of the latter to Nestorius, which, with the letter of St. Leo to Flavian, were received in the definition of the fourth council as authoritative exponents of the Incarnation. Two longer treatises by St. Cyril,—the first On the Holy and Co-essential Trinity, the second entitled The Treasury—should not be passed over here; nor, again, the twelve books, On the Trinity, by St. Hilary, nor, again, the Ancoratus of St. Epiphanius, with the seven books, On the Incarnation, by St. John Cassian, written at the request of St. Leo.

But the master-piece by far of this period in dogmatics was the great work of St. Augustine on the Trinity, and never perhaps was a deep subject handled more delicately or expounded more luminously, or each conclusion of the author respecting it expressed with more modesty and reserve. This is his temper at starting: "Proinde quisquis haec legit, ubi pariter certus est, pergat mecum: ubi pariter haesitat, quaerat mecum: ubi errorem suum cognoscit, redeat ad me. Ita ingrediamur simul caritatis viam, tendentes ad Eum de quo dictum est: 'Quaerite faciem Ejus semper.' Quisquis ergo, cum legit, dicit, 'hoc non bene dictum est, quoniam non intelligo': locutionem meam reprehendit, non fidem; et forte vere potuit dici plenius: veruntamen nullus hominum ita locutus, ut in omnibus ab omnibus intelligeretur. Vidcat ergo cui hoc in sermone meo displicet, utrum alios in talibus rebus quaestionibusque versatos intelligat, cum me non intelligit; et si ita est, ponat librum meum: vel etiam, si hoc videtur, abjiciat: et iis potius, quos intelligit, operam et tempus impendat. . . . Qui vero haec legens dicit, 'Intelligo quidem quod dictum est, sed non vere dictum est'; asserat, si placet, sententiam suam et redarguat meam, si potest: Quod si cum caritate et veritate fecerit, mihi quae etiam (si in hac vita maneo) cognoscendum facere curaverit, uberrimum fructum laboris hujus mei cepero." (De Trin. i. 3). Strange words indeed to have proceeded from the founder of theological dogma for the West! The treatises of Gennadius, de Dogm. Eccl. in the 5th century; of St. Fulgentius, de Fide ad Pet. in the 6th; and of Alcuin, de Trin. (which is, in other respects, mere plagiarism throughout), in the 8th, shew how widely professed admirers and disciples had wandered from their spirit even by then. However, the four books of St. John Damascene, de Fide Orth. in the 8th century, form the true point of departure from the patristic to the scholastic method. "In laudem cedat Joannis Damasceni," as Le Quien says of them, "quod ipse Catholicorum Doctorum primus confertissimum sententiarum volumen digesserit." (Op. i. 119.) Commentators are the next class of writers that patristic literature supplies; and they are readily distinguished from other classes, and yield in importance to none, having, of course, the canonical Scriptures of the Old and New Testament for their subject-matter. It has hastily been concluded that Origen set the patristic fashion of interpreting them, by discovering in them four different senses, as follows: 1. The literal or historical; 2. The moral or spiritual; 3. The mystical or allegorical; 4. The anagogical or heavenly. But it must not be forgotten that our Lord Himself distinguished authoritatively between the first and second, both in his sermon on the Mount, and upon other occasions; and that in regard to the third, St. Paul, in expounding one chapter of the Old Testament, uses this very phrase: "which things are allegorized" (Gal. iv. 24; comp. 1 Cor. x. 6-11). Also that with regard to the fourth, he elsewhere recognises a "rest" for the elect, other than that of the promised land (Heb. iv. 8, 9), and a "Jerusalem," which is not now, but "above." With such authorities to guide them, the Fathers need hardly be supposed to have taken their cue from one of themselves; nor, again, he to have supplied the copy, or else borrowed it from Philo. Origen, whose commentaries are the earliest extant, taking them as they stand now, unquestionably made too much of the mystical, to the frequent doing away of the letter; but he was blamed, not applauded for this. Of extant commentaries, it may fairly be said, there is not one which shews signs of having been inspired by his. St. Augustine moreover, in his third book Upon Christian Doctrine, gives his own rules for interpreting Scripture, when he comes to that point; and in mentioning the rules of Fabianus the Donatist afterwards with approbation, shews that he was unacquainted with any biblical authority to whom he could refer with more confidence. No doubt in their sermons, and devotional works generally, the Fathers expatiate with a freedom that has provoked criticism, on the mystical sense; but this is just the case where the appeal to it is seldom otherwise than edifying, and arguing from it cannot mislead. So far as their commentaries are concerned there is certainly no disproportionate prominence given to the mystical sense, nor any neglect shewn for the literal, by SS. Jerome, Chrysostom, and Cyril; Theodoret and Theophylact, who pass for the best patristic commentators on the Old and New Testaments. St. Augustine cannot be called a commentator in the ordinary sense of the word; nor his noble, and for all devotional purposes unrivalled, work upon the Psalms, a commentary. The Morals of St. Gregory the Great on the book of Job is another of the same kind. But, as interpreters of Scripture, we should in all fairness judge the Fathers from their commentaries rather than from their sermons, or works written for spiritual instruction. Again, to estimate their commentaries aright, we must compare them, not with the accumulated wealth of ages in modern times, but with Ammonius upon Aristotle, Servius upon Virgil, the scholiasts in general upon the classics, their contemporaries. It must be conceded, indeed, at least that their subject-matter tells to their advantage; still it would have covered them with confusion, had they proved unequal to it. Taking them as they stand, it will hardly be denied that the commentaries of the Fathers on the Scriptures in general are better reading than ordinary scholia, and St. Chrysostom on the Pauline Epistles than Servius on the Aeneid. Several compilations from the Fathers, however, must not be considered their equivalents in this comparison.

Letters, again, form another important branch of patristic literature, and here likewise, though we have the letters of Cicero and others of the Augustan age to compare with them, the Fathers may fairly be said to hold their own. The papal registers, to begin with alone, comprising a multitudinous as well as continuous correspondence without a break, spread over at least fifteen centuries, have no parallel either in ancient or modern times, among royal, scientific, or ordinary correspondence; nor in the archives of any kingdom whatsoever. Of mere Fathers, we have 270 genuine letters from or to St. Augustine, 428 of St. Basil, 242 of St. Gregory Nazianzen, 150 of St. Jerome, 50 of St. Paulinus of Nola, 147 of Apollinaris Sidonius, 225 of St. Chrysostom, 146 of Theodoret, to name no more, all teeming with information on questions and feelings, and customs of the day; edifying alike by the high sentiment and aspiration they breathe, and for the spiritual instruction, no less than the theological and ecclesiastical lore with which they abound. It is of this branch that the late dean Milman, no mean judge, says: "I might perhaps have made another, and a very interesting branch of the prose Christian literature, the epistolary." Those desiring some choice specimens of it ready to hand may find them in the exquisitely rendered extracts from letters of St. Gregory Nazianzen and St. Basil, for the most part in the Church of the Fathers, by Dr. Newman. But the letters that passed between St. Jerome and St. Augustine (Ep. xviii., xl., lxviii., lxxi.-liii., lxxv., lxxxi.-ii.) may well be read for the noble passage of controversy they exhibit between two great men: the letter of St. Jerome to Sunnia and Fretela (Ep. cvi.) for its biblical criticism; to Evangelus (Ep. cxlvi.) for remarks on ecclesiastical orders; of Paula and Eustochium to Marcella, preserved among his letters (Ep. xlv.) for its notices of the Holy Land at that date. Several of the letters of St. Paulinus of Nola possess interest, as being written in the joint names of husband and wife—Paulinus et Thersia—and that husband a bishop or priest at least, and addressed in three cases to St. Augustine (Ep. iv., vi., xlv.); another (Ep. l.) asks his help in interpreting Scripture. Several of the letters of Apollinaris Sidonius are addressed 'domino papae Lupo salutem'; viz. to St. Lupus, bishop of Troyes, who accompanied St. Germanus from France to aid the bishops of Britain in their struggle with Pelagianism. Other letters from him to other bishops are couched in the same style, proving its application to bishops in general to have been in constant use then. Of the twelve books called Varieties by Cassiodorus, consisting for the most part of letters, edicts, and rescripts, it has already been observed in this work (art. Cassiodorus) that "apart from the study of those pages, it is hardly possible to obtain a true knowledge of the Italy of the 6th century."

In sermons, we have none to compare with the Fathers, but those who followed in their wake. It is a species of literature that began with Christianity, and is peculiar to it; and therefore cannot be criticized by comparison with other styles, though for mere eloquence it is surpassed by none. Neither Cicero nor Demosthenes ever produced greater, or more elevated, or more lasting effects on their hearers than St. Chrysostom and St. Augustine, for instance. Suidas, says that St. John Chrysostom had a tongue that was of more power than the cataracts of the Nile. Photius credits him with the purest language, splendid imagery, varied matter, and graceful anecdotes without end. His twenty-two sermons, delivered when he was a priest at Antioch, on the occasion of a sedition in which the people threw down and trampled upon the statues of Theodosius and the empress Flacilla, in the absence of his bishop, who went to intercede for the people, while he preached repentance to them, are models of the noblest cast. As the last of them was preached, the bishop returned with full pardon for all. Of St. Augustine, Possidius, his biographer and disciple, writes that he was no sooner ordained priest than he was permitted to preach by his bishop, Valerian, even when he was present himself, a thing wholly without precedent in Africa till then. His sermons were so popular, that many practised committing them to memory while they were preached; others employed notaries to take them down. They are divided by his Benedictine editors into four classes:—1. On the Scriptures of the Old and New Testaments; 2. On the seasons; 3. On the saints; 4. On miscellaneous subjects. Nothing is more wonderful in them than his handling of types and his power of developing and applying them. But this was for edification, solely, not argument; nor can he be charged with unmindfulness of the letter in expounding Scripture. Speaking of his own success in preaching down the brutal fights that had long been a national custom in Mauritania, he says, "Non tamen egisse aliquid me putavi, cum eos audirem acclamantes, sed cum fientes viderem" (De Doct. Christian.) with a touch of true genius. Some of his sermons must have occupied nearly two hours in delivery; but to judge from other extant specimens, these must have been exceptional. All the 154 sermons of St. Peter Chrysologus, whose surname bespeaks his eloquence, were of a much shorter type, and besides them, 21 of St. Gaudentius, 21 of St. Celarius of Arles, and 96 of St. Leo. But of this shorter type, the homilies of St. Gregory the Great on Ezekiel and on the Gospels are perhaps the most striking.

Of poets there were several among the Fathers, and hymnology may be properly called their creation. Of these St. Gregory Nazianzen wrote verse with facility, and St. Paulinus with elegance. Prudentius "was especially the poet of dogma," says Ozanam: but the attempts of Juvenius and Dracontius, Sedulius and Victorinus to turn biblical narratives into poetry must be pronounced failures: though they cleared the ground for Milton and Klopstock. St. Hilary, St. Ambrose, and Venantius Fortunatus composed many beautiful hymns. Boethius, author of the Consolatio Philosophiae, was a true philosopher; Cassiodorus, author of the twelve books of Varieties, a man of letters and cultivated tastes. To Dionysius Exiguus we owe the study of canon law in the West, and the custom of dating from the Christian era. The work of St. Isidore of Seville On Etymology, in twenty books, is replete with curious facts and ancient lore. The six books on music by St. Augustine, the only remaining specimen of a series brought out by him on the Disciplines, or seven liberal arts then taught, produced a number of kindred treatises by later writers of less note.

Two more classes of works remain to be noticed: historical and spiritual.

1. Ecclesiastical history commenced in the 2nd century with Hegesippus, of whose work in five books, now unfortunately lost, Eusebius speaks in terms of high praise (E. H. iv. 8); the same praise being unquestionably due to his own in ten. Putting its style on one side, which is turgid at times, it must, for the information it contains, and the truthfulness with which it has been composed, be pronounced of the same value to Christianity that the nine books of Herodotus are to the ancient world. But for his opposition to St. Athanasius, nobody would have thought of disputing his orthodoxy; of his devotion to the Christian religion there can be no question, as long as his Praeparatio and Demonstratio remain to speak for themselves. His Chronicon opened a new path in history for others in succeeding ages. But of ecclesiastical historians it is impossible to speak, without noticing the fact, that a reputation for orthodoxy has seldom figured among their strong points. Socrates, the successor of Eusebius, was a professed Novatian; Theodoret took fierce part against St. Cyril; Philostorgius was at least a semi-Arian; neither Sozomen nor Evagrius rank high on other grounds; Sulpitius Severus has alone never been discredited as a writer or as a Christian, and though his is but an abridgment, it contains some facts of importance, which, according to M. Guizot, "are not found elsewhere." History, no less than science, predisposes men to pessimist views in matters of faith, both shaping their estimate of the unseen world by the facts of the seen.

Of works of narrow compass St. Optatus has given us a fair account of the Donatists; Liberatus, of the Nestorians and Eutychians; St. Epiphanius and Philastrius, of heresies in general, down to their own times. Later, the history of kings and of empires, of wars and of peoples, came to be written by Christians exclusively, and in most cases, down to the 16th century, by persons in holy orders. Nor is it out of place to observe, before quitting this branch, that the entire literature of pre-Christian times must have been irrecoverably lost to mankind in succeeding ages, had it not been for Christian scribes, among whom Pamphilus, the friend of Eusebius the historian, was perhaps the earliest and most indefatigable; no early MS. of any portion of it being now extant, but what has been the work of their hands. (Comp. Dict. of Christ. Antiq. LIBHARIUS.)

2. Of spiritual treatises, if so few have come down to us from those times, one reason is because they were, to begin with, oral. All instruction was oral at first. Numbers had delivered catechetical lectures before St. Cyril; but his were the first to be taken down. All must have been deeply devotional, to judge from his. We have fragmentary specimens elsewhere in the ancient service-books. But the Confessions of St. Augustine created a new flood of spiritual works, with material for meditation and self-examination in the closet. Witness the collection of kindred pieces that formerly claimed him as their author, in the appendix to the sixth vol. of the Benedictine edition of his works (p. 74 et seq.). The six books of St. Chrysostom On the Priesthood; the four books of Dialogues by St. Gregory the Great, and his work On the Pastoral Care, were soon in the hands of all who could read. Each of the two last were translated into Greek and Anglo-Saxon, and the former of them into Arabic as well. Martyrologies and lives of the saints formed another class of works expressly written for edification, but meant as little to be measured by their historical exactness, as sermons by their conformity with biblical criticism or with logical rule. It is a characteristic of all biographies that they abound with anecdotes, often resting on no better evidence than hearsay.

Such, then, is a compressed outline of a literature, which has no doubt its faults as well as its shortcomings, but, in addition, recommendations which it would not be easy to parallel. For, first, it is a literature on which character is impressed conspicuously throughout, whose whole tone is spiritual and elevating, and whose object is to promote the civilization of man through religion. Imperfections of style it may have, imperfect knowledge it may betray; defects of temper it may at times be led into; still, there the part of it which panders to lust; it never excuses sin, or throws a cloak over vice; it has no word of encouragement for sordid or mean aims; it never consciously falsifies facts, or screens its own heroes. Next, it embraces writers of distant countries, and of various ages, animated by the same principles, all held together by purely spiritual ties in one corporate body, when all other ties were giving way. Lastly, their range is of more than ordinary compass, both in length and breadth. Nothing approaching to an exhaustive list of themselves, their subjects, or their performances has been attempted. These the reader will be able to find for himself, either from this work alone, or comes out, under articles on authors and their works; or he may get it at once from the series of the late Abbé Migne, Patrol. Graec. Lat., the 218th vol. of which last contains (pp. 31-1006) a synthetical index of subjects collected in the extant writings of the Latin Fathers alone, accompanied by the following just remark: "Haec autem in diversas sectiones dividuntur, ita ut constet sacrosanctis de qualibet scientiâ tractasse, in quantum humana mens potest intelligere et eloqui." . . . But it cannot be repeated too frequently, that, in order to form a correct estimate of this literature, we must know the men. For the Fathers not only wrote, but worked, and what they really did in their writings is often best explained by their lives. "The epistles of Gregory," the Englishman of our Saxon ancestors, says Gibbon, "his sermons and his dialogues, are the work of a man who was second in erudition to none of his contemporaries . . . On the first day of each month, he distributed to the poor, according to the season, their stated portion of corn, cheese, vegetables, oil, fish, fresh provisions, clothes, and money; and his treasurers were continually summoned to satisfy, in his name, the extraordinary demands of indigence and merit. The instant distress of the sick and aged, of strangers and pilgrims, was relieved by the bounty of each day, and of every hour; nor did the pontiff indulge himself in a frugal diet, till he had sent the dishes from his own table to some objects deserving of his compassion." (Hist. cxlv.) We may say, literally, without overdraw, "Ex uno disce omnes." Similarly, from this point of view, Cave's History of the Fathers; Butler's and B. Gould's Lives of the Saints; the Church of the Fathers, by J. P. Migne; Fabola, by the Cardinal Wiseman; Guizot's and Ozanam's History of Civilization; Montalembert's Monks of the West; A. de Broglie's L'Eglise et l'Empire au sixième siècle; Döllinger's First Age of the Church; De Presensé's Early Years of Christianity; Martyrs and Apologists; Heresy and Christian Doctrine; Christian Life and Practice in the Early Church, should be named as authorities to be put by side with Cave's Historia Literaria, Alzog's, Rohrbacher's, and Robertson's Church Histories; Migne's Patrologia and Patrol. Lat.; Mareschal's Concord. Pat., continued by Schramm's Analysis; Fessler's Inst. Patrol.; Schenck's Hist. of Doctrines, etc. The obvious truth, in varying degrees, of Daillé, De vera Patrum; Mosheim's Church History, David's Heremeneutics; Donaldson's Apostolic Age, etc., adds weight to their testimony, whenever favourable, and interprets it cum grano, when adverse. [E. S. Ff.]

FAUSTA (1) (FLAVIA MAXIMIANA FAUSTA) daughter of the emperor Maximian Heraclius by Eutropia, and second wife of Constantine the Great. She was born at Byzantium, married in 307, and soon after her marriage did her husband a great service in revealing her father's plot against his life. She was the mother of six children, three sons, afterwards emperors: Constantinus, b. 312, Constantius, b. 317, and Constans, b. 320; and three daughters: Constantina, named Augusta by her father, and married first to Hannibalian, king of Pontus, and then to Gallus Caesar; Constantia, said to have been the foundress of St. Agnes at Rome, and to have professed virginity; and Helena, wife of the emperor Julian. (Ducange, Fam. Byzant. p. 47.)

She was put to death by her husband, probably in 326, under very doubtful circumstances: see the article on CONSTANTINE, Vol. I. p. 630.

[J. W.]

FAUSTA (2), a virgin and martyr with Evilasius at Cyzicus, under Galerius, A.D. 305. She was the daughter of rich parents, who, having carefully instructed her in the Christian faith, left her an orphan at thirteen. Becoming famous for her religious activity she was reported to the emperor, who sent his Primus Palatii, Evilasius, to torture her. Converted by her constancy and arguments he was in turn tortured by the propraetor Maximinus. Some of the Martyrologists, as Rabanus and Symeon Metaphrastes, add this last as a third martyr, converted by the sufferings of the other two. Bede, Usuardus, Rabanus, Notkerus, and Mart. Rom. commemorate them on Sept. 20. Rabanus and Notkerus commemorate them at Jan. 7 as well. (Men. Basil. at Feb. 6.) The acts are extant in Greek and Latin. (Surius, Vitas SS. i. 863; Acta SS. Boll. Sep. vi. 144.) They are so full of legend that Tillemont's sentence, "nulla inest illis veri species," does not seem too severe. (Tillemont, Mém. tom. v. p. 61.) [G. T. S.]

FAUSTIANUS (FAUSTINIANUS), sixth bishop of Dax, succeeding Liberius A.D. 584. He was nominated to the episcopate by the pretender Gundobald. Bertram, of Bordeaux, at that time the metropolis of Dax, excused himself, mistrusting the consequences, and ordered Palladius of Saintes to consecrate him. Orestes, bishop of Bazas, was also present, though he afterwards denied it before the king. But Gundobald being soon afterwards killed, Guntram assembled the second council of Mâcon, A.D. 585, at which Faustianus was deposed, but Bertram, Orestes, and Palladius, who were responsible for his consecration, were ordered to support him by turns and pay him a hundred pieces of gold a year. In spite of his deposition he appears to have subscribed the synod. He was succeeded by Nicetius, whom Chilperic had nominated for the bishopric at the time of the usurpation. (Greg. Tur. Hist. Franc. vii. 31, viii. 2, 20; Mansi, ix. 959; Gall. Christ. i. 1040; Baron. ann. 588, xxi.) [S. A. B.]

FAUSTINA (1) (full name FLAVIA MAXIMA FAUSTINA, Goltz), third wife of Constantius II. Constantius married her at Antioch in the winter of 360. (Amm. xxi. 6, § 4.) She was pregnant at the time of his death, and the child afterwards born, Flavia Maxima Constantia, became the wife of the emperor Gratian. (Amm. xxi. 15, § 6.) [M. F. A.]

FAUSTINA (2), wife of Julianus, a wealthy man living in Dalmatia at the beginning of the 5th century, and friend of St. Jerome, whose letter to him (118, ed. Vall.) was written after his wife's death. [W. H. F.]

FAUSTINIANUS (1), legendary father of CLEMENS ROMANUS (Clem. Recog. ix. 35). In the Clementine Homilies (xiv. 8) the name of the father is given as Faustus, and Faustinianus is that of one of Clement's brothers. [G. S.]

FAUSTINIANUS (2) (FAUSTINUS), bishop of Bononia (Bologna), c. A.D. 312, and successor of St. Zama. It seems uncertain whether he immediately succeeded St. Zama, or whether the see had remained vacant during the persecution of Diocletian. He died probably c. A.D. 330, and was succeeded by St. Basilus. (Boll. Acta SS. 26 Feb. iii. 639; Ughelli, Ital. Sacr. ii. 8; Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Ital. iii. 446.) [R. S. G.]

FAUSTINIANUS (3), bishop of Tamugada, Tamogada, or Tamagadi, in Numidia, present at Carth. Conf. A.D. 411. (Mon. Vet. Don. p. 408, ed. Oberthür.) [H. W. P.]

FAUSTINIANUS (4), Donatist bishop of Carpis ("Gurbo," Shaw, p. 87) in proconsular Africa; ordained by Donatus; present at Carth. Conf. A.D. 411. (Mon. Vet. Don. p. 439, ed. Oberthür.) [H. W. P.]

FAUSTINIANUS (5), bishop of Rusiccada, or Rusiccade (Râs Solkhda, or Philippeville) in Numidia; absent through illness from Carth. Conf. A.D. 411. (Mon. Vet. Don. p. 463, ed. Oberthür.) [H. W. P.]

FAUSTINIANUS (6), one of the sixty-one bishops of Numidia, who met in council at Mileum, Milevia, or Mireum ("Milah," Shaw, p. 63), A.D. 416, and joined in an address to pope Innocent I. against the errors of Celestius and Pelagius. (Aug. Ep. 176.) [H. W. P.]

FAUSTINIANUS (7), one of the bishops who met in council at Carthage, A.D. 416, and joined in an address to pope Innocent I. concerning Pelagius and Celestius. Probably the same as the preceding. (Aug. Ep. 175.) [H. W. P.]

FAUSTINIANUS (8), bishop of Utica; present at the council held at Carthage by bishop Boniface, A.D. 525. (Morcelli, Africa Christ. i. 362; Mansi, viii. 647.) [L. D.]

FAUSTINIANUS (9), bishop of Dax. [FAUSTIANUS.]

FAUSTINUS, a name sometimes interchanged with Faustus.

FAUSTINUS (1), legendary brother of CLEMENS ROMANUS (Clem. Recog. ix. 35; Clem. Hom. xiv. 8). [G. S.]

FAUSTINUS (2) (Cyp. Ep. 57, A.D. 252), African bishop, present at the second synod of Carthage under Cyprian, De Pace. He does not appear in any subsequent council. [E. W. B.]

FAUSTINUS (3), bishop of Lyons, A.D. 254. [MARCIANUS.] (Cyp. Ep. 68.) [E. W. B.]

FAUSTINUS (4), bishop of Tuburba, or Tuburba, a small, and as St. Augustine remarked, insignificant town of proconsular Africa; condemned as a traditor by the Donatists without inquiry, A.D. 312, but not further prosecuted. (Aug. ad Don. post. coll. 22, 38, vol. ix. p. 676; Tillemont, 8, vol. vi. p. 18.) A Faustus bishop of Tuburba was present at the council of Arles, A.D. 314 (Routh, R. S. iv. 313, 2nd ed.; Manc. ii. 477 B), and is perhaps the same person. [H. W. P.]

FAUSTINUS (5), bishop of Bononia (Bologna). [FAUSTINIANUS (2).]

FAUSTINUS (6), the seventh known bishop of Iconium, and metropolitan (Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 1068), coming between Eulalius [EULALIUS (5)] and Joannes I. St. Basil, writing in 373 (ep. 138, al. 8) mentions his having been invited to Iconium to ordain a successor to Faustinus, who was dead. In 374 Basil (ep. 161, al. 393) compliments John's successor Amphilocheus with an allusion to 1 Sam. ix. 3, "the asses are lost (δνοὶ ἀπόλλυνται) that Israel may have a king," insinuating that Faustinus and John were men of dull parts. The reading of ἐχθροὶ for δνοὶ (which would imply that they belonged to the Arian party) is not accepted. [C. H.]

FAUSTINUS (7), seventh, or perhaps ninth, bishop of Brixia (Brescia), succeeding Ursicinus c. A.D. 350. He is believed to have written the Acts of St. Apollinaris, and of SS. Faustinus and Jovita the martyrs (Feb. 15). He died c. 379, and was succeeded by St. Philastrius. (Acta SS. 16 Feb. ii. 886; Ughelli, Ital. Sacr. iv. 729; Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Ital. xi. 556.) [R. S. G.]

FAUSTINUS (8), Donatist bishop of Hippe Regius, about A.D. 380; mentioned by St. Augustine as having recommended that because there were few Catholics in Hippo no one should bake bread for them. In one case a baker who was the tenant of a Catholic deacon, threw away unbaked the bread intended for his landlord, and refused all communication with him. (Aug. c. Petil. ii. 84, 184; Tillemont, 37, vol. vi. p. 140.) [H. W. P.]

FAUSTINUS (9), Donatist bishop of Bina, or Binea, in proconsular Africa, present at the Donatist council of Cabarsussia, in Byzacene, A.D. 393. (Aug. En. in Ps. 36, 20, vol. iv. p. 361; Ceillier, vol. iv. 658.) [H. W. P.]

FAUSTINUS (10), one of the bishops, probably of proconsular Asia, who presented a complaint against Chrysostom at the council of the Oak, for having unjustly deposed them (Photius, Cod. 59, p. 60). [E. V.]

FAUSTINUS (11), Donatist bishop of Naragora (Edjbel), in Numidia; present at the conference of Carthage, A.D. 411. (Mon. Vet. Don. p. 459, ed. Oberthür.) [H. W. P.]

FAUSTINUS (12), Donatist bishop of Tambaja, in Byzacene; present as the preceding. (M. V. D. p. 447.) [H. W. P.]

FAUSTINUS (13), Donatist bishop of Lamba, in Byzacene; present at the preceding. (M. F. D. p. 467.) [H. W. P.]

FAUSTINUS (14), bishop of Sillis, in Numidia; present at the preceding. (M. F. D. p. 464.) [H. W. P.]

FAUSTINUS (15), the name of two bishops present at the council of Milevia, or Mileum, A.D. 418. But the name of one of them is also given as SANCTUS. (Aug. Ep. 176.) [H. W. P.]

FAUSTINUS (16), perhaps a bishop, to whom are ascribed (i.) a homily On the Passion, wherein the sufferings of Abel, Isaac, and Jonah are put forth as types of the passion of Jesus Christ (Patrol. Lat. lix. 407); (ii.) a fragment of sermons justifying the addition of a week to the last fast, preserved in the book of Aeneas bishop of Paris, Against the Greeks, cap. 176. (Lige, Patrol. Lat. cxxi. 742); (iii.) an exhortation to see this present world in such a manner as to gain a better one, printed among the sermons of Eusebius Emesenus under the title, Sermo V. exhortatorius, Sancti Faustini Episcopi (La Bigne, Bibl. Patr. vi. 679). These impositions have been generally attributed to Roman bishop of Reims, but as Ceillier states (ist. Scr. i. 435-6) they differ in style, and are probably to be attributed to a bishop of the 4th century otherwise unknown. As to the sermo in Kalendis Januariis, which has been ascribed to the same writer, see No. 19.

FAUSTINUS (17), twelfth bishop of Le Puy, according to St. Armentarius or Hermenarius, and named by Fortunus or Fortinus in the latter half of the 5th century. Sidonius Apollinaris speaks of a bishop Faustinus in friendly terms, who may perhaps be identical with him. (Sid. Apoll. lib. iv. Epist. 6. Migne, Patr. Lat. lviii. 509; Sid. Chron. ii. 689.) [S. A. B.]

FAUSTINUS (18), bishop of Girba, a town situated on an island near the lesser Syrtis, included in the Tripolitan province of the African Church, and to be distinguished from Girba by the name of Girba Major. (M. F. D. p. 467.) [H. W. P.]

council of Toledo, which ratified the translation of Felix, formerly of Seville, to the see of Toledo [FELIX (152)]. At the time of this translation of Felix, Faustinus was metropolitan of Braga, and was thence transferred to Seville by Egica. He signs the Acts of the sixteenth council of Toledo, and according to Roderic of Toledo (lib. vi. cap. 13, apud Schott. Hisp. Ill.) was present at the seventeenth council, A.D. 684 (Exp. Sagr. ix. 228; Aguirre-Catalani, iv. 833). [M. A. W.]

FAUSTINUS (21), a presbyter and martyr with his brother Jotina a deacon, Feb. 16, at Brizina in Italy; under the emperor Hadrian; about the year 120. (Martyrol. Vet. Rom., Usuardi, Notker.; Ensch. H. E. iv. c. 9.) Their acts, which are full of legendary stories, are said to have been written by Faustinus bishop of Brizina, A.D. 350 (cf. Acta SS. Boll. Feb. ii. 807). [G. T. S.]

FAUSTINUS (22), Aug. 7; martyr at Milan under Constantius, about A.D. 182 (FAUSTINUS, Vet. Rom. Mart.). He was son of a Milanese Christian, named Philip. Together with his father he was baptized by Caius, third bishop of Milan. Engaging in military service he seems to have been called on to discharge some idolatrous ceremony. Upon his refusal he suffered the penalty of military law and obtained the crown of martyrdom. The Bollandist is astonished at Baronius placing his martyrdom under Commodus, while in his Annals he tells us that there was no persecution under this emperor. But many suffered for Christ under the operation of military law even when no general persecution took place. For a Roman soldier there was no freedom of conscience. [cf. FORTIANUS] (Vet. Rom. Mart., Mart. Hieron., Usuardi, Adonis, Notkeri; Ferrarius, Catalog. SS.) [G. T. S.]

FAUSTINUS (23), martyr at Perugia in the Decian persecution, according to the tabulae ecclesiasticae quoted by Baronius. (Baron. A. E. ann. 254, xxix.) [C. H.]

FAUSTINUS (24), commemorated Feb. 17, suffered with forty-four others. Baronius conjectures that they suffered at Rome, but their place is not fixed. Ferrarius (Catalogus SS.) tells that before the correction of the present Roman calendar no mention of them existed in it (cf. Martyr. Hieron., Bedae). [G. T. S.]

FAUSTINUS (25), July 28, martyr at Rome in the Diocletian persecution with Stimplicius Beatrix or Viatrix, their sister. He suffered the seventh milestone on the Via Portuensis. of the most valuable illustrations of Italian antiquity in De Rossi's La Roma Sotterranea Cristiana, tom. iii., is his account of cemetery of Geterosa, where they were buried. Beatrix, having received the bodies of martyrs which had been flung into the river, hastily buried them in the sandpit of one cross, a Christian woman, whence the origin of the cemetery. This catacomb, which had long looked for elsewhere, was accidentally discovered a few years ago. It is approached by a ruined basilica, dedicated to Faustinus and Beatrix, and built (it is said) by pope Damasus, in 382. This discovery illustrates the trustworthiness of the older martyrologies on points of geography. (Acta SS. Jul. vii. 38; Martyr. Vet. Rom., Hieron., Usuardi; Till. Mem. iv. 550.)

FAUSTINUS (26), a presbyter (Cypr. Ep. i. 1, 3). [GEMINIUS.] [E. W. B.]

FAUSTINUS (27), presbyter of Orange at the council of Arles, 314 (Mansi, ii. 476; Routh, Rel. Sac. iv. 303, 312, 2nd ed.). [C. H.]

FAUSTINUS (28), a son of Ambrose's friend Eusebius. It is probable that he is the person to whom Ambrose's letter 39 was written. He had a son of the same name. [EUSEBIUS (133).]

[J. L. D.]

FAUSTINUS (29), catholicos, mentioned by Athanasius as inciting the populace to molest Catholic congregations. (Athan. Hist. Arian. ad Monach. § 55 in Opp. par. i. 298.) [C. H.]

FAUSTINUS (30), a Roman, perhaps a presbyter, at the end of the 4th century. He was one of the band of men who took a strong part in resistance to the Origenistic doctrines then agitating the church. Tranquillinus, his brother (either by natural or spiritual relationship), finding him pronounce a very strong judgment on Origen as 'penitus respuendus,' wrote to St. Jerome then at Bethlehem, to know the truth. Jerome's answer, which is discriminating and moderate, is written to Faustinus, and forms the sixty-second letter in Vallarsi's edition.

[W. H. F.]

FAUSTINUS (31), a gentleman of Caesarea, whose acquaintance Chrysostom made during his sojourn in that city, on his way to Cucusus A.D. 404, and from whom he received many kindnesses, to which he refers with warm expressions of gratitude in a letter, announcing his safe arrival at his place of exile (Chrysost. Epist. 84).

[E. V.]

FAUSTINUS (32), a layman of Philadelphia, one of those who adjured Quartodeciman opinions and signed the symbolum of Jacobus in 431 (Mansi, iii. 1353 d). [EUTYCHIUS (28).]

FAUSTINUS (33), a Roman presbyter who on the death of Liberius bishop of Rome in September, 369, sided with Ursinus, and soon afterwards was one of the many who suffered exile on his account (v. the edicts in Baronius, Ann. s. a. 369, iii. iv. v.; 371, i. ii. iii.; DAMASUS, Vol. I. 783). In the preface to a petition which he and a fellow exile, Marcellinus, presented to the emperors Valentinian, Theodosius, and Arcadius c. A.D. 383, there is an account given both of the schism and of that which led to it, which is so damaging to Damasus personally, as well as to his party and their proceedings, that such writers as Baronius do not scruple to violently impugn its veracity (Libellus Precum, Migne, Patrol. xiii. 82; Baron. Ann. s. a. 367, xiv.). But it is fully sustained by the evidence of Ammianus Marcellinus (xxvii. 3), and even by that of Socrates (H. E. iv. 29), who in his narrative of what took place transcribes Rufinus (Valesius, note in Socr. u. s.), a contemporary who had ample means of direct information as to the facts.

Both Faustinus and Marcellinus were Luciferians. Their petition contains, perhaps, the most trustworthy account we possess of that party and of the personal career of Lucifer bishop of Cagliari, with whom it had its origin. It was written at Eleutheropolis in Palestine. The bishop of that see was Turbo, a deacon of his predecessor Eutychius the semi-Arian (Epiphan. Haer. lxxiii.; Baronius, u. s. a. a. 351, xxvii. xxviii.; Gams, Ser. Episc. 453). The exiles bitterly complain of his cruelty both to Lucifer, when he was in his power some years previously, and of late to themselves (v. Ep. Conc. Rom. ad Gratian. et Valentin. A.D. 381 (?); Labbe et Cossart, ii. 1000; Rescript. Gratian. ib. 1003) and earnestly implore the interposition of the emperors in their behalf. The reply was a rescript addressed by Theodosius to Cynegius, prefect of the East (A.D. 384, Gothofred. Prosopogr. Cod. Theod. s. n.), commanding him to see that they had full liberty, and that the civil authorities protected them from further molestation (Migne, u. s. 106, 107).

About the same time that he and Marcellinus thus appealed to the emperors, Faustinus wrote a work on the Trinity, addressed to Flaccilla the wife of Theodosius, which was prepared at her request. This work has been strangely ascribed to Gregory the Luciferian bishop of Eliberis (e.g. Baronius, A. E. s. a. 371, cxxiv.; Gams, u. s. 34), and is, no less strangely, still printed as having been addressed to Galla Placidia (Migne, u. s. 29), notwithstanding that Gennadius expressly states that it was addressed to Flaccilla, and that its author was Faustinus (de Script. Eccl. Migne, lviii. 1069). He has also left us a confession of faith addressed to Theodosius in reply to some persons who had charged him with Sabellianism (Migne, xiii. 79).

FAUSTINUS (34), a priest of the monastery of Insula Barba, a letter to whom is extant, professedly from St. Eucherius (Labbe, Biblioth. i. 665). But no other testimony is available to shew that the monastery then existed, and the letter is doubtless spurious. (Ceillier, Aut. Eccl. viii. 453).

[R. T. S.]

FAUSTINUS (35), a penitent who had publicly confessed his sin with tokens of great humility, when St. Nilus wrote to the priest Chariclea, who was treating him with too severe a discipline, urging gentleness and mercy towards repentant sinners. (Nil. op. 243, p. 213, Pat. Gr. lxxix. 498 a; Ceillier, viii. 222.)

[J. G. S.]

FAUSTINUS (36), defensor of Sicily; according to another reading of Greg. Mag. Epp. lib. ii. ind. i. ep. 23, Migne, note, FAUSTINUS.

[C. H.]

FAUSTUS, bishop of Tubushe. [FAUSTINUS (4)]

FAUSTUS (1), the father of Clemens Romanus. [FAUSTINIANUS (1).]

FAUSTUS (2), bishop of Timida Regia, a municipium in Prov. Proc., present at synod on Basilides (Syn. iv.; Carth. Cyp. Ep. 67), gives fifty-eighth suffrage in Sentt. Epp. Syn. Carth. sub Cyp. vii. In later MSS. called confessor.

[E. W. B.]

FAUSTUS (3), bishop of Panemotichus in the second Pamphylia (coins of Julia Domna are extant bearing the name of this town), one of the Seven fathers, A.D. 325. (Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 1031; Mansi, ii. 700.) [L. D.]

FAUSTUS (4), bishop of Limenae in Pisidia; present at the first Constantinopolitan council, A.D. 381. (Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 1051; Mansi, iii. 570.) [L. D.]

FAUSTUS (5), bishop of Satala, in Lesser Armenia, ordained by Anthimus of Tyana during his dispute with St. Basil. (Le Quien, O. C. i. 432, under Poemonius; Ceillier, Aut. Sacr. iv. 354, 360.) [ANTHIMUS, Vol. I. p. 119 b.] [L. D.]

FAUSTUS (6), bishop of Sassena (Sarsina). He succeeded Valerius c. A.D. 437, and died c. 459. His successor was Probus. (Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Italia ii. 486.) [R. S. G.]

FAUSTUS (7), bishop of Apollonia, probably the town of that name in Bithynia, 484. He wrote a letter to Peter the Fuller, of Antioch, concerning the clause that bishop had added to the Trisagion, "Qui crucifixus est propter nos," which Faustus condemns as heretical and blasphemous (Cave, Script. Eccl. i. 457; Mansi, vi. 1127, gives the letter in full). This bishop of Apollonia is not mentioned either in Le Quien's Oriens Christianus, or in Gams's Series Episcoporum. [L. D.]

FAUSTUS (8), bishop of Baronia, a town of uncertain position, mentioned only in connexion with this bishop. Victor Vitensis (de Persecutione Vandal. i. c. xi.) cites him as a witness to the miracles wrought at the place where certain martyrs perished during the persecution under Genseric: "a blind woman received her sight in the bishop's presence." Faustus appears to have died before the persecution under Hunneric, as there is no further mention of him. (Morcelli, Africa Christ. i. 110; Migne, Patrol. Lat. lviii. 104.) [L. D.]

FAUSTUS (9), bishop of Castra Seberiamensis, in the province of Mauretania Caesariensis; one of the Catholic bishops who, after the conference at Carthage with the Arians, was banished by king Hunneric, A.D. 484. (Morcelli, Africa Christ. i. 130; Notitia in Victor. Vit. 59, Migne, Patrol. Lat. lviii.) [L. D.]

FAUSTUS (10), an orthodox African bishop, banished from his see of Telepte in 484, by Hunneric. Faustus founded a small monastery in this district, which became celebrated, from the circumstance that the young procurator, Fabius Fulgentius, had recourse to its founder, when he was first smitten by the desire to enter upon the "religious" life. This was in the year 491. Fulgentius was well known to Faustus (Vita Fulgentii, in Acta SS. and Migne, Patr. lxx. cc. 4-6), who strongly dissuaded the young noble from a method of life so contrary to all his previous habits. His resolution and courage induced Faustus to grant a brief novitiate to Fulgentius, during which he was put to severe labour. The mother of Fulgentius betook herself to Faustus in a state of frenzy (furibunda), and hurled upon him violent reproach. She loudly bewailed her lot, and clamoured at the gates of the monastery. Faustus did not allow her to see her son, although the latter overheard her bitter ejaculations. Faustus argued that as Fulgentius could bear this severe strain upon his integrity, it was safe to admit him to the brotherhood. It appears that Faustus made no demand upon Fulgentius for his paternal property, which the latter handed over to his mother for the education and advantage of his brother Claudius. Under pressure of persecution, Fulgentius soon separated from Faustus [FULGENTIUS OF RUSPE], who nevertheless exercised a certain authority over him. As Fulgentius for many years manifested intense reluctance to occupy any position of trust and importance, and was tempted to make numerous romantic escapes from the dignities that were thrust upon him, Faustus was appealed to, and he suddenly ordained Fulgentius as presbyter, and commanded him to undertake the duties of both presbyter and abbat (ib. c. 15). His influence over Fulgentius is his principal title to remembrance. [H. R. R.]

FAUSTUS (11), sometimes called Faustus the Breton, from his having been born in Brittany, or (as Tillemont thinks) in Britain, but more generally known as Faustus of Riez (Faustus Rieensis, al. Regiensis seu Rhegiensis) from the name of his see in Provence. He was born towards the close of the 4th century, and died in A.D. 492, or possibly somewhat later.

Authorities.—1, his own writings, for which see below; 2, the letters of his friend and contemporary, Sidonius Apollinaris (Epist. Lib. ix. Epp. 3, 9); 3, Gennadius (Illustr. Virorum Catalogus, cap. 85); 4, St. Avitus (Epist. iv.); 5, acts of the third Council of Arles (Concilium Arelatense, about A.D. 455, and of another council at the same place which may be termed the fourth), held in A.D. 475; also of a Council of Lyons (Lugdunense) said to have been held shortly after that of Arles; 6, a letter of pope Hormisdas, written in A.D. 520, to an African bishop named Possessor, who had consulted him concerning the writings of Faustus. For Nos. 5 and 6 see Labbe's Concilia, tom. ii. pp. 806, 1038 (ed. Parisiis, 1714). For editions of the other authorities cited the reader is referred to their respective names in this Dictionary.

Life.—We are ignorant of the condition of the parents of Faustus, and even of their names. He may have lost his father while he was young, for we only hear of his mother, whose fervid piety and striking demeanour made a great impression on all who saw her, insomuch that to be allowed to pay her a visit was esteemed a favour. She lived to a great age, and saw her son become a bishop. Faustus studied Greek philosophy, but in a Christian spirit. He also mastered the principles of rhetoric, and may possibly have pleaded for a time at the bar as an advocate. A brother, named Memorius, appears to have been ordained priest, and to have lived with Faustus during his later career at Riez.

While still youthful (probably about A.D. 426 or a little later), Faustus retired from the world and entered the famous monastery of Lerins (Lerium), at that time presided over by St. Maximus. Here he became a thorough ascetic, and a great student of Holy Scripture, without, however, giving up his philosophic pursuits. It was probably at Lerins that he acquired the reputation assigned to him by Gennadius of being an illustrious extempore preacher. He became a presbyter, and about 432 or 433 succeeded Maximus as abbat of Lerins.

His tenure of this office was marked by a keen dispute with his diocesan Theodore, bishop of Fréjus, concerning their respective rights. So much scandal was caused by this controversy, that the third council of Arles was convened by Ravennius, bishop of Arles, for the sole purpose of settling it. The decision, which seems to be a kind of compromise, leaves considerable ecclesiastical power in the hands of the abbat. This may be an early instance of encroachment on episcopal authority by a corporate body. But, considering how strongly even the best men may be influenced by the esprit de corps, we are not justified, without further evidence, in blaming either side. In such cases men think of the rights of their successors, and consequently a difference between a bishop and the ruling body of a monastery, a college, or a cathedral, is an event which may happen in any age of the church. The epistle of Faustus to a deacon named Gratus (al. Gratus or Gregorius), who was heretical on the union of the two natures in the Person of Christ, belongs also to this period of his life.

The next event of importance in the career of Faustus is his succession in the episcopate of Riez, in Provence, to St. Maximus, whom he had already succeeded in the abbacy of Lerins. Of the fact there is no question, but its date is extremely uncertain. Baronius (followed by Ramsay in Smith's Dict. of Greek and Roman Biography) places it as late as A.D. 472; but Tillemont (Mém. Ecclés. tome vi. p. 775) makes an ingenious case against so late a date as this, and is inclined to place it at least as early as 462, or even in 456. Happily the vagueness of the chronology does not in this case seriously affect the history. There is no question but that Faustus continued as bishop the stern self-discipline which he had practised as monk and abbat. He often retired to Lerins with a view of increasing the severity of his ascetic regimen, and became known throughout his diocese, and beyond its bounds, not only as a striking preacher, but also as one who gave both temporal and spiritual succour to the sick, both in body and mind. He seems, however, to have taken a somewhat stern view on the subject of late repentance, like that so prevalent at an earlier period in the church of North Africa. In the councils of Arles and of Lyons above-named a presbyter named Lucidus, accused of having taught fatalism through misunderstanding the writings of Augustine (ex libri Sancti Augustini male intellectis), was censured, and induced to make a retraction. The signatures of eleven bishops were adhibited, according to the report given us by Faustus, to his letter against Lucidus; and Leontius, bishop of Arles, invited Faustus to compose a treatise on the subject of grace and free choice. (The case of Lucidus is thought of sufficient importance to be noticed by Petau in his famous treatise, De Theologicis Dogmatibus, tom. i. lib. ix. cap. 2, § 2; and also by Döllinger, in his Church History, vol. ii. chap. 4, § 2.)

We next find Faustus mixed up in secular affairs, inasmuch as he appears from Sidonius to have had some share in bringing about that treaty, concluded in A.D. 475 between the emperor Nepos and Euric, king of the Visigoths, which Tillemont and Gibbon agree in regarding as discreditable to the Roman empire. It certainly wrested Auvergne and subsequently Provence from the hands of an orthodox sovereign, and threw them into those of an Arian one. This result was an unfortunate one for Faustus. About A.D. 481 he was banished from his see, in all probability in consequence of his writings against Arianism. Kind and powerful friends supported him during his exile, which he bore, though suffering from illness, with fortitude and dignity. His banishment is naturally attributed to king Euric, on whose death, in A.D. 483, Faustus was enabled to return to Riez. His life, as has been remarked, was prolonged until at least A.D. 492, possibly until some years later. Of his character it is impossible to speak without first considering his publications.

Writings.—These have not come down to us in a complete and satisfactory condition. The ill-repute of their teaching, as semi-Pelagian, has probably much lessened their chance of being carefully edited. If, for reasons to be mentioned presently, they have in some quarters been rather over-censured, it must be owned that there is nothing extant from the pen of Faustus of Riez to justify the extravagant eulogies lavished on their style and matter by his friend Sidonius Apollinaris. The following are still accessible:—

1. Professio Fidei, contra eos, qui per solam Dei Voluntatem alios dicunt ad Vitam attrahit alios in Mortem deprimi; hinc Futurum cum Gentilibus asserunt, inde liberum arbitrium cum Manichæis negant. (Bibliotheca Maxima Patrum Lugduni, A.D. 1677, p. 523.)

This treatise is addressed to the then bishop of Arles, beatissimo ac reverendissimo Leontio Papæ. [LEONTIUS.] Faustus opens it with a severe attack on the teaching of Pelagius as heretical, but proceeds to express a fear of the opposite extreme, of such a denial of man's power as a free agent, as would virtually amount to fatalism.

2. Ejusdem Fausti Epistola ad Lucidum Presbyterum (ibid.). This letter, to which reference has already been made, is similar in tone to the preceding, but rather fiercer in its language. Faustus here, too, anathematizes the error of Pelagius; but he also says anathema to any one who shall have declared that the vessel of wrath cannot arise so as to become a vessel for honour; or that Christ did not die for all men, or willeth not that all should be saved, or to any one (it seems desirable here to give the author's own wording) "qui dixerit illum quæ periit, non accepisse ut salvus esse posset, id est de baptizato, vel de illius ætatis pagano, quæ credere potuit et noluit."

3. De Gratia Dei et Humanæ Mentis libero Arbitrio Libri II. (ibid. p. 525). The first book of this treatise is like an expansion of No. 1. After again censuring Pelagius, the writer argues strongly on behalf of the need of human endeavour and co-operation with the Divine aid. Towards the close of the first book, and still more emphatically in the second, he gives his interpretation of some of those passages of Holy Scripture (as e.g. Exodus iv. 21, vii. 13; Romans ii. 11-26), which make most strongly for Augustinianism. This is the part where Faustus is most extreme and least successful. The idea of an antinomy, of the acceptance of two apparent contradictions, which in this life must remain unharmonized, is a comparatively recent one, though we find it in the writings of Bossuet. But it had not dawned upon the mind of the 5th century, nor even upon that of the 16th, and many passages in this book resemble the writings of a much later age, and might almost be supposed to have come from the pen of some Arminian controversialist in the age of the school of Dort. In cap. x. of this second book, which has for its title "Gentes Deum Naturaliter Sapientes," Faustus calls attention to the language of Daniel towards Nebuchadnezzar, and his censure of Belshazzar, as assuming heathen recognition of God (Dan. iv. and v.). He also appeals for the same purpose to the first chapter of Jonah, to the repentance of the Ninevites (Jonah iii.), and to the language of Jeremiah (Jer. vii. 7-10). In this chapter the writer anticipates a sermon by bishop Horsley to the same effect. Perhaps the famous expression in the apology of Tertullian, O testimonium animae nostrae Christianae, and the language of St. Justin Martyr, St. Clement of Alexandria, and some other fathers, might be considered to favour the view of heathendom here taken by Faustus.

4. Fausti Rhegiensis Episcopi ad Monachos sermo.—The title seems prima facie to indicate a publication subsequent to its author's elevation to the episcopate. But it may, of course, have been written at an earlier date, just as it is e.g. common among ourselves to speak of the works of archbishop Leighton, although most of that prelate's writings are prior, in point of date, to his consecration as bishop.

The tone of this short letter resembles that of the author's other writings. He refers to excommunication as a terrible weapon only to be used in the last resort. It is sad to see monks go back to the world, especially if, after doing so, they retain their monastic dress. The lower creation sets a better example. "Aves ipsae diligunt nidos suos. Amant ferae locum quibus habitant." As usual, he is energetic in his appeals to the human element in religion. "Use your will. Resist the devil. Cherish all graces, especially obedience and humility." "Quanto magis aruerimus in studio, tanto ille apponet adiutorium; quanto nos apposuerimus ad diligendum tanto ille addet ad gloriam. Qui habet, accipite illud." With this admonition may be classed Sermo ad Monachos, which certainly seems to have been addressed to the community of Lerins, while Faustus presided over it. (These are all given in the Patr. Bibl. Max. ubi supra pp. 545-7; also by Martene and Durandus in Scriptor. et Monumentor. ampliss. Collectio, tom. ii. p. 142, Paris, 1733; by Brockie, Codex Laudunensis, append. p. 469. Aug. Vind. 1759; and by Barnage, Thesaurus Monumentorum, tom. i. p. 350. Amst. 1725.)

5. Responsio ad objecta quaedam de Ratione Fidei Editione.—This is an epistle consisting of two parts so distinct from each other, that several others have, with Gennadius, regarded them as separate treatises. The former part is a brief statement of the case against Arianism. It explains the distinction between Persona and Natura in reference to our Lord's Incarnation, and appears to be addressed to an orthodox, but perplexed friend, whom the author treats as a superior. The second portion is metaphysical, and discusses the nature of the soul, which Faustus seems to pronounce material. Claudius Mamertus, in his De Statu Animae, wrote against Faustus on this point. It is, however, possible that Faustus may not have meant more than to draw a marked distinction between the Creator and the creature; arguing, as he does, nil credendum incorporeum praeter Deum. (This is given in the Patr. Bibl. Max. and has also been published in the collection of ancient French ecclesiastical writers edited by P. Pithou, Paris, 1586.)

6. Homilia de S. Maximi Laudibus.—This eulogy of the person, whom Faustus twice succeeded, has been, by a singular mistake, ascribed to Eusebius of Emesa. [EUSEBIUS EMESENSIS.] But this Eusebius died about A.D. 360, a century before the death of Maximus, and before the existence of the famous monastery of Lerins. (It is given in another patristic collection, the Bibl. Magn. Patr. published at Cologne in 1618, tom. v. pt. 1.)

7. Epistolae. (These, to the number of nineteen, are also given in the collection just named (ibid. x. part v.), and a selection is also to be found in the Lyons Patr. Bibl. Max. cited throughout this notice.) That to Lucidus has already been described. The one addressed to Cratius given by H. Canisius (in his Antiquae Lectiones, tom. v. and reproduced by Basnage ubi supra) has been already mentioned. Gennadius describes Gratius as a Nestorian, but his errors, apparently resulting rather from ignorance than wilfulness, seem more akin to those of Eutyches. The other epistles of Faustus touch upon problems of metaphysics and theology, but do not make any important additions to our knowledge of their author.

Taking Faustus of Riez as an ecclesiastic and as a writer, we have before us this phenomenon. Here is a man of unimpeachably good character; of an earnest, active, ascetic life; orthodox on the central doctrine of the Christian faith, and even suffering exile for it as a confessor; but stigmatized as a semi-Pelagian, and consequently by many authorities, both ancient and modern, denied the title of saint. But his own flock at Riez, deeply moved by his life and preaching, and warmly attached to his memory, insisted on giving him at least a local canonization. To them he was Sanctus Faustus Rieensis; they erected a basilica, dedicated in his name, and kept Jan. 18 as the anniversary of his festival.

The decision of this question will depend upon the verdict passed by the student on the school to which Faustus belonged. [v. SEMI-PELAGIANS.] In the case of Arianism it is possible to answer with an emphatic affirmative or negative to the really essential question put by Arius, viz. is the Redeemer, or is he not, only a creature? But Pelagianism and semi-Pelagianism involve questions of degree, and cannot be thus trenchantly stated. The excellent life of Faustus does not prove (any more than that of Pelagius himself) that he may not have written some dangerous, if not absolutely heretical, statements concerning man's free agency. But the following considerations also seem to deserve attention. If St. Augustine was—as so many now believe—betrayed by his opposition to Pelagius into some extravagances, the reaction in Southern Gaul must be in part ascribed to the influence of this extreme tendency. In the Italy of the 5th and 6th centuries the weight of Augustine's name and that of his followers, St. Hilary and St. Prosper, was so great, that those who refused entire acquiescence in their views were unfavourably regarded at Rome. In a later day much of the learning of the French fell into the hands of decided Jansenists, such as the editors of the Lyons Bibliotheca Patrum, Natalis Alexander, and Tillemont. The Jansenist school has so many claims upon our admiration and respect that in some quarters it seems to be assumed that its decisions on all such questions are final. This, however, can hardly prove to be the ultimate verdict of impartial history. The apologies made by learned Jesuits, such as Birmond, on behalf of Faustus, may by some be viewed with suspicion, as coming from a partial source; but it is hardly possible to deny that the account given by Tillemont is much more strongly imbued with partisanship and a disposition in prius interpretari. Baronius reminds his readers that Faustus wrote before the date of the second Council of Orange, presided over by St. Caecilius [CAECILIUS], (which did so much to lull the disputes on predestination), and rather leans towards allowing the citizens of Riez to have their way, and continue their homage to his memory. "Maneant igitur Fausto integra ura sua, nec ex nostris scriptis sentiat praejudicium." The cardinal does not seem to pay regard to the letter of pope Hormisdas to Possessor, which tends, to say the least, in the opposite direction. But, if confronted by it, Baronius might perhaps have taken refuge in the convenient resource, that the bishop of Rome was here writing only as a private doctor, and not pronouncing a decision ex cathedra." [J. G. C.]

FAUSTUS (12) II., fifth bishop of Riez, succeeding Contumelinus, and followed by Emericus. He was represented at the fifth council of Orleans, A.D. 549, by Claudianus, a deacon. (Mansi, ix. 137; Gall. Christ. i. 383.)

FAUSTUS (13), twenty-fourth bishop of Auch, succeeding Paulinus and followed by Fabius. He was present at the second council of Nîmes (585), and died the same year. There is a Faustus, whose praises as the builder of a church of St. Martin, are sung by Venantius Fortunatus (Misc. lib. i. cap. 4 in Migne, Patr. Lat. lxxviii. 67), who may possibly be this bishop. (Greg. Tur. Hist. Franc. viii. 22; Mansi, ix. 957; Gall. Christ. i. 873.)

FAUSTUS (14), ST., 25th bishop of Tarbes succeeding Auselius, perhaps about the close of the 6th century. All we know of him is derived from the legendary life of St. Licerius his disciple, whom he taught, and who after his return from exile to Vicus-Julius (Aire) remained with him till his death. This life, which is ascribed to Bernardus Guido, was first published by Labbe, and is also to be found in Boll. Acta SS. Aug. vi. 46. Nothing trustworthy is known of Faustus, and his successors are unknown even by name till Saracenia, towards the close of the 9th century. (Gall. Christ. i. 1236.)

[S. A. B.]

FAUSTUS (15), common. Oct. 4, a deacon and martyr, with his fellow deacons, Gius, Eusebius, and Chresmon and many others, disciples, probably, of Dionysius bishop of Alexandria, when head of the celebrated catechetical school in that city, A.D. 252–267 (Dionysius (6)). They suffered, some in the Decian persecution, A.D. 250 (Menolog. Græc.), some of them under Valerian and Gallienus, A.D. 254, and Faustus in an advanced old age under Diocletian. (Eusebius, E. H. vii. c. 11.)

[G. T. S.]

FAUSTUS (16), commemorated Sept. 6, martyr at Alexandria, with Macarius and others under Decian, Valerius being prefect of the city (Menolog. Græc. Sirlet.)

[G. T. S.]

FAUSTUS (17), commemorated July 16, martyr under Decian. He suffered by crucifixion (Magna Græca Menæa: Martyr. Romanæ Boll. Acta SS. Jul. iv. 124.)

[G. T. S.]

FAUSTUS (18), commemorated Aug. 1, martyr at Rome with Bonus and others at the same time as pope Stephen, under Valerian. (Martyr. Bedæ, Usuardi; Euseb. H. E. vii. 10.)

[G. T. S.]

FAUSTUS (19), martyred at Cordova with Januarius and Martinian. Their feast is placed by the Bollandists on Oct. 13, but the Gothic Office and the most ancient Spanish breviaries give Sept. 26. The date of their martyrdom is uncertain. Two points, however, throw light on it, (1) a verse of Prudentius, which probably refers to them ("Corduba Adulatus dabit. Zeallum, Treque curvas;" cf. Prudent. Perseph. Hymn 4, 19); (2) the mention of "sacratissimi imperatores" in some MSS. of the Acta which would seem to fit the Diocletian persecution. Tamayo de Salazar (Martyr. Hisp. Oct. 13) gives the date as 300, but with equal confidence he makes them brothers and the sons of St. Marcellus and St. Nema. The first supposition seems disposed of by the word "societas" in the Acta applied to the bond between them and the connexion with St. Marcellus probably arises from the confused notices of them in the Martyrologium, where three other martyrs Chalcedon share the same day, one of who is named Marcellus, and they appear endlessly confused with each other and with the Cordova

---tyrs. There was a church in their honour at Cordova in the 9th century (Memoriale Sanctorum of St. Isidore, cap. 9, lib. 3), and also in the 11th, if the document known as Vita et Mir. Petr. Emerit. (Exp. Sacer. x. 155) is to be trusted. On the subsequent feast by St. Ferdinand their church was rededicated to St. Peter, and the supposed saints be three saints, together with others, etc.

discovered in it Nov. 21, 1575. (Flores, Exp. Sacra, vol. x. 321, 508; Boll. AA. SS. Oct. vi. 13; the Acta are given at f. 2436 of the five 16th-century Sanctorale, which in Flores's time was still in the monastery of Cardena, but is now in the Brit. Mus. Addit. MSS. 25,600. See also Mart. Adon., Usuard.) [M. A. W.]

FAUSTUS (20), one of a company of martyrs at ~~Antioch~~ in proconsular Africa in the Diocletian persecution, according to the Acta Martyrum, professing to be drawn from the proconsular records, and quoted by Baronius. (Baron. A. E. ann. 303, lxxvi.) [C. H.]

FAUSTUS (21), martyr, April 16. [SARACENA, MARTYRS OF.]

FAUSTUS (22), commemorated Nov. 26, perhaps identical with the Faustus of Oct. 4 (No. 15), a presbyter and martyr at Alexandria, with Dios and Ammonius, who suffered under Maximian, A.D. 308, at the time when Peter, bishop of that city, was also put to death by his command. (Martyr., Adonis, Usuardi; Euseb. H. E. viii. 13.) [G. T. S.]

FAUSTUS (23), commemorated Sept. 8, martyr at Antioch with Timothy (Martyr. Usuardi), called Faustinus (Martyr. Bedae), and Justinianus (Martyr. Hieron.). [G. T. S.]

FAUSTUS (24), commemorated Nov. 19, an aged deacon and martyr. (Martyr. Usuardi.) [G. T. S.]

FAUSTUS (25), probably a monk, the bearer of a letter from St. Augustine to his friend Boniface, the tribune, from whom he had brought a letter to Augustine requesting his advice, c. A.D. 413. (Aug. Ep. 189.) [H. W. P.]

FAUSTUS (26), monk of Constantinople, son of Dalmatus. The father, who had been a soldier in the time of the emperor Theodosius, was persuaded to embrace a monastic life by St. Ilarius of Constantinople. Faustus followed the example, and was shorn by his own father. Both lived in the greatest credit with the emperor and the senate, and miracles are recorded of them. Faustus was commemorated on Aug. 3. (Basil. Menol.) [C. H.]

FAUSTUS (27), a deacon mentioned by Synesius, bishop of Ptolemais in Cyrenaica, who praises the clergy for heading their flocks against their enemies when the soldiers would not come forward, and commends above all the valour of the manly (μελαινρογες) Faustus, who was the foremost combatant. (Synesius, Ep. 122, in Migne, Patrol. Graec. lxxvi. 259; Ceillier, Ant. Sacr. viii. 31.) [L. D.]

FAUSTUS (28), a presbyter and archimandrite of Constantinople, ranking first among the contemporary holders of that office. In the year A.D. 448 Eutyches, the heretic, endeavored to secure his support, in common with that of the other archimandrites of Constantinople, for his views. With this object he met round a table to which he tried to induce the archimandrites to subscribe. When Eutyches' agents, Constantinus and Kleusinius, came to Faustus they described the document as an "Exposition of the faith of the three hundred and eighteen [Fathers of Nicaea] and of the Fathers of Ephesus:" "Let me have it," said Faustus, "to compare with the copies which I have of the decrees of those councils." This, however, they would not allow, and retired. When narrating this incident to messengers from the archbishop Flavian, Faustus added, "As to us, we are the children of the church, and have, after God, but one father, our archbishop." (Labbe, Concilia, iv. 211; Tillemont, xv. 501.) This Faustus, with Martin, a brother archimandrite, enjoyed the especial confidence of Leo I. He wrote to him, Martin and the other archimandrites, in June A.D. 449, against the heresy of Eutyches (Leo Mag. Ep. 32, 859, Migne). He addresses them again in October, after the "Robber Council," exhorting them to constancy (Ep. 51, 957). He writes again to Faustus and Martin in March, 450 (Ep. 61, 983), in answer to a letter from them, in the same strain. Again in July he writes to all the archimandrites complaining of the silence of Anatolius and the bishops who consecrated him to the see of Constantinople, as to his having given adequate evidence of orthodoxy (Ep. 71, 1012). In the same year he wrote an undated letter to Faustus alone (Ep. 72, 1016), praising his faith and constancy, and in November he wrote to Faustus and Martin (Ep. 75, 1022), saying how intolerable to the Western bishops was the action of the "Robber Council" at Ephesus. In A.D. 451 Faustus, with eighteen other orthodox archimandrites of Constantinople, addressed a letter to the emperor Marcian against the Eutychians, asking him, with a view to preventing the spread of that heresy, to allow them to subject its monastic supporters to the rules of monastic discipline (τοῖς πνευματικοῖς τῶν μοναχῶν ὁμοίως), and if they are obstinately contumacious to punish them as they deserve; they asked also that a certain cave to which the Eutychians seem to have retired (ἐνθα οἱ θηριώδεις κατοικοῦσι) might be handed over to them (Labbe, iv. 531). After the meeting of the council of Chalcedon in 451, the bishops there assembled summoned Faustus, among other orthodox archimandrites, to take their seats in the council when Carosus and the other Eutychian archimandrites were summoned before it. Their names appear as subscribing to the deposition of Eutyches, in Act i. of the council. [C. G.]

FAUSTUS (29) (FAUSTINUS), the Latin form of the Irish COMGALL.

FAUSTUS (30), monk of Agaunum (St. Maurice) in the Valais, accompanied his abbat, St. Severinus, on a journey to Paris to visit king Clovis I., who was sick of a fever. Severinus died on the return journey at Château-Landon, where Faustus appears to have established himself instead of returning to Agaunum. At the age of sixty he wrote a life of Severinus, c. A.D. 523-4, at the command of Childebert, who had built a church over the tomb of the saint. This work was corrected and adorned by some one whose name is unknown, at the suggestion of Magnus bishop of Sens, at the beginning of the 9th century, and in this new form is published by the Bollandists (AA. SS. Feb. ii. 547). The original work in its imperfect state has been edited by Mabillon (Acta SS. O. S. B. p. 568), but doubts have been thrown on its genuineness (Hist. Litt. de la France, iii. 111). Cave (Script. Eccl. i. 574) wrongly identifies this Faustus with Faustus Cassinensis, who lived half a century later. [L. D.]

FAUSTUS (31), CASSINENSIS, an Italian confided in childhood by his parent to St. Benedict to be brought up in the monastery of Monte Cassino; A.D. 543 he was sent by the saint to take part in the foundation of the monastery of Glanfeuil in Anjou, the first Benedictine establishment in France, of which St. Maur was the abbat. After a sojourn there of forty-six years, Faustus returned to Italy, and took up his residence in the Lateran monastery, whither the monks of Monte Cassino had retired after their monastery had been destroyed, and there he died. He is revered as a saint (AA. SS. Boll. Feb. ii. 839-841). He wrote a life of St. Maur after his return to Italy, which is printed by the Bollandists (AA. SS. Jan. i. 1039-1051), and contains as a preface a short autobiography. Some doubts have been cast on the genuineness of this work, but without good reason; Odo (Endes) abbat of Glanfeuil rewrote the work, altering only the style and not the facts, A.D. 863; there is no cause for supposing that he is the actual author of the work, and that Faustus is only a creature of his imagination. The work is dedicated to all monks of the East and West, and mentions the approval of pope Boniface, either the third or fourth of that name. Cave wrongly identifies this Faustus with Faustus of Agannum, who was over sixty years of age A.D. 523. (Ceillier, Aut. Sacr. xi. 610-12; Hist. Litt. de la France, iii. 496; Cave, Script. Eccl. i. 574.)

FAUSTUS (32), ST., abbat of St. Lucia, near Syracuse, cir. A.D. 607; succeeded by his disciple Zosimus, afterwards bishop of Syracuse. (Pirri, Sic. Sacr. i. 608; Cajetanus, Acta SS. Sicul. i. 223; Boll. Acta SS. 6 Sep. ii. 686.)

[C. H.]

FAUSTUS (33), a man of position, probably a decurion at Autun, who, together with his son Symphorian, is said to have entertained St. Andochus (Andochius) and his companions when they came preaching the Gospel during the reign of the emperor Marcus Aurelius, A.D. 161-180, or else during that of Caracalla, 211-217. According to the tradition he received baptism at the hands of the missionaries, and interred their bodies when they suffered martyrdom shortly afterwards, and composed a memorial of their work. But the existing Acta of St. Andochus and his companions are confessedly of a later date. (Hist. Litt. de la France, i. part i. 294; AA. SS. Boll. vi. Sept. 663-677.) [L. D.]

FAUSTUS (34), a Manichaean doctor who visited Carthage A.D. 383. He was an African by birth, a native of Milevis, and of humble origin, but a man of some attainments, great dialectic ability, and considerable eloquence. Augustine, who had then been a Manichaean some nine years, had long wished to see him, and on his arrival he at once placed himself under his instruction. The only effect which he produced upon his gifted pupil, however, was to "loosen the snare" in which he had been so long entangled, and so dissatisfy him with Manichaeism that he soon finally broke with it (Augustine.

Confess. v. 3, 3, 7; Contr. Faust. Manich. i; Retract. ii. 7.)

Faustus was still at Carthage A.D. 386, when he was indicted as a Manichaean before Messianus, the proconsul of Africa, but escaped the extreme penalty to which he was exposed, at the intercession of the Christians who had informed against him, and his punishment was commuted to exile in an island (Augustine. Contr. Faust. Manich. v. 8). Many years afterwards a book which Faustus had written was put into the hands of Augustine by some of his brethren, and at their request he wrote a reply to it, a copy of which he sent to Jerome A.D. 400 (Contr. Faust. n. s. 207 et seq.; Ep. lxxxii).

FAUSTUS (35), ANICIUS ACILIUS GLABRIO, prefect of Rome A.D. 425. To him was addressed one of the four edicts issued in the name of Valentinian III. at Aquileia, immediately after the cruel murder of John, the successor of Honorius, in that city (Cod. Theod. XVI. v. 62, July 17, A.D. 425; see also 63, Aug. 4, and 64, Aug. 6, and ii. 42, July 6; Philostorg. H. E. xii. 11, ed. Gothofred. and Diss. ib. p. 438). It commands all Manichaeans, heretics, and schismatics, to be driven from the city, and especially those who persistently withhold themselves from communion with the "venerable pope." Faustus was also consul A.D. 428 in conjunction with Theodosius II. (Corsini, Ser. Praef. 344.)

[T. W. D.]

FAUSTUS (36), a Roman senator, consul, A.D. 483, to whom, in conjunction with Symmachus, Avitus bishop of Vienne, addresses a letter (Ep. xxxi.) in the name of the Gallic hierarchy, upon the subject of the synod which deposed pope Symmachus. (Migne, Patrol. lxx. 247.)

[E. M. Y.]

FAUSTUS (37), master of the household to Theodoric, who, on taking the title of king after the capture of Ravenna, A.D. 493, despatched him as an ambassador to the emperor Anastasius. In the article GELASIUS an account is given of the part he took in that pope's communications with Constantinople.

FAVENTIUS (1), the lessee of the wood of Paratiana, a place twenty-five Roman miles from Rusiccada, in Numidia (Ant. Itin. 19, 3). Apprehending injury from the proprietor, perhaps on account of debt [FASCIUS], though we are not informed as to the true cause, he took refuge in the church precinct of Hippo Regius; but becoming in course of time more careless as to his movements, he was one day, while on his way from supper with a friend, apprehended by Florentinus, the official of the court of Africa, and detained in custody. For some days his place of confinement was unknown, and St. Augustine wrote to Cresconius, probably the tribune of the sea-coast, a Christian, to complain of violation of the privilege of sanctuary, to learn the place of his confinement, and to take steps for enabling him to avail himself of the law of Theodosius, by which he might be allowed to remain for thirty days under partial restraint with liberty to arrange his affairs. Cresconius sent some soldiers, but the prisoner had been removed; and the messenger sent a second time, when the place of confinement had been discovered.

ward, was forbidden by Florentinus to see him. Augustine then wrote a second letter, by a presbyter named Coelestinus, reminding Florentinus somewhat sharply of the state of the law, and of his own duty in the matter. But the pater had already removed his prisoner, and Augustine was afraid lest, as his opponent was a rich man, Faventius might suffer some personal injury. In order, therefore, to prevent any unfair dealing in the matter, he wrote to Fortunatus, bishop of Cirta, the chief town of Numidia and seat of government, to undertake the service of delivering and reading to Generosus, the consular of the province, a Christian, a letter requesting him to delay the hearing of the case, and to enquire whether the law mentioned above had been duly observed. The letter to Generosus is an admirable specimen of refined and respectful admonition as to his duty as a Christian judge, as is the one to Florentinus of grave and dignified, but courteous, rebuke for his neglect of the law. (Aug. Epp. 113, 114, 115, 116; Cod. Theodos. ix. 2, 6.)

[H. W. P.]

FAVENTIUS (F), bishop of Regium Lepidi (Reggio, in the Duchy of Modena), present at the council held under Eusebius of Milan, A.D. 451 (Lat. Mag. Ep. 97, 1082, Migne).

[C. G.]

FAVILA. [FAFILA.]

FAVORINUS, Carthaginian acolyte (Cyp. Ep. 34). [PHILUMENUS.]

[E. W. B.]

FEACHTNACH (FECTAC, Ann. Ult.), abbat of Fobhar, now Fore, co. Westmeath, died A.D. 731 (Four Mast. by O'Donovan, A.D. 776, i. 381).

[J. G.]

FEADHACH (FEDACH, Ann. Ult. FETTACH, FETHACH), son of Cormac, and abbat of Louth, Slane and Duleek, died A.D. 789 (Four Mast. by O'Donovan, A.D. 784, i. 391; Lanigan, Ch. Hist. l. iii. 203).

[J. G.]

FEAMMOR, virgin. [BLATH.]

FEAR— [FER—]

FEBATUS, bishop of Orleans in the 5th century, between St. Magnus and Gratianus (act. Chr. viii. 1413).

[C. H.]

FEDEDIOLUS (FIDIOLUS), fourth bishop of Embsa, succeeding St. Melaninus and followed by Victorinus, subscribed the 5th council of Orleans, A.D. 549. (Manr. ix. 136; Gall. Christ. xiv. 740.)

FEBRONIA, commemorated June 25, martyr under Diocletian, A.D. 304. She is said to have lived at Nisibis in Mesopotamia, where she was a member of a religious house and celebrated for her beauty, piety, and charity. Diocletian suspecting a young man of noble family named Lysimachus, of a secret inclination to Christianity, sent him to the distant East to prove his fidelity by uprooting the Christian faith. Because his obedience he entrusted the chief matter to the hands of the young and guardian, Selenus, an ambitious, cruel, and cruel man. Having arrived at the latter went vigorously to work while Selenus in secret endeavoured to temper the persecution. Selenus, having arrested

Febronia, was so struck with her beauty that he offered her the hand of Lysimachus in marriage, and, upon her refusal to accept it or to sacrifice, put her to death with the most cruel torments. Stung with remorse, Selenus committed suicide, while Lysimachus sought baptism and became a monk. Her Acts profess to be the work of an eyewitness, and member of the same monastery, named Thomais. They were originally written in Syriac or Greek. (Boll. AA. SS. Jun. v. 17-34; Symeon Metaphrastes; Menolog. Graec.; Cal. Byzant.)

[G. T. S.]

FEBRUARIUS, bishop of Lerida, signs the acts of the council held at Lerida in A.D. 548 (not 524 as Dahn and others have it, see Tejada y Ramiro, Colecc. de Can. ii. 146), attended by eight bishops and one proxy, and presided over by Sergius, metropolitan of Tarragona. (Florez, Esp. Sagr. xlv. 99, 170; Hefele, Conciliengeschichte, ii. 683; Aguirre-Catalani, iii. 171.)

[M. A. W.]

FECHIN, FEICHIN, FEIGHIN, ST. Besides the following there are other Feichins or Fechins commemorated in the Irish Calendars, at Feb. 22, Aug. 2, and Dec. 28.

(1) Fechin, abbat of Fobhar or Fore, was a zealous labourer for Christ in the west of Connaught in the seventh century, and his name is still remembered in connexion with his religious foundations. Only two ancient Lives seem to be extant. (Colgan, Acta SS. 130-39.) Bp. Challoner (Brit. Sanct. pt. i. 68-70) and Bp. Forbes (Kal. Scott. Saints, 456-58) have given memoirs of the saint, but the latest and fullest is by O'Hanlon (Irish Saints, i. 356-82). His name is attached to wells and churches in many localities of Ireland. In none of the Lives is there any record of his visiting Scotland, yet there is Ecclesfechan or Ecclesfechan in Dumfriesshire, and under the latinized form of Vigeanus his dedication is found at St. Vigeanus beside Arbroath. His being called Mo-ecca or Eccanus by St. Aengus and in the Cal. Cassel. seems to be based on a mistake, though Colgan (Acta SS. 140 n. 2) accepts it as a fact.

(2) St. Fechin, one of the priests of the third class of Irish saints, belonged to the same noble race as St. Brigida. He is said to have been born at Billy, in the barony of Leyny and county of Sligo. So soon as he was of age for education, he was placed under the charge of St. Nathi (Aug. 9) of Achonry in the same barony of Leyny, but whether he entered the priesthood under him or not is uncertain. After a time he left his own country for greater retirement, and built his monastery at Fobhar, or Fore, now St. Feighin's, in the barony of Fore and county of Westmeath. (For the remains at Fore, see Petrie, Round Towers of Ireland, 174-5, 453; O'Hanlon, Irish Saints, i. 365 sq.) But besides the monastery of Fobhar, where three hundred monks were under him "secundum regulam a sanctis patribus institutam," other places are associated with his name, as the islands of Omey and Ardoilen in Galway, Cong near Lough Corrib, Bally-adare and Drumrat in Sligo. (On the localities see specially Lanigan, Eccl. Hist. Ir. iii. 46-50, and O'Hanlon, Lives of the Irish Saints, i. 360 sq.)

He died in the yellow plague, which proved fatal to so many saints in Ireland in A.D. 662.

FECHNO (FETCHUO, FETHUO, FETNO, FIACHNA, FIECHNO), one of St. Columba's companions in the first voyage to Iona, and the planting of the faith in the Hebrides of Scotland. He was son of Rodan, and brother of Rua. He devoted himself to preach the gospel among the Picts, bringing them back to the piety of the days of St. Ninian. Miracles were said to be wrought at his tomb. By the early Scotch historians his feast is Aug. 12, and the year of his death 580. Colgan evidently prefers July 23, A.D. 588, for the date of his death (Bp. Forbes, Kal. Scott. Saints, 336; Colgan, Acta SS. 588; Proc. Roy. Ir. Acad. vii. 372; Ussher, Eocl. Ant. c. 15, wks. vi. 237-39). He is invoked in the Litany of Dunkeld (Bp. Forbes, Kal. Scott. Saints, p. lx.).

[J. G.]

FEDHLIM (FEDELLA, FEDELMIA, FEDHELM, FEIDELMAL, FETHLIMIA), virgin, daughter of Ailill, king of Leinster (ob. 544). She was baptized, with her sister Mughain, by St. Patrick at a fountain near Naas. Both of them took the veil, became famous for virtue, and (it is said) for miraculous signs, and were commemorated on Dec. 9. (Mart. Donegal, by Todd and Reeves, 331; Tripart. Life of St. Patrick.)

[J. G.]

FEDHLIMIDH (FEIDLIMIDH, FELIM), a common name in the ecclesiastical annals of Ireland.

(1) Fedhlimidh, of Cill-mor Dithruib, who is commemorated on Aug. 9, is said to have been brother of Diarmaid (Jan. 10) of Inis-clothrann and others, and to have belonged to the race of the Hy-Fiachrach [DIARMAID (4)]. (Colgan, Acta SS. 52 n. ^o). In his Loca Patriciana, the Rev. J. F. Shearman shews his father to have been Cairrell, son of Laisre luind, descended from Niall of the Nine Hostages, and his mother to have been Deigha or Deidi, the daughter of Trian, son of Dubhtach mac Ui Lugair; he attributes the feasts of both Aug. 3 and 9 to him (Journ. Roy. Hist. and Archaeol. Assoc. 4 ser. iii. p. 24 Gen. Table, and p. 56). To Fedhlimidh is usually ascribed the foundation of the see of Kilmore, co. Cavan, yet there are no particulars of his life connecting him with either the place or its episcopate, and there is no account of any bishop being there prior to the fifteenth century. But as in the calendars he is placed at Cill-mor Dithruibh (Mart. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, 215), it is suggested by O'Donovan, and accepted by Reeves, that he in no sense belonged to Cavan, but lived at Kilmore, a parish in the barony of North Ballintober, co. Roscommon, which lies close to the Shannon, and is the "Cill-mor dithribh," where St. Columcille (June 9) founded his monastery of Kilmore. This St. Fedhlimidh must have flourished about the middle of the sixth century.

(2) Abbat of Kilmoona, co. Meath, appears in the Four Mast. at A.D. 809 as also anchoret and excellent scribe, but in the Ann. Ul. at A.D. 813 as not only these, but as the steward appointed by the archbishop of Armagh, as successor of St. Patrick, to collect St. Patrick's tribute in Bregia. The true date of his death is 814 (Four Mast. by O'Donovan, i. 421; O'Connor, Rer. Hib. Scrip. iv. 198).

(3) Finn, bishop of Armagh, succeeded David, son of Guaire, A.D. 551, and died A.D. 578. In the Irish annals he is called only abbat, but Ware (Irish Bishops, by Harris, 38) and Lanigan (Ch. Hist. Ir. ii. c. 10, § 13, c. 12, § 1) accept the account of the Psalter of Cashel (Colgan, Tr. Thawn. 293) and place him among the bishops of Armagh. His feast is Oct. 30 "Feidlimidh, of Domhnach" (Mart. Doneg.), or Dec. 20 (Stuart, Armagh, 92).

(4) Bishop of Clones or Clogher, placed by Ware (Irish Bishops) third after Tigernach (A.D. 550) in the sixth century (Lanigan, Ch. Hist. Ir. ii. 10, 12).

(5) Abbat of Iona. [FAILBHE (4).] [J. G.]

FEDOLIUS, an unknown personage, addressed by St. Columban, abbat of Luxeuil, in a poem composed of monometer verses. The concluding lines (v. 160-165), which are hexameters, indicate that it was the work of his extreme old age. (Migne, Patrol. lxxx. p. 291.)

[E. M. Y.]

FEDOLUS, FEDOLIUS, thirty-ninth bishop of Paris, succeeding Merseidus and followed by Ragnecaptus, or Radbertus, about the middle of the 8th century. (Gall. Christ. vii. 29.)

[S. A. B.]

FEGADIUS, bishop of Agen. [FOEGADIUS.]

FELANUS, bishop. [FILLAN.]

FELARTUS, FELERTUS. [FULARTACH.]

FELERANDUS, bishop of Luni, near Sarzana (to which place the see was transferred in the 12th century) in 769. For a legend of events during his time see Cappelletti (Le Chiese d'Italia, xiii. 433).

[A. H. D. A.]

FELGELD, an anchoret at Farne, who was cured of a swelling in the face by a piece of leather which Ethelwald, the successor of St. Cuthbert, had nailed up in the cell at Farne. (V. S. Cuthb. cc. 44, 46; Smith's Bede, pp. 252, 253, 290, 291.)

[8.]

FELICIA, a lady devoted to virginity, whose mind was disturbed by the misconduct of a bishop, probably Antonius of Fussala, but of this there is no evidence beyond the fact that he is mentioned in the next letter. She was even disposed to join the Donatist party; but Augustine wrote to pacify and comfort her, shewing that the Donatist theory of the visible church is a fallacious one, for that in it the evil must ever be mingled with the good (Aug. Ep. 208).

[H. W. P.]

FELICIANA, one of the band of noble Roman ladies who gathered round St. Jerome when at Rome, A.D. 383-5. She is saluted by him in a letter to Paula (xxx. 14, ed. Vall.) as "vera anis et spiritus virginitate felicem." She is possibly the same as FELICITAS (4). [W. H. F.]

FELICIANUS (1) I., fourth in the list of the bishops of Foligno, his native town. His predecessor is anonymous, following Britius; his successor, also anonymous, is followed by Felicianus II. According to the Roman Martyrology he was consecrated to the see of Foligno by Victor bishop of Rome, and in extreme old age was martyred in the Decian persecution. The period assigned to his episcopate is from A.D. 203 to 254, and his commemoration day is Jan. 24. In the time of Otho the Great numerous relics of the saints were brought out of Italy, and Theodoric bishop of Metz, attending that emperor in his expedition beyond the Alps, was one of the most zealous collectors of such treasures, for the enrichment of his monastery of St. Vincentius at Metz. Spegbert names Felicianus among those whose remains were thus transported. The Bollandists give the Acta in three recensions. (Sigebert. an. 970; Patr. Lat. clx. 193; Baron. Annal. ann. 203, ii. 254, xxix.; Boll. Acta SS. Jan. ii. 581; Ughel. Ital. Sac. i. 684.) [C. H.]

FELICIANUS (2) II., 6th in the list of bishops of Foligno, following the anonymous successor of Felix I., and preceding Paulus. His election is stated to have been confirmed by Marcellinus bishop of Rome, A.D. 296. He is thought to be the Felicianus mentioned without a see among the 300 bishops of the council of Suessa, A.D. 303. (Mansi, i. 1253; Ughel. Ital. Sac. i. 685.) [C. H.]

FELICIANUS (3), Donatist bishop of Bitta, or Vittia, in proconsular Africa, present at the Carthaginian conference, A.D. 411. (Mon. Vet. Don. p. 459, ed. Oberthür.) [H. W. P.]

FELICIANUS (4), Donatist bishop of Musti, Numita, or Mustita, a town of which there is some doubt whether it was in Numidia, or in proconsular Africa. The Notitia Africae places it at the former, the province in which no doubt the Donatist party was strongest (Aug. Enarr. in Ps. 21, 26; de Unit. Eccl. 19, 51); but (1) Musti of the Provincia (Abd-er-Rabbi) was a well-known place, at which Roman remains still exist (Shaw, p. 95). (2) Bishops from other towns in the Provincia are mentioned as well as Felicianus, as being present at the council of Bagaia, 44 from Membresa and Assuris. (3) The civil proceedings arising out of that council were carried on before the proconsul, and not, as it seems, in Numidia. In order to reconcile the difficulty, several writers, as Noris, Tillemont, Morcelli, and Gams, have supposed another Musti to have existed in Numidia, but of this there is no authentic trace. (Ant. Itin. 48, 49; Aug. c. Cresc. iv. 5; c. Gaudent. ii. 7, 7; Enarr. in Ps. 57, vol. iv. p. 685.)

However this may be, there is no doubt that the name of Felicianus of Musti is one of the most prominent in the history of Donatism, and that it almost always occurs in connexion with that of Praetextatus of Assuris, the place mentioned above. Probably, but the expression of St. Augustine is not quite definite, he assisted at the consecration of Primian, A.D. 391. Two years later he was one of the 100 Donatist bishops assembled at Cabarusanis who condemned him, and of the twelve who joined in ordaining Maximian in his place, A.D. 393 (Aug. c. Parm. 1, 4, 8; c. Cresc. iii. 13, 16; c. Petil. 1, 12; En. in Ps. 38, 20; Dioc. i. 887). At the council of Bagaia, April 24, A.D. 394, Primian presided, and was upheld in his position by the 310 bishops there assembled. None of the Maximianists attended, but they were all condemned by the council, especially those who assisted at the ordination of Maximian, of whom Felicianus was undoubtedly one. The sin of all who took any part in this action was denounced in the strongest terms possible, but to all, excepting the twelve ordainers, a respite was granted until Dec. 25 of the same year (Aug. c. Cresc. iii. 19, 22; 54, 60; 56, 62; iv. 4, 5; c. Gaud. ii. 7, 7; Ep. 51; de Gestis cum Emer. 9). In March of the year following (A.D. 395) the Primianist party commenced proceedings in the civil courts for the purpose of ejecting the Maximianist bishops from their sees, on ground supplied, as it would appear, by the imperial edicts issued to protect orthodox bishops and churches, such as the Primianists represented themselves exclusively to constitute (Cod. Theodos. xvi. 24 and 26). They were carried on first before the proconsul Herodes, at the suit ostensibly of Peregrinus, a presbyter, and the elders of the people of Musti, represented by an advocate named Titianus; and they lasted during three or four proconsulates until that of Theodorus, but in what year he filled the office is uncertain. One of the proconsuls during the time was Serenus, who pronounced a decree against Salvius of Membresa (see above), but similar doubt exists as to his date (Aug. c. Cresc. iii. 53, 59; 56, 62; iv. 3, 3; 48, 58; 49, 59; de Gest. cum Emer. 9). Certain it is that the proceedings were carried on more or less continuously till A.D. 398, but without producing the desired effect, though Felicianus was attacked, not only before the proconsul, but before the municipal authorities of Musti (Aug. c. Cresc. iv. 4; Ep. 57). During this time the condemned Maximianist bishops suffered annoyance, and even persecution, in which Salvius of Membresa was cruelly put to death. This persecution was chiefly instigated by Optatus, bishop of Thamugada, surnamed the Gildonian, from the support which he received from Gildo the tyrant, as he may be called, of Africa at that time. These severities succeeded, at length, in terrifying the people of Musti and Assuris into inviting, or rather demanding, that their bishops, of whom Praetextatus had died, and been succeeded by Rogatus, should return to the communion of Primianus (Aug. c. Cresc. iii. 60, 66; iv. 25, 32; Mor. Vet. Don. p. 402, ed. Oberthür). They returned unconditionally, without any act of humiliation, and all their acts during the time of separation were accepted without question by the Donatist communion. It is on this point that Augustine is never weary of insisting in his arguments against the Donatists: "If," says he, "Felicianus and Praetextatus were rightly expelled, how could they be restored rightly on these terms? if wrongly, how could the acts of the Donatists towards them be justified? They baptized many persons during their time of separation, yet none of these underwent re-baptism. The baptisms performed by Maximianists were not condemned; yet if the council of Bagaia was right, Felicianus and Praetextatus, and the rest condemned by its 310 bishops, were little less than murderers, and in returning, ought to have been treated as penitents, not readmitted on equal terms." (Aug. c. Parm. i. 4, 5; ii. 3, 7, 15, 34; de Bapt. i. 1, 2; c. Pet. ii. 7, 16; 52, 120; c. Cresc. iii. 39, 43; iv. 10, 13; Post. Coll. 4, 4; Epp. 76, 108.)

After this restoration, Felicianus appears as the Donatist bishop of Musti at the great Enquiry, A.D. 411, but took no prominent part in its proceedings (Mon. Vet. Don. p. 401, ed. Oberthür).

[H. W. P.]

FELICIANUS (5), the name of five bishops present at the Carthaginian conference of A.D. 411, namely, the bishop of—

Aquae Novae, probably in Numidia. (Mon. Vet. Don. p. 446, ed. Oberthür.)

Cufruta, in Byzacene; a former bishop had been condemned by the Donatists, and not received by the Catholics, and no Donatist appointed. (M. V. D. p. 409; Tillemont, 77, vol. vi. p. 189.)

Ferada Minor, in Byzacene. (M. V. D. p. 418.)

Trisipa, in proconsular Africa. Donatist. (M. V. D. p. 406.)

Utina, in proconsular Africa. Donatist. (M. V. D. p. 440.)

[H. W. P.]

FELICIANUS (6), the name of three Catholic bishops banished by Hunneric after the convention at Carthage in 484 (Victor. Vit. Notit. 56–58 in Migne, Pat. Lat. lviii.), namely of—

Girutarasi, in the province of Numidia. (Morcelli, Africa Christ. i. 170.)

Ida, in the province of Mauretania Caesariensis; along with Subitanus, who was bishop of the same see, he went to the convention; as he is placed lower in the list than Subitanus, he is supposed to have been a Donatist who joined the Catholics, and would have retained his rank and see according to the rule of the African church. (A. C. i. 190.)

Meta, in the province of Numidia. (A. C. i. 225.)

FELICIANUS (7), the name of a person either real or imaginary, but of whom, if real, nothing is known, though he is called by Alcuin an Arian bishop. He is represented as one of the interlocutors in a dialogue carried on with St. Augustine on the nature of the Trinity. The treatise which contains this is entitled Contra Felicianum Arianum de Unitate Trinitatis, and was formerly ascribed to Augustine. It is quoted under his name by Alcuin, Bede, and Peter Lombard. The first who doubted its genuineness was Erasmus, and it was afterwards assigned, chiefly on internal grounds, by the Jesuit father, P. F. Chifflet, to Vigilius bishop of Tapsa or Tapsis in Byzacene, c. 434, and this judgment has been followed by the later editors of St. Augustine's works. The arguments of the dialogue are confessedly founded less on scriptural grounds than on such as belong to the nature of the case, and the whole terminates somewhat abruptly. (Aug. Opp. vol. viii. app. pp. 1158–1172; Cave, Hist. Lit. i. p. 458; Tillemont, 342, vol. xiii. p. 914.)

[H. W. P.]

FELICIANUS (8), bishop of Ruspe in North Africa, elected on the day of the death of Fulgentius, A.D. 533 (Vit. Fulg. cap. 66), and consecrated in the following year, A.D. 534.

While a presbyter he shared the exile of Fulgentius in Sardinia (Vit. Fulg. prol. sec. 2). As bishop he took part in the council of Carthage under Reparatus in 534. (Mansi, viii. 841.) To him was addressed the Vita Fulgentii, prefixed to the works of Fulgentius. (Vit. Fulg. in Pat. Lat. lrv. 117; also in Roll. Acta SS. Jan. i. 32; Morcelli, Afr. Chr. i. 266.)

[H. R. R.]

FELICIANUS (9), bishop of Vicenza, c. A.D. 809. (Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Ital. x. 822.)

[R. S. G.]

FELICIANUS (10), commemorated Nov. 19; martyr at Vienne, A.D. 163, with Severinus and Exuperius. Their relics were translated to the church of St. Romanus in Vienne some time about the year 800. (Martyr. Usuardi, Adon., Chron. Adonis.)

[G. T. S.]

FELICIANUS (11), commemorated Jan. 30; martyr in Africa with Pellianus and others (Martyr. Roman., Hieron.); probably at Alexandria or Carthage in the beginning of the Decian persecution, when the entire population was summoned man by man to sacrifice, and hundreds were put to death. See letter of Dionysius bishop of Alexandria, describing this process in Eusebius (H. E. vi. 41)

[G. T. S.]

FELICIANUS (12), commemorated June 9; martyr with Primus at Nomentum, now Mentana, an ancient city of Latium, fourteen miles and a half from Rome. Their acts are given in three different versions in Surius. Ceillier, however, does not regard them as authentic. The story, which is surrounded with many difficulties, is briefly thus:—The emperors Diocletian and Maximian being at Rome, the martyrs, who were Roman citizens, were brought before them, at the instigation of the heathen priests, who declared that the gods would neither give oracles nor blessings till they were compelled to sacrifice. The emperors ordered them to be led to the altar, and there to sacrifice to Jupiter and Hercules. Upon their refusal, they were committed to the charge of Promotus, governor of Nomentum, with strict orders to compel them to obedience, or else to punish them with the severest tortures, which he forthwith executed. Wearied out with their obstinacy, Promotus made a final effort, called them before his tribunal, and endeavoured to persuade them to obedience. Whereupon Felicianus refused, saying: "I am now eighty years old, and have known the truth for thirty years, during which I have chosen the service of my Creator the eternal God, thinking nothing of the pleasures of the world." Upon this they were beheaded, and their bodies cast to the dogs; but neither birds nor beasts would touch them. The Christians recovered the bodies, and buried them in a sand-pit at the arch on the Via Nomentana, where a church was afterwards built. (Martyr. Usuardi, Bedae, Hieron., Adonis; Surius, Hist. SS. June 9.)

[G. T. S.]

FELICIANUS (13), commemorated July 21. A soldier and martyr under Maximian at Marseilles. [FABIUS VICTOR.] (Martyr. Adonis, Usuardi, Hieron.)

[G. T. S.]

FELICIANUS (14), commemorated Oct. 29; martyr in Lucania with Hyacinthus, Quintus, and Lucius (Martyr. Usuard.).

[G. T. S.]

FELICIANUS (15), commemorated Feb. 2, martyr at Rome with Fortunatus, Firmus, Candidus, and seven others. (Martyr. Hieron., Usuard.) [G. T. S.]

FELICIANUS (16) (Cyp. Ep. 59. xi. xii.), an envoy of Rome sent from Cornelius to Cyprian, A.D. 252 and the bearer of intelligence from the latter to Cornelius of the movements of the party of Felicissimus; whose delay prevented Cornelius from being forewarned, and disconcerted him much. [E. W. B.]

FELICIANUS (17), to whom Dionysius of Carthage dedicated his translation of the epistle of St. Proclus of Constantinople to the Armenians. Dionysius addresses him as "pastor," and then styles him "venerable," adding that it is at his instance and for his ears that he translates this epistle into Latin. We must infer him, therefore, to have been a Latin ecclesiastic of some distinction, but whether bishop or priest is uncertain, as Dionysius styles the "presbyter Eugubius," to whom he dedicates another of his translations, the "venerable." We meet with no subscriber of this name to the various councils contemporary with Dionysius. [E. S. Ff.]

FELICISSIMUS (1), deacon of Carthage, whom Novatus associated with himself in the management of a district called Mons. (Cyp. Ep. 41.) He was the chief agent (signifer seditionis, Ep. 59) of the anti-Cyprianic party, which combined the five presbyters originally opposed to Cyprian's election, with the later-formed party for the easy readmission of the lapsed. (Ep. 43, 45.) The charge of peculation and debauchery (Cyp. Ep. 41, 59) is weakened by its reappearance in the case of every deacon in opposition. (e. g. IUSTRATUS.) But Cyprian (Ep. 52) more definitely states that he had been, when the persecution arose, on the point of being tried before the presbytery on charges of homicidal cruelty to his father and wife. Like other African and Spanish deacons (Neander, vol. i. p. 324, ed. Ebn) he acquired influence through his administration of church property, and was able to threaten with excommunication any one who accepted relief or office from Cyprian's commissaries [CALDONIUS], who doubtless seemed to interfere with his functions. He was then excommunicated by them (Ep. 42) with Cyprian's consent, and any future adherents were warned that their excommunication would be perpetual. (Ep. 43.) Still they were heard again by the First Council, A.D. 251 (Ep. 45. v.), and continued.

The mild resolution of the Council of A.D. 252, causing the readmission of the lapsed on their earnest repentance [CYPRIANUS, p. 746 a], destroyed his locus standi. The party then associated with that of PRIVATUS, who consecrated Fortunatus anti-bishop; and Felicissimus sent from Rome to conciliate or to intimidate Cornelius into a recognition of him. (Ep. 59.) Failing here, the party melted quietly away into the church.

Obs. 1. On the Mons, see CYPRIANUS, Vol. I. p. 743. Obs. 2. The expression that Novatus "ecclesiam constituit Felicissimum" cannot fairly be pressed into "Novatus ordained him," although it might mean that he procured his ordination, as we read similarly that he "fecit Episcopum Novatianum." But as Cyprian (Ep. 41) is already familiar with him, and speaks of his "veteres fraudes, de quibus jam multa cognoveram," it more probably means that Novatus appointed him deacon of his own presbyteral district. Obs. 3. Rettberg (in accordance with his general theories), treats the faction of Felicissimus as anti-episcopal, i.e. presbyterian in principle; but there is no foundation for the idea, [see CYPRIANUS, p. 743.] [E. W. B.]

FELICISSIMUS (2), a layman, "quietus semper et sobrius," one of the earliest confessors at Carthage in the Decian persecution. (Cyp. Ep. vi.) See Pearson (Ann. Cyp. A.D. 250, vii.) as to his being made into a martyr by Bede and other Roman martyrologists. [E. W. B.]

FELICISSIMUS (3), presbyter, described at condemnation of Priscillian, 386, at Treves, as a recent convert. He was beheaded (Sulp. Sev. ii. 51). [M. B. C.]

FELICISSIMUS (4), Donatist bishop of Obba, a town in Mauretania Tingitana; present at Carth. Conf. A.D. 417. (Mon. Vet. Don. p. 443, ed. Oberthür.) [H. W. P.]

FELICISSIMUS (5), bishop of the two sees of Sedela and Utina, in the province of proconsular Africa; present at the synod of Carthage held under bishop Boniface, A.D. 525. (Mercelli, Africa Christ. i. 272; Mansi, viii. 648.) [L. D.]

FELICISSIMUS (6), a Monophysite of the 6th century, who in conjunction with Julian of Halicarnassus, and Gaius of Alexandria, originated the sect known as Julianists and also as Gaianites (Sophron. Ep. Synod. Act. Co. Constantinop. A.D. 680, Mansi, xi. 461). Severus of Antioch, another Monophysite, wrote a work against him, only some fragments of which are now extant (Mai, Script. Vet. Nov. Coll. vii. p. 8). [T. W. D.]

FELICISSIMUS (7), commemorated Aug. 6; martyr at Rome with Agapetus, both of whom were deacons in attendance upon pope Sixtus, who suffered under Valerian in virtue of an edict which appeared A.D. 258. This edict is extant in Cyprian, Ep. 92, ad Successum. After various tortures they were all beheaded. The deacons were buried in the cemetery of Praetextatus. (Martyr. Usuard., Adonis, Hieron., Bedae; Surius Vitae SS., Acta S. Laurentii, Aug. 16; Neander, Hist. i. 193, ed. Bohm; Baron. A. E. ann. 261. iv.) [G. T. S.]

FELICISSIMUS (8), commemorated July 2; martyr in Campania under Diocletian, with Aristo and others. In the Acts of St. Sebastian (Surius, vol. i. Jan. 20) there is an account of their conversion by the efforts of St. Sebastian and St. Polycarp. These Acts are evidently corrupt, as they give the title of Episcopus episcoporum to the bishop of Rome. Ceillier, however, considers them to have been written before the end of the 4th century, as they speak of gladiatorial shows as still existing, which were abolished in or about A.D. 403. (Mart. Usuard., Adonis; Till. Mém. iv. 515.) [G. T. S.]

FELICISSIMUS (9), commemorated May 26; martyr, A.D. 303, under Diocletian, with Helias-

elius and Paulinus at Tudertum (Martyr. Usuard., Adon.; Ferrarius, Catal. SS. Italiae). [G. T. S.]

FELICISSIMUS (10), Nov. 24, martyr at Perugia, according to Usuardus; at Rome according to Jerome (Martyr. Hieron., Usuard.).

[G. T. S.]

FELICISSIMUS (11), commemorated March 14; martyr at Nicomedia with Dativus, Frontinus, Jocundus (Martyr. Hieron., Notker.).

[G. T. S.]

FELICITAS (1), commemorated on Nov. 23; martyr at Rome with her seven sons, under Antoninus Pius, Publius being prefect of the city, about A.D. 150. The story of the martyrdom of Felicitas and her sons is fixed by their Acts under Antoninus Pius, and at his personal command. Now it is almost certain that there was no authorized persecution in his reign [ANTONINUS PIUS]. Public calamities, a famine, an inundation of the Tiber, earthquakes in Asia Minor and in Rhodes, ravaging fires at Rome, Antioch, and Carthage, stirred up the mob to seek for the favour of the gods by the shedding of Christian blood (Julii Capitolini Vita Antonini Pii, c. 9). Doubtless, in some such way, Felicitas and her children suffered without any participation on the emperor's part. In her Acts Publius the prefect is represented as commanded by Antoninus to compel her to sacrifice, in which he fails, though he appeals to her maternal affection as well as to her fears. He then calls upon each one of her seven sons, Januarius, Felix, Philippus, Sylvanus, Alexander, Vitalis, Martialis, and with a similar want of success, the mother, exhorting them thus, "Behold, my sons, heaven, and look upwards, whence you expect Christ with His saints." The prefect, having tortured some of them, reported the whole matter to the emperor, at whose command they were beheaded. Their martyrdom is commemorated by Gregory the Great, in Hom. 3 super Evang., where, preaching in a church dedicated to her, he lauds Felicitas as "Plus quam martyr quae septem pignoribus ad regnum praemissis, toties ante se mortua est. Ad poenas prima venit sed pervenit octava." (Mart. Vet. Rom., Hieron., Bedae, Adonis, Usuardi.)

[G. T. S.]

FELICITAS (3), March 7; martyr at Carthage with Perpetua, Revocatus, Saturninus, and Secundinus. They were all catechumens, and baptized after their arrest. Felicitas and her companions having been interrogated by Hilarianus, the proconsul, and remaining steadfast in their profession, were condemned to be thrown to the beasts on the anniversary of the young Geta's accession. Felicitas, being in the eighth month of her pregnancy, and the law not permitting women in her condition to be executed, was greatly distressed at the delay of her martyrdom. Prayer was therefore made that God might grant her an earlier delivery, and this accordingly took place a few days after. While the pangs of labour were upon her the jailer, hearing her utter some natural exclamations of pain, said, "If thy present sufferings are so great, what wilt thou do when thou art thrown to the wild beasts? This thou didst not consider when thou refusedst to sacrifice." Whereupon she answered, "What I now suffer I suffer myself, but then there will be another who will suffer for me because I also shall suffer for Him." They were all put to death together in A.D. 202 or 203, during the reign of Severus, whose latter years were marked by a very rigorous persecution of the church (Ael. Spart. Secer. Imp. sec. 27 in Hist. August. Scriptt.). Few martyrdoms are better attested than this one. The ancient Roman calendar, published by Bucherius, and dating from about the year 360, mentions only three African martyrs, viz. Felicitas, Perpetua, and Cyprian, and fixes the day of their death as March 7. Their names are embodied in the canon of the Roman Mass, which mentions none but really primitive martyrs. Their martyrdom is mentioned by Tertullian in his book, De Anima, lv., and is treated at length in three sermons, 280, 281, and 282, by St. Augustine, while their burial at Carthage, in the Basilica Major, is asserted by Victor Vitensis, Lib. i. de Persecut. Vandal. Their Acts were for a long time missing, and after a long search were found by Lucas Holstenius among the MSS. in the convent library at Monte Cassino. They profess in part to have been written by Perpetua. Some think from their style that they were edited and finished by Tertullian after he adopted Montanist views. (Martyr. Vet. Rom., Hieron., Bedae, Adonis, Usuardi; Ruinart, Acta Sincera; Prosper in Chronico Labbeano; Bedae, de Sex Actat.; Neander, vol. i. 170; vol. ii. 209-212, ed. Bohm.) [G. T. S.]

FELICITAS (3); martyr with Augustinus at Capua; according to some, during the persecution which raged during the brief reign of Decius, about A.D. 250. Valerian, afterwards emperor, and a persecutor as well, occupied at that time the post of public censor, restored by a vote of the senate, Oct. 27, A.D. 251. He may have been the immediate agent in the persecution. According to others (Tillem. iv. 174) the martyrdom happened in Valerian's persecution, A.D. 257. St. Cyprian is said to have encouraged them to perseverance in an epistle which is now lost. (Lactantius, de Mort. Persecut. cap. 4, 5 Ceillier, ii. 341.) [G. T. S.]

FELICITAS (4), a Roman lady, eminent for her sanctity, a friend of St. Jerome, who bade her adieu through Asella in the letter (45, ed Vall.) written from Portus, when he was leaving Italy for the last time for Palestine, A.D. 385 [FELICIANA.] [W. H. F.]

FELICITAS (5), a lady, probably the head of a religious house, to whom St. Augustine wrote to compose some differences which had arisen in the society, and to exhort the inmates to maintain peace, rather than encourage a spirit of contention (Aug. Ep. 210). [H. W. P.]

FELICULA (1), commem. June 5; martyr at Rome, on the Via Ardeatina, with Felicitas, and twenty-one others. There seems a confusion between this martyr and the following in the Martyrologies (Mart. Hieron., Notkeri).

[G. T. S.]

FELICULA (2), commem. June 13; virgin and martyr at Rome, under Domitian. A prefect named Flaccus wished to marry her after the death of his first wife Petronilla. He gave her a choice either to marry him or to sacrifice to legda. Upon her refusal to comply with his wish he delivered her to his deputy, who racked and starved her, and flung her body into the public sewer, whence it was rescued by a priest named Nicomedes, and buried at the seventh milestone on the Via Ardeatina (Martyr. Bedae, Adonis, Usuardi, Wandalberti). [G. T. S.]

FELICULA (3), commem. Feb. 14; virgin and martyr at Rome, with Vitalis and Zeno (Martyr. Adonis, Usuardi, Wandalberti). [G. T. S.]

FELIM. [FEDLINIDH.]

FELINUS, martyr at Perugia in the Decian persecution, according to the tabulae ecclesiasticae referred to by Baronius. (Baron. A. E. ann. 54, xix.) [C. H.]

FELIX (1) L, bishop of Rome, probably from January 5, A.D. 269, to Dec. 30, A.D. 274, in the reigns of the emperors Claudius and Aurelian. These are the dates according to our oldest and most trustworthy authority. For the Liberian Catalogue (354) names the consuls of the years there mentioned as those contemporary with his mission and death, and gives 5 years, 11 months, and 25 days as the duration of his episcopate; while the Liberian Deposito Episcoporum gives the 30th of December as the date of his death. Later authorities, including the Liber Pontificalis, differ as to the date and duration of his episcopate. But there seems to be no good reason for doubting the correctness of the earliest record. He appears in the Roman Calendar as saint and martyr, his day being the 30th of May. His martyrdom is asserted, not only in the later editions of the Liber Pontificalis, but also in the early recension of 530, known as the Liberian Catalogue, where we read, "Martyrio coronatus fuit temporibus Claudii et Aureliani." It is attested also in the Acts of the Council of Ephesus (431), and by Cyril of Alexandria and Vincent of Lerins, in the same century. But, notwithstanding this testimony, the fact of his martyrdom seems inconsistent with the silence on the subject of the Liberian Catalogue in the previous century, and with his name appearing in the Deposito Episcoporum, not the Deposito Martyrum, of the same date. There is also this further argument against his martyrdom, that, if Lactantius is to be believed, the intended persecution under Aurelian, to which he is said to have fallen a victim, never in fact took place. In Lactantius states (H. E. vii. 30, Chron. ad an. 2392, Ab.) that the emperor died when on the point of signing the edict of persecution, and that consequently it never took effect. It is true that Lactantius (de Morte Persecut. c. 6) gives a somewhat different account, representing the edict as having been signed, but its effects stopped by the death of the emperor before it reached the distant provinces. This account leaves room for the operation of the edict for a time in Rome, and for the martyrdom of Felix under it. Still, the apocryphal character of other legends about martyrs under the supposed Aurelian persecution (appearing in the Acta Sanctorum and elsewhere) would throw suspicion on the story of the martyrdom of Felix, even if the absence of all mention of it in the Liberian Catalogue did not invalidate its probability.

It has been supposed that the story may have arisen from a substitution of the name of Felix I. for that of Felix II., the antipope to Liberius in the following century, for whom his followers claimed the honour of martyrdom. This supposition is supported by the fact that the pontifical annals which make Felix I. a martyr assign to him also the same place of burial as is assigned to Felix II., viz. his own cemetery at the second milestone on the Aurelian Way; whereas it is distinctly stated in the Liberian Catalogue that he was buried, like other popes of the period, in the cemetery of Callistus. (See Lipsius, Chron. der röm. Bischöfe, p. 231 et seq.) Another probable supposition is that the stories of the martyrdom of both these popes arose from a confusion of them with an African martyr of the same name, the translation of whose remains to Rome was celebrated on the same day as is devoted to Felix II. in the Roman Calendar (Döllinger, Fables of Popes of the Middle Ages).

Nothing is known with any certainty of the acts of Felix I., except the part he took in the deposition of Paul of Samosata from the see of Antioch. A synod at Antioch (A.D. 290) having deposed this heretical bishop, and appointed Domnus in his place, announced these facts in letters addressed to Maximus and Dionysius, bishops of Alexandria and Rome, and to other Catholic bishops. Felix, who had in the meantime succeeded Dionysius, addressed a letter on the subject to Maximus and to the clergy of Antioch, fragments of which are preserved in the Apologeticus of Cyril of Alexandria, and in the Acts of the council of Ephesus, and which is also alluded to by Marius Mercator, and by Vincent of Lerins in his Commonitorium. Paul refusing to cede his place to Domnus, the case was laid before the Emperor Aurelian, present at Antioch in 272 or 273, after his victory over Zenobia. He decided in favour of whichever claimant to the see should be recognised by the bishops of Italy and of Rome. The consequence was the expulsion of Paul (Euseb. H. E. vii. 30).

It is stated in the Liber Pontificalis that Felix I. ordered the sacred mysteries to be celebrated over the graves of martyrs.

Three decretals, undoubtedly spurious, are assigned to him (Harduin, Concil.). One, to a bishop Paternus, has for its object the protection of the clergy from accusations for crimes, the controlling of the process in case of accusations being made, and the reserving of appeals to Rome. Another, purporting to be in reply to complaints received from a synod of Gallican bishops, relates to the accusation and trial of bishops before provincial synods, disallowing the entertainment of any charges against them by persons of suspected character, and protecting the accused from spoliation during the progress of any trial. It also orders masses in memory of martyrs. A third, to a bishop Beignus, is doctrinal, condemning the assertions that because no one has seen the Father at any time, the Son sees Him not, and that, because the Father is invisible and the Son visible, the Son is less than the Father. [J. B.]

FELIX (3) II. made bishop of Rome after the exile of Pope Liberius (A.D. 355). This Felix has obtained a place in the Roman Calendar as a saint and martyr, and in the Pontifical and in the Acts of St. Felix and St. Eusebius is represented as a legitimately elected and orthodox pope, persecuted by the emperor and the Arian faction. Contemporary and other ancient writers (Faustus and Marcellinus, Hilary, Athanasius, Jerome, Rufinus, Sozomen, and Theodoret) unanimously represent him, on the contrary, as an interloper into the see, placed there violently and irregularly by the emperor and the Arian party, and make no allusion to his martyrdom. The following is the account given by Marcellinus and Faustus, two contemporary Luciferian presbyters of Rome, who must have had good opportunity of knowing the truth. It occurs in the preface to their Libellus Proci addressed to the emperors Valentinian, Theodosius, and Arcadius during the pontificate of Damasus, who succeeded Liberius, and by whom the writers complain of being persecuted. Immediately on the banishment of Liberius all the clergy, including the archdeacon Felix, swore before the people that they would accept no other bishop during the life of the exiled pope. Notwithstanding this, the clergy afterwards ordained this same Felix, though the people were displeased and abstained from taking part. Damasus, pope after Liberius, was among his perjured supporters. After two years the emperor visited Rome, and, being solicited by the people for the return of Liberius, at length consented on condition of his complying with the imperial requirements, but with the intention of his ruling the church jointly with Felix. In the third year Liberius returned to Rome, when the people met him with joy. Felix was driven from the city, but after a little time, at the instigation of the clergy who had perjured themselves in his election, burst into it again, taking his position in the basilica of Julius beyond the Tiber. The whole multitude of the faithful, and the nobles, again expelled him with great ignominy. After eight years, during the consulship of Valentinianus and Valens (i.e. A.D. 365) on the 10th of the Calends of December (Nov. 22) Felix died, leaving Liberius without a rival as bishop of Rome till his own death on the 8th of the Calends of October (Sept. 24), A.D. 366. The other ancient writers of repute mentioned above confirm this account, supplying further details, and with no discrepancies such as to affect the main drift of the narrative. From their combined relations we learn that the election and consecration of Felix took place in the imperial palace, since the people debarred the Arians from their churches: that three of the emperor's eunuchs represented the people on the occasion, the consecrators being three heretical bishops, Epictetus of Centumellae, Acetius of Caesarea, and Basil of Ancyra; and that it was only the Arian section of the clergy, though apparently a large one, that supported Felix.

From Sozomen and Theodoret especially we obtain detailed accounts of the circumstance attending the emperor's visit to Rome, such as the deputation of ladies in their best array, who waited on him to request the recall of Liberius, and his conversation with them, the cries of the people in the amphitheatre on their learning that Liberius and Felix were to preside together, the summoning of Liberius to Sirmium previously to his return, and the signature to a semi-Arian confession obtained from him there before he was allowed to return. [See art. on LIBERIUS.] Sozomen's account seems to imply that Felix survived the return of Liberius but a short time, having in the mean time presided over the church as a rival bishop. From all the accounts together it appears that serious seditions, accompanied by bloodshed, ensued between the rival factions, Liberius being greatly beloved by the Roman populace both for his good character and for his former resistance to the emperor in the cause of religion. (Jerome, Chron. in ann. Abr. MROCCLX; Athanas. Hist. Arian. ad Monach. 75; Rufinus, H. E. lib. i. c. 22, etc.; Socrates, H. E. lib. ii. c. 27; Sozomen, H. E. lib. iv. c. 11, etc.; Theodoret, H. E. lib. ii. c. 13, etc.)

As has been already said, a totally different account of things is given in the Pontifical, and in the Acts of St. Felix and of St. Eusebius. In the life of Liberius contained in the Pontifical (Anastas. Bibliothec. in Liberius) we are told that, after his exile, the clergy of Rome, acting under his advice, ordained in his place Felix, a venerable man, described as a presbyter. Felix is said to have called a synod of forty-eight bishops, and therein excommunicated Ursacius and Valens, incorrectly described as Roman presbyters. Accordingly, after a few days, these two heretics requested the emperor to recall Liberius on the terms of himself and the Arians communicating together without the requirement of a second baptism. They were sent to Liberius, who consented to these terms. On his return, after an exile of two years (three according to Catal. Felic.) he occupied at first the cemetery of St. Agnes, with the emperor's sister Constantia, as hoping through her intervention to obtain the emperor's consent to his return into the city. She, however, being faithful to Christ, and suspecting some scheme, refused to intercede for him. In the meantime Constantius, after summoning Ursacius and Valens, with other Arians, did recall Liberius from the cemetery and caused him to enter Rome, at the same time expelling the Catholic Felix in a council of heretics. Immediately a persecution of the clergy ensued, many being martyred within the walls of churches. Felix retired to his own farm on the Via Portuensis, where he rested in peace on July 29.

The life of Felix, as related by Anastasius, is in many respects inconsistent with that of Liberius as above given. In it he is said to have been bishop of Rome for one year and two months only; to have denounced Constantius as a heretic, and as having been baptized a second time by Eusebius of Nicomedia; a confusion being here evident, significative of the late origin of the story, between Constantius and Constantine. In consequence of this denunciation he was crowned with martyrdom by order of the emperor, being beheaded secretly, with many others of the clergy and the faithful, "in civitate Corana" (Cacra?) "ad latus formae (fori?) Trajanæ" on the 3rd of the Ides of November, whence his body was taken in the night by certain clergy, including the presbyter Damasus, and buried on the 12th of the Calends of December in a basilica on the Via Aurelia at the second milestone from the city, which he had himself founded, and endowed with a field on the spot which he had bought. The Acts of St. Felix agree with his life in the pontifical, though with some differences as to dates. In the Acts of St. Eusebius it is stated that, when Liberius had been recalled from exile on the terms described in his life in the Pontifical, Eusebius, a Roman presbyter, began to denounce him as a heretic and a friend of Constantius. On many, in consequence of this denunciation, avoiding the communion of Liberius, the churches were seized by him, Felix was ejected, and Liberius restored. Then follows a detailed account of the seizure of Eusebius, his examination by the emperor, assisted by Liberius, his imprisonment and martyrdom.

Of the two accounts of these transactions given on the one hand by Marcellinus and Faustus, supported by such a number of reputable writers, and on the other by the Pontifical and the Acts of Martyrs, the former is undoubtedly to be preferred. The latter authorities are in many cases altogether trustworthy, and in this instance are inconsistent with each other, shewing signs also of their compilation at a later time than those of the events referred to by evident historical inaccuracies viz. the incorrect designation of Ursacius, and Valens, and the confusion between Constantius and Constantine. They may be considered due to a desire to clear the reputation of Felix, his party having become dominant on the elevation of Damasus, his supporter, to the papacy after the contentions that ensued on the death of Liberius. [See DAMASUS.] It may be, however, as is maintained by Lipsius in his Chronologie der römischen Bischöfe, that they contain elements of truth, as representing the genuine traditions of the party of Felix, though coloured and distorted. This writer endeavours to reconcile in some degree the conflicting accounts. He even supposes that the alleged martyrdom of Felix may have had a foundation in fact; that, strengthened through the action of Eusebius, and supported by the majority of the clergy, who were now alienated from Liberius on account of his compliance with heresy, he had maintained his position as a rival bishop in the basilica on his own property alluded to, that conflict had ensued between the two parties, in one of which Felix might have been killed, and hence come to be regarded as a martyr. (See the same writer, as above cited, for the probable chronology of the events.) Dr. Döllinger (Papstthronik des Mittelalters) regards the whole of the stories in the pontifical and the Acts (so far as they contradict the historical narrations) as fabulous, and considers that of the martyrdom of Felix to be sufficiently disproved by the expression "requievit in pace" applied to him in the earliest and least fabulous of these accounts, the life of Liberius in the pontifical. He considers the tradition of his martyrdom to have arisen from a confusion of his name with that of an African martyr Felix, the translation of whose remains to Rome was celebrated on the same day, July 29, as is devoted to Felix II. in the calendar. With regard to the orthodoxy of Felix himself, even the writers who are most adverse to him do not distinctly impugn it, though all agree that he owed his elevation to the heretics, Athanasius, who speaks violently against Constantius and the ordainers of Felix, says of him only that he was worthy of them. Rufinus says of him, "Non tam sectae diversitate quam communionis et ordinationis conniventia maculatur." Socrates, having just said that he then embraced the Arian perfidy, adds that some affirmed that he by no means embraced the Arian opinion, but had undergone ordination compelled by force and necessity. Sozomen similarly asserts the report of some that he perpetually adhered to the Nicene faith, and that on the ground of religion he was entirely without reproach, the only ground of reproach against him being that even before his ordination he had been associated with heretics. If against these testimonies in his favour be urged the improbability that the emperor could allow his ordination without the same compliance with heresy as he undoubtedly required and at last obtained from Liberius, it may be replied that after the banishment of the latter the attitude of the Roman populace may have been such as to deter the emperor and his advisers from the dangerous step of elevating an avowed heretic to St. Peter's chair. Still, from the charge of association with Arians and toleration of their communion, and also apparently of perjury, Felix cannot with any probability be regarded as free. Probably, like Liberius, he was all the time orthodox at heart, and avowed his orthodoxy boldly, as Liberius did, when pressure was removed.

Though Felix, as well as Liberius, has obtained a place in the list of lawful popes, and has even been canonized, it is evident from what has been shewn that his claim to such a place is more than doubtful. And, accordingly, Augustin, Optatus, and Eutychius, regarding him (as did Athanasius, Jerome, and Rufinus) as a mere interloper, exclude him entirely from their lists of popes. In the Roman church, however, his claim to the position given him appears to have remained unquestioned till the 14th century, when, an emendation of the Roman Martyrology having been undertaken in 1582, under Pope Gregory XIII., the question was raised and discussed. Baronius, who was an actor in what took place, relates the circumstances. He himself was at first adverse to the claims of Felix, and wrote a long treatise against them; a cardinal, Sanctorius, defended them. The question was finally decided by the accidental discovery, in the church of SS. Cosmas and Damian in the forum, of a coffin bearing the inscription, "Corpus S. Felicis papae et martyris, qui damnavit Constantium." In the face of this, which seemed like a personal reappearance of the calumniated saint to vindicate his own claims, Baronius was convinced in spite of his own arguments, and retracted all that he had written. (Baron. ad Liberium, c. lxii.) Accordingly Felix retained his place in the martyrology, though the title of pope was afterwards expunged from the oratio for his day in the breviary. What became of the inscribed slab is not known. Of course in the absence of any knowledge of its date, its testimony is valueless.

An expedient for justifying the position of Felix as well as that of Liberius among the lawful popes is that of supposing that, the see having become vacant on the banishment, or fall into heresy, of the latter, the former was legally elected in his place, and continued lawful pope till his death, when Liberius again became so by virtue of a second election (Bellarmine, de Rom. Pontif. l. 4. c. 17). But of any such second election there is no intimation, whether in any existing record. Baronius dispenses with its necessity, supposing Liberius to have resumed his old position, on the next vacancy of the see, after breaking with the Arians (Baron. ad Liber. lxxvi.).

The festival of Felix is kept on July 29. Two spurious decretals are assigned to him by the Pseudo-Isidore. One, addressed to Athanasius and the African bishops, relates to charges against bishops, its object being to protect them, and to reserve appeals to Rome: the other, addressed to the clergy generally, is directed against Arianism, and exhorts to patience under persecution and other trials. [J. B—y.]

FELIX (3) III. (otherwise II.; see preceding article), bishop of Rome after Simplicius, from March A.D. 483 to February A.D. 492, during nearly nine years. The circumstances attending his election are in the first place noteworthy. They are known to us from the acts of a council held at Rome under Pope Symmachus (498–514). In this council a document was read, in which it was stated that the clergy having met in St. Peter's Church for the election of a successor to Simplicius, Basilius (Praefectus Praetorio, and Patrician) interposed in the name of his master Odoacer the Herulian, who since the year 476 had ruled the West as king of Italy. This Basilius alleged, as a fact known to his hearers, that Simplicius before his death had conjured the king to allow no election of a successor to take place without his consent; and this for the avoidance of the turmoil and detriment to the church that was otherwise likely to ensue. He expressed surprise that the clergy, knowing this, had taken independent action; and proceeded in the king's name to propound a law, prohibiting both the pope to be then elected, and all future popes, from alienating any farms or other possessions belonging to the church; declaring invalid the titles of any who might thus come into possession of ecclesiastical property; requiring the restitution to the church of alienated farms with their proceeds, or the sale for the benefit of religious uses of gold, silver, jewels, and clothes, unfitted for church purposes; and further subjecting all donors and recipients of church property to anathema. The assembled clergy seem to have assented to this law, and to have been then allowed to proceed with their election, their choice falling on Caelius Felix, the son of a presbyter, also called Felix. The Roman synod under Symmachus, on the document being read which gave an account of these things, protested against the interference of laymen with the election of a pope which had been allowed on the occasion referred to, and to laymen having presumed to pronounce an anathema, and further requested Symmachus to declare void the law that had been promulgated, as having been enforced by merely lay authority, and, however assented to at the time by bishops, invalid for want of papal confirmation. Sym-machus, while he assented to this request, at the same time caused the synod to re-enact the law against the alienation of farms, and to extend its prohibitions to all bishops and presbyters as well as future popes. (Syn. Rom. 3, sub Symmacho; Harduin, Conc. vol. ii. p. 977.)

The pontificate of this Felix was chiefly remarkable for the commencement of the memorable schism of thirty-five years, between Rome and the Eastern patriarchates. For a clear understanding of what led to it, a brief reference to certain previous events is in the first place needed.

In the year 451 the Council of Chalcedon had condemned the Monophysite or Eutychian heresy, adopting the definition of faith contained in the famous letter of Pope Leo I. to Flavian, patriarch of Constantinople, on the subject. The same council had also enacted certain canons of discipline, two of which, the ninth and the seventeenth, gave to the patriarchal throne of Constantinople the final determination of causes against Metropolitans in the East; and another, the twenty-eighth, assigned to the most holy throne of Constantinople or new Rome, equal privileges with the elder royal Rome in ecclesiastical matters, as being the second after her, with the definite right of ordaining metropolitans in the Pontic, and Asian, and Thracian dioceses, and bishops among the Barbarians therein. This last canon the legate of Pope Leo, present at the council, had protested against at the time, and Leo himself afterwards repudiated it, as contrary (so he expressed himself) to the Nicene canons, and an undue usurpation on the part of the see of Constantinople.

It was in connexion both with the heresy condemned by the council of Chalcedon, and with the privileges assigned by its canons to the see of Constantinople, that the schism between the East and West ensued during the pontificate of Felix.

The condemnation of Monophysitism at Chalcedon by no means silenced its abettors. In the church of Alexandria they were especially strong and resolute. There, A.D. 477, Peter Mongus (or the Stammerer) had by them been elected patriarch, but had been deposed by the Emperor Zeno in favour of Timotheus Solofacialus, who professed orthodoxy. The latter prelate dying in 482, Peter Mongus was again raised by his supporters to the patriarchal throne in opposition to John Talaias, who was elected by the orthodox. At first the Emperor Zeno, and Acacius patriarch of Constantinople, opposed Peter's appointment, the former ordering his expulsion and the latter writing to Pope Simplicius against him. Soon, however, Acacius (offended, according to one account (Liberat. Breviar.) by John Talaias not having sent him the usual synodical letters announcing his election, and persuaded by the emissaries of Peter Mongus) induced the emperor to accept the latter on condition of signing the Henoticon, a formula of faith, ambiguously expressed, which Zeno at this time put forth under the advice of Acacius, in the hope that all parties might come to terms by signing it. John Talaias now fled to Rome, to solicit the support of Pope Simplicius, who wrote to Zeno and Acacius, complaining of the exp-son of John, and insisting that Peter should either be required to accept the faith of Chalcedon, or be expelled from communion. After the death of Simplicius in 483, Felix at once took up the cause. In a synod at Rome he condemned the Henoticon, renewed his predecessor's excommunication of Peter Mongus, and addressed also letters to Zeno and Acacius, which were despatched by the hands of two bishops, Misenus and Vitalis, to whom was joined Felix, Defensor of the Roman church. In his letter to Acacius he urges him to comply at length with the injunction of Simplicius, by supporting the faith of Chalcedon, renouncing Peter Mongus, and inducing the emperor to do the same. With this letter he sent also a formal summons (citationis libellum) requiring Acacius to appear at Rome and there answer before a synod to the charge of having disregarded the injunctions of Simplicius, and to other charges brought against him by John Talaias. In his letter to Zeno, having said that he had waited in vain for a reply to the letter of his predecessor, he implores the emperor to refrain from rending the seamless garment of Christ, and, following the steps of his predecessors, to renew his support of the one faith which had raised him to the imperial dignity, the faith of the Roman church, against which the Lord had said that the gates of hell should not prevail. He urges him also not to shrink from severe measures of coercion. To this letter also was added a more formal document (deplorationis libellum), in which the usurpation of Peter Mongus is described, as requiring expiation, affecting the whole Eastern church, and implicating Acacius. Mention is also made of the charges brought against Acacius by John Talaias, and of the summons to submit himself to St. Peter that had been sent to him in accordance with both ecclesiastical and imperial law, and which it is hoped he will attend to without delay. Misenus and Vitalis, charged with these documents, set forth without Felix, who was detained by sickness. At Abydos they were seized, deprived of their papers, and required under threats to communicate with Peter Mongus and Acacius. Unmoved by threats, they are said to have been won over by bribes, and, being so allowed to proceed to Constantinople, they complied with the imperial demands. In the meantime Felix was kept informed of what went on there by those steady champions of orthodoxy the "Acoemetæ," or Sleepless Monks, whose abbat, Cyril, had written to him from Constantinople, before the arrival of the legates, to warn him against delay; on which Felix had written to his legates charging them to do nothing till they had consulted Cyril and taken instructions from him. After their compliance at Constantinople Cyril sent messages to Rome informing the pope that the name of Peter Mongus was at length openly, and no longer secretly as before, read from the diptychs in the presence of Misenus and Vitalis, that the latter openly communicated with him and Acacius, and that Peter (who had been ordained by two heretics only) had, after the flight of John Talaias, persecuted the orthodox, and had been supported in all his acts by Acacius. The account of things sent by letter to Felix by the emperor and Acacius was, that John Talaias was deposed for perjury, having accepted the see of Alexandria in defiance of his previous oath that he would never do so; and that Peter Mongus had proved his orthodoxy by signing the Nicene Creed, "on the steps of the faith of which the Chalcedonian synod also rested." Zeno stated also, in his letter, that Peter, as well as himself, did actually accept the faith of Chalcedon. With respect to this last assertion the historians Nicephorus and Evagrius speak of Peter as a Proteus, who sometimes declared his acceptance of, and sometimes utterly condemned, the decrees of Chalcedon, obliging his clergy to join in the condemnation. They say that Acacius had remonstrated with him on this ground, and for having, as was alleged, caused the body of his orthodox predecessor, Timothy Solofacialus, to be ignominiously disinterred, but that he had then denied the truth of the charges: also that Zeno had sent a legation to Alexandria to inquire into the matter, but without any good result. However, both the emperor and Acacius continued to support Peter, being probably moved thereto by the high tone of the pope quite as much as by their own satisfaction with Peter. After the release of Misenus and Vitalis from confinement Felix, the Defensor, at length arrived at Constantinople, where he was denied access to Acacius, and is said to have been imprisoned and had his papers taken from him. The papal legates having at length returned to Rome, Felix convened a synod of sixty-seven Italian bishops, in which he deposed and excommunicated the two faithless legates, renewed the sentence of excommunication which had been already pronounced against Peter Mongus, and finally published a sentence of deposition and excommunication, which was signed by the sixty-seven bishops, against the patriarch Acacius himself, declaring him to be incapable of being ever loosed from the anathema then pronounced. The offences alleged against Acacius as the ground of this irrevocable sentence were, first, his invasion of the provinces of other bishops, contrary to the canons, in having ordained one John Cordonatus bishop of Tyre, within the province of Antioch, and raised to the priesthood one Hymerion, a deacon, whom the patriarch of Antioch had deposed; which would have been unlawful even had the persons promoted been catholics, instead of heretics, as they were; secondly, his communicating with and promoting condemned heretics, especially Peter Mongus; thirdly, his having been a party to the imprisonment and corruption by bribes of the legates sent from Rome; and lastly, his disregard of the summons requiring him to clear himself at Rome of the charges against him, and his refusal to admit even to an interview the Defensor Felix, who had been the bearer of this summons. With respect to the first of these charges it is to be observed that what Acacius had done was doubtless in virtue of the authority assigned to him by the canons of Chalcedon, above mentioned, which Pope Leo had repudiated; and with respect to the power assumed by Felix, alleged to be according to ecclesiastical and imperial law, of summoning a patriarch of Constantinople to be tried at Rome, the law intended was doubtless that of the canons referred to previously by Pope Leo as contravened by the objectionable canon of Chalcedon, and by him on that occasion called Nicene. In both instances the canons meant appear to have been those of Sardica. A council held at this place in 343, being one of Western bishops only, had given appellate jurisdiction over metropolitans to Julius then bishop of Rome: and these canons had been erroneously referred to by subsequent popes (beginning with Zosimus, A.D. 415) as Nicene, and interpreted as giving not only appellate but also coercive jurisdiction to the bishops of Rome perpetually over the whole church. Felix also addressed letters to the emperor, to the clergy and monks of Constantinople, and to those of the patriarchates of Antioch and Alexandria, acquainting them with the judgment. The conveyance of these documents to Constantinople, and their promulgation there, was a task of difficulty and danger. It was entrusted to one Tutus, an aged Roman ecclesiastic and Defensor of the church, who, after arriving at his destination, was, like the legates sent before, won over by bribes, and himself communicated with Acacius. The sentence of excommunication was at last served on Acacius by one of those zealous champions of Felix, the sleepless monks, who had in some way obtained from Tutus the fateful parchment. He effected his purpose by fastening it to the robe of the patriarch when about to officiate in church. The patriarch discovered it, but proceeded with the service without regarding it, and then, in a calm, clear voice, ordered the name of Felix, bishop of Rome, to be erased from the diptychs of the church. This memorable occurrence was on August 1, A.D. 484. And thus the two chief bishops of Christendom stood mutually excommunicated, and the first great schism between the East and West, which lasted thirty-five years, began. The emperor, and the great majority of the prelates of the East, supported Acacius; and thus the patriarchates of Alexandria, Antioch, and Jerusalem, as well as that of Constantinople, remained out of communion with Rome. Felix, having excommunicated his emissary Tutus, wrote to the monks of Constantinople and Bithynia, acquainting them with the fact, and warning them to hold no communion with the deposed Acacius. The latter, however, in spite of the pope, retained his see undisturbed till his death. As to John Talaias, whose appeal to Rome had been the immediate cause of the quarrel, Felix, unable to procure his elevation at Alexandria, made him bishop of Nola in Campania, where he ended his days (Liberatus, Breviar.).

Another noted Monophysite who, as well as Peter Mongus, had excited the orthodox zeal of Felix was another Peter, called Fullo (i.e. the Fuller), who during the reign of the Emperor Leo had been raised by his party to the patriarchal throne of Antioch, and had been several times deposed and reinstated. Eutychianism was not the only heresy of which he was accused. He had added to the Tersanctus the clause, "Who wast crucified for us," thus attributing passibility to the Godhead. To him, therefore, from a Roman synod, Felix had addressed a letter of earnest remonstrance, which is extant, accusing him of a multitude of heresies, especially in respect to his addition to the Tersanctus, and imploring him to stop in his downward course, and renounce his errors. This letter, and another addressed to him by Felix, being disregarded, the latter sent him a final synodical letter, which is also extant, in which, in the name of Peter, the chief of the apostles and the head of all sees, he pronounced a sentence of deposition and excommunication. He also wrote to the emperor announcing Peter's excommunication, and urging his expulsion from Antioch. Acacius also, as well as other bishops, had written to this Peter in strong reprobation of his addition to the Tersanctus, and in the final sentence pronounced by Felix they are alluded to as concurring, or being expected to concur, in the sentence. But after the rupture between Rome and Constantinople in 484, Acacius gave further proof of his defiance of the pope by reinstating the heretical patriarch in his see. This appears from the letter of a Roman synod, dated Oct. 5, 485, and signed by forty-three bishops, to the clergy and monks of the East. The immediate purpose of this letter is to apprise the orthodox Easterns of the excommunication of Acacius, the knowledge of which, they say, might possibly have been kept from them, and to induce them to concur in it. They therefore send a copy of the sentence, and detail the circumstances that had led to it, and they are at some pains to explain to the Orientals the immemorial custom of the Western church, sanctioned (they say) by the Council of Nice, that the pope, as St. Peter's successor, should determine and confirm all things done in synods, thus implying a little doubt as to the acquiescence of the Easterns in this view. They then go on to state how Acacius had proceeded to such a pitch of impiety as to scoff at his deposition, and had lately (as they heard) deposed from the see of Antioch the holy bishop Calendio and put Peter, whom he had himself often before condemned, in his place. They conclude with an anathema against Peter Mongus, Acacius, Peter Fullo, and all their followers.

In the year 489 Acacius died, and was succeeded by Flavitas, or Fravitas. Felix, on hearing of the vacancy of the see, wrote to Thalassius, an archimandrite of Constantinople, warning him and his monks (who appear throughout to have espoused the cause of Rome) to communicate with no successor to Acacius till the see of Rome had been fully apprised of all proceedings, and had declared the church of Constantinople restored to its communion. Flavitas, after his election, unwilling (as Nicephorus expresses it) to be enthroned without the assent of the Roman see, sent a legation to Rome charged with letters, in which he declared his renunciation of Peter Mongus, and craved intercommunion. The legation was accompanied by some of the Constantinopolitan monks, who seem to have given a good account of the orthodoxy of the new patriarch. But when Felix intimated to the messengers the necessity of the name of Acacius, as well as that of Peter Mongus, being erased from the diptychs they replied that they had no instructions on that point, and were consequently dismissed with a letter from the pope to Flavitas insisting on compliance with the condition required. Nicephorus states that Flavitas had written also to Peter Mongus declaring his communion with him and his renunciation of Felix, and that it was the pope's having heard of this double dealing that caused him to dismiss the messengers with contumely. But of this the extant letter of Felix to Flavitas makes no mention. Flavitas having died within four months after his accession, see, the pope's letter to him, as well as a reply from Peter Mongus, was received by his successor Euphemius. The letter of Peter condemned the Council of Chalcedon, and Euphemius in consequence at once broke off communion with him, removing with his own hand his name from the diptychs. He also replaced the name of Felix, to whom he sent letters, as his predecessor had done, professing his own orthodoxy, and desiring intercommunion. Felix, though satisfied as to the faith of Euphemius, still insisted on the erasure of the name of Acacius, which condition being still demurred to, the breach continued.

In the April of the year 491 the Emperor Zeno died, and was succeeded by Anastasius, to whom Felix sent a congratulatory letter. The new emperor, whose policy at that time was one of toleration towards all religious disputants, is not recorded to have replied; and on the 24th of February in the following year Felix himself was removed by death.

Between the date of his rupture with the East and that of his death Felix had been employed in helping to reconstitute the African church, which had lately suffered under persecution at the hands of the Arian Vandals. This persecution, which had raged with great cruelty under king Hunneric, who died in 484, had ceased under his nephew and successor Gundamund, when a number of apostates sought readmission to catholic communion. A synod of thirty-eight bishops was held at Rome under Felix in the year 488, the result of which was a synodical letter from him, dated the 15th of March in that year, laying down the following terms of readmission:—1. Bishops, priests, and deacons, who had allowed themselves to be rebaptized by the Arians, whether willingly or under pressure, were to do penance during life, and be admitted to lay communion only at the point of death. 2. Others, whether clerics, monks, virgins, or laity, who had been rebaptized voluntarily, were to be reconciled, on condition of repentance, after twelve years, of which three were to be passed among the medietates, seven among the poenitentes, and during the remaining two of which they were to be debarred from offering oblations, the viaticum being still allowed them during any period of their penance if at the point of death. 3. Persons, not being bishops, priests, or deacons, who had been rebaptized under pressure of persecution, were to be admitted to communion after three years' penance, and imposition of hands. In all cases those who had been rebaptized were declared incapable of ordination. Children who had been rebaptized were, on the ground of the ignorance incident to their age, to be admitted to communion after a short period of penance.

Felix is honoured as a saint in the Roman calendar on the 25th of February. His extant works are fifteen letters, to most of which reference has been made. Of these seven were first published by Sirmondi in 1631. Gratian gives further a decretum as his, to the effect that the royal will should yield to priests in ecclesiastical cases.

The ancient authorities for his life are his own letters and those of his successor Gelasius, the Breviarium of Liberatus Diaconus, and the Church Histories of Evagrius Scholasticus and Sulpicius Callistus.

[J. B.—y.]

FELIX (4) IV. (otherwise III.; see FELIX II.), bishop of Rome from July 526 to October 530, during four years, two months, and fourteen or eighteen days (Anastas. Biblioth.). The same authority states further that he was a Samnite, his father's name Castorius, that he built the basilica of SS. Cosmas and Damian, restored that of the martyr St. Saturninus which had been burnt, and that he was buried on the 12th of October, in the basilica of St. Peter. There is little to be told of this pope, except the circumstances of his appointment. His predecessor, John I., had died in the prison at Ravenna, into which he had been thrown by Theodoric the Ostrogoth, who then ruled the West as king of Italy. On his death Theodoric took the unprecedented step of appointing his successor on his own sole authority, without waiting for the customary election by the clergy and people. His choice fell on Felix, to whom there seems to have been no objection on the ground of personal character or belief. This high-handed proceeding seems to have been resisted for some time, but at length acquiesced in, the see having been kept vacant, probably owing to the struggle, for fifty-eight days. This appears from a letter from Athalaric, who succeeded Theodoric in the same year, to the Roman Senate, in which he commends that body for having at length acquiesced in Theodoric's nomination, accepting "a man probably instituted by divine grace, and commended by the royal examination." He also reminds them that there was no disgrace in having had to yield to a prince, and hopes that no one may now be affected by the past contention (Cassiodor. lib. 8, Ep. 15). No subsequent king or emperor laid claim to a like power of interference in the appointment of popes, freedom of election being henceforth allowed, as before, to the clergy and people, though the confirmation of elections by the civil power was insisted on, and continued till the election of Zachary in 752, when the confirmation of the exarch of Ravenna, as representing the Eastern emperor, was first dispensed with under the Carolingian empire. The same continued to be the theory of papal elections till the appointment was given to the College of Cardinals during the pontificate of Nicholas II., A.D. 1059. (For previous interventions of the civil power see articles on BONIFACE, EULALIUS, FELIX III., SYMMACHUS, LAURENTIUS.) Theodoric died only ninety-eight days after the death of John I. (Anastas. Biblioth.), an awful account of his end being given by Procopius (de Bell. Goth. lib. i.), the horrors of which have been regarded as a judgment for his treatment of the deceased pope, and his general insolence towards the church. (Baronius on Felix IV.)

The only further event known as marking the pontificate of Felix is the issue of an edict by Athalaric, the grandson and successor of Theodoric, requiring all civil suits against ecclesiastics to be preferred before the bishop and not the secular judge, on pain of the suitor losing his suit, and forfeiting ten pounds of gold, to be distributed by the bishop to the poor. If, however, the bishop should fail to render justice, application was to be allowed to the secular judge. The edict was called forth by Felix, with the Roman clergy, having complained to the king that the Goths had invaded the rights of churches, and dragged the clergy before the lay tribunals. It extended only to the Roman clergy, "in honour of the Apostolic see." (Caesodorus. lib. 8, c. 24.) Justinian I. afterwards extended the same clerical privilege, though with an appeal to the civil tribunal, to all ecclesiastics. (Justin. Novell. 83, 123.)

Only one genuine writing of this pope has come down to us, viz. a letter to Caesarius of Arles, requiring probation from candidates for the priesthood before their ordination. This letter was formerly assigned to Felix III., whose it could not be, since he was not a contemporary with Caesarius. The mistake arose from a wrong name of the contemporary consul, Mavortius instead of Boethius being given in extant copies. Sirmond, in the 17th century, recovered a codex at Arles, with the proper consul's name. There are two spurious letters, which have been erroneously assigned to him, one to all bishops, forbidding the celebration of Mass in unconsecrated places; the other to Sabina, a pious lady of rank. He is honoured as a saint by the Roman church, the Pope Felix commemorated on the 30th of January being supposed to be he, though in some editions of the Roman Martyrology this day, as well as the 25th of February, is assigned to Felix III.

Bishops in Alphabetical Order of their Sees or Countries.

BISHOPS IN AFRICA, WITH NO SEES NAMED.

FELIX (5), African pseudo-bishop, temp. Cyp. [PRIVATUS.] [E. W. B.]

FELIX (6), African bishop. (Cyp. Ep. 56. [ANIMNIUS.] [E. W. B.]

FELIX (7), African bishop (in Syn. iv. Carth. de Basilide, A.D. 254; Cyp. Ep. 67). It is useless to try to settle which other Felix he is to be identified with. [E. W. B.]

FELIX (8), African bishop. (Cyp. Ep. 57; Syn. Carth. sub Cyp. 3 de Pace.) [E. W. B.]

FELIX (9), African bishop in Syn. Carth. 5, sub Cyp. de Bap. Haer. 1; Cyp. Ep. 70. [E. W. B.]

FELIX (10), a bishop mentioned in a letter of Constantine to the bishops of Numidia concerning the restoration to the Catholics of a church at Cirta, of which they had been deprived by the Donatists A.D. 330. (Mon. Vet. Rom. = 518 and Oberthur.) [H. W. P.]

the name of one or more than hop, to whom St. Augustine time as to Eleusinus. [ELEU-
[H. W. P.]

bishop, to whom, as well as to guatine wrote concerning Bonir, whom he considered to have used, and therefore not deserv-om his office. (Aug. Ep. 77.)
[H. W. P.]

a bishop, present at the council leum, in Numidia, held against
A.D. 416. (Aug. Ep. 176, 182.)
[H. W. P.]

FELIX (14), a bishop, present at the council of Carthage against the Pelagians A.D. 416. He was, perhaps, the same as he on whose behalf St. Augustine wrote a letter of introduction to Valerius, count of Africa. (Epp. 175, 181, 186.) [H. W. P.]

FELIX (15), bishop of Abara, in the province of proconsular Africa, one of the Catholic bishops banished by Hunneric, A.D. 484, after the convention at Carthage. Ruinart identifies him with the paralytic FELIX ANHURTANUS (No. 17). (Morcelli, Africa Christ. i. 59; Notitia in Victor. Vit. 55, Migne, Patrol. Lat. lviii.) [L. D.]

FELIX (16) I., bishop of Abbir Major, a place in proconsular Africa, present at Carth. Conf. A.D. 411. (Mon. Vet. Don. p. 412, ed. Oberthur.) [H. W. P.]

FELIX (17) II., bishop of Abbir Major, banished by Hunneric in 484, after the conference at Carthage. He was aged and paralysed, having been a bishop forty-four years, and he had to be strapped upon the animal which carried him to his desert exile. (Victor Vit. Persec. Vand. ii. in Patr. Lat. lviii. 309; Morcelli, Afr. Chr. i. 61.) [C. H.]

FELIX (18), bishop of Abora, in the province of proconsular Africa, subscribed the letter which the bishops of that province sent to Paul, the patriarch of Constantinople, against the errors of the Monothelites, which letter is to be found in the acts of the Lateran council, 649. (Morcelli, Africa Christ. i. 64; Mansi, x. 940.) [L. D.]

FELIX (19), bishop of Acci. Vid. of Guadix.

FELIX (20), bishop of Adrametum (Hadrametum), the metropolis of the Byzacene province of Africa; exiled by Genseric, A.D. 455, because he had entertained John, a foreign monk (Victor. Vit. Persec. Vand. i. 7). The Notitia makes no mention of this see, either amidst the vacant sees, or in the list of those exiled by Hunneric, so that Felix is thought to have lived in exile till A.D. 484. (Morcelli, Africa Christ. i. 69.) [L. D.]

FELIX (21), bishop of Agrigentum (Girgenti), present at the Lateran synod under pope Martin in 649, which condemned the Monothelite heresy. (Hefele, § 307; Mansi, x. 866.) [A. H. D. A.]

FELIX (22), bishop of Ambli, in the African province of Mauretania Caesariensis, a town known only from the mention of this bishop among the Catholic bishops exiled by the Vandal king, Hunneric, A.D. 484. (Notitia in Victor. Vit. 59, Migne, Patrol. Lat. lviii; Morcelli, Africa Christ. i. 75.) [L. D.]

FELIX (23), first recorded bishop of Anagnin or Anagni, present at the Roman council held 487 under Felix III. (Mansi, Concil. vii. 1171 Ughel. Ital. Sacr. i. 307.) [C. H.]

FELIX (24), bishop of Antium (Anzio), present at the council mentioned in the preceding article. (Mansi, vii. 1171 a; Ughel. Ital. Sacr. xiv.) [C. H.]

FELIX (25), bishop of Apollonia in Neopatria, present at the council of Ephesus in 431 (Mansi, iv. 1125 a, 1368). His first signature appears to describe him as likewise bishop of the neighbouring city of Bullis. (Farlati, Ilyr. Sacr. vii. 396.) [C. H.]

FELIX (26) I., bishop of Aptunga, a person around whom has raged a tempest of controversy, the centre of which may be said to have been the refutation of Caecilianus to the see of Carthage (vol. i. p. 867). The place of which he was bishop is written variously, Aptunga, Abtugna, and Autumnae; but its situation is uncertain, except that it must have been in proconsular Africa, and probably not far from Zama, between it and Furni (Opt. i. 18). It must have been a place of some importance, for it possessed a municipal government, of whose principal officers the names and titles of some are recorded (Mon. Vet. Don. pp. 160–167, ed. Oberthür). His history begins at the death of Mensurius, when Caecilianus having been chosen as his successor by the vote, as we are told, of the whole people, Felix of Autumnae was one of those who laid hands on him, if not the sole officiating bishop, A.D. 311 (Aug. Brev. Coll. iii. 14, 26–28, 29), an irregularity not distinctly condemned by the church earlier than the council of Nice, A.D. 325 (Conc. Nic. c. 4; Bruna. i. p. 18). When the storm began to rage against Caecilianus, an important element lay in the question, whether, previously to his own appointment to a Christian bishopric, Felix himself had not been guilty of the infamous crime of “tradition” (vol. i. p. 881). He was consequently denounced without scruple by the enemies of Caecilianus, as the “fountain head of all the subsequent evils” (Aug. Ep. 88, 3; c. Cresc. iii. 61). But though many indirect complaints were made, no formal examination appears to have taken place into the case of Felix, until the Donatist party had failed to establish their case against Caecilianus in the Court of Enquiry held at Rome, under Melchisedes, October 2, A.D. 313. Foiled in this attempt, and also in the results of the enquiry as to the true position of the Catholic church, which was held afterwards in Africa under Eusebius and Olimpina, at the direction of the emperor, they turned their attack on Felix, and the emperor gave orders to Aelianus, the proconsul of Africa, to hold an enquiry on the spot, which took place on February 15, A.D. 314, eleven years after the facts (Aug. Post. Coll. 33, 56; Ep. 43, 3–14; 88; c. Cresc. iii. 61). It was held at Carthage in the presence of many persons who had held municipal offices at the time of the persecution, A.D. 303, 304. The prosecutor was Maximus, a Donatist, the counsel on the Catholic side, Apronianus, but Felix himself was not present. The principal witness was Albus Caecilianus, formerly chief magistrate at Aptunga (“duumvir, aedilis, magistratus”), who deposed that when the imperial officials came to execute the edict at the house of Felix, he was reported to be absent, but that a man named Galtius went with them to the church, from which they brought away the episcopal chair, certain documents (“epistolae salutatoriae”) not belonging to holy Scripture, and all the books, and then burnt all these publicly. And now came a piece of fraudulent testimony, which, if it had been proved true, would have substantiated the charge against Felix. At some time later than the events just now described, a man named

Maurus purchased, it was said, the bishopric of Zama, for which he was publicly denounced by Felix. A man named Ingentius, a friend to Maurus, formerly secretary to Augustinus, a former colleague of Caecilianus in the aedileship, wishing to avenge his friend, charged Felix with “tradition” at the time of the persecution. In order to prove this, he paid a visit to Caecilianus, bearing with him a letter which purported to have been sent by Felix to his friend Caecilianus, to the effect that he had in his possession, though not of his own property, certain sacred writings, eleven in number, which he was unwilling to surrender, and with this view wished his friend Caecilianus to say that, as inquisitor, he had burnt them at the time of the persecution, intending by this clumsy device to make him an accomplice, in suggesting that they had belonged to Felix, and that the latter had thus been guilty of “tradition.” At first he came alone, but when Caecilianus endeavoured to drive him away, he brought with him on a second occasion Augustinus, the friend of Caecilianus, to support his request. Caecilianus dictated to Augustinus a letter, in which he described what had taken place at the time of the search. The letter is imperfect, but clearly contains no account of any act of “tradition” on the part of Felix, and it concludes with the usual salutation. To this last, however, Ingentius made a fraudulent addition, to the effect that Felix had given directions to the officials about taking with them the key of the place in which the books were deposited, so that they might fulfil their purpose concerning them, but desiring them to spare the oil and flour used for sacred purposes. This forged postscript was of course intended to implicate both Felix and Caecilianus, but under threat of torture, he confessed the fraud, as well as the fact that he travelled about the country endeavouring to stir up opposition to the Catholic church. Thus self-convicted, the proconsul sentenced him to be imprisoned at the pleasure of the emperor, and pronounced a judgment of complete acquittal in favour of Felix, which was confirmed by the emperor in a letter to Probianus, the successor of Aelianus, in which he ordered Ingentius to be sent to Rome. This decision was repeated in a letter to Verinus, or Valerius, the vicar of Africa, A.D. 321. The case of Caecilianus and Felix, though not named, is no doubt implied in the thirteenth canon of the council of Arles, which prescribes caution in removing from the clerical order persons accused of “tradition.” The whole case was brought up again at Carth. Conf., A.D. 411, and the absence of Felix at the time of the enquiry was pressed hard by the Donatists as a fatal defect in the integrity of the acquittal, but Augustine argued that his absence was, in truth, an argument for its fairness, that all the documents were in existence, and that there was no doubt of the completeness of the imperial decision. (Aug. c. Cresc. iii. 81, iv. 79; de Univ. Bapt. 28; Brev. Coll. 41, 42; Post. Coll. 56; Mon. Vet. Don. iii. pp. 160–167 and 341–343, ed. Oberthür; Bruna. Concil. i. 108; Routh, Rel. Sacr. iv. 92.) [H. W. P.]

FELIX (27) II., bishop of Aptunga, present at Carth. Conf. A.D. 411. (Mon. Vet. Don. p. 407, ed. Oberthür.) [H. W. P.]

FELIX (28), schismatic bishop of Aquileia in opposition to Maximus. The latter signs the first at the Lateran council in 649 (Mansi, x. 866 a; De Rubeis, Monum. Eco. Aquil. 303; Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Ital. viii. 71, 555). Ughelli (Ital. Sacr. v. 33) believes there is authority for regarding both the bishops as one, under the name of Maximus Felix. [C. H.]

FELIX (29), bishop of Aquisira, in Mauretania Caesariensis, identified by Morcelli with Artisiga; exiled by Hunneric, A.D. 484. (Notitia in Victor. Vit. 59, Migne, Patrol. Lat. lviii.; Morcelli, Africa Christ. i. 81.) [L. D.]

FELIX (30), twenty-ninth bishop of Arles, between John I. and Walbert; signs with the following. (G. C. i. 543; Mansi, xi. 306.) [C. H.]

FELIX (31), bishop of Ascoli, signed the second Epistle of pope Agatho, which was sent in 680, after a synod in Rome, to the third Council of Constantinople. (Mansi, xi. 303; Hefele, § 314.) [A. H. D. A.]

FELIX, bishop of Asturica (Astorga) (No. 99).

FELIX (32), bishop of Atino, said to have been consecrated by pope Pelagius in 592, and to have sat thirty years, preceding Gaudentius. A chronicle quoted by Ughelli makes him a martyr. (Ugh. Ital. Sacr. vi. 426; x. 592.) [C. H.]

FELIX (33), bishop of Bagai (interesting place, see Morcelli), in Numidia; present at the seventh synod of Carthage under Cyprian, the third on Baptism, A.D. 256. (Sentt. Epp. 12.) He was one of the nine martyr bishops of the mines of Sigua. [NEMESIAN.] (Cyp. Ep. 76, 77.) [E. W. B.]

FELIX (34), bishop of Baianae, in the province of Numidia; present at the council of Carthage, under Gratus, A.D. 349, where he seems to have held the position of primus of his province, since he is named first among the bishops present in the preface to the canons there enacted; the Numidian province was always reckoned next to the proconsular. (Mansi, iii. 144; Morcelli, Africa Christ. i. 94.) [L. D.]

FELIX (35), bishop of Bamaccora (Plin. Vamacares, ab Vamaccora:—v. l. Ab Amacora, Abbamaccora, ab Amaecura. Also Ep. Damatcorensis), in Numidia. (Cypr. Sentt. Epp. 33.) [E. W. B.]

FELIX (36), bishop to the Barbaricians (146).

FELIX (37) I., c. 520, bishop of Benevento. (Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Italia, iii. 21; Ughelli, Ital. Sacr. viii. 17.) [A. H. D. A.]

FELIX (38) II., c. 585, bishop of Benevento. (Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Italia, iii. 21; Ughelli, Ital. Sacr. viii. 17.) [A. H. D. A.]

FELIX (39), bishop of Bellunum (Belluno) c. A.D. 347. His successor was Joannes. (Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Ital. x. 108, 214.) Ughelli (Ital. Sac. v. 146) dates him 547. [R. S. G.]

FELIX (40), bishop of Bercera, in Numidia, a town not mentioned by geographers. He is the first of the list of the Numidian bishops exiled by king Hunneric, A.D. 484. (Notitia in Victor.

Vit. 56, Migne, Patrol. Lat. lviii.; Morcelli, Africa Christ. i. 101.) [L. D.]

FELIX (41), thirtieth bishop of Besançon, succeeding St. Claudius II. and followed by Tetradius II. at the beginning of the 8th century. The authors of the Gallia Christiana (xv. 18) quote the work of an anonymous canon of St. Paul's at Besançon to the effect that Felix gave himself up to intemperance and plundered the goods of the church. The canons followed his example, and exceeded all bounds in their violence and debauchery, so that the citizens at last rose in indignation, and slaying some, drove the others from the city. Felix, in alarm for his own life, fled into Upper Burgundy, where he died. [S. A. B.]

FELIX (42), Donatist bishop of Boncara, a place in Mauretania Caesariensis, present at Carth. Conf. A.D. 411. (Mon. Vet. Don. p. 459, ed. Oberthür.) [H. W. P.]

FELIX (43), seventh bishop of Bononia (Bologna), a native of Milan, and a pupil and deacon of Ambrose, at whose death he was present. He became bishop of Bologna, c. A.D. 400, succeeding St. Eusebius. He died A.D. 429, and was succeeded by St. Petronius. (Ughelli, Ital. Sacr. ii. 9; Ceillier, Auteurs Sacr. x. 161.) [R. S. G.]

FELIX (44), Donatist bishop of Boستا or Voseta, a place in proconsular Africa, present at Carth. Conf. A.D. 411. (Mon. Vet. Don. p. 408, ed. Oberthür.) [H. W. P.]

FELIX (45), ST., twenty-fourth bishop of Bourges, following St. Probianus and succeeded by Remedius. He was consecrated by Germanus of Paris, A.D. 568 (Venant. Fort. Vita S. Germani, lxiii.; Patr. Lat. lxxxviii. 473). In 573 he subscribed the fourth council of Paris and the letter of the same council to Sigebert. (Mansi, xi. 867, 869.) Venantius Fortunatus has some verses addressed to Felix in praise of a pyx (turris) which he had made of gold to contain the host (lib. iii. c. 25. Patr. Lat. lxxxviii. 144). There is a Felix mentioned in the will of Bertram bishop of Le Mans (to be found in Patr. Lat. lxxx. 402), whom Le Cointe supposes to be Felix of Bourges (Ann. Eccl. Franc. an. 615, an. xxiii. tom. ii. 683). The year of his death is unknown, but he was buried in the church of St. Austregisilus de Castro in the suburbs. Gregory of Tours says that at his tomb, which was of Parian marble many miracles were wrought, and that nearly twelve years after his death his body was found to be untouched by corruption (Greg. Tur. Liv. de Glor. Confess. cap. 102.) [S. A. B.]

FELIX (46), bishop of Braga. Vid. of Oporto (No. 138).

FELIX (47), bishop of Brescia, 617. Certain inscriptions are quoted by Cappelletti (Le Chiese d'Italia, xi. 565) to shew that Theodelinda caused a baptistery to be erected in Como during his episcopate. [A. H. D. A.]

FELIX (48), bishop of Bulla, in proconsular Africa, exiled by Hunneric after the conference of 484. (Victor Vit. Notiz. 55; Morcelli, Africa Christ. i. 197.) [C. H.]

FELIX (49), Donatist bishop of Bulla Regia, an important town on the confines of proconsular Africa, four days W. S. W. from Carthage (now probably Bül Bull. (Ant. Itin. 43, 4), present at 4th. Conf. A.D. 411. (Mon. Vet. Don. p. 420, d. Oberthür.) [H. W. P.]

FELIX (50), bishop of Bullis in Illyria. Vid. d. Apollonia.

FELIX (51), African bishop, "a Buslacenius," is Prov. Proc. From an unsuspected inscription at Maffei, Morcelli concludes that this is a corruption of "Colonia Bisica Lucana" (v. l. Bustiacenis, abustlaccens, abusti lacceni). He was present at the council of Carthage, under Cyprian A.D. 255, and gave his opinion that questions of rebaptizing heretics ought each of them to be decided on their own merits, and not only by the general custom of the church. (Cypr. Sentt. Ep. 63; Aug. de Bapt. iii. 8, 11.) [E. W. B.]

FELIX (52) of Caesar Augusta (Saragossa), wrote to Cyprian and the African bishops on affair of Basilides. (Ep. 67, vi.) As to the question whether he was bishop of Saragossa, see Baluze ad loc. (ap. Routh, Rel. S. p. 158). But it seems likely that he is the "Felix presbyter" of the title.* [E. W. B.]

FELIX (53), bishop of Calahorra, signs the acts of the sixteenth council of Toledo, A.D. 693, in the sixth year of Egica. For a discussion of the late tradition which connects this bishop with the St. Felix now venerated in the bishopric of Calahorra, see Risco, Esp. Sagr. miii. 162. (Aguirre-Catalani, iv. 333.) [M. A. W.]

FELIX (54), bishop of Camerino, signed the second epistle of pope Agatho, which was sent in 680, after a synod in Rome, to the third Council of Constantinople. (Mansi, xi. 302; Hefele, § 314.) [A. H. D. A.]

FELIX (55), bishop of Caniopita, or Canapita, a place in proconsular Africa, present at 4th. Conf. A.D. 411. (Mon. Vet. Don. p. 417 d. Oberthür.) [H. W. P.]

FELIX (56), bishop of Cannae, or else Canosa (No. 154).

FELIX (57), bishop of Carpis, near Carthage, in the proconsular province of Africa; banished to the island of Corsica by the Vandal king Huneric, A.D. 484. (Notitia in Victor. Vit. 55, Migne, Patrol. Lat. lviii.; Morcelli, Africa Christ. i. 122.) [L. D.]

FELIX (58), bishop of Casae Nigrae, in the province of Numidia; banished with the preceding. (Notitia, 56; Morcelli, i. 124.) [L. D.]

FELIX (59), bishop of Castellum, in Mauretania Sitifensis, one of many towns of this name in Africa; banished with the preceding. (Notitia, 59; Morcelli, i. 126.) [L. D.]

FELIX (60) L., nineteenth bishop of Châlons-sur-Marne, succeeding St. Leudomerus, and followed by Ragnobaudus. He was one of the bishops who in A.D. 589 signed the letter to

Gundegesilus, archbishop of Bordeaux, on the disturbances in the monastery of St. Croix, at Poitiers [CHRODIELDIS.] He was also present at the council of Rheims in 625. (Greg. Tur. Hist. Franc. ix. 41; Mansi, x. 594; Gall. Christ. ix. 862.) [S. A. B.]

FELIX (61) II., 25th bishop of Châlons-sur-Marne succeeding Chamingus, and followed by Bladaldus, about the beginning of the 8th century. The name alone survives. (Gall. Christ. ix. 863; Gama, Series Episc. 534.) [S. A. B.]

FELIX (62), bishop of Cisterna (No. 163).

FELIX (63), 27th bishop of Clermont, succeeding Gyroindus and followed by Garivaldus in the latter half of the 7th century. He was buried in the church of St. Stephen. (Gall. Christ. ii. 245.) [S. A. B.]

FELIX (64) ST., a bishop of Como, to whom Ambrose's third and fourth letters are addressed. Ambrose had ordained him bishop, and calls the day of his ordination his birthday. The letters shew him to have been an intimate friend of Ambrose, and highly successful in his ministry at Como. [J. Ll. D.]

FELIX (65), bishop of Compostella (92).

FELIX (66), bishop of Cremona, 537, a native of Cremona, died 562. (Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Italia, xii. 128; Ughelli, Ital. Sacr. iv. 581.) [A. H. D. A.]

FELIX (67), bishop of Crepedula, in the Byzantine province of Africa, according to Morcelli on the coast; banished by the Vandal king Huneric after the conference of Carthage, A.D. 484. (Notitia in Victor. Vit. 57, Migne, Pat. Lat. lviii. Morcelli, Africa Christ. i. 146.) [L. D.]

FELIX (68), bishop of Curbis or Curubis, a town in the proconsular province of Africa; banished to Corsica with the preceding. (Notitia, 55; Morcelli, i. 150.) [L. D.]

FELIX (69), bishop of Diabe. (Optat. de Schism. Don. ii. 18, in Patr. Lat. xi. 969, var. lec.) Vid. of Zaba (No. 185). [C. H.]

FELIX (70), bishop of Dianium (Denia), signs the acts of the 11th council of Toledo, A.D. 675, the last council of the reign of Wamba. At the twelfth and thirteenth councils he was represented by vicars. He died before 684. The first bishop of Dianium was probably Antonius (q. v.) (636), and the see disappears with the Moorish invasion. The bishop was a suffragan of Toledo. (Esp. Sagr. vii. 212; Aguirre-Catalani, iv. 247.) [M. A. W.]

FELIX (71), bishop of Dumium (138).

FELIX (72), the apostle of the East Angles and first bishop of Dunwich. He was born and ordained in Burgundy, and, having offered his services as a missionary to Honorius, archbishop of Canterbury, was sent to preach to the East Angles, among whom he settled in the see of Dunwich, ruled for seventeen years and died there. Bede gives the length of the episcopate of Felix and his successors, Thomas, who was bishop for five years, and Berchtgils or Boniface, who ruled for seventeen years, and whose successor was consecrated by Theodore about the year 670. The date of the appointment of Felix is thus thrown back to the year 631 at the latest, between which year and 627 he probably was consecrated bishop by Honorius, his ordination in his own country having, it would seem, been to priest's orders and not to the episcopate. Felix found the East Angles still heathen, for although Redwald had become a Christian in Kent, he had apostatized on his return home; Earpwald, his successor, had been converted under the influence of Edwin of Northumbria, but had been murdered almost immediately afterwards; and, after three years of disturbance, Sigebert mounted the throne about the same time that Felix undertook the mission. Bede describes the conversion of the East Angles as very effectual; it was indeed the only mission of the Kentish church of which so much could be affirmed, and even here, during the episcopate of Boniface, the Mercian bishop Jaruman had a great share in the establishment of the faith, which, so long as Penda lived, must have been in a very precarious state. Sigebert, after a short reign, retired into a monastery, leaving his kingdom to his kinsman Egric, and shortly after both Sigebert and Egric were killed in battle with Penda. Anna, the next king, and father of a family of saints, occupied the throne during the remaining years of the life of Felix. Although the state of East Anglia was anything but peaceful, Felix managed to found schools and to obtain teachers from Kent, a fact recorded by Bede, and in the middle ages pressed as an argument for the antiquity of the university of Cambridge. The death of Felix can scarcely be placed later than 647: he was commemorated as a saint on the 8th of March. The historians of Ely and biographers of St. Etheldreda have added to these details derived from Bede some particulars which may be traditional and are more or less legendary. According to the Ely history Felix had become acquainted with Sigebert when the latter was in exile in France, and had been a bishop before he undertook the mission (c. i. p. 13); after his death his body was translated to Seham or Soham, near Ely, which he had founded; Redham (Reedham) also was a church of his foundation. After the Danish ravages his bones were removed to Ramsey (c. 6, pp. 21, 22). Felix Stowe, on the Suffolk coast, is said to be called from him; and several churches are dedicated in the name of Felix, which may probably be referred to him in preference to the other saints of the name. The church of Feliskirk in Yorkshire is one of these. Babingley in Norfolk is no doubt dedicated to him; and the church of Kirby Ravensworth in Yorkshire to St. John the Evangelist and St. Felix (Parker, Anglican Calendar, p. 235).

The missionary career of St. Fursey in East Anglia coincides with the early years of Felix, but the two are never mentioned together, although, as both were friends of Sigebert, they must have acted in concert. Probably Felix represented the clerical and energetic missionary element, whilst Fursey was a monk and ascetic.

There is a life of Felix in Capgrave, f. 146, mainly an expansion of Bede's narrative, and another still in manuscript among the lessons of the Norwich Breviary. (See Hardy, Cat. Mat. i. 234, 235; Bede, H. E. ii. 15, iii. 18, 20, 25; Milnesbury, Gest. Pontif. lib. ii. 74, iv. 181; Gesta Rer. Angl. 135; Camden, Britannia, ii. 77, ed. Gough; Boll. Acta SS. Mar. 1, 779.) [S.]

FELIX (73), circ. 422, bishop of Dyrrhachium in Epirus. His case is an instance of the arts used by the papacy in extending its sway. Pope Celestine I., writing to Perigeneas, Basilus, Paulus, and other bishops of Illyria, recommends submission to Rome, and cites the case of Felix as an encouragement, who, he says, would have been overwhelmed by his accusers, but for Celestine's attentive and paternal care. (Patrol. Lat. I. 427; Coelest. I. Pap. Epist. III.; Ceillier, viii. 128.) [W. M. S.]

FELIX (74), citizen and afterwards fifth bishop of Eugubium or Gubbio in Umbria between Paulus and Dionysius, A.D. 367. (Ughel. Ital. Sacr. i. 634.) [C. H.]

FELIX (75), bishop of Fica, in Mauretania Sitifensis, probably the same as Ad Ficum (Dj Baboura, Ant. Itin. 40, 4), present at Carth. Conf. A.D. 411. (Mon. Vet. Don. p. 462, ed. Oberthür.) [H. W. P.]

FELIX (76), bishop of Flenuclum, in Mauretania Caesariensis, a town known only from the mention of this bishop, who was one of those banished by the Vandal king Hunneric, A.D. 484. He died in exile. (Notitia in Victor. Vit. 59, Migne, Patrol. Lat. lviii.; Morcelli, Africa Christ. i. 157.) [L. D.]

FELIX (77), bishop of Florence, one of the nineteen bishops assembled at Rome to examine the case of Caecilianus, A.D. 313 (Vol. I. 367; Opt. i. 23.) [H. W. P.]

FELIX (78), bishop of Forum Antonianum, in the Byzacene province of Africa; banished by the Vandal king Hunneric after the conference of Carthage, A.D. 484. (Notitia in Victor. Vit. 58, Migne, Patrol. Lat. lviii.; Morcelli, Africa Christ. i. 161.) [L. D.]

FELIX (79), Donatist bishop of Garba, a place in Numidia, absent through illness from Carth. Conf. A.D. 411. (Mon. Vet. Don. p. 461, ed. Oberthür.) [H. W. P.]

FELIX (80), Catholic bishop of Garba, in Numidia; banished by Hunneric, A.D. 484, after the convention at Carthage between the Catholics and Arians. He died in exile. (Notitia in Victor. Vit. 57, Migne, Patrol. Lat. lviii.; Morcelli, Africa Christ. i. 165.) [L. D.]

FELIX (81), bishop of Genoa (95).

FELIX (82), bishop of Gibba, in the province of Numidia; exiled by the Vandal king Hunneric, A.D. 484, after the conference at Carthage between the Catholics and Arians. (Notitia in Victor. Vit. 56, Migne, Patr. Lat. lviii.; Morcelli, Africa Christ. i. 169.) [L. D.]

FELIX (83), bishop of Guadix (Acci), presided at the council of Eliberi in 305, and signed first of nineteen bishops as Felix Episcopus Accitanus. (Esp. Sagr. vii. 31; Gams, Kirchengeschichte von Spanien, ii. 1. 10; Aguirre-Catalani, ii.) [M. A. W.]

FELIX (84), bishop of Gubbio (74).

FELIX (85), African bishop, "a Gurgitibus" (ant. Ep. 74. Prov. Byz.), Morcelli conjectures this to have been on river Triton, if so near Capoa. [E. W. B.]

FELIX (86), bishop of Hadrumetum (80).

FELIX (87), bishop of Hierpina, in Byzacena; banished by Hunneric, A.D. 484. (Notitia Victor. Vit. 57, Patrol. Lat. lviii.; Morcelli, Africa Christ. i. 179.) [L. D.]

FELIX (88), bishop of Hispellum (Spello) in Umbria, martyr under Maximian; commemorated May 18. In Usuard the city is named "urbis Spelatensis," which some identify with Spoleto. In preference to this and other possible identifications Henschen, who discusses the question, decides for Hispellum (Boll. Acta SS. Mai. ii. 167.) [C. H.]

FELIX (89), bishop of Hixirzada or Iziria in Numidia, present at the Carthaginian conference in 411. (Gest. Collat. Carth. cap. cxxxiii. p. 271, in Patr. Lat. xi. 1308 a; Morcelli, Afr. Chr. i. 165.) [C. H.]

FELIX (90), Donatist bishop of Idicra, in Numidia (Oued Bousselah, Ant. Itin. 28, 4), jointly, in conjunction with Urbanus, of great excess during the period of Donatist ascendancy under Julian, A.D. 361-362, especially at Tipasa (Tefesah), a town on the sea-coast of Mauritania Caesariensis. Unless the language of Optatus be grossly exaggerated, the conduct of Felix and his fanatical partisans was brutal, aculegious, and licentious in the extreme, resembling in all respects, as he describes it, the "wild and desperate wickedness" of soldiers let loose upon a city taken by storm. From Tipasa the party appears to have gone to Tysedria, a place whose situation is undetermined ("Tididitum," Gams, Ser. Episc. p. 469), and there to have laid violent hands on Donatus, its septuagenarian bishop, whom they forced by terror into a declaration favourable to their sect, and even, perhaps, to resign his see; but the words which seem to express this may perhaps be taken as a rhetorical description of the violent treatment received by him. (Opt. 11, 19; Tillemont, vol. vi. p. 139.) [H. W. P.]

FELIX (91), bishop of Interamna (163).

FELIX (92), bishop of Iria Flavia (Compostella), signs the acts of the third council of Braga, 675, in the last place, as Idalphus qui cognominor Felix, Iriensis Ecclesiae Episcopus. In the twelfth, thirteenth, and fifteenth councils of Toledo (A.D. 681, 683, 688) he appears as Felix Iriensis, and in the last-mentioned council his name takes precedence of thirty-five bishops. The order of seniority in the various signatures is tolerably conclusive for the view that the Idulfus Felix of the council of Braga is the same as the Felix of the subsequent councils of Toledo. For a notice of the untenable theory that this Felix of Iria afterwards became metropolitan of Seville, and is to be identified with Felix the successor of Julian, see FELIX (No. 152). (Esp. Sagr. xix. 28; Aguirre-Catalani, iv. 262, 270, 287, 313.) [M. A. W.]

FELIX (93), bishop of Jactera (Zactara) in Numidia; present as delegate of the Numidian province at the synod of Carthage under Boniface, A.D. 525, and again at the council likewise held at Carthage under Reparatus, A.D. 535, in which was discussed the liberty of monasteries, which he strongly upheld. (Mansi, viii. 647, 841; Morcelli, Africa Christ. i. 188.) [L. D.]

FELIX (94), bishop of Jadera (Zara) in Dalmatia, present at the council of Aquileia, 381, and took part in the condemnation of Palladius and Secundianus (Ambrose, Opp. iii. 839). It is probably the same bishop who joins in the condemnation of Jovinianus and others (ib. 1044). [J. L. D.]

FELIX (95), bishop of Janua (Genoa), succeeded St. Valentinus c. A.D. 307. He is said to have been a man of remarkable learning and sanctity. He was succeeded by St. Syrus, who had been his pupil. (Ughelli, Ital. Sacr. iv. 1152; Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Ital. xiii. 278.) [R. S. G.]

FELIX (96), Donatist bishop of Lambia, Lambesa, or Lambese, an important town of Numidia (Lemba, Ant. Itin. 34, 2), alleged to be absent through illness from Carth. Conf. A.D. 411. His name was confounded by the Donatist party with that of Felix of Zumma. (Mon. Vet. Don. p. 449, ed. Oberthür.) [H. W. P.]

FELIX (97), bishop of La Mentana (123).

FELIX (98), bishop of Lamsorta in Africa, banished by Hunneric in 484. (Victor Vit. Notit. 56; Morcelli, Afr. Chr. i. 197.) [C. H.]

FELIX (99), one of the two bishops raised to the sees of Leon-Astorga and Merida, in the places of their deposed predecessors BASILIDES and MARTIALIS (q. v.). Our only information respecting him and his colleague, Sabinus, is derived from St. Cyprian's letter (Ep. 68, Migne, Patr. Lat. iii. 411); Felici Presbytero et Plebibus consistentibus ad Legionem et Asturicas, item Laelio Diacono et Plebi Emeritae consistentibus, fratri in Domino. There is considerable difficulty in apportioning these two sees rightly between the four bishops in question. Baronius, Routh, Dupin and Aguirre make Basilides and Martialis bishops, not of Leon-Astorga and Merida, but of Leon and Astorga respectively. Tillemont rightly joins the churches of Leon and Astorga, but avoids assigning the bishops, while Ceillier (ii. 265. 562-4) holds Basilides to have been bishop of Leon-Astorga, and Martialis bishop of Merida. Florez does the same, on the ground that as Leon-Astorga is mentioned before Merida and Basilides before Martialis, therefore the two names must be connected, as also those of Martialis and Merida. This argument is certainly not conclusive. We know from Cyprian's letter that Sabinus was made bishop in the room of Basilides. His name, however, is mentioned after that of Felix, so that no such inference can really be drawn from the pairs of names. Gams (Kirchengesch. von Spanien, i. 236), in contravention of all previous writers, maintains that Sabinus was made bishop of Merida in the room of Basilides, and Felix of Astorga and Leon in the room of Martialis, supporting his view by various ingenious arguments drawn from the name of Sabinus and the circumstances of his election, which are described in some detail by Cyprian [SABINUS]. If this is accepted Felix would appear as the first bishop of Astorga or Leon, or of both together, known in history. Only one episcopus Legionensis appears in Roman or Gothic Spain—Decentius of Leon, who signs the canons of Eliberi 305 (a signature probably to be understood in the same way as that of Posidonius (q. v.) of Eminiis, i.e. Porto, C. Tol. iii. 589). [M. A. W.]

FELIX (100), 18th bishop of Limoges, succeeding Simplicius and followed by Adelphius II. (Gall. Christ. ii. 505). There is a story in the life of St. Eligius, of how St. Eligius, while a layman, obtained the see for Felix from the king. (Vita S. Eligii, ii. 28; Migne, Patr. Lat. lxxvii. 558). He was represented at the council of Châlons about A.D. 650, by Paternus, an abbat (Mansi, x. 1194). In A.D. 650 he wrote a letter to St. Desiderius, Didier of Cahors, which is extant, but in no way remarkable. (Migne, Patr. Lat. lxxvii. 266.) [S. A. B.]

FELIX (101), reckoned the seventh bishop of Lucca, between Fullanus and Obsequentius, identified by some with the Felix Luceusis (where other readings are Lunensis and Cumiensis) in the list of those present at the Roman council of Hilarius, A.D. 465 (Mansi, Concil. vii. 959; Ugh. Ital. Sacr. i. 794). The reading Lunensis, which makes Felix the first bishop of Luna, a see afterwards transferred to Sarzana, is adopted by Ughelli (Ital. Sacr. i. 844) and Cappelletti (Le Chiese d'Ital. xiii. 428). [C. H.]

FELIX (102), bishop of Lucca. A confirmation by him of goods granted to the monastery of St. Fredianus, in Lucca, c. 685, is given in Troya, Cod. Dipl. ii. 565. Also in Muratori, Antiq. Med. Aev. v. 367. King Cunibert, c. 686, confirmed the charter of Felix, given to the same monastery (Troya, Cod. Dipl. iii. 11). [A. H. D. A.]

FELIX (103), bishop of Macriana, a place in Mauretania Sitifensis, present at Carth. Conf. A.D. 411. (Mon. Vet. Don. p. 462, ed. Oberthür.) [H. W. P.]

FELIX (104), Donatist bishop of Magarmelis in Numidia, present as the preceding. (M. V. D. p. 402.) [H. W. P.]

FELIX (105), Donatist bishop of Manazena Regia, in Numidia, present as the preceding. (M. V. D. p. 451.) [H. W. P.]

FELIX (106), bishop of Manfredonia (153).

FELIX (107), bishop of Marazana in Numidia (Anton. Itin. Marazania, in Notitia, "Maraziana" Sentt. Ep. 46), is the "alter Felix," who is a martyr bishop at Sigua in mines (Cyp. Ep. 76, 79), and the scribe or author of Ep. 79. [E. W. B.]

FELIX (108), bishop of Martana (Martula), cir. 306; commemorated on Oct. 30, according to Ferrarius (Cat. SS. qui non sunt in M. R.). Jacobillus reckons him the same as the martyr bishop of Hispellum (No. 88), May 18, and as presiding over both sees. (Ugh. Ital. Sacr. x. 129.) [C. H.]

FELIX (109), bishop of Mathar in Numidia; banished by the Vandal king Hunneric, after the conference between the Catholics and Arians at Carthage, A.D. 484. He died in exile. (Notitia in Victor. Vit. 56, Migne, Patrol. Lat. lviii.; Morcelli, Africa Christ. i. 217.) [L. D.]

FELIX (110), bishop of Maxita in the province of Mauretania Caesariensis; exiled with the preceding. (Notitia, 59; Morcelli, i. 219.) [L. D.]

FELIX (111), Donatist bishop of Maxula, a town of proconsular Africa, perhaps Hammam el Enf, eighteen miles from Carthage; but, as there was more than one place of the same name, this is not certain. (Dict. Geog. ii. p. 299.) He was present at Carth. Conf. A.D. 411. (Mon. Vet. Don. p. 442, ed. Oberthür.) [H. W. P.]

FELIX (112), bishop of Messina, received a letter from Gregory the Great (lib. i. indict. ix. Ep. 40; Migne, lxxvii. 493-494). Consulted Gregory on the degrees of consanguinity lawful in marriage and other matters (lib. xiv. indict. vii. Ep. 16; Migne, lxxvii. 1320-1322). Gregory's answer to this letter (lib. xiv. indict. vii. Ep. 17; Migne, lxxvii. 1322) is spurious. (Jaffé, Regesta Pont. Literas Spuria, p. 937.) [A. H. D. A.]

FELIX (113), bishop of Metz. Nothing is recorded of him save some incredible stories in the chronicles of the bishops of Metz. He is there said to have ruled for forty-two years, and died in the fourth year of Hadrian, A.D. 121. He was commemorated on Feb. 21. (Gall. Christ. xiii. 680; Boll. AA. SS. 21 Feb. iii. 236.) [R. T. S.]

FELIX (114), 35th bishop of Metz, succeeding Aptatus, and followed by St. Sigibaldus early in the 8th century. The authors of the Gallia Christiana (xiii. 703) quote the Codex of St. Symphorian to the effect that he sat nine months, and died on Dec. 22. He is said to have been buried in the church of St. Symphorian. [S. A. B.]

FELIX (115), Donatist bishop of Mopti in Mauretania Sitifensis, in opposition to Leo the Catholic bishop; present at the Carthaginian conference of 411. (Gest. Collat. Carth. cap. 143, 180, in Patr. Lat. xi. 1319 a, 1326 a.) [C. H.]

FELIX (116), bishop of Muzua, in the proconsular province of Africa; summoned to a conference with the Arians at Carthage, and subsequently banished by the Vandal king Hunneric, A.D. 484. (Notitia in Victor. Vict. 56; in Patrol. Lat. lviii.; Morcelli, Africa Christ. i. 239.) [L. D.]

FELIX (117), ST., elected bishop of Nantes in Brittany 550, died 6th January, 582. (Acta Sanctorum, 7th July, ii. 470-77.) He is repeatedly mentioned by Gregory of Tours (iv. 4, 37, v. 5, 32, 50, vi. 15, ix. 39; Liber de Gloria Confessorum, c. 78; Vitae Patrum, c. x. § 4), who says that Felix once wrote him a letter full of reproaches, because Gregory would not yield up some property to him. Gregory says he was careless and boastful, and that he himself replied that if Felix had only been bishop of Marseilles the ships from Egypt would have brought no oil or spices hither, but only paper for him to defame good men by his writings. (Hist. Fr. v. 5.) He was one of the few Western scholars who knew Greek. Fortunatus, who addressed several poems to Felix (iii. carm. 8), praises him for his mission to convert the Saxons, meaning the areas who had occupied the country near Exeter. This Saxon settlement dates from the 9th century, and by the aid of local names we can still trace its sharply defined boundaries. (Mac Taylor, Words and Places, ed. 3, pp. 92-94.) It is curious to observe in how many cases we find the same names on the opposite coast of Exeter, Dorset, Devon, and Cornwall. Felix was at the council of Tours in 567, and that of Paris in 573. St. Felix's day is given in the calendar as 7th July. See Histoire littéraire de la France, iii. 332; St. Felix Evêq. de Nantes, by L. de Kermabiec, Nantes, 1861. [C. W. B.]

FELIX (118), bishop of Naples c. 455. He succeeded either St. Nostrianus or Timasius, and is said to have held the see about nine years. He was succeeded by Soter. (Ughelli, Ital. Sacr. vi. 31.) [R. S. G.]

FELIX (119), bishop of Narbonne, about A.D. 500. All we know of him is derived from a letter addressed to him by St. Desiderius of Cahors, in answer to one of his, which is described as full of grief and bitterness (Migne, Pat. Lat. lxxvii. 256). His name is not found in the lists of the Narbonne bishops, and is omitted by Gams (Series Episc. 583). [S. A. B.]

FELIX (120), bishop of Nepi, present at the 1st, 3rd, 4th, and 6th synods under pope Symmachus in March 499, Oct. 501, Nov. 502, and Oct. 504. For reference, see Felix bishop of Terni; also Mansi, viii. 235, 253, 269, 316. [A. H. D. A.]

FELIX (121), bishop of Nismes, crucified by the Vandals in the beginning of the 5th century. Eccl. Conc.-Gesch. § 110; Gall. Christ. vi. 427.) [R. T. S.]

FELIX, bishop of Nocera (127).

FELIX (122), commemorated Nov. 15; a bishop and martyr at Nola in Campania with many others under a prefect named Martianus. He is by some considered the same as the presbyter Felix of Nola. He was buried by Elpidius, a presbyter. (Martyr. Usuardi, Adon.) [G. T. S.]

FELIX (123), bishop of Nomentum (La Mentana), present at the third synod of Rome under Innocent II., A.D. 531. (Mansi, viii. 740; Ughelli, Ital. Sacr. x. 147.) [C. H.]

FELIX (124), bishop of Nova, Novae, or Noba, a place in Mauretania Caesariensis, probably the same as Oppidum Novum (Alkassar el kabir), (Lat. Itin. 24, 2), present at Carth. Conf. A.D. 411. (Mon. Vet. Don. p. 463, ed. Oberthür.) [H. W. P.]

FELIX (125), Donatist bishop of Novasinna, or Nebasinna, a place in Numidia, present at Carth. Conf. A.D. 411. (Mon. Vet. Don. p. 439, ed. Oberthür.) [H. W. P.]

FELIX (126), bishop of Nova Sparsa, in the province of Numidia; summoned to a conference at Carthage by Hunneric, A.D. 484, and subsequently driven into exile, where he died. (Acta in Victor. Vit. 56, Migne, Pat. Lat. lviii.; Ughelli, Africa Christ. i. 245.) [L. D.]

FELIX (127), first bishop of Nuceria or Nocera in Calabria, A.D. 402. Being desirous of restoring discipline in his diocese after the rebuilding of the churches, which, it seems, had been destroyed by the Goths in the year 410 or 411, he consulted Innocent I., bishop of Rome, on certain difficult points which had arisen. Innocent, commending the deference he had displayed towards the Roman see, which he termed the chief bishopric, proceeds to mention some of the disqualifications for the clerical office. He is surprised that so well informed a man as Felix should have consulted him on points known to all the world, and supposes that his engrossing labours must have made him forgetful of the canons which had decided all the points he had brought before him. Innocent's reply is placed by Jaffé (Regest. Pontif. p. 26) between the years 402 and 417. (Innocent, Ep. 37, ed. Migne, Patr. Lat. xx. 603; Mansi, Concil. iii. 1045, Ep. 4.) Ughelli says he was present at a council with Decentius bishop of Eugubium (Ital. Sacr. i. 1065; see also Gams, Ser. Episc. 709). [C. H.]

FELIX, bishop of Padua (181).

FELIX (128), bishop of Palermo, present at the Lateran synod under pope Martin in 649, which condemned the Monothelite heresy. (Hefele, § 307; Mansi, x. 867.) [A. H. D. A.]

FELIX (129), bishop of Paris, mentioned in the Acta S. Genovefae, under the name of Vilicius or Julicus. (AA. SS. Jan. i. 143 b; Gall. Christ. vii. 15.) Commemorated on Jan. 3. [R. T. S.]

FELIX (130), bishop of Parium, in the proconsular province of Africa; subscribed the letter against the errors of the Monothelites sent by the synod of his province to Paul, the patriarch of Constantinople, A.D. 646. (Mansi, x. 939; Morcelli, Africa Christ. i. 253.) [L. D.]

FELIX (131) I., bishop of Patavium (Padua). He succeeded Eupavius c. A.D. 293. He is said to have introduced the practice of burying Christians in a ground apart from the pagans. He died c. A.D. 313, and was succeeded by Paulus, a Roman. (Ughelli, Ital. Sacr. v. 398; Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Ital. x. 484.) [R. S. G.]

FELIX (132) II., bishop of Patavium, c. A.D. 523. (Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Ital. x. 487.) [R. S. G.]

FELIX (133) III., bishop of Patavium, succeeded Virgilius c. 591, and was succeeded, 609, by Audacius. (Ughelli, Ital. Sacr. v. 399; Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Ital. x. 488.) [R. S. G.]

FELIX (134), ninth in the list of the bishops of Pavia (Ticinum), between Crispinus and Maximus, as given in Ughelli, who places his accession in 253 and his martyrdom on July 15, 255. In some accounts of the bishops of Pavia the place of Felix is occupied by a Crispinus II., a discrepancy discussed by the Bollandists. Gams omits Felix, and places Crispinus and Maximus in the 5th century, with Epiphanius between them. (Ughelli, Ital. Sacr. i. 1078; Boll. Acta SS. Jul. iv. 23; Gams, Ser. Episc. 800.) [C. H.]

FELIX (135), bishop of Pesaro (Pisaurum), receives a letter from Gregory the Great, blaming him for interfering with a monastery and allowing public masses there (lib. vi. indict. xiv. Epist. 46; Migne, lxxvii. 832). [A. H. D. A.]

FELIX (136), Donatist bishop of Pisita, a place in proconsular Africa, unable through age to be present at Carth. Conf. A.D. 411. (Mon. Vet. Don. p. 413, ed. Oberthür.) [H. W. P.]

FELIX (137), bishop of Portus Romanus addressed by Gregory the Great (lib. ix. indict. ii. Ep. 25; in Migne, lxxvii. 964). Gregory (Dial. iv. 51, 55) states that Felix was born in the Sabine province, and that to him he owes some of his information. Felix was present at the synod of 595 about the service of the pope, the goods of the church, etc., and also at the synod of 601, which tended to free monasteries from episcopal control. These are two separate synods according to Hefele, §§ 288, 289; according to Jaffé, from a consideration of the signatures there was only one, and that in 595. (Regesta Pont. p. 114; Mansi, ix. 1228, and x. 488.) [A. H. D. A.]

FELIX (138), bishop of Oporto, A.D. 692, but made metropolitan of Braga by the same sixteenth council of Toledo, which, in consequence of the conspiracy of Sisebert, transferred Felix of Seville to Toledo and Faustinus of Braga to Seville [FELIX (152)]. In Loaysa's edition he is made to sign the acts of the sixteenth council as bishop both of Braga and Porto; but according to four of the council MSS. it should be "Bracarensis atque Dumensis sedium Episcopus." The see of Dumium, which included the monastery of Dumium only, and which was founded in memory of St. Martin of Dumium, was often administered by the bishop of the neighbouring diocese and town of Braga. For the groundless legend of the martyrdom of Felix by the Arabs in 724, see Esp. Sagr. xv. 161, and Boll. AA. SS. May 15. (Esp. Sagr. xv. 158; Aguirre-Catalani, iv. 333.) [M. A. W.]

FELIX (139), Donatist bishop of Putia, a place in Numidia, present at Carth. Conf. A.D. 411. (Mon. Vet. Don. p. 453, ed. Oberthür.) [H. W. P.]

FELIX (140), archbishop of Ravenna, 708–724. He was consecrated by pope Constantine. At the time of his consecration he was apparently unwilling in some way to submit to the papal supremacy. Hence his later fate, according to the author of the Life of Constantine, was not undeserved. (Vita Constantini I. in Liber Pontificalis, Migne, cxxviii. 947.) The people of Ravenna had killed the exarch John Rixocopus, and had rebelled against the emperor Justinian, who sent a force under Theodore, c. 709, against Ravenna. Felix was captured, and carried off to Constantinople, where he was blinded, and sent into exile in Pontus. Justinian's successor, Philippicus, took pity upon Felix, caused search to be made for his property which had been taken from him, and recovered all except one candlestick. He then gave him presents, and sent him back to Ravenna. Felix died in 724, Nov. 25, and was buried in the church of St. Apollinaris in Classis, where his sarcophagus and epitaph are still to be found. He had written many works, but he caused them to be burnt before his death, because on account of his blindness he could not revise them. One was saved by the priests, a commentary on St. Matt. xxiv. 15, which was extant in the 9th century when Agnellus wrote, but has perished. According to Agnellus, Felix had been head of the monastery of St. Bartholomew, in Ravenna. (The Life of Felix is given in the Liber Pontificalis Eccl. Rav. of Agnellus, Monum. Rerum Ital. et Langob. 366 sqq. which is inaccurate in many details, and may be partly corrected from the Liber Pontificalis Vita Constantini I. Migne, cxxviii. 947.) [A. H. D. A.]

FELIX (141), Donatist bishop of Rome, sent thither from Africa by his party, present at the Carthaginian conference, A.D. 411. Objection was made to his appearance by the Catholic managers, as not being an African bishop. Petilian, on the part of the Donatists, defended it as being simply the result of the general migration from Rome at the time of the Gothic invasion. The president pointed out that his duty was to deal with an African question, but admitted his signature on the understanding that this admission was not to prejudice the rights of Innocent, the Catholic bishop who was not present. (Aug. Ep. 53, 2; Mon. Vet. Don. pp. 430–432, ed. Oberthür.) [H. W. P.]

FELIX (142), bishop of Rotaria, in Numidia, present at the council of Cirta, A.D. 305, who gave an opinion on the side of moderation. (Aug. c. Cresc. iii. 30; Opt. i. 14.) [H. W. P.]

FELIX (143), bishop of Rusubiris (Rusicibar), a port of the province of Mauretania Tingitana, but assigned to M. Caesariensis by the Notitia; one of the Catholic bishops summoned to Carthage by the Vandal king Hunneric, A.D. 484, and subsequently banished by him. (Notitia in Victor. Vict. 58; Migne, Patrol. Lat. lviii.; Morcelli, Africa Christ. i. 267.) [L. D.]

FELIX (144) OF SARAGOSSA, probably bishop of Saragossa, described in the letter of Cyprian and the African bishops on the case of BASILIDES and MARTIALIS as "alius Felix de Caesar Augusta fidei cultor atque Defensor veritatis," who had written letters to the council assembled at Carthage, describing the fall of the two deposed bishops. There has been much dispute as to whether he is to be regarded as bishop of Saragossa. Spanish opinion is, on the whole, opposed to the bishopric. (See Aguirre, Coll. Mar. Conc. Hisp. i. Diss. 14, Exc. 1, and Risco in the Esp. Sagr. xxx. 99.) Nothing, however, can safely be inferred from the absence of the episcopal title, which is equally absent with regard to the catalogue of African bishops given in the superscription of Cyprian's letter (Ep. 68, apud Migne, Patr. Lat.); and, on the whole, it seems most probable that Felix was bishop of Saragossa. If so, we should then have information, dating from the middle of the 3rd century, of the existence of three bishoprics in northern Spain—Tarragona [FRUCTUOSUS], Astorga [FELIX], and Saragossa. To these the Spaniards would certainly add Braga, but the proofs are doubtful. (Esp. Sagr. xxxi. 250; Gams, Kirchengesch. von Spanien, i. 253.) (Cf. No. 52.) [M. A. W.]

FELIX (145), bishop of Sardica on the Oescus in Dacia. This see was subject to the metropolitan of Prima Justiniana at the end of the 6th century, but Felix resisted the authority of Joannes, and elicited a severe letter of reproof from Gregory the Great, who threatened further ecclesiastical censures if he refused submission. (Greg. Magn. Epist. lib. v. 14 in Patrol. Lat. lxxii. 131. Wiltach gives Lychindus as the name of the metropolitan see, but it had been transferred to Prima Justiniana, c. A.D. 530. See also Le Quien, Or. Christ. ii. 281–285.) It is not known whether Felix submitted, or how long he lived. [J. de S.]

FELIX (146), a bishop sent by Gregory the Great, c. 595, together with an abbat Cyriacus, to convert the Barbariciana, an idolatrous portion of the population of Sardinia. Their religious instruction had been neglected by the native bishops, whom Gregory accordingly reproves. (Greg. Mag. Epp. lib. iv. ind., Epp. 23–26.)

[R. S. G.]

FELIX (147), bishop of Sarsina, A.D. 495–532, between Adeodatus and Sergius. (Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Italia, ii. 487, 518.) [C. H.]

FELIX, bishop of Sassari (175).

FELIX (148), bishop of Segermis, in Byzacene, perhaps the same as Seggera (Jumah (Ant. Itin. 63, 3), present at Carth. Conf. A.D. 411. (Mon. Vet. Don. p. 402, ed. Oberthür; Gams, Ser. Episc. p. 468.)

[H. W. P.]

FELIX (149) II., bishop of Segermis; subscribed the letter which the bishops of his province wrote to Constantine, the son of Heraclius, against the novel doctrines of the Monothelites, A.D. 641; “et Gernisii” in the subscription has been emended into “Segermitensis.” (Mansi, x. 928; Morcelli, Africa Christ. i. 273.)

FELIX (150), bishop of Selemsela, a town either in the proconsular or Numidian province of Africa. He was present at the council convened at Carthage by bishop Genethlius, A.D. 390, and was the author of three of the canons there enacted concerning the discipline of the clergy, two of which were afterwards embodied in Gratian's decretal. (Mansi, iii. 693; Morcelli, Africa Christ. i. 273.)

[L. D.]

FELIX (151), bishop of Sertels, or Serta, a place in Mauretania Sitifensis, prevented by illness from attending Carth. Conf. A.D. 411. (Mon. Vet. Don. p. 463, ed. Oberthür.)

[H. W. P.]

FELIX (152), metropolitan bishop of Seville shortly before C. Tol. xvi. In can. 12 of the council, Sisbert of Toledo is deposed for conspiracy against Egica and his family; and Felix, then metropolitan of Baetica, was declared metropolitan of Toledo in his place, by action of the council, and consent of the clergy and people of Toledo. The council, however, in this only ratified the prae-electio and autoritas of Egica, “dicti Domini nostri,” who had commanded (jussit) Felix to assume the charge of the see of Toledo. His election is spoken of as “in praeteritis,” and we may probably see in it one of the first effects of C. Tol. xii. 6, which had placed the election of bishops in the hands of the king and the metropolitan of Toledo. In this case, however, the council is asked both to deliver judgment upon Sisbert and to confirm the election of Felix, probably because Felix could not confirm himself, and possibly because the strong hand of Julian (q. v.) having been withdrawn, it was felt desirable, at a critical moment for the government, to make some concession to the older order of things. This Felix is not to be identified with the Felix bishop of Iria who signs C. Tol. xii. (Esp. Sagr. vi. 285), but rather with the Felix, archpriest of Toledo, who signs the thirteenth, fourteenth, and fifteenth councils, and disappears as soon as Felix of Seville and Toledo is heard of. He was in all probability the friend and protégé of Julian, whose life he wrote, and whose ambitious policy with regard to the see of Toledo he seems to have attempted to carry out, though with inferior ability and vigour. Isidorus Pacensis in the 8th century says of him, after some expressions of praise, “concilia satis praeclara etiam adhuc cum ambobus Principibus agit” (Isid. Pac. Esp. Sagr. viii.). The princes were Egica (687–701) and his son Wittiza, associated with his father in the government from 698; and it has therefore been inferred from this passage that, besides the sixteenth council of Toledo already quoted, Felix presided also at the seventeenth and eighteenth. For his presidency at the seventeenth in 694 we have the authority of Roderic of Toledo (iii. 13), writing from MSS. in which the signatures of the council, not now extant, were contained; and it is of course possible that he survived the eighteenth, under Wittiza, the acts of which are lost, though the passage from Isidore of Beja, already quoted, is our only ground for supposing it. The life of Julian of Toledo, attributed to Felix, and which with Julian's life of Ildefonsus appears as an addition in many MSS. to the De Viris Ill. of Isidore and Ildefonsus, is accepted by Gams as genuine. (Kirchengesch. von Spanien, ii. (2) 222; España Sagr. vi. 316; Aguirre-Catalani, iv. 333; Hefele, Conc.-Gesch. iii. 318, 323.)

[M. A. W.]

FELIX (153) I., bishop of Manfredonia or Siponto, c. 465. (Vita Laurentii Sipontini in Monum. Rerum Ital. et Langob. 1878, p. 544.)

[A. H. D. A.]

FELIX (154) II., bishop of Siponto (Ughelli, Ital. Sac. vii. 818), addressed by Gregory the Great. In 591 he is requested to take charge of the vacant church of Canusium (Canosa in Apulia, a see afterwards united with Bari) and directed to ordain two parochial presbyters for it (lib. i. ind. ix. ep. 53). Ughelli (Ital. Sac. vii. 790) on the authority of this letter places Felix as commendatarius among the bishops of Cannae, having evidently so read the name of the church. In 593 Felix is bidden to make, with two notaries of the Roman see, an inspection of the valuables of the Sipontine church and forward a summary account of them signed by him, without any delay or excuse, to Gregory. For the dissolute morals of his nephew Felix [EVANGELUS (4)] he is severely blamed, and the debt owing by his deacon Evangelus for his ransom he is directed to discharge out of the church funds (lib. iii. ind. xi. epp. 42, 43). In this year also Felix is reproached as unfeeling for having withheld payment, from the same source, of twelve solidi incurred by Tribunus, one of his clerics, for his ransom from the enemy (lib. iv. ind. xii. ep. 17).

[FELIX (56).]

FELIX, bishop at Spello (88).

FELIX (155), bishop of Spoleto, signed the second Epistle of pope Agatho, which was sent in 680 after a synod in Rome to the third council of Constantinople. (Mansi, xi. 302; Hefele, § 314.) [A. H. D. A.]

FELIX (156), bishop of Suava (Sua), in the province of Numidia; banished by the Vandal king Hunneric, A.D. 484. (Notitia in Victor. Vit. 57, Migne, Patrol. Lat. lviii.; Morcelli, Africa Christ. i. 284.) [L. D.]

FELIX (157), Donatist bishop of Summa, or Zumma, a town in Numidia. He was not present at Carth. Conf. A.D. 411; but as the name of a bishop of that see appeared in the list of signatures, the error, being challenged by the Catholics, was after some discussion admitted by the Donatists. (Mon. Vet. Don. p. 448, ed. Oberthür.) [H. W. P.]

FELIX (158), Donatist bishop of Tacapae, or Tacape, a town of proconsular Africa, near some hot springs (Gabo, Cebes, or Quâbes, Ant. Itin. 78, 3), said by his party to be prevented by illness from appearing at Carth. Conf. A.D. 411. (Mon. Vet. Don. p. 419, ed. Oberthür.) [H. W. P.]

FELIX (159), Donatist bishop of Tagaraja, a place in Byzacene, present at Carth. Conf. A.D. 411. (Mon. Vet. Don. p. 449, ed. Oberthür.) [H. W. P.]

FELIX (160), bishop of Tebeste (Theveste), in Numidia; banished by Hunneric, 484. (Notitia in Victor. Vit. 56, Migne, Patrol. Lat. lviii.; Morcelli, Africa Christ. i. 309.) [L. D.]

FELIX (161), Donatist bishop of Tela, in proconsular Africa, present at Carth. Conf. A.D. 411. (Mon. Vet. Don. p. 459, ed. Oberthür.) [H. W. P.]

FELIX (162), bishop of Terni (Interamna), present at the 3rd, 4th, 5th, and 6th Roman synods under pope Symmachus in Oct. 501, Nov. 502, in 503, and Oct. 504, according to the reckoning of Dahn (Die Könige der Germanen, iii. 209), who accepts, with a slight alteration, the arrangement of Hefele, § 220. (Mansi, viii. 252, 268, 299, 314; Ugh. Ital. Sac. i. 750.) [A. H. D. A.]

FELIX (163), third bishop of Terracina, c. A.D. 366, succeeding Sabinus. It is related in a Vatican manuscript quoted by Ughelli how the prayers of Felix in the church of St. Caesarius at Terracina obtained a cure for Placidia, daughter of Valentinian III., when possessed by a demon. (Ughelli, Ital. Sac. i. 1289.) [R. S. G.]

FELIX (164) II., bishop of Terracina, present at the Lateran synod under Martin in 649, which condemned the Monothelite heresy. (Mansi, x. 867; Hefele, § 307.) [A. H. D. A.]

FELIX (165), bishop of Thenae, in the Byzacene province of Africa; subscribed the letter of the bishops of his province against the Monothelites, c. A.D. 641. (Mansi, x. 928; Morcelli, Africa Christ. i. 313.) [L. D.]

FELIX (166), bishop of Tibiura Tibursica. Vid. of Tubzoca (No. 174).

FELIX, bishop of Ticinum (134).

FELIX (167), bishop of Timida Regia, in the proconsular province of Africa; subscribed the letter sent by the synod of his province to Paul, patriarch of Constantinople, against the Monothelites, A.D. 646. (Mansi, x. 939; Morcelli, Africa Christ. i. 326.) [L. D.]

FELIX, bishop of Toledo (152).

FELIX, bishop of Torres (175).

FELIX (168), bishop of Tres Tabernae (Cisterna), one of the nineteen bishops assembled under Melchiades at Rome to examine the case of Caecilianus, A.D. 313. (Vol. I. p. 367; Opt. i. 23; Ughelli, Ital. Sac. i. 193.) Ughelli makes his see Praeneste, by a clerical error doubtless, as Secundus bishop of Praeneste immediately precedes him in the list of signatures. (Mansi, Concil. ii. 437; Gams, Ser. Episc. vii.) [H. W. P.]

FELIX (169). In A.D. 386 according to Baronius, 385 according to Tillemont, Felix was chosen bishop of Treves at the time of the synod held there under Maximus. Sulpicius Severus (Dial. iii. 13) gives a high personal character of him. But the bishops who consecrated him were Ithacians, or favourers of Ithacius, at whose instance Maximus had put the Priscillianists to death. St. Martin of Tours was then at Treves, and assisted at the consecration, though he declined to sign the record of it. He considered it better to yield for the moment, than endanger the lives of those over whose necks the sword impended. In 398 or thereabouts, however, a council at Turin directed that all who should withdraw themselves from Felix should be received into communion; and he himself afterwards surrendered his bishopric, and betook himself to a monastery which he had founded and dedicated to the martyrs of the Thebaean Legion, where he lived till after the year 400. It should be mentioned, however, that the Bollandists discredit the identification of this Felix with him whose consecration is recorded by Sulpicius Severus. (AA. SS. Mar. 26; Tillemont, Mém. viii. 511; Gall. Christ. xiii. 377.) [R. T. S.]

FELIX (170) I., bishop of Treviso. In the year 569 (or 568, Troya), he met Alboin, according to Paulus Diaconus, and was liberally treated. ("Cui rex, ut erat largissimus omnes suae ecclesiae facultates postulanti concessit et per suum praeumaticum postulata firmavit," Paulus Diac. ii. 12.) This has been spoken of as an invention of Paulus on the ground that the Lombards could not write. It was probably merely a confirmation of a charter. (See note by Waitz on the passage Mém. Rerum Langob. 1878, p. 79, and Troya, ed. Diplom. vol. i. p. 1.) This case has an important bearing on the treatment of the church by the Lombards. At the same time, it must be remembered that the bishops of Venetia, as well as others in north Italy, were now in opposition both to Constantinople and the pope on the subject of the Three Chapters (Hefele, § 278). This Felix was a personal friend of Venantius Fortunatus, the writer, who was born near Treviso, probably about 530. (Ebert, Gesch. d. Christl.-Lat. Liter. p. 494.) Both were cured of eye-disease at the der of St. Martin. See Paul Diac. ii. 13, and note by Waltz to the passage in Mon. Rerum Langob. 1878, p. 79, with a quotation from Fortunatus's Life of St. Martin, in which Felix is mentioned. [A. H. D. A.]

FELIX (171) IL, bishop of Treviso (successor of Rusticus, who was bishop in 589 or 590, Paul Diac. iii. 26). Distinct from the earlier Felix, one of the ten bishops who (after a synod of bishops of Venetia and Rhaetia II.) signed a letter to the emperor Maurice, c. 591, justifying their refusal to condemn the Three Chapters. (Mansi, x. 466; Hefele, § 281.) [A. H. D. A.]

FELIX (172), bishop of Trisipis, in the proconsular province of Africa; subscribed the letter of the synod of his province sent to Paul, patriarch of Constantinople, against the Monothelites A.D. 646. Trisipelis, in the subscription, should be Trisipensis. (Mansi, x. 942; Morcelli, Africa Christ. i. 330.) [L. D.]

FELIX (173), bishop of Tubiae, a place in Mauritanis Sitifensis, present at Carth. Conf. A.D. 411. (Mon. Vet. Don. p. 411, ed. Oberthür.) [H. W. P.]

FELIX (174), bishop of Tubzoca, Oct. 24. His story illustrates the action of the first edict of persecution issued by Diocletian at the instigation of Galerius, on Feb. 22, A.D. 303, and the special severity with which it was worked in the provinces of the West, under the unhappy domination of the emperor Maximian. We must remember that this edict did not authorize death as the punishment of resistance. It simply prohibited the assembly of Christians for religious worship; ordered the destruction of churches, and of all sacred documents, and authorized the use of torture in legal proceedings taken in accordance with its provisions. Issued in the early spring, the official notice of its publication only arrived at Tubzoca on June 5. As soon as it was posted the overseer of the city, one Magellianus, summoned the clergy before him, and demanded the sacred writings. Informed by them that they were in the bishop's hands, and that he had gone that day to Carthage, he remanded them until Anulinus, the proconsul, should have an opportunity of examining them. Upon the return of Felix on the next day, he also was brought before the overseer, and had the same demand proposed to him. Whereupon he uttered a noble reply, "It is better for me that I should be burned with fire than that the Holy Scriptures should be so treated, since it is better to obey God rather than man." Three days were thereupon given him for a reconsideration of his decision, during which time he was committed to the private custody of Vincentius Cebrenus, a leading citizen of the city. Upon his continued refusal he was sent to the proconsul Anulinus at Carthage, on June 24. By the time the bishop was examined upon his arrival, and again after an interval of sixteen days, as the magistrates of Carthage appear to have been anxious to find loopholes whereby the Christians might escape the extreme penalty of the law. With the edict, however, there seems to have been sent by Maximian, a high court official, to secure its due and vigilant execution. He was the praetorian prefect or commander of the emperor's guard. To him, therefore, upon his final refusal Felix and his companions were delivered for transportation into Italy. After four days' sail they arrived in Sicily, having partaken of no food during the journey, doubtless from sea sickness, wherein we find an incidental proof of the authenticity of these Acts. At the various points Agrigentum, Catana, Messina, Taurominium, where they touched, they were received with the greatest honour by the Christians. Thence they were carried by the prefect—who perhaps called at so many towns to rouse the zeal of the officials—to Venusia, in Apulia, where, having again called upon him to surrender the sacred writings, he condemned him to death for disobedience. Doubtless the known sentiments, or perhaps the secret instructions of Maximian, encouraged the court officials in exceeding the limit fixed by the letter of the edict. Felix finally suffered by beheading, Aug. 30, on which day he is commemorated by Bede. At his execution he is reported to have said, "Thanks be to Thee, O God. Fifty-six years have I lived in the world. I have guarded my virginity, I have preserved the Gospels, I have preached the faith and truth. Oh, Jesus Christ, Lord God of heaven and earth, I offer my neck as a sacrifice to Thee, who abidest to eternity, to whom be glory for ever." The Acts and Martyrologies call the town where Felix was bishop, Tubzoca, with considerable variations in the spelling. Baronius, however, well suggests, though without any MSS. authority, Thibaris, a well-known episcopal city, of Numidia, whose bishops, Catholic and Donatist alike, appeared at the Carthage conference, A.D. 411, while Tubzoca is utterly unknown. The companions of his martyrdom were Audactus and Januarius, presbyters, Fortunatus and Septimus, readers. There is considerable confusion as to various details in different versions of the Acts, which D'Achery and Baluze have in vain endeavoured to remedy. (Martyr. Vet. Roman., Bedae, Adonis, Usuardi; Baronius, Annal. A.D. 302, cxvii.—cxliii.; Ruinart, Acta Sincera; Surius; D'Acherii Spicileg. t. xii. 634; Baluz. Miscell. t. ii. p. 77; Tillemont, v. 202.) [G. T. S.]

FELIX (175), reckoned by Matthaëus the first of the undoubted bishops of Turres (de Turribus), or Torres, a see afterwards removed to Sassari, in Sardinia (Matth. Sard. Sac. 144). He was one of the bishops exiled by Hunneric in 484 (Victor Vit. Notit. 60 in Pat. L. lviii. 276 b). Cappelletti recognises earlier bishops, and among them another Felix, A.D. 404. (Le Chiese d'Ital. xiii. 131.) [C. H.]

FELIX (176), bishop of Urgel, a city of Catalonia, near the Gallic border, at the roots of the Pyrenees, on the Segre and one of its affluents. As Urgel lay within the dominions of Charles, and belonged to the ecclesiastical province of Narbona, that monarch watched the movement represented by Felix with the greatest concern.

Felix was a native of Spain (Eginhard. Ann. a. a. 792, in Migne, Patrol. Lat. civ. 441), and early distinguished himself, both by his high character and his great ability (Alcuin, Ep. 4, ad Felic. Episc. in Migne, c. 144; Elipand. Epp. ep. 3, ad Carol. Mag. sec. 2, in Migne, xcvi. 868 c). About A.D. 783 he was consulted by Elipandus bishop of Toledo on the adoptionist theory of Christ's human nature, and returned an elaborate reply in favour of it (Eginhard. u. s.) [ADOPTIONISTS.] From thenceforth Felix and Elipandus became active in the dissemination of that opinion far and wide, Elipandus especially in the Asturias and Galicia, Felix in Septimania. Felix also endeavoured, though with no great success, to secure adherents in other parts of Gaul, and in Germany. (Jonas. Aurel. de Cult. Imag. l. i. s. init. in Migne, cvi. 308, 309.) Pope Hadrian wrote to the bishops of Spain (A.D. 785, Jaffé, Reg. Pont. 210), urging them to do their utmost to resist the further spread of the heresy (Migne, xcvi. 874; Mansi, xii. 814). In 788 Daniel, archbishop of Narbona, convened a council, in which Adoptionism was condemned as the "pestiferous heresy of Felix" (Mansi, xiii. 821; Froben. Diss. Hist. d. Haer. Elipand. Tolet. et Felic. Orgell. in Migne, ci. 303). In 792 Felix recanted before Charlemagne at the council of Ratisbon, and was then sent, for what reason does not appear, in the charge of Angilbert the son-in-law of Charles (Regino, Chron. s. a. in Migne, ci. 61 c), to Hadrian at Rome (Alcuin, adv. Elipand. i. 16, in Migne, ci. 251; Eginhard. u. s.; Mansi, xiii. 855). As Felix is not known to have been at Rome more than once, it was probably at this date that he wrote the letter to Elipandus which the latter received with extreme delight, and sent on to the brethren at Cordova who "thought rightly about God" (Elipand. Ep. 5, u. s.). From this it appears that on his arrival in Rome Felix was encouraged to hope that his opinions would meet with a better reception than that accorded to them at Ratisbon. If so, he was more than disappointed, as at a council convened by Hadrian he was again prevailed upon to recant. At the same time he drew up a libellus of which Hadrian approved, and laid it first on the altar, and afterwards on the relics of St. Peter, taking an oath that the opinions there expressed were those that he would maintain thenceforth (Eginhard. u. s.; Mansi, xiii. 856; Leo III. ap. Co. Rom. A.D. 799, Mansi, xiii. 1031). Notwithstanding his double recantation, however, Felix does not appear to have been restored to his see (Elipand. Epp. Ep. 3, ad Carolum Mag. in Migne, xcvi. 867). From Rome Felix apparently returned to Urgel, and was soon as active as ever in disseminating the opinions which he is said to have so solemnly recanted (Alc. Adv. Elip. u. s.; Leo III. u. s.). Alcuin, who had held him in the highest esteem, and still retained great respect for him, now seems to have written a letter of earnest remonstrance, addressing him as "vir venerandus et in Christi charitate desiderandus," "episcopus," "pater," "pater amandus," and reminding him of their former correspondence, he beseeches him to "arise and return to his Father, and to the bosom of the church," adding, "Christ calls you, the church longs for you, all the saints desire you as a citizen." In this letter Alcuin speaks very highly of the writings of Felix, though he takes strong exception to his Adoptionism. (Migne, ci. 119-125.) In 794 Charles convened a council at Frankfort, to which Felix was summoned, but where he does not seem to have appeared. The first canon adopted by that assembly condemns the "impious and wicked heresy of Elipandus bishop of Toletum and Felix bishop of Orgellis" (Mansi, xiii. 909).

Paulinus patriarch of Aquileia was commissioned to draw up a libellus on the subject, to be sent with the decree of the council to the "Spanish provinces" (Paulin. Libell. Sacrosyllab. in Migne, xcix. 151-166; Mansi, xiii. 873-883). Two years afterwards (A.D. 796) Paulinus held a council at Aquileia in which Adoptionism was again condemned. (Co. Forojul. in Migne, xcix. 285; Madrisius, Diss. de Conc. Forojul. ib. 534.)

In the meanwhile Felix replied in a libellus of considerable length to the letter which he had recently received from Alcuin, wherein Alcuin says that he found "more heresies or rather blasphemies than he had previously read in his writings" (Ep. 83, ad Dom. Reg. in Migne, c. 273 d). Charles, hearing of this, requested Alcuin to prepare an answer, and Alcuin consented. At the same time, on the plea that he felt himself unequal to the task alone, Alcuin prayed the king to forward copies of the libellus to Leo III., Paulinus of Aquileia, Richbonus bishop of Treves, and Teudolf bishop of Orleans, with a request that they would also answer it. Paulinus complied in his Contra Felicem Urgellitanum, which he inscribed to Charles (Migne, xcix. 343-467.) The answer of Alcuin is also extant (Contr. Fel. Urgel. Episc. in Migne, ci. 119-230).

In 799 Leidradus bishop of Lyons, Nefridius bishop of Narbona, Benedictus abbat of Aniane with many other bishops and abbats, held a council at Urgel by command of Charles, and Felix appeared before it. His Adoptionism was once more condemned, but he himself was allowed an appeal to Charles (Felic. Conf. Fid. in Migne, xcvi. 882; Mansi, xiii. 1033), who the same year summoned a council at Aix-la-Chapelle, and Felix was there heard in self-defence. His great opponent at that council was Alcuin who after several days' disputation succeeded in evoking another retraction from him (Alc. Ep. 117 ad Aquil. Pontif. in Migne, c. 348; Mansi, xiii. 1033). In the course of the same year, Charles procured another council to be held against Felix at Rome by Leo III., where his opinions were once more condemned, the time as those of a "thrice perjured heretic" (Mansi, xiii. 1031). After this Felix drew up a Confession of Faith, which, when it had been first approved by Charles and his bishops, was published and widely circulated. It is addressed especially, to the clergy of Urgel. (Alc. Ep. 108, ad Arnou. in Migne, c. 329; Fel. Conf. Fid. u. s.; Mansi, xiii. 1025.)

Felix was now sent to Leidradus at Lyons, whom he appears to have been kept in custody in the monastery of St. Martin in that city. He was still there when Agobardus succeeded Leidradus. By that time Felix had again retracted his recantations and soon had more than one discussion with Agobardus (Agobard. adv. F. Urgell. in Migne, civ. 33). After the death of Felix, A.D. 818, a "schedula" of his was found in the form of question and answer, containing an elaborate reassertion of his old opinions. This Agobardus felt it to be his duty to reply in a work which he addressed to Louis the Pious. The reply contains copious extracts from the "schedula" (Migne, u. s. 29-70). There is also extant a Liber contra Haeresim Felicis written by Alcuin (Migne, ci. 87). Besides the writings of Felix already referred to, Alcuin makes use tion of a Disputatio cum Saraceno, which, however, he had only heard of, and had never seen. It had been inquired for by Charles, and Alcuin referred him to Leidradus, with what result is not known. (Alc. Ep. 101 ad Domn. Reg. in Xigne, ci. 314.) The only work of Felix that survives in its entirety is the Confessio Fidei. (Pagi, Crit. a. a. 788 ix. 788 xi. 792 i. 794 i. 798 vii. viii.; Hist. Littér. d. Franc. iv. 428–433; Matrisina, de Fel. et Elipand. haer. Disput. historico-chronologic. in Migne, xcix. 557 et seq.; Walch, Hist. Adoptian. 1755; *Enhueber, Diss. Dogmatico-histor.-contr. Chr. FELIX (177), bishop of Uthina (cf. Tert. de Numq. 12), on Bagradas river in Prov. Proc. (Ant. Epp. 26.) [E. W. B.]

FELIX (178), Donatist bishop of Utma, a place in Numidia, mentioned as being absent from Carth. Conf. A.D. 411. (Mon. Vet. Don. p. 453, ed. Oberthür.) [H. W. P.]

FELIX (179), Donatist bishop of Uzalia, or Unia, near Utica, in proconsular Africa, present at Carth. Conf. A.D. 411. (Mon. Vet. Don. p. 453, ed. Oberthür.) [H. W. P.]

FELIX (180), bishop of Valencia, signs the acts of the eighth and ninth councils of Toledo (A.D. 635, 655), the former, which was a national council, in the thirty-seventh or thirty-eighth place; in the latter, which was provincial only, in the eighth. (Esp. Sagr. viii. 171; Aguirre-Catalani, iii. 448.) [M. A. W.]

FELIX (181) (FELICINUS), a bishop of Verona, who probably lived c. 470. (Acta SS. 19 Jul. iv. 644; Ughelli, Ital. Sacr. v. 580; Capelletti, Le Chiese d'Ital. x. 747.) [R. S. G.]

FELIX (182), bishop of Vicus Turris, in the proconsular province of Africa; was present at the synod of Carthage convened by Boniface, bishop of that see, A.D. 525. (Mansi, viii. 648; Marcelli, Africa Christ. i. 353.) [L. D.]

FELIX (183), bishop of Villa Regia, a place in Numidia, present at Carth. Conf. A.D. 411. (Mon. Vet. Don. p. 408, ed. Oberthür.) [H. W. P.]

FELIX (184), bishop of Visica, a place in proconsular Africa, present at Carth. Conf. A.D. 411. (Mon. Vet. Don. p. 403, ed. Oberthür.) [H. W. P.]

FELIX, bishop of Voeta (44).

FELIX (185), Donatist bishop of Zaba, or Zabi (M'silab), a town within the district of Lake, in Mauretania Sitifensis (Ant. Itin. 30, 3; Barb. p. 66), notorious for his violence during the period of Donatist ascendancy under Julian, especially at a place called Lemella, between Zabi and Zabi, where two Catholic deacons were slain, Primus, son of Januarius, and Donatus, son of Ninus, A.D. 361 or 362 (Opt. ii. 18.) [H. W. P.]

FELIX, bishop of Zactera (No. 93); of Zara (No. 94); of Zumma (No. 157).

Clergy and Monks.

FELIX (186) of Nola in Campania, a priest, called also by St. Augustine a confessor, whose personal history is known chiefly through the poems of Paulinus bishop of Nola A.D. 409–431, on which Bede has founded a history in prose. He was of Syrian extraction, but born at Nola, where his father Hermias had settled. He devoted himself from a very early age (fifteen) to the service of God and of the church, and, having passed through the lower grades of the ministry, was ordained priest by Maximus bishop of Nola, c. A.D. 250 (a date as early as A.D. 84 is sometimes given). During the persecution under Decius, Maximus retired from his see for refuge, and the persecutors laid hold on Felix, and having imprisoned treated him with excessive severity. But, says his encomiast Paulinus, like St. Peter he was delivered by an angel, and, having reached his bishop at a moment when he was at the point of death, revived him by means of some grapes, of which he found a bunch hanging on a thorn-bush. He took him on his shoulders, and carried him to a place of safety, where an old woman took charge of him, whilst he himself returned home and remained there until the time of danger had passed away. The circumstances just related took place, we are told, in a single night. During the reign of Valerian persecution was renewed, A.D. 257, and again Felix became an object of attack. Having taken refuge in some ruined buildings, the search of the persecutors was diverted from his place of concealment by their seeing a cobweb spread across the opening, by which they were led to suppose that it had not lately been entered by any one. Meanwhile Felix escaped by another way, and took refuge in an old water-tank, in which he was fed during six months by an old woman who lived in a neighbouring house. When persecution ceased he returned to the town, and was received with joy by his fellow-Christians. Maximus was now dead, and they made a strong effort to place him in the vacant see, but Felix refused, and persuaded them to elect Quintus, a priest of seven days' older standing than himself. We are not informed of the date of his death, but many miracles are said to have been wrought around the place of his interment, over which a church was built, according to local tradition, by pope Damasus. At the time of the Gothic invasion, A.D. 410, he is said to have appeared to many persons. St. Augustine, who was intimate with Paulinus, declared his belief in the reality of these manifestations, for when a question of serious misconduct had arisen between two members of a monastery under his superintendence, named Spes and Bonifacius, he recommended that they should both of them repair to the tomb of St. Felix, and there await a Divine revelation of their respective guilt or innocence. He also speaks of an apparition of Felix at the time of the barbarian invasion, as attested by trustworthy witnesses. (Ughelli, Ital. Sacr. vi. pp. 219, 246; Gama, Ser. Episc. p. 907; Fleury, Hist. Eccl. vii. 48; Ceillier, vol. ii. c. xvii.; vol. viii. c. ix.; Aug. Ep. 78; de Curâ pro Mort. c. i. 16; vol. vi. p. 606; de Dulcit. quaest. ii. 2; vol. vi. p. 157.) The legend became a popular one during the middle ages, and appears in the Golden Legend of Jac. de Verazine, c. 19. [PAULINUS.] [H. W. P.]

FELIX (187), a deacon of Carthage, who, having written a severe letter during the persecution of Maxentius, A.D. 311, was concealed, at some risk to himself, by Mensurius, who refused to give him up to the government. [MENSURIUS.] (Opt. i. 17.) [H. W. P.]

FELIX (188), a deacon of Milan, sent by Ambrose with a letter to the emperor Theodosius (Ambrose, Opp. iii. 1109). [J. L. D.]

FELIX (189), a young monk of Adrumetum, who went with Florus to Uzalis, and there dictated to him the letter of St. Augustine which caused so much disturbance among the brethren. In company with Cresconius and another Felix, who, from some unknown cause arrived later than his companions, he took a journey to Hippo to confer with Augustine on the matter. They were in a great hurry to return home before Easter, but Augustine prevailed on them to remain till after the festival, perhaps because of the late arrival of the other Felix, and thus gained time to explain the questions to them more fully. (Aug. Epp. 214, 215, 216; Tillemont, 318, vol. xiii. pp. 873-878; Fleury, Hist. Eccl. xxiv. 45, 46.) [CRESCONIUS (4), EVODIUS (3), FLORUS (12).] [H. W. P.]

FELIX (190), another monk of Adrumetum, companion of the preceding (August. ep. 215 al. 47). [C. H.]

FELIX (191), deacon of the church at Ruspe, who, by his desire to secure the appointment of an unsuitable person during the Vandal persecution, was the means of preventing for some years the election of a bishop. He endeavoured to arrest the consecration of Fulgentius by very questionable and even violent means, A.D. 502. He failed in his attempt, and was subsequently subdued into obedience by the gentle spirit of Fulgentius, who shortly afterwards ordained him as presbyter. He died within the year 503. (Vita Fulgentii, c. xvii.; Migne, Patr. lxxv. p. 134; Ceillier, xi. 5.) [FULGENTIUS (3).] [H. R. R.]

FELIX (192), deacon, one of the five legates whom Hormisdas specially instructed and sent in A.D. 519 to treat with John, bishop of Constantinople, and the whole Eastern church on the question of reconciliation with the Western (Baronius, Annal. ix. a. 519, 2). The legates appear to have remained some time in the East, and to have kept Hormisdas acquainted with the course of events, especially as to the circumstances and motives of the riots that were occurring in Thessalonica and all through the East. The legates returned to Rome in A.D. 520. (Ib. a. 520, 28. See the whole proceedings in Mansi, Concilia, viii. 441 sq.; Hormisdas Papae Epistola et Decreta, epp. 31 sq. ap. Migne, Patr. Lat. lxxiii. 435 sq.) [J. G.]

FELIX (193), African monk, the head of the little monastery in Byzacena to which Fulgentius retired shortly after his entrance upon the monastic life. (Vita Fulgentii, cc. 8-11, 15, in Boll. Acta SS., Jan. i. 35-38, Patr. Lat. lxx. 124 sq.) Felix strove to induce Fulgentius to assume chief command. He consented to undertake the educational department only, while Felix retained that of the property. The friendship of these two men was ardent and prolonged. They fled together, before an incursion of barbarians, to Sicca Veneria or Siccensia, and there endured great indignities from an Arian priest, who also bore the name of Felix. The monk Felix displayed a beautiful spirit of self-renunciation. Fulgentius, in his search for austerity and severity of rule, deserted Felix more than once, yet it was through Felix and his monks that Faustus ordained Fulgentius; and when that father was subsequently made bishop of Ruspe, and when he erected a monastery in close contiguity to his church, he persuaded Felix to come and preside over it; transferring to it the majority of his own monks, so that leaving the remnant of his family under the deputy control of one Vitalius, the two houses were brought under the same management. During the double exile of Fulgentius, Felix appears to have retained the position, and his life must have been prolonged for some years after the death of Thrasimund in 523. On the return of Fulgentius, though a bishop, he resolved to conduct himself as monk, and to submit in the smallest matters to the authority of the abbat Felix (ib. c. 29). [FULGENTIUS (3).] [H. R. R.]

FELIX (194), an African abbat, termed by Victor Tununensis hegumenus or prior monasterii "Guillensis" and Gillitani" (Chron. s. a. 553, 557); the monastery is called "Gillitanum" by Vigilus likewise (u. infr.) He was excommunicated by Vigilus, bishop of Rome, for his loyalty to the "Three Chapters," at the same time with Rusticus and Sebastianus, A.D. 553 (Vigil. Ep. 14, ad Rust. et Seb. Migne, Patrol. lxxix. 50 c. Mansi, ix. 359 A). He was sent into exile by the council of Constantinople, A.D. 553 (Vict. Tun. u. s. Migne, Patrol. lxxviii. 960), and died at Sinope in Hellenopontus, A.D. 557 (Vict. Tun. u. s. 961). He is mentioned by Facundus Hermianensis (cont. Mocian. Migne, Patrol. lxxvii. 855). [T. W. D.]

FELIX (195), subdeacon of Rome, directed by pope Gregory the Great in 599 to secure observation of the rules prohibiting bishops or clerics to have women residing with them (Greg. Mag. Epp. lib. ix. ind. ii. Ep. 60. Patr. Lat. lxxvii. 996.) [C. H.]

FELIX (196), an abbat in Eumorphiana, one of the Ponza islands, off the coast of Campania. He was the bearer of a letter in 591 from Gregory the Great to the subdeacon Anthemius, the rector or defensor of Campania, who is directed to supply Felix with 1500 pounds of lead. (Epist. lib. i. indict. ix. ep. 50, Migne, lxxvii. 513.) [A. H. D. A.]

FELIX (197), mentioned by Alcuin in connexion with Elipandus and the Adoptionist controversy, different from Felix bishop of Urgel. Mabillon thinks he was abbat of Obo, a Benedictine monastery founded in 780 by Adelgast, the son of king Silo in Asturias. (Alcuin, Op. ii. 587, col. 2, B, ed. Froben.; Mabill. Annot. 273, num. 53; Patr. Lat. xcvi. 889.) [C. H.]

Martyrs, arranged in order of commemoration.

FELIX (198), commem. Jan. 5, martyr with Secundus, Honorius, and ten others in Africa, perhaps under Severus, A.D. 198. (Martyr. Hieron.) [G. T. S.]

FELIX (199), commem. Jan. 7; martyr with Januarius at Heraclea, in Lucania probably. The Mart. Hieron. seems to celebrate them a second time on Feb. 14. (Martyr. Rom., Hieron., Usuardi.) [G. T. S.]

FELIX (200), commem. Feb. 12; a reader and martyr of Abitina, in Africa, under Anulinus the proconsul, with Saturninus a presbyter, lativus a senator, thirty other men, and seventeen women. [DATIVUS.] The Acta in which the examination of these martyrs is recorded are better attested than most of those which we possess. The martyrs suffered at Carthage in 304, under Diocletian and Maximian. The Acta seem to have been extracted by a Donatist within a century from their martyrdom out of the public registers. They were produced by the Donatists at the Conference of Carthage, 411, and received as genuine by the Catholic party. They are also cited by St. Augustine, contra Cresconium lib. 3, cap. 27, 29; Breviculus. Collect. cum Donatistis coll. diei tertii, cap. 17. The landlord of the house where the martyrs were seized at the celebration of the Holy Communion was also named Felix Octavius. There were two others also of the same name arrested with them, of whom nothing certain is recorded. Altogether four of the name of Felix were seized and put to death. (Martyr. Usuard.; Baluz. Miscell. t. ii.; Surius, i. 949, Feb. 11, on which day Baronius also commemorates them; Tillemont, Mém. v. 231; Ceillier, i. 20.) [G. T. S.]

FELIX (201), April 16. [SARAGOSSA, MARTYRS OF.]

FELIX (202), commemorated April 21; martyr at Alexandria with Arator a presbyter, and three others. (Martyr. Usuard., Hieron.) [G. T. S.]

FELIX (203), commemorated April 23: presbyter, martyred at Valence in Dauphiny with the deacons Achilleus and Fortunatus, said to have been sent out as missionaries by Irenaeus, bishop of Lyons. After great success in their work they were seized and put to death after various tortures by a general named Cornelius, in the beginning of the reign of Caracalla, about A.D. 200. (Martyr. Hieron., Adon., Usuardi, Notkeri; Tillemont, Mém. iii. 97.) [G. T. S.]

FELIX (204)—May 18, bishop of Hispellum (No. 83).

FELIX (205), commemorated May 24; martyr at Istria, a town on the border of Illyria, with Teollius, Servilius, and Silvanus. There is almost hopeless confusion in their history. Some places some of them, including Felix, in Syria, and the rest at Istria. (Martyr. Rom., Adonis, Usuardi.) [G. T. S.]

FELIX (206), commemorated May 28; martyr at Sardinia, one of the usual places of Roman exile, with Aemilius, Trianus, and Lucianus. (Martyr. Roman. Vet., Hieron., Adonis, Usuardi.) [G. T. S.]

FELIX (207), commemorated June 11; martyr with Fortunatus his brother, at Aquileia, under Maximian, A.D. 296. They seem to have been instances of the intermittent persecution, which went on here and there, especially among the military, under Maximian and Galerius, previous to the edict of Diocletian, which authorized a general persecution. (Mart. Rom. Vet., Adon., Usuardi.) [G. T. S.]

FELIX (208), commemorated June 23; presbyter and martyr at Sutrium, in Tuscany, under a prefect named Turcius. (Martyr. Usuardi.) [G. T. S.]

FELIX (209)—July 2, martyr with FELICISSIMUS (8). [G. T. S.]

FELIX (210), commemorated July 6, a hermit and martyr at Apollonia under the emperor Numerian, A.D. 283. (Bas. Men.) [G. T. S.]

FELIX (211)—July 15, bishop of Pavia (No. 184).

FELIX (212), commemorated July 17; martyr at Carthage, with eleven other Christians from the town of Scillita. They suffered in the persecution of Severus, A.D. 200 or 202, when Perpetua and Felicitas also were martyred. The names of his companions were Speratus, Martialis, Cythinus, Veturius, Aquilinus, Lactantius, Januarius, Generosus, Vesta, Donata, Secunda. Their Acta seem genuine, being strikingly confirmed in one particular by a contemporaneous document. The Acta call the proconsul under whom they suffered Saturninus, while Tertullian ad Scapulam, lib. iii. treating of persecutors of the church who had been divinely punished, says, "Vigellius Saturninus, who first used the sword against us, lost his eyes." Saturninus, however, seems to have used the deliberation in his course of action which was characteristic of legal procedure of this kind at Carthage. He called on the men to sacrifice on one day. On another day he called on the women to do so, and offered all of them time for consideration. One of them, Donata, replied, "We render honour to Caesar as Caesar, but worship and prayer to God alone." Persisting in their refusal, they were condemned to be beheaded. On receiving their sentence they thanked God, and as they came to the place of execution they fell on their knees and again gave thanks. The ancient Calendar of the church of Carthage, discovered by Mabillon and assigned by him to the 5th century, commemorates them on the same day. (Martyr. Roman., Vet. Hieron., Bedae, Adonis, Usuardi, Notkeri, Wandalberti; Ruinart, Acta Sincera.) [G. T. S.]

FELIX (213), commemorated July 27; martyr at Nola. In several of the martyrologies he is noted with three women, Julia, Jucunda, Januaria, who suffered at Nicomedia. They all died probably in the Diocletian persecution. (Martyr. Rom. Vet., Bedae, Notkeri; Ferrarius, Catul. Generalis.) [G. T. S.]

FELIX (214), commem. July 29, martyr in Africa with Niceta and Postiniana. Only found in Martyr. Hieron. which of course may have helped the confusion about pope Felix II. (No. 2). [G. T. S.]

FELIX (215), commemorated Aug. 1; martyr under Diocletian and Maximian at Gerona in Spain. By his Christian energy in preaching God's word he rendered himself so remarkable that Dacian, the proconsul, notorious for his persecuting zeal, ordered him to be seized and then put him to death with various torments, to which the imaginations of the monks have added numerous miracles and angelic appearances. [DACIANUS (1).] (Martyr. Adon., Usuard.; Gregor. Turon. de Glor. Mart. cap. 92.)

[G. T. S.]

FELIX (216), commemorated Aug. 22; martyr at Ostia with Martialis, Epictetus, Saturninus, Aprilis; apparently travellers or seamen who there suffered for Christ. (Martyr. Adon., Usuardi.)

[G. T. S.]

FELIX (217), commemorated Aug. 30; presbyter and martyr at the second milestone on the road to Ostia. There may possibly, or even probably, be a confusion between this and the previous martyr, as both suffered in or about the same place. The Martyrologies, however, give more details about this man. He lived under Diocletian and Maximian, and suffered in the fresh persecution which ensued upon the publication of the fourth edict, April 30, 304. Having been racked and tortured by the prefect Draco, he was taken to several shrines and commanded to sacrifice. He steadily refused, and according to a monkish legend, worked so many miracles at each shrine as ought to have converted the most determined persecutor. A Christian encountering the martyr on his way to execution and stirred up with that mania for martyrdom which then seized men like an epidemic, cried out that he also was a Christian; whereupon he was seized, and executed in company with Felix. His name being unknown, the Christians denominated him Adactus, because he was added to the crown of St. Felix. The confusion about this commemoration among the authorities is almost inextricable. Hieronymus notes him on Aug. 29, with four women, of whom one is Adausia. Bede (ed. Coln.), on Aug. 30, commemorates Felix the bishop of Tubzoca in Africa, among whose fellow martyrs was Audactus, a presbyter. In ed. Boll. of Bede both Felix of Rome and of Africa are noted on that day. All efforts to unravel the matter would now be hopeless. (Martyr. Hieron., Bedae, Adonis, Usuardi, Notkeri, Wandalberti.)

[G. T. S.]

FELIX (218), commemorated Sept. 24; martyr at Autun, with Andochius a presbyter and Thyrsus a deacon, during the reign of Marcus Aurelius, A.D. 161-180, probably about the same time as the martyrs at Lyons, A.D. 177. (Martyr. Roman., Hieron., Bedae.)

[G. T. S.]

FELIX (219), commemorated Oct. 12; martyr with 4976 others, bishops, priests, deacons, and laymen, in Africa, under Hunneric, A.D. 477. Cyprian and Felix were the most distinguished presbyters who suffered at that time. They were martyrs in behalf of the Catholic faith as against Arianism, which Hunneric and the Vandals supported. The numbers may seem large, but all the authorities represent the Arian persecution of North Africa, which lasted from A.D. 429 to 523, when the accession of Hilderic brought peace, to have been a very frightful one. (Martyr. Adonis, Usuardi; Victor Vitensis, de Persecut. Vandal. l. 2.) Victor was himself a bishop of Vita in Numidia, and exiled by Hunneric. Other authorities for the Vandal persecution are the life of St. Fulgentius, who was distinguished in the persecution of Thrasimund, A.D. 496, contained in Bibliotheca Max. Patrum, tom. ix. pp. 4-16; Procopius, de Bell. Vandal. c. 7, 8; Gibbon, cap. xxxvii. Ruinart, the last editor of Victor Vitensis, has illustrated the whole subject with a copious and learned apparatus of notes and supplement.

FELIX (220)—Oct. 24; martyr. (No. 174.)

FELIX (221)—Nov. 5. The Hieronymian Martyrology commemorates him in Italy on Nov. 1, and places a Felix in Africa on Nov. 5. Baronius places him under Trajan, while the acts of Caesarius place him under Claudius Nero. Tillemont considers the whole story of this Felix and his fellow-martyrs, Eusebius, Caesarius, and Julianus at Terracina, to have been very much corrupted. [CAESARIUS (1).] He says pithily that it is best to leave them in the number of those whose saintliness we are sure of, but of whom we know nothing else. (Martyr. Hieron., Bedae, Usuardi, Wandalberti; Tillemont, Mem. Eccles. ii. p. 574.)

[G. T. S.]

FELIX (222), commem. Nov. 6; martyr at Toniza in Africa. St. Augustine, when expounding the 127th Psalm, is said to refer to him where he says, "Felix martyr, verè felix et nomine et coronâ, cujus hodie dies est." (Martyr. Hieron., Adonis, Usuardi.)

[G. T. S.]

FELIX (223)—Nov. 15; martyr (122).

FELIX, martyrs. See also Nos. 32, 121.

Miscellaneous.

FELIX (224), addressed by Sidonius Apollinaris (ii. Ep. 3) in a letter of congratulation on his elevation to the dignity of patrician.

[R. T. S.]

FELIX (225), a notary to whom Fulgentius of Ruspe addressed a work entitled De Trinitate, in thirteen chapters. He is addressed in endearing terms, and reminded that he is surrounded by those who are infected with various errors. Fulgentius furnished him with a practical vade mecum of the orthodox faith. The only authority to which he appeals, with the exception of one quotation from Augustine, is Holy Scripture. [FULGENTIUS (3).] (Fulg. Opp. p. 498 in Migne, Patr. lxx.; Ceillier, xi. 50.)

[H. R. R.]

FELIX (226) GALLUS, friend of Cassiodorus. He was advanced to the consulship by Theodoric, in recognition of his public services (Cassiod. Var. lib. ii. Ep. i. and ii.). He is probably the same person whom Cassiodorus eulogizes (Var. lib. xi. praef.) as having assisted him in the composition of the epistles contained in the first ten books of Varieties. [E. M. Y.]

FELIX (227), chartularius and "vir consularis," commended by Gregory I. to Maximian bishop of Syracuse. Gregory writes to him more than once, and in one letter apologizes if any property under the charge of Felix has been wrongfully occupied by officers of the church, and orders restitution. (Greg. Magn. Epist. lib. i. indict. x. ep. 27; lib. ix. indict. ii. ep. 14. Migne, lxxvii. 560, 959.) [A. H. D. A.]

FELIX (228), a lapsed Christian in Africa in the diocese of Caldonius, with whom he was connected (Prosimus mihi vinculis, v. l. ap. edd. Florus), who subsequently confessed and suffered banishment and confiscation; he had been assistant presbyter (?) to one Decimus (Presbyterium subministrabat sub Decimo, v. Fell); was married to Victoria, who, as well as one Locius, shared his fall and recovery. (Cyp. Ep. 24.) [E. W. B.]

FELIX (229), a Christian who begged the prayers of St. Fructuosus of Tarragona on his way to martyrdom. Fructuosus replied, "I must pray for the whole Catholic church, East and West." (Ruinart, Acta Sanc. 220; Ceillier, Act. Ecc. ii. 388.) [FRUCTUOSUS (1).] [R. T. S.]

FELIX (230). [MINUTIUS FELIX.]

FELIX (231), "Comes Sacrarum Largitionum" under the emperor Julian (Cod. Theod. II. xlii. 5, March 9, A.D. 362). In that capacity he was also a member of the imperial "consistorium," and is mentioned as such in the Theodosian Code (xi. xxxviii. 5: March 23, 362).

Previous to the accession of Julian, Felix had professed to be a Christian, but with the change of masters he became a fierce pagan (Libanius, pro Aristoph. Op. ed. Morell. ii. 218; Theodoret, H. E. iii. 12; Philostorg. H. E. vii. 10), and was one of the three officers who were sent by Julian to spoil the great church at Antioch; on which occasion he is related to have said, "See with what vessels the Son of Mary is served!" (Theodoret, u. s.) His death soon after was sudden and appalling (Ammian. Marcellin. xxiii. 1, before Jan. 1, 363; Sozomen, H. E. v. 8, s. f. Theod. iii. 13: Philostorg. u. s.). [ELPIDIUS (36).] [T. W. D.]

FELIX (232), condemned with Jovinian as sharing his heresy by pope Siricius, and by St. Ambrose and other bishops assembled at Milan (Amb. Opp. iii. 1044). [J. Ll. D.]

FELIX (233), a Manichaean teacher, with whom Augustine held a public disputation, Dec. 1 and Dec. 12, A.D. 404 (Augustin. Retract. ii. 1 & Op. i. 633, ed. Migne, Patrol.; de Act. c. Felice Manich. ibid. 521). It seems to have been a judicial proceeding, Felix being in custody, and his books under "public seal" (Possid. Vit. c. 16, et ii. 1, 553, u. s.). Five years before this the emperor Honorius had addressed an edict to Demianus, then "vicarius" of Africa, commanding him to exercise especial vigilance for the suppression of Manichaeism (Cod. Theod. IV. v. 35, June 17, A.D. 399), and this is an example of the vigilance which had been thus evoked. Gothofred ascribes the edicts of Honorius against Manichaeism to the influence of Augustine (u. in d. l.).

If the letter of Augustine to "a certain Manichaean presbyter" (Ep. lxxix. Op. ii. 272, l. 1) was addressed to Felix, he was the su-cessor of Fortunatus at Hippo [FORTUNATUS (48)].

Augustine describes him as "ineruditus in liberalibus literis" (Retract. u. s.). On the second day of the disputation Felix was persuaded to recant and subscribe a written anathema of Manes. He appears to have been then set at liberty (act. ii. c. ult. 551, u. s.). [FAUSTUS (34).] [T. W. D.]

FELIX (234), a person to whom St. Augustine wrote in reply to a letter concerning a young lady placed under the protection of the church until she came of age. Felix seems to have been the husband of her aunt, and her mother was alive, though absent from some cause, but her father was dead. A proposition had been made to marry her to the son of one Rusticus, who was still a pagan, but she herself appears to have wished to take religious vows; but St. Augustine's letter is to the effect that, until she was of age to judge for herself, and unless her mother should appear, which was quite possible, the church, to whose care she had been committed, could not properly relinquish the charge of her, and that for the present neither marriage nor a monastic life could be decided for her; but that the church could not, so long as she remained under its care, allow her to be betrothed to an unbeliever. The letters of Augustine on this subject are addressed to Felix, perhaps the girl's uncle, to Benenatus, a bishop under whose care she appears to have been, and to Rusticus. (Aug. Epp. 252, 253, 254, 255; Tillemont, vol. xiii. p. 261.) [H. W. P.]

FELIX (235), uncle of Flavian, the instructor of Paulus Diaconus. Paulus (vi. 7) says of him during the reign of Cunipert, 680-702, "Eo tempore floruit in arte grammatica Felix." He was liberally patronized by the king.

[A. H. D. A.]

FELIX (236), presbyter. Alcuin has a metrical inscription: "Ad Aram SS. Thaddei, Felicis, Samsonis." The line referring to St. Felix runs—

"Presbyter et vero dictus cognomine Felix."

(Alcuin. Carm. 143, Opp. i. 219, ed. Froben.)

[C. H.]

FEME, daughter of Cairell, virgin and martyr, commemorated on Sept. 17 (Mart. Doneg.), was one of the many children of Dediva, daughter of Trena, of the race of Eoghan son of Niall. Adam King (Bishop Forbes, Kal. Scott. Saints, i. 162) commemorates "S. Eupheme, virgin and martyr under Diocletian, A.D. 290," at Sept. 16; on the same day the Breviary of Aberdeen has a commemoration of St. Euphemia and her companions; and among the notes left by O'Clery (Mart. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, p. xliv.) is a reference, along with another, to "Euphemia i. FEME vv. et martyres ambo 16 seu 17 Septembr." It is possible that the Irish Feme may be a reflection of, or mixed up with, the Greek martyr Euphemia, in whose church the fourth general council met at Chalcedon, in A.D. 451, and who is venerated on Sept. 16 (Evagrius, Eccl. Hist. lib. ii. c. 3; Fleury, Eccl. Hist. B. xxviii. § 1, Oxford, 1843, vol. iii. 331-32; Butler, Lives of the Saints, Sept. 16; Kal. Drummond, Sept. 16, in Bishop Forbes, Kal. Scott. Saints, 24, calling her "Sancte Eufenie.") [J. G.]

FEOCA, ST., an Irish devotee, who gave name to the parish of St. Feock, on Falmouth harbour, in Cornwall, where the Celtic tongue was still spoken down to 1640. It is possible that the name is the same as that of St. Fiecc, bishop of Sletty, in Ireland, to whom is doubtfully attributed the famous hymn in praise of St. Patrick. (Todd, St. Patrick, 1864.)

[C. W. B.]

FEOLCBERHT, presbyter in the diocese of Elmham, signs the synod of Clovesho, 803. (Kemble, C. D. 1024.)

[C. H.]

FEOLOGELD, the sixteenth archbishop of Canterbury (M. H. B. 616). Before he was raised to the archiepiscopal see he had been an abbat in one of the Kentish monasteries, and his name in that capacity occurs in several charters. Not to mention the spurious act of Bapchild, misdated 798 (Kemble, C. D. 1018; Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 517), Feologeld, priest and abbat, is found among the Kentish abbats at the Council of Clovesho in 803 (Kemble, C. D. 1024; Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 546); he attests an act of archbishop Ethelheard in 805 (K. C. D. 189), and one of king Cuthred the same year (ib. 190). He is mentioned along with archbishop Wulfred, and abbat Wernoth of St. Augustine's as one of the chief members of a council at Acle in 810 (K. C. D. 256; Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 567); consents to a grant of Ceolwulf, king of Mercia, in 823 (K. C. D. 217), and to the reconciliation of Wulfred and Cwenthrytha at the Council of Clovesho in 825 (K. C. D. 220; Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 601). On the death of archbishop Wulfred he was elected to the archbishopric. According to the Chronicle, in 829 (which must be corrected to 831, both because of the error of two years in the computation of the chronicle and because Wulfred survived until the latter year, K. C. D. 227, dying on the 24th of March, Ob. Cant. in Ang. Sac. i. 53), archbishop Wulfred died, and after him abbat Feologeld was chosen to the archbishopric on the 7th of the Kalends of May; "and he was consecrated on a Sunday, the 5th of the Ides of June, and he died on the 3rd of the Kalends of September" (M. H. B. 344). It must be observed that this notice occurs only in one MS. of the Chronicle, all the others contenting themselves with the note under 830 [832]; "this year Ceolnoth was chosen bishop and ordained, and abbat Feologeld died." The day, however, given for Feologeld's consecration was a Sunday in 832, and as the name occurs in nearly all the lists of the archbishops, the authority of the single MS., which is a Canterbury MS., may be accepted as sufficient. Some few lists omit the name of Feologeld and substitute that of Swithred, of whom, however, nothing is known (M. H. B. 616). The pontificate of a few weeks was too short to contain any events of historical importance, and the name of Feologeld as archbishop is not found on coins or in charters. It would be interesting to know over what abbey he had presided before his promotion: it was probably in or near Canterbury, but we know too little of the constitution of the cathedral at the time to favour the conjecture that he may have presided as abbat over the monastery of Christ Church itself. See Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 609; Elmham, p. 14.

FERADHACH [FEARADHACH] (1) Abbat of Saighir, now Serkieran, in the barony of Ballybritt, King's County, died A.D. 814 (Four Mast. by O'Donovan, A.D. 809, i. 421).

(2) Son of Scannal, scribe and abbat of Achadh-bo-Cainnigh, now Aghaboe, in the barony of Upper Ossory, Queen's County, died A.D. 813 (Four Mast. by O'Donovan, A.D. 808, i. 421).

(3) Son of Seigheni, abbat of Reaschna, now Rathlin island, off Antrim, died A.D. 799 (Four Mast. A.D. 794, i. 403; Ann. Ult. A.D. 798).

[J. G.]

FERDACHRICH (FEARDACHRICH, FERDACHRIOCH, FIRDACHRICH) is etymologically "the man of two boundaries or countries."

(1) Abbat of Dairinis, died A.D. 744 (Ann. Tig.). He seems to have become mixed up in the Kalendars with St. Maccarthen of Cogher (MACCARTHEN). This Dairinis (Oak-Island) is identified as Molan or Molana, where St. Maelanfaidh erected an abbey or monastery at the mouth of the Blackwater, near Youghal, co. Waterford. (Four Mast. by O'Donovan, A.D. 742, i. 343; Ann. Ult. A.D. 746.)

(2) Abbat of Imleach (Emly, co. Tipperary) and Leithghlinn (Leighlin, co. Carlow), died A.D. 742. (Ann. Tig.; Four Mast. by O'Donovan, A.D. 737, i. 339.)

(3) Son of Conghalach or Congal, died A.D. 722. (Ann. Tig.; Four Mast. and Ann. Ult. A.D. 721.)

(4) Abbat and bishop of Armagh, succeeded Cele-Peter at Armagh, A.D. 758, and died A.D. 768. In the Irish Annals, Ferdacrigh is always called abbat, but Ware, Lanigan, and other authors usually follow the Psalter of Castel in placing him among the bishops or archbishops of Armagh. (Four Mast. by O'Donovan, A.D. 771, i. 376 n. 2, 377; Ann. Ult. A.D. 767; Lanigan, Eccl. Hist. Ir. iii. c. 19, §§ 13, 14; Ware Ir. Bps. by Harris, 41; Stuart, Armagh, 94.)

[J. G.]

FERDOMHNACH (FEARDOMHNACH, latinized FERDOMNACUS, and phonetically contracted into ERDOMHNACH), literally "churchman."

(1) Abbat of Tuam, died A.D. 782, and commemorated on June 10 (Mart. Doneg.). He is included among the bishops of Tuam. (Four Mast. by O'Donovan, A.D. 777, i. 383; Ann. Ult. A.D. 781; Lanigan, Eccl. Hist. Ir. iii. c. 19, § 16.)

(2) Scribe of Armagh, died A.D. 732. (Ann. Tig.; Four Mast. A.D. 726; Ann. Ult. A.D. 731; Lanigan, Eccl. Hist. Ir. iii. 163, but placing his death in A.D. 727.)

[J. G.]

FERDULFUS, duke of Friuli, in the beginning of the 8th century. He bribed the Slaves to invade his duchy, and was ultimately killed in fighting against them. (Paulus Diaconus vi. 24.)

[A. H. D. A.]

FERFIO (FEARFIO), son of Fairbre, abbat of Kilcomreragh, Westmeath, died 762. O'Conor calls him "Abbas coadjutor Midiae," and "Predicator Midiae," but by a misinterpretation of the annals (Four Mast. by O'Donovan, A.D. 751, 359, 360 n. 2; O'Conor, Rer. Hib. Script. iv. 9 at Ann. Ult. A.D. 761).

[J. G.]

FERFUGILL (FEARFUGHAILL, FIRFUGILL), of Clondalkin, bishop, commemorated on March 10, is not found in the Mart. Doneg., but in Mart. Tallaght there is on this day "Ferfughill Epa." (Kelly, Cal. Ir. Saints, xviii.) In his short memoir, Colgan (Acta SS. 577) states that he flourished after the middle of the 6th century, when, having been raised to the episcopal dignity, he governed the church of Clondalkin (now a parish and village in the baronies of Uppercross and Newcastle, co. Dublin), and that after a rule of many years, and the acquisition of a fame for sanctity, he died A.D. 783. Lanigan (Eccl. Hist. Ir. iii. 202) places his death in A.D. 785, but the true date is A.D. 789 (Ann. Ul. A.D. 788; Four Mast. by O'Donovan, A.D. 784, i. 391). [J. G.]

FERGEOLUS, Jan. 12, bishop of Gratianopolis (Grenoble), and martyr in the 7th century. (Acta SS. Boll. Jan. 1, 743.) [G. T. S.]

FERGHUS (FEARGHUS, FERGHASS, FERGUS, FERGUS), from 'fear' a man and 'gus,' strength or valour (Joyce, Irish Names of Places, 2 ser. 132). In Mart. Doneg. there are eleven dedications to saints of this name, and in Mart. Tallaght thirteen, called Ferghus, Fergus, and Fergusa, but of most of these, as usual, we know merely the feast. [FERGUS.]

(1) Of Drumlethglas, commemorated Mar. 31. He was son of Aengus, and descended from Caelbhadh king of Ireland, (Four Mast.). Ware (Irish Bishops, by Harris, 194) places him second in the list of bishops at Down, but Lanigan (Eccl. Hist. Ir. ii. c. 12, § 1) and Reeves (Eccl. Antiq. 142-44) consider him the first. His death is entered at different years in the Irish Annals from A.D. 557 to 589, but the true date is probably A.D. 584 (Ann. Tig.). He appears to have been a distinguished person, for the fact of his having founded Cill m-Bian (a place now unknown) is mentioned, along with his death, in all the Annals. (Four Mast. by O'Donovan, i. 211.)

(2) Son of Cathal, a bishop, died A.D. 765 (Four Mast.), but his place in Ireland is unknown. [J. G.]

FERGIL (1), the Geometer. [VIRGILIUS.]

(3) Farghil of Cill-mor-Eimhire, now probably the church of Kilmore-Oneilland, co. Armagh, died A.D. 770. (Ann. Ul. A.D. 769; Four Mast. by O'Donovan, A.D. 765, i. 367, 368 n. °.)

(4) Ua Taidhg, scribe of Lusca, now Lusk, co. Dublin, died A.D. 800. (Four Mast. by O'Donovan, A.D. 795, i. 405; Ann. Ul. A.D. 799.) [J. G.]

FERGNA (FEARGNA, FERGNAUS, VIRGNAUS). These are some of the forms of a name which is found among the Scotch and Irish saints, and is etymologically the diminutive from the Irish "ferg," anger.

(1) Brit, fourth abbat of Iona, and bishop, commemorated on March 2. Of this person, Colgan (Acta SS. 448-50) gives a life which runs up under eight heads the most of what is known or imagined about him. He was of noble Irish extraction, being son of Failbhe, who was descended from Conall Gulban through his son Iona Boghaine. He followed his relation, St. Columba, to Iona, and, as his disciple, so progressed in learning and virtue as to merit participation in a heavenly vision, as related by St. Adamnan (Vit. S. Colomb. iii. c. 19). He became abbat of Iona, A.D. 605, on the death of St. Laisren (Ann. Tig.) In that office he continued till his death A.D. 623. A gloss on Mar. O'Gorman calls him a bishop, and this is followed in the entry of his death and feast in the Four Mast. (A.D. 622) and Mart. Doneg. (March 2), but the Ann. Inisfall. (A.D. 616), Ann. Ul. (A.D. 622), Ann. Tigern. (A.D. 623), Mart. Tall. and Kal. Drum. merely call him abbat. Such an exceptional appointment as a bishop-abbat at Iona at that period, and especially when taken in connexion with the testimony of Bede (Eccl. Hist. iii. 4) that the abbat was always a priest, cannot be entertained by Dr. Reeves as other than a later fabrication. (Colgan, Tr. Thaum. 370 n.¹⁰, 481 n.²²; Lanigan, Eccl. Hist. Ir. ii. c. 14, § 12; Ussher, Eccl. Ant. vi. 245, Ind. Chron. A.D. 588, 623; Reeves, Adamnan. 223-24, 372, 463; Bollandists, Acta SS. Mar. 2, t. i. 125, placing him among their pretermessi: O'Hanlon, Irish Saints, iii. 41-2; C. Innes, Orig. Par. Scot. ii. pt. i. 287; Haddan and Stubbs, Councils, &c. ii. pt. i. 135; Skene, Celt. Scot. ii. 151 sq.; Bp. Forbes, Kal. Scott. Saints, 6, 199, 336; Kelly, Cal. Ir. Saints, 81.)

(2) In his Vit. S. Columbae (iii. c. 23), St. Adamnan tells of a Feargna who retired from the monastery in Iona, and spent twelve years as an anchorite at Muirbulmar, on the island of Hinba, one of the Garveloch islands on the west of Scotland. He was at Cluain-Finchoil in Ire and with Lugaidh, when the death of St. Columba was revealed to the latter by a vision. It seems evident from Adamnan's narrative that this Feargna or Virgnous could not have been the abbat of Iona, but only a hermit in the solitary island Eilean na Naomh, where the beehive cells of the recluses are still to be seen (Skene, Celt. Scot. ii. 131, 246; Reeves, Adamnan, 322 sq., Edinb. 1874). [J. G.]

FERGUS (FERGUSIANUS) (1), bishop and confessor, has his legend given in the Breviary of Aberdeen (Prop. SS., pars aestiv. ff. 163-64), but in the other Scotch kalendars is usually called Terguse and Tergusius. The truth of the legend seems wonderfully confirmed by the church dedications which mark his route, and appear to stamp the story as a genuine tradition. Probably of Irish birth, and after being many years in Ireland as a bishop, he came with a few presbyters and clerics to the western parts of Scotland, and settled for a time in Stratherne, where he founded three churches, Strogeth, Blackford, and Dolpatrick, all dedicated to St. Patrick. Thence he went north to Caithness (Cathania), where for some time he occupied himself in converting the barbarous people by his doctrine and by his life; there we find Wick and Halkirk dedicated to him. Passing southward again, he visited Buchan in Aberdeenshire, and built a basilica at a place called Lungley, now the parish of St. Fergus; Dyce in the same county was dedicated to him. Still southward, on the same coast, and beside Montrose in Forfarshire, a chapel was dedicated at Inchbrayoch to St. Fergus. And at Glamis in the south-west of the same county the legend gives the place of his rest; this, the church of Glamis, is dedicated to St. Fergus, and there there are St. Fergus's cave and his well. A pious abbat of Scone is said to have carried off St. Fergus's head long after to the monastery of Scone, where it must have remained till the year 1503, when king James IV. had a silver case provided for it, and made his "offerand to Sanct Fergus heide in Scone." The carrying the head to Scone might suggest a reason for the curious fact of a close connexion existing between the church of Caithness and the abbey of Scone, and of the abbat of Scone holding a prebend in the cathedral church of Caithness; but on the other hand we find offerings made from that county to "God and St. Michael" and to the canons remaining at Scone, without any reference to St. Fergus (C. Innes, Orig. Par. Scot. i. pt. i. p. xxiii. n.; ii. pt. ii. 621-22). His festival is variously given from Nov. 15 to 18, and his time is uncertain. (Book of Deer, pp. iii-iv.; C. Innes, Orig. Par. Scot. i. p. xxiii. and Sket. Earl. Scot. Hist. 5, 71-2, 124, and al.; Bp. Forbes, Kal. Scott. Saints, 168, 219, 242, 336-38; Ogilvie, Christ. in Buchan, 14-5, 34, 43-5; Skene, Celt. Scot. ii. 232-33; Haddan and Stubbs, Councils, &c., ii. pt. i. 7, 116, 141; Camerarius, de Scot. Fort. 199.)

(2) Son of Conall, Erenach of Armagh, died A.D. 732 (Ann. Ult. A.D. 731).

(3) Bishop of Duleek, co. Meath, died A.D. 783 (Ann. Ult. A.D. 782).

(4) [FERGHUS.]

[J. G.]

FERGUSTUS, a bishop, but of what place is unknown. Along with "Sedulius Britanniae Episcopus de genere Scotorum," he signed the canons passed at the council held in Rome, under pope Gregory II. A.D. 721, as "Fergustus Episcopus" (Mansi, viii. 109). There was sufficient intercourse at that period between Rome and Britain to account for the appearance of a Pict from Ireland being found at the threshold of the apostles, but we have hardly sufficient material for otherwise identifying him or fixing his see if he had one. Dempster ascribes to him Commentarium in Evangelium S. Matthaei, lib. i., and says Bale calls him Pergustus. [FERGUS (1).] (Haddan and Stubbs, Councils, &c. ii. pt. i. 7, 116, 141; Skene, Celt. Scot. ii. 232; Bp. Forbes, Kal. Scott. Saints, 337-38; Ussher, Eccl. Ant. c. 16, wks. vi. 331.) [J. G.]

FERMERIUS (popularly FRAIGNE), ST. and confessor in Angoulême, and the isle of Bouin, in the department of La Vendée, commemorated Aug. 30. The Bollandists identify him with St. Fremerius, martyr in the diocese of Bazas. (Boll. Acta SS. Aug. vi. 842, Oct. i. 32.) [S. A. B.]

FEROX, bishop of Macriana Major, a place in Byzacene, present at Carth. Conf. in A.D. 411. (Mon. Vet. Don. p. 402, ed. Oberthür.)

[H. W. P.]

FERRANDUS, deacon of Carthage, disciple of Fulgentius of Ruspe. [FULGENTIUS (3).]

FERRANUS, "Episcopus Culdaeus in Scotia," is mentioned by the Scotch annalists, and placed by Dempster in the middle of the 8th century, but by Lesley in the end of the 3rd or beginning of the 4th. The former says he wrote Sermones pios, lib. i., and Camerarius places his feast on May 24. (Boethius, Scot. Hist. vi. f. 99; Dempster, Hist. Eccl. Gent. Scot. i. 292; Leslaeus, de Reb. Gest. Scot. lib. iii. 117; Camerarius, de Scot. Fort. 150; Tanner, Bibl. 278; Bp. Forbes, Kal. Scott. Saints, 237, 338.) [J. G.]

FERREOLUS (1), June 16, presbyter and martyr at Besançon. He suffered with Ferrutio, a deacon. They are said to have been sent there by Irenaeus, bishop of Lyons. (Martyr. Hieron., Wandalberti (which place the commemoration on Sept. 5), Adonis, Bedae, Usuardi; Greg. Turon. de Glor. Mart. c. 71; Gall. Christ. xv. 4; Tillemont, Mém. iii. 98; Surius, Vitae SS. t. ii. and t. vii.) A street in Besançon is called Rue des Martyrs, as being the traditional place of their sufferings. [G. T. S.]

FERREOLUS (2), Sept. 18, martyr at Vienne in Gaul, under Maximian, about A.D. 304. He was a military tribune when the persecution broke out. For a time he exercised his influence to protect Christians like St. Julianus, who had taken shelter with him. At last, seeing the speedy advent of the persecution, he advised them to fly, and prepared himself to meet the coming storm. The prefect, Crispinus, shortly afterwards called on him to sacrifice. Upon his refusal, he was tortured and imprisoned. In his Acts we read of a miraculous deliverance from the prison-house, which, however, admits of a perfectly natural explanation, in the secret presence of many Christians among the officials. Being recaptured, he was put to death by beheading. (Martyr. Hieron., Bed., Adon., Usuard.; Greg. Turon. Léb. de Mirac. Juliani, cap. ii.; Sidon. Apoll. lib. vii. ep. 1, ad Mamercian; Venantius Fortunatus, lib. viii. car. 4; Ruinart, Acta Sincera.) [G. T. S.]

FERREOLUS (3), ST., fifth bishop of Uzes, succeeding his uncle St. Firminus, and followed by Albinus. He is said to have been born in the province of Narbonne, of noble parents named Ansbertus and Blithild, or Blitildis, A.D. 521. Among his ancestors he numbered the emperor Avitus and two prefects of Gaul, while on the mother's side he was a grandson of king Lothaire I. At the age of seven he was sent in company with his uncle St. Firminus, who was then only twelve years old, to Roricus, bishop of Uzes, and his great uncle, for instruction in letters and religion. At the age of thirty-two, upon the death of his uncle, he was consecrated to the see, A.D. 553. He is said to have striven earnestly for the conversion of the Jews, who were numerous in the province, mixing freely with them and inviting them to his table, so freely indeed, that his enemies accused him to king Childebert of plotting with them against the throne and country. He was summoned to the palace and sent into exile at Paris, where he remained three years, until the king, being convinced of his innocence, remitted him to his diocese with presents. On his return he convened a diocesan synod to discuss the means of converting all the Jews of the district. Many, it is said, became Christians, and the stubborn were compelled to labour on the earth or emigrate elsewhere. He died A.D. 581 (Gall

(Hist. vi. 613), and is commemorated Jan. 4. Gregory of Tours says, "At this time died Ferreolus, bishop of Uzes, a man of great sanctity and full of wisdom and understanding, who, in imitation, as it were, of Sidonius, compiled several books of letters" (Hist. Franc. vi. 7). According to the Chartae Fontanellenses (Spicilegium, ii. 33), he suffered martyrdom. There is still extant a rule composed by him for a monastery, which he built at Uzes, and which was called after him. Before instituting it, he submitted it to the criticism of Lucretius, bishop of Die. (Migne, Patr. Lat. lxxvi. 959; cf. Ceillier, Hist. des auteurs sacrés xi. 312, for a short statement of it.) [S. A. B.]

FERREOLUS (4), ST., fourteenth bishop of Limoges, succeeding Exotius and followed by Adepius. In the eighteenth year of his reign (A.D. 579), Chilperic I. laid very heavy taxes on his kingdom, which caused great distress and riots. At Limoges Marcus the royal commissioner was saved from the popular fury by the intervention of Ferreolus. The bishop rebuilt the church of Briva Curretia (Brive-la-Gaillarde). In A.D. 585 he was present at the second council of Micon. He is said to have died A.D. 595. He is commemorated Sept. 18. (Greg. Tur. Hist. Franc. v. 29, vii. 10; Mansi, ix. 957; Vita S. Audeberti, m. 16, 17 in Mabill. Acta SS. Ord. S. Benedicti, i. 352; Migne, Patr. Lat. lxxi. 1127, 1138; Gall. Christ. ii. 503.) [S. A. B.]

FERREOLUS (5), twenty-fourth bishop of Autun, succeeding Racho, and followed by St. Leger. His name occurs in the Gesta Dagoberti I. Regis, cap. xxxvii. (Migne, Patr. Lat. xcvi. 1411), and in a charter of the same king in favour of the matricularii of the monastery of St. Denys (Migne, Patr. Lat. lxxx. 535). He was present at the council of Châlons (circ. A.D. 650), and died in 657. The see remained vacant for two years. (Mansi, x. 1193; Gall. Christ. vi. 348.) [S. A. B.]

FERREOLUS (6), ST., thirteenth bishop of Grenoble, succeeding Clarus, and followed by Bas, is said to have been martyred A.D. 683, but accounts differ as to the manner of his death. According to the Breviary of Vienne (Jan. 16), he was killed by a blow from a staff while preaching to the people of Grenoble. But Sausse (Jan. 12) makes him one of the victims of Ervin, mayor of the palace, by whom he was first driven from his see and afterwards murdered. (Boll. Acta SS. Jan. 1, 743; Gall. Christ. vi. 222.) [S. A. B.]

FERREOLUS (7). [ERNAN.]

FERRIOLUS, bishop of Osca (Huesca), in the province of Aragon, between A.D. 803-809. He is also called bishop of Aragon, and again "Episcopus in sancto Petro et in Iacca." Huesca was the metropolis, but being in the hands of the Moors, the bishop resided at Jacca till such time as Huesca could be recovered, when Jacca was to take the position of a suffragan see. (Larraz, Fundacion de Huesca, p. 351; Gams, Series Episc. 36.) [L. D.]

FERROCINCTUS, one of the bishops who subscribed the third council of Paris (A.D. 557) without appending his see. Le Cointe conjectures him to have been the fifth bishop of Evreux, succeeding Licinius and followed by Viator. (Mansi, ix. 747; Le Cointe, Ann. Eccl. Franc. an. 557, n. xxxvii. tom. i. 829; Gall. Christ. xi. 567.) [S. A. B.]

FERRUTIO, martyr. [FERREOLUS (1).]

FERRUTIUS, Oct. 28, a military martyr at Mainz, probably about the year A.D. 296, when a considerable number of soldiers suffered. In Gaul, as in Africa, an idea seems to have just then got abroad among many, that the Roman military service was utterly unlawful for Christians. [FABIUS (2) VICTOR, FABIUS (3).] Ferrutius having resigned his post was seized, imprisoned, and starved to death by his commanding officer. His memory is preserved for us in a sermon preached by Moginhard, a monk of Fulda, upon the translation of his relics to the newly-founded monastery of Bleidenstadt, three miles from Mainz, A.D. 850. A church had been previously dedicated to him by Riculfe, archbishop of Mainz, A.D. 812. (Martyr. Rom.; Ceillier, xii. 523.) [G. T. S.]

FESTUS (1), Sept. 19, deacon of Beneventum, who, when visiting St. Januarius his bishop at Puteoli, where he had been arrested for the sake of Christ, was also seized by a magistrate named Timothy, cast to the beasts, and beheaded. He suffered under Diocletian and Maximinian, A.D. 304. [JANUARIUS.] (Martyr. Rom. vet., Adonis, Usuardi; Basil. Menol.) [G. T. S.]

FESTUS (2), bishop of Strategis, a town of unknown position in the ecclesiastical province of Hellas, supposed to be Stratus in Acarnania. He was one of the Nicene fathers, A.D. 325. (Mansi, ii. 696; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. ii. 222.) [L. D.]

FESTUS (3), a pupil of St. Basil, who addressed to him and Magnus (probably Festus's brother), a letter of earnest affection, reminding the young men how he had planted the seeds of piety in their hearts, had watered them with his prayers, and entertained good hope of their bringing forth worthy fruit. Basil testifies to the delight of imparting knowledge to those who will open their minds to receive it; and rejoices in the thought that, though separated from them, he can still instruct them by his letters, if only they will attend to his words. (Basil, Epist. 294 [210].) [E. V.]

FESTUS (4), a Christian in the imperial service, possessing authority, perhaps as a landed proprietor, over many persons in the diocese of Hippo Regius. In pursuance of the edict of Honorius, A.D. 405, he appears to have written letters with the view of reclaiming these persons from Donatism, but without success. St. Augustine wrote a letter to him describing the excesses and inconsistencies of the Donatists, and justifying the imperial proceedings against them, but recommended that instead of communicating directly with these persons, Festus should send out trustworthy agents who should confer with him in the first instance, and arrange the plan of operations for endeavouring to reclaim them (Aug. Ep. 89). [H. W. P.]

FESTUS (5), a Roman senator, and father of Elpis, reputed to have been the wife of Boethius. He is probably the same person who is coupled with Symmachus by Ennodius (Puraen. Didasc.) [E. M. Y.]

FESTUS (6), bishop of Satafis, in the province of Mauretania Sitifensis; summoned to a conference at Carthage, and subsequently banished by the Vandal king Hunneric, A.D. 484. (Notitia in Victor. Vit. 59, Migne, Patrol. Lat. lviii.; Morcelli, Africa Christ. i. 271.) [L. D.]

FESTUS (7), patrician of Rome, employed by king Theodoric on an embassy to the emperor Anastasius when Anastasius II. was elected pope, A.D. 496. He was mixed up in the attempts to heal the breaches of the churches. He was addressed by the apocrisiarius of the church of Alexandria at Constantinople, requesting communion with the Roman see. When pope Anastasius died, A.D. 498, Festus returned to Rome, having made a secret arrangement with the emperor Anastasius that the bishop of Rome should subscribe the Henoticon. On his arrival he found that Symmachus was chosen to succeed Anastasius II., and in order to fulfil his engagement he procured the election and consecration of Laurentius, and got up an accusation against Symmachus. Theodoric, however, determined in the favour of Symmachus, and the schism was healed by Laurentius's acceptance of the bishopric of Nocera. (Mansi, viii. 194, 246; Ceillier, Aut. Sacr. x. 519, 521.) [L. D.]

FESTUS (8) (FUSCUS), bishop of Capua, who complained to Gregory the Great that he was despised by the clergy and citizens of Capua. He died before Gregory, who, after the death of Festus, ordered the restitution of a sum of money which he had unlawfully taken from his archdeacon. (Greg. Magn. Epist. lib. iii. indict. xi. epist. 34 in Migne, lxxvii. 631; lib. v. indict. xiii. epist. 13, 14 in Migne, 734; lib. v. indict. xiii. epist. 33 in Migne, 759.) [A. H. D. A.]

FESTUS (9), bishop of Merida, from about 672 to about 680. He is known to us only from the speech of Egica (687-701) annexed to the acts of the sixteenth Council of Toledo [EGICA]. From this we learn that at the beginning of Wamba's reign "Theudemund Spatarius noster" [THEUEMUND], was, at the instance of Festus, then bishop of Merida, degraded by Wamba from the noble class and obliged to fill the office and perform the duties of numerarius at Merida. What was the reason of Festus's appeal to the king and what part exactly the bishop played in the transaction is far from clear. It is a curious instance of the infliction of a purely secular punishment by ecclesiastical means. (Esp. Sagr. xii. 218; Tejada y Ramiro, Coll. de Can. de la Igl. Esp. ii. 584.) [M. A. W.]

FESTUS (10), Dec. 21, martyr in Tuscany, with a companion named John. (Martyr. Rom. Vet., Hieron., Adonis, Usuardi; Ferrarius, Cat. SS.) [G. T. S.]

FETHAIDH (FETRADIUS) is commemorated on March 31 in the Irish Martyrologies, and Colgan (Acta SS. 799) has a short notice of Fethadius, whom he seeks to identify with Feadhach, son of Cormac, abbat of Iouth.

Slaine, and Duleek, who died in A.D. 789, but the identification is no more than conjecture. [J. G.]

FETHCHU (FEDCHON, FEDHCHU, FETHOCAN) At July 6 and 23 in Mart. Doneg. there are commemorated Fedhchu, of Uamadh Fubi, and Fethchu; in Mart. Tallaght they are Fedchonnaiad or Fedchonnaiad and bishop Fethcon. Colgan at March 12 (Acta SS. 588) gives a memoir of a Fetchuo or Fiechno, whom he identifies with Fechno or Fetno companion of St. Columba. [FECHNO.] [J. G.]

FFAGAN (Stubbs, Reg. Sac. 154), legendary British bishop. [FAGAN.]

FFILI, ST., a Welsh saint, to whom Rhos Ffili (or Rhos Sili) in Gower is dedicated. He is placed by Rees among the saints who flourished between A.D. 566 and 600. (R. Rees, Welsh Saints, 277.) [C. W. B.]

FFINAN, ST., an Irish saint, to whom Llanfinan in Anglesey is dedicated. There is also an Irish saint called Ffinian, who is said to have visited St. David at Menevia, about 530, and to have built three churches. (R. Rees, Welsh Saints, 239; Haddan and Stubbs, i. 160.) [C. W. B.]

FFLEWYN. [FLEWYN.]

FFOMREU, abbat of St. Illtyd, or Llantwit Major, Glamorganshire, witness to the deed of restoration of Abermenei by king Ithael to bishop Berthgwyn of Llandaff, in the latter part of the sixth or early in the seventh century. (Léb. Land. by Rees, 429.) [J. G.]

FFRAID. [FRAID.]

FIACC (FIECH, FIECUS), bishop of Sleibhte (now Sletty), commemorated October 12. The Bollandists (Acta SS. Oct. vi. 96-106, and Suppl. tom. 119-121) have compiled a memoir, which contains almost everything known about him, and the date they assign is "sub saeculi V., ut apparet, finem." We are told in the Annot. Tirechan that St. Patrick conferred the degree of bishop upon him, so that he was the first bishop that was ordained among the Lagenians, and St. Patrick gave a "Cumtach" or box to St. Fiacc, containing a bell, a "menster" or reliquary, a crozier, and a "poolire" or book satchel. He also left seven of his people with him (Petrie, Round Towers of Ireland, 338; Wilson, Prehist. Annals, 657). But in teaching the faith, St. Fiacc is often styled not merely bishop, but archbishop of Leinster: thus the ancient Scholias upon The Hymn of St. Fiacc in Praise of St. Patrick (Colgan, Tr. Thaum. n. 1^a) states the fact of his consecration as bishop, and then adds "tandem Lageniae Archiepiscopus institutus; quo etiam munere ejus Comorbani sive successores abinde funguntur." (See also Colgan, Tr. Thaum. 8 n. 1, 265, col. 1, and Acta SS. 217 n. 2^a; Lanigan, Eccl. Hist. Ir. i. 274, 278.) But this notion has arisen from a misinterpretation by Colgan of the title applied to St. Fiacc by the Scholiast, and the adoption of an official designation which was not used in Ireland till the 12th century. The word in the original Irish of the Scholiast is Uir-Éppcop, but this is not equivalent to Archi-Episcopus, having no claim to jurisdiction, and signifying nothing more than a "distinguished prelate," like 'Ard-righ,' an eminent king, or 'Ard-file,' chief poet. (See the whole question exhaustively treated by Dr. Todd in his St. Patrick, 14-19, and Book of Hymns, Fasc. ii. 299-303.) He was honoured throughout Leinster, and when he died his relics were long after preserved at Sletty, and regarded with the utmost veneration. (Book of Armagh, fol. 4, bb.) As at the time when St. Fiacc flourished, there is nothing but tradition to guide us in determining. Dr. Todd (Book of Hymns, Fasc. ii. 33) thus sums up:—"The year 418 will be about the year of his birth; and if he survived St. Patrick, whose death is generally fixed 493, he may have lived to be about the age of 80 or 90. In this there is nothing improbable or actually incredible: and there remain no grounds for disturbing the chronological place assigned to Fiacc of Slebhite, in the traditions of the Irish church, as a contemporary and disciple of St. Patrick."

Two hymns have been attributed to St. Fiacc. (a) The Hymn of St. Brigida the Virgin (Colgan, Tr. Thaum. 542: see also 545 n. ⁸⁰, 609, col. 1); but it could not have been written by St. Fiacc, who predeceased St. Brigida (Lanigan, Ir. Saints, i. c. 9, § 5; O'Hanlon, Irish Saints, ii. 3, 162; Ir. Writ. i. c. i.) (b) The Hymn of St. Fiacc in Praise of St. Patrick is more commonly regarded as authentic: it belongs at least to a very early date. It was first published by Colgan (Tr. Thaum. 1-3) in A.D. 1647, and placed at the head of his other Lives of St. Patrick. He has given the Irish and a Latin translation, followed by "Scholia veteris scholasticæ." A critical edition of it is promised in the Book of Hymns of the Ancient Irish Church, by Dr. Todd (Fasc. ii. 287 sqq.); but as yet (1875) only part of the Introduction has been published. "The narrative is short and simple. It recounts the saint's baptismal name,—the name and rank of his father and grandfather,—his captivity in Erin,—his passing over the Alps into Italy for his education,—his return again to Erin, in the reign of Laeghairé Mac Léir, to convert the descendants of Eber and Lomair,—how King Laeghairé's Druids foretold his success, and the destruction by him of the druid system,—the founding of 'Dun-da-luigi' (now Downpatrick) and of Armagh,—his last illness,—his receiving the communion from the hands of Bishop Tassach,—the wonders that happened at the time of his death,—and of his spirit passing 'into the loving friendship of the Sea of Mary'" (O'Curry, Lect. Man. and Col. Asc. Ir. ii. 75, which is evidently in error of acknowledging its authenticity). (On St. Fiacc, see Lanigan, Eccl. Hist. Ir. i. c. 6, § 5; Todd, St. Patrick pass. and Book of Hymns, Fasc. ii. 287 sq.; Book of Rights, by O'Donovan, 194; Duffus Hardy, Descript. Cat. i. pt. ii. 788; Dobson, *Irish Hist. FIACHNA, a diminutive of Fiach, a raven.

(1) It is a name which we find in the Irish Kalendars on March 30 and April 29, but without any distinct identification. The Scholia on the Felire of Aenghus the Culdee calls the latter "monk of Mochuda" (Mart. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, 114 n. ², 115), and O'Clery (Ib. 91) thinks it probable that either one or other of the two Fiachnas may be the person of whom Cuimin of Condeire gave the character, that he never pronounced a bad word, but always a word pleasing to God, and of whom he further suggests that he was, perhaps, of the race of Eoghan, son of Niall.

(2) Fiachna Ua Maicniadh, abbat of Cluain-fearta-Brenainn, now Clonsfert, county Longford, died A.D. 752 (Ann. Tig.; Four Mast. A.D. 747; Ann. Ulst. 751.)

(3) Companion of Columba. [FECHNO.]

[J. G.]

FIACHRA (FIACHRIUS, gen. from FIACH-RACH), (1) abbat of Conwal and Clonard, was widely venerated throughout Ireland on Feb. 8. He had dedications in the county of Kilkenny. In The Felire of Aengus, he is praised as "Fiachra—a manly man, the noble abbat of Irard," and he gave the viaticum to St. Comgall, of Bangor [COMGALL (1).] He flourished in the beginning of the seventh century. (Colgan, Acta SS. 406, c. 5, Mart. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, 43; Kelly, Cal. Ir. Saints, xv.; O'Hanlon, Irish Saints, ii. 412; O'Connor, Rer. Hib. Scrip. iv. 184; Ulst. Journ. Arch. ii. 214-15; Reeves, Adamnan, 317; Fleming, Coll. Sacr. 312-313.)

(2) Son of Fothadh, abbat of Baslick, near Ballintober, county Roscommon, died A.D. 759. (Four Mast.)

FIACHRAIDH (FIACHRA), son of Fiacc, is commemorated in the Irish Martyrologies, and in the Scoto-Irish Kalendar of Drummond Missal on October 12, and specially called the son of St. Fiacc. He was born probably before St. Fiacc met with St. Patrick, and was promoted to the episcopate; but beyond his being commemorated at Sletty, where it is likely that he lived with his father, we know nothing more of his history. [FIACC.] (Mart. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, 273; Kelly, Cal. Ir. Saints, xxxvi.; Colgan, Tr. Thaum. 182 n. ²⁰⁴; Bp. Forbes, Kal. Scott. Saints, 25.) [J. G.]

FIACRIUS, sometimes FERRUS, Fr. FIACRE. (Probably Irish-Gaelic Fiachra [gen. Fiachrach] from Fiach a raven, and -ra or -raidh, a collective suffix. Fiach also signifies value, worth, &c.)^a

Fiacrius, a saint of Gaul, was almost certainly by birth an Irish Celt. Hector Boece, indeed, (Hist. of Scotland, ix. 19), claims him as a fellow-countryman, saying that he was a younger son of Eugenius IV. king of Scotland, who withdrew from his father's court out of desire for an ascetic life; but it is far more probable that he was one of the great body of Irishmen who in the 6th and 7th centuries were driven by an impulse of missionary zeal to visit the continent of Europe [MISSIONS, in DICTIONARY OF CHRISTIAN ANTIQUITY, p. 1208]. Early in the 7th century he came to Meldae (now Meaux) in the Neustrian kingdom, and presented himself to Faro, the bishop of that see. The bishop assigned him a spot in the woods on his own domain, where he might build his hermitage. There he cleared a space, and built an oratory in honour of St. Mary the Virgin, with a hut near it in which he dwelt. The subsequent history of the saint differs little from that of many of his contemporaries; what we can discern through the cloud of legend which surrounds him is, that his fame spread, and that his chapel became the resort of pilgrims from the neighbouring districts (Chron. de St. Denys, in Bouquet, iii. 279). He is said to have died Aug. 30, A.D. 670. His cultus (says the Bollandist editor of his life) soon spread far and wide through Gaul, and many chapels were dedicated in his honour in which miracles were believed to be wrought. His name is found on Aug. 30 in many ancient martyrologies, not only Gallican, but also Scotch and Irish. He has an office in many Gallican Breviaries (Mabillon, Ann. O. S. B. p. 344), and also in one of Aberdeen (Acta SS. 599). In a collection of Irish Masses published at Paris by O'Kenny (1734) is found for Aug. 30 a "Missa S. Fiacrii Confessoris, Hiberniae Principis, ecclesiae et dioecesis Meldensis patroni generalis" (Acta SS. 599). The hymns and legends of the Breviaries all agree in the few particulars of his life which are given above, though there is considerable variety in the wonders which they relate. One of the most constant legends, of a woman who reported him to be a sorcerer after witnessing one of his miracles, is evidently intended to account for the fact that women were excluded from his chapels. The real explanation probably is that Fiacrius brought with him from Ireland the Rule of St. Columba, which forbids women to enter a monastic church; and that this restriction was maintained, out of respect for the saint, even when a Benedictine priory rose on the site of his cell. At all events there was a prevalent belief that "all women that gangis in his chapell will be other blind or wod" [mad] (Boece, trans. by Bellendene, ix. 19); and so strong was this belief that even as late as 1641, Anne of Austria, when she went to pay her devotions at his shrine, did not venture to enter the chapel which contained it, but remained outside the grating.

The wonders related of Fiacrius are generally miracles of healing; in particular (Mab. Acta § 13), he used to heal those who suffered from a fleshy tumour called viacus, and his relics are said to have retained the same power; hence that particular tumour gained the name of "le fic de S. Fiacre."

The name of St. Fiacre is however still better known, as applied to a hackney-carriage. The history of this use of the name appears to be as follows. In the year 1640, one Sauvage first set up in Paris an establishment of carriages for hire. This man rented for the purpose of his business a large house in the Rue St. Martin, called the "Hôtel de St. Fiacre," from an image of the saint, which was over the gateway; from the principal station of the coaches, the name passed to the coaches themselves (Littré's Dictionnaire, s. v.). Hefele (Beiträge zur Archäol. ii. 299) says that the drivers placed an image of Fiacre on their carriages, and regarded him as their especial patron.

(The authorities for the life of St. Fiacre are found in Surius, viii. 745, ed. Turin, 1877; in Mabillon, Acta SS. Bened. saec. ii. p. 598 ff.; and in the Bollandist Acta SS. Aug. 30, vol. vi. p. 604 ff. with the Comment. Praevius of Stilting. There is a Histoire de Saint-Fiacre by A. J. Ansart, Paris, 1782, which the writer has not seen. See also Hardy, Cat. Mat. i. 272-274.) [C.]

FIANA, in an Irish Life of St. Barry of Cork, is represented as belonging to a female school which that saint had at Loch Irce, and as giving the last sacrament to him at Cloyne before his death (Caulfield, Life of St. Fin Barre, v.).

[J. G.]

FIANAMHAIL (FIANAMHLA, FIANNAMHLA), son of Gertide (Gertnide, Gertighe), abbat of Clonard, co. Meath, died A.D. 736 (Ann. Tig.; Four Mast. A.D. 731; Ann. Ult. A.D. 735.) [J. G.]

FIANCHU, abbat of Lughmadh, now Louth, died A.D. 770 (Four Mast.), or abbat of Luigne, now Lune, co. Meath, died A.D. 774 (Ann. Ult.); evidently both belong to the same individual.

[J. G.]

FIANGALACH, son of Anmchadh, son of Maelcuraich, abbat of Inisboffin in Loch Ree, co. Longford, died A.D. 750 (Four Mast.). [J. G.]

FIANGUS, abbat of Roscrea, in the barony of Ikerrin, co. Tipperary, died A.D. 805 (Four Mast. by O'Donovan, A.D. 800, i. 411). [J. G.]

FIANNACHTA (FIANACHTACH) of Ferns, co. Wexford, died A.D. 799 (Four Mast. by O'Donovan, A.D. 794, i. 403; Ann. Ult. A.D. 798). [J. G.]

FIARI, bishop of Agen. [FOEGADUS.]

FIARMUS, bishop of Viseo. [FIRMUS (12).]

FIBICIUS, ST., 22nd bishop of Treves, Nov. 5, succeeding Maximianus and followed by Rusticus. Le Coñte believes him to have been abbat of St. Maximin before his elevation to the episcopate in A.D. 498. (Annal. Eccl. Franc. an. 498, n. v. tom. i. p. 201.) His date suggests that he may be identical with the Felix bishop of Treves, who granted permission to St. Goar to build a church in his diocese. (Vita S. Goaris, Surius, de Probat. Sanct. Hist. Jul. vi. tom. iv. 91; Boll. Acta SS. Jul. ii. 335; Gall. Christ. xlii. 379, 526.) [S. A. B.]

FIDELIS (1), April 21, martyr in the Diocletian persecution, at Edessa with his mother Bassa and his brothers Theogonius and Agapius. Encouraged by the exhortations of Bassa her sons suffered first, and then she also was beheaded. (Martyr. Rom. ed. Baron.) [G. T. S.]

FIDELIS (2), Oct. 28, martyr under Maximian, A.D. 304, at Como. (Martyr. Rom. ed. Baron.) [G. T. S.]

FIDELIS (3), wife of Pneumatius, and addressed with him in a consolatory poem of considerable length by Paulinus of Nola on the death of her son Celsus. The poem is chiefly on the resurrection of the dead. (Migne, Patrol. Lat. lxi. 688.) [L. D.]

FIDELIS (4), companion of St. Teilo from Arunorica in the 6th century, and included among the clerical witnesses to grants of land to St. Eulalia. (Rees, Welsh Saints, 253; Lib. Landav. in Rees, 351-52, 365-67; Ussher, Brit. Eccl. hæc vi. 80.) [J. G.]

FIDELIS (5), ST., priest, abbat. [FIDOLUS.]

FIDELIS (6), ST., commonly accepted as bishop of Merida before Masona (who presided c. Tol. iii. in 589), and placed therefore by Annales between 560 and 571. His life rests entirely upon the testimony of the not very satisfactory piece of writing known as the opus. de Vita et Miraculis Patrum Emeritanorum, and attributed in the MSS. to a certain Paulus Diaconus (not to be confounded of course with his famous namesake of Lombard memory).

Fidelis, according to this life, was the successor and adopted son of Paulus bishop of Merida. A company of Greek merchants visiting Merida were entertained by the bishop, and in return sent him a present by the hands of a boy whom they had brought with them as a servant. The bishop was struck with the boy, asked him his name and history, and discovered that he was his own sister's son. He immediately claimed him from the merchants, sent a message through them to his sister, and thenceforward the boy was brought up at Merida. He was, of course, dedicated to the church, and made a deacon in due time. Paulus in his old age took a strange and uncanonical step with regard to Fidelis. "Hæc sibi successorem elegit, moxque etiam in ætate se vivente ordinavit, et omnium bonorum suorum hæredem instituit," coupling the legacy with the condition that, if after the death of Paul the clergy of Merida confirmed the appointment of Fidelis, the money should pass at Fidelis's death to the see of Merida; if they did not confirm it, because of those "insidiae facibus accendi," the money was to remain at Fidelis's private disposal.

After Paul's death, what he had foreseen happened. "Quidam pestiferi homines" began to raise objections to Fidelis's appointment. The fear, however, of the alienation of Paul's property from the church finally silenced all opposition, and the objectors, "plus inviti licet quam sponte se pedibus ejus prostraverunt." Thus it came about that the church of Merida became equal if not superior in riches to any in Spain. The principal events of Fidelis's pontificate—leaving the miracles out of count—appear to have been the rebuilding of the episcopal palace (palatium), and the restoration of the church of St. Eulalia. The old palace fell just after the death of Paul and all his clergy had quitted it on their way to Mass. The new house was made far more splendid than the old. Its pavement and walls were adorned with shining marbles. Afterwards the church of St. Eulalia (see Prudentius's famous description of its architecture in the 4th century, Peristeph. Hymn 3) was restored in a wonderful manner, and high towers were added to it. At last, after many marvellous appearances of saints and angels, Paul was warned by a vision, seen not by himself but by a certain religious man of the town, of his approaching death. Like St. Eustachius and St. Isidore, he had himself carried into the church, and there distributed large sums to the poor, remitting, moreover, all debts owing to him, and returning the chirographa and cautiones he had received on account of them. He died in the church, and was buried with his predecessor.

Seven churches are named as existing in or close to Merida in the life of Fidelis, and others are vaguely mentioned under the general title of basilicæ martyrum. In the early part of the document, of which this life forms a part, we read of more than one monastery in the immediate neighbourhood of Merida, so that the impression left on the mind is one of the great ecclesiastical importance of the city. No such information remains to us as to the ecclesiastical state of any other Spanish town under the Goths. (Esp. Sagr. xiii. 176, 350; Gams, Kirchen-gesch. von Spanien, II. i. 425; Bolland. AA. SS. Feb. 1.)

[M. A. W.]

FIDELIS (7), according to the list of Muelinen's Helvetia Sacra (i. 8), eleventh bishop of Constance, elected A.D. 681 on the death of Gangulphus, and followed by Theobald. His name is omitted from the list of the Gallia Christiana (v. 893).

[S. A. B.]

FIDELIS (8), an abbat living in Asturias, addressed by Elipandus in a letter, A.D. 785. Beatus, a monk of Asturias, together with Etherius, afterwards bishop of Osma, had exerted themselves with success in combating the Adoptionist views, whereupon Elipandus, archbishop of Toledo, wrote an angry letter to Fidelis, wherein he says "that those who do not confess that Jesus Christ is the adoptive Son according to His humanity, but not according to His divinity, are heretics," and, remarking on the youthfulness of Etherius, compares Beatus to Bonosus the Photinian, and Faustus the Manichee, and finally implores Fidelis to root out the Beatian heresy. In the second book of his answer Beatus calls Fidelis "frater," so that though Elipandus wrote to him as if he was an Adoptionist, he really held the true faith; he is said to have shewn the letter to no other persons besides Beatus and Etherius. (Frober, Alcuin, ii. 587, 591, 585; Ceillier, Aut. Sacr. xii. 214.)

FIDENTIANUS, an African bishop, present at the council of Carthage, A.D. 416. (Aug. Ep. 175.)

[H. W. P.]

FIDENTINUS, Donatist bishop of Gypsaria, a place in Mauretania Caesariensis, present at Carth. Conf. A.D. 411. (Mon. Vet. Don. p. 409, ed. Oberthür.)

[H. W. P.]

FIDENTIUS (1), Sept. 27, martyr under Diocletian and Maximian, A.D. 304, at Tudertum, in Umbria. They are said to have been born in Cappadocia, whence they came to Rome, where they were converted. Upon the outbreak of persecution they were arrested, tortured, and delivered to the commander of the first cohort for execution. The rest of their story is distorted with legendary miracles. (Martyr. Rom. ed. Baron.; Ferrarius, Catalogus Sanctorum; Boll. Acta SS. Sept. vii. 479-481.)

[G. T. S.]

FIDENTIUS (2), bishop and martyr with twenty others, most probably in the Diocletian persecution. He is, perhaps, the same as Fidentianus, commemorated Nov. 15, in the Rom. Martyr. Baronius would identify them with twenty martyrs who suffered at Tarsus, in

Cilicia, but without any sound reason. In fact, all the evidence we possess concerning their history places them in Africa, and connects their martyrdom with Hippo. Within a century from the era of martyrs, A.D. 304, we find their cultus firmly established at that city, and honours so lavished upon them as would scarcely be paid to any but local heroes. A splendid church had by that time been erected and dedicated under their name; their Acts were publicly read in the church; sermons were preached about them by St. Augustine himself; and miracles, as he also testifies, were worked by their power. Thus we find by the title of Augustine's sermon 148, on the story of Ananias and Sapphira, that it was preached in the church of the Twenty Martyrs, at Hippo, on the first Sunday after Easter. Sermons 325 and 326 deal with their faith and constancy in suffering. They present us with the very words of the magistrate who endeavours to shake their resolution, as well as with the martyrs' replies, evidently drawn from the official Acts preserved in the provincial registry, as in the case of Felix the reader of Abitina [FELIX (200)]. St. Augustine had a profound belief in their miraculous powers. We therefore find the Twenty Martyrs introduced in the De Civit. Dei, lib. xxii. c. 8, to prove that miracles have not ceased since the world believed in Christ. (Ceillier, iii. 95; Morcelli, Africa Christ. i. 182.) [FLORENTIUS (48).] [G. T. S.]

FIDENTIUS (3), one of the Donatist bishops who petitioned Constantine that some Gallic bishops should be appointed as judges in the case of Caecilianus. (Opt. i. 22.)

[H. W. P.]

FIDENTIUS (4), bishop of Cefala, in the proconsular province of Africa; present at the conference between the Catholics and Ariana, A.D. 411, where he declared that in his diocese there was no rival Donatist bishop; for, as Valentinian, the deacon of the Donatist archbishop Primian, added, one of the same name as the Catholic bishop had lately died in that see. (Mansi, iv. 110, 266; Morcelli, Africa Christ. i. 133; Mon. Vet. Don. p. 413, ed. Oberthür.) [L. D.]

FIDENTIUS (5), bishop of Diana (Zanah), a town in the interior of Numidia, north-west of Lambesa (Ant. Itin. 34, 3), present at Carth. Conf. A.D. 411. (Mon. Vet. Don. p. 445, ed. Oberthür.) [H. W. P.]

FIDENTIUS (6), Donatist bishop of Cullita, perhaps Chullu (el Quoll), on the sea-coast of Numidia, present at Carth. Conf. A.D. 411. (Mon. Vet. Don. p. 404, ed. Oberthür.)

[H. W. P.]

FIDENTIUS (7), bishop of Tucci (Martos), one of the suffragans of Seville, from about 616 to about 633. His signature appears among those of the second council of Seville (619), at which Isidore and Fulgentius were present, and in 633 his vicar, Centaurus, signs for him at the fourth council of Toledo in the first place among the vicars, as representing the senior bishop of those unable to attend personally. (Esp. Sagr. xii. 389; Aguirre-Catalani, iii. 355-385.) [M. A. W.]

FIDENTIUS (8), with the consent of the duke of Friuli, founded an episcopal see for himself at Castrum Juliense (Julia Carnica, now destroyed), c. 725, and was followed in the see by Amator. (Paulus Diaconus, vi. 51.)

[A. H. D. A.]

FIDENTIUS (9). In the preface to the work of St. Agobard against the Adoptionist opinions and writings of Felix of Urgel, which was composed A.D. 818, the author states that his own work is really a summary of the writings of others on the same point, amongst whom he mentions Fidentius, an ecclesiastical writer otherwise unknown. (Hist. Litt. de la France, iv. 572.)

FIDES (1), Aug. 1 (Usuardus and Rom. Mart.), June 23 (Notkerus), Sept. 16 (Bas. Men. and Symeon Metaphrastes); martyr with her mother, Sophia, and her sisters, Spes and Charitas. [CARITAS.] [G. T. S.]

FIDES (2) (ST. FAITH), Oct. 6; virgin and martyr at Agen in Aquitaine, in the Diocletian persecution, under the president Dacian, 304. Her example encouraged St. Caprasius to endure martyrdom. [CAPRASIIUS.] (Mart. Rom., Hierol., Adonis, Usuardi, Notkeri, Rabani; Tillemont, iv. 543, 752; Surius, vii.) Her name of St. Faith was attached to seventeen churches in England besides the crypt of old St. Paul's. In art she is represented with a bundle of rods or a brazen bed in her hands. (J. H. Parker, Cal. of Angl. Ch. 121.) [G. T. S.]

FIDHAIRLE Ua Suanaigh, abbat of Rathain (now Rahin), commemorated Oct. 1. After the expulsion of St. Carthach Mochuda (May 14) from Rathain or Rathin near Tullamore in the King's County, about A.D. 630, the place falls nearly out of sight till Fidhairle Ua Suanaigh founds it anew, and becomes its patron. He was brother of Fidhmuine Ua Suanaigh and Fidhgus Ua Suanaigh; also uterine brother of Dichlethe O'Triallaigh, of Aedhan of Cloonoghill, and of Colman Ua Fiachrach of Templeshanbo (q. v.). He died A.D. 763 (Ann. Tig.), and is said by Mac Firbis to have had a church at Kinsale, co. Cork. (Four Mast. by O'Donovan, A.D. 758, i. 361; O'Connor, Rer. Hib. Scriptor. ii. 256, iv. 99; Butler, Lives of the Saints, Oct. 1; Mart. Doney. by Todd and Reeves, 265.) [FIDHMUINE.] [J. G.]

FIDHBHADHACH (1), abbat of Bangor, died A.D. 767 (Four Mast. A.D. 762; Ann. Ult. A.D. 766.)

FIDHBHADHACH (2), Of Cill-Delge, now Kildalkey, co. Meath, died A.D. 753. (Four Mast.) [J. G.]

FIDHMUINE (FIMOYNE, FINNGUIN,) Ua Suanaigh of Raithin (now Rahin), commemorated on May 16. With Fidhairle and Fidhgusa his brothers, he was son of Fiodhbhadach, son of Cuduiligh, descended from Fiachra, son of Eoch-aidh Muighmheadhoin, his mother being Fear-amhla or Ferbla, daughter of Dima Dubh, of the same house. Fidhmuine died, according to the accurate entry in the Ann. Tigernach, in A.D. 757. The Ann. Clonmacn. add slightly to our information: "A.D. 751, Luanus alias Fimoyne O'Swanaye of Rahin, died." He was anchorite at Rahin near Tullamore in the King's County, and is also designated by O'Clery (who however as calling him son of Cuduilech) as of Inis Meáin, now Ennisboyne, in the parish of Danpatrick, co. Wicklow. In the Scoto-Irish Calendar of the Drummond Missal (Bishop Forbes, Lat. Scott. Saints, 13) he is commemorated on the same day and called Finnguin. [J. G.]

FIDIOLUS, bishop of Rennes. [FEBEDIOLUS.]

FIDOLUS (popularly FALE or FIDELE), ST., priest and abbat at or near Troyes in the 6th century, was born of noble parents in the city of Clermont. From his early years he seemed marked out for the service of God, and in due time entered the ranks of the clergy. In an expedition of king Theoderic against his native city he was taken prisoner with many others. As his captors were returning with him through the territory of Troyes, they were met by Aventinus, the abbat of a monastery at or near that city, who had been warned in a vision to ransom Fidos, and adopt him into his community. Twelve pieces of gold was the sum demanded and paid. By his diligence and obedience in the monastery, Fidolus strove to repay the debt. In time went on he was chosen first to be prior, and then, upon the death of Aventinus, abbat of the foundation. In this office he was remarkable for his meekness and austerity, and his pre-eminent sanctity was attested by numerous miracles. He is commemorated May 16. This account is from a meagre life, first published by Casanat, and afterwards more correctly by the Bollandists. The authors of the Histoire Littéraire de la France adjudge it from its style to be close of the 6th century, forty or fifty years after the saint's death. Another life is to be found in Mabillon's Acta SS. Ord. S. Bened. evidently of a later date, which amplifies the former story to make it incorrect, as, for instance, where it treats as contemporary Theoderic, the brother of Theobert, who was reigning in A.D. 596, and Guislanus, the bishop of Troyes who was present at the first council of Orleans in 511. Who the Theoderic of the earlier life may have been, is not clear, but probably he was the eldest son of Clovis I., in which case the expedition will be other than that recorded in Greg. Tur. Hist. Franc. i. 57, or iii. 14, 15. The site of Fidolus's monastery is also doubtful, some placing it at a little town called Insula on the Seine, about two leagues from Troyes, others within the walls of Troyes, and others again in the suburbs of that city, where afterwards a church in honour of St. Aventinus was built. (Boll. Acta SS. Mai. i. 588; Mabill. Acta SS. Ord. S. Bened. i. 61. Venice, 1733; Bouquet, Recueil des Historiens, iii. 406; Hist. Litt. de la France, iii. 415, 44; Gall. Christ. xii. 531.) [S. A. B.]

FIDUS (1), African bishop, applied to Cyprian and Council, (1) to complain of bishop Therapius being readmitted to lay communion a lapsed Pagan, Victor, before due and sufficient penance. (2) To state, and to ask for an affirmation of, his opinion that infants ought not to be baptized within two or three days of their birth, alleging that the law of circumcision, and stating that it was repugnant to the feelings to give the kiss of peace to a newborn child. Cyprian replies to him for the council (3rd Carth. A.D. 258), (1) agreeing, but declining to reverse the action of the council; (2) disagreeing with Fidus, both as to the law and the sentiment. (Cyp. Ep. lxxv.) The Epistle very useful to Augustine in his controversy with Pelagians. [E. W. B.]

FIDUS (2), bishop of Joppa, one of the fourteen bishops who took part in the synod summoned by Eulogius, metropolitan of Caesarea, at Diospolis, A.D. 416, stigmatized by Jerome as "a miserable little synod," in which Pelagius was acquitted of heresy (Labbe, Concil. ii. 1532; August. contr. Julian. c. 5). We find Fidus afterwards at the council of Ephesus, A.D. 431, at which he warmly espoused the cause of Cyrilus, whose letter against Nestorius he declared to be such as might have been written by the Holy Spirit Himself (Labbe, Concil. iii. 468), while that of Nestorius was far removed from the truth, and approached very near the evil doctrine of Paul of Samosata (ibid. 477). He signed the sentence of deposition against Nestorius (ibid. 540), and the anathema against any who should compose another creed (ibid. 690). Fidus visited the celebrated solitary, St. Euthymius, at his laura, in company with his nephew Fidus, afterwards bishop of Dor, and Anastasius, afterwards patriarch of Jerusalem. (Cyrill. Scythop. Vita S. Euthym. c. 60.) [E. V.]

FIDUS (3), bishop of Dor in Palaestina Prima, nephew of the preceding. He, while still a lector, accompanied his uncle, the bishop of Joppa, and Anastasius, on a visit to St. Euthymius (Cyrill. Scythop. Vita S. Euthym. c. 60). He was ordained deacon by Anastasius immediately after he became bishop of Jerusalem, A.D. 458, was despatched to Euthymius to request him to allow him to visit him, and shew the truth of his prophecies of his elevation to the episcopate (ibid. 96). [ANASTASIUS.] On the death of Euthymius he accompanied Anastasius, as his deacon, to his obsequies, and was left by him at the laura to erect a suitable tomb (ibid. 110, 111). Having been despatched by Martyrius, bishop of Jerusalem, to Constantinople with letters to the emperor Zeno and the bishop Acacius relative to the Aposchistae, on his voyage out he was shipwrecked at midnight, and having given himself up for lost he saw a vision of Euthymius, who told him that the journey he proposed would bring no advantage to the church, and that he was to return home, and assure Martyrius that the schismatics would soon return to the unity of the church. He also commissioned Fidus to convert his laura into a coenobium, to be erected around his sepulchre (ibid. 113-115). In obedience to the vision, with the sanction and aid of the patriarch, he pulled down the scattered cells and erected a monastery, of which Cyrillus gives a lengthened description (ibid. 116-121), which was dedicated with great pomp by Martyrius, A.D. 484 (ibid. 122). In that or the following year, Fidus became bishop of Dor (ibid.). Nothing more is known of him. He died before A.D. 518. (Le Quien, Or. Christ. iii. 575.) [E. V.]

FIGULUS, an ecclesiastical writer, known only from the citations by Smaragdus abbat of Saint Mihiel (9th century) in his sermons on the Epistles and Gospels for the year, which are abridgments of the writings of twenty fathers of the church. Between Isidore of Seville and Bede he places Figulus; perhaps the name is corrupted.

(Hist. Litt. de la France, iv. 444; Ceillier, Aut. Sacr. xii. 256.) [I. D.]

FILACRIUS (HILARIUS), bishop of Novara, 552. For his tombstone and epitaph, see Cappelletti. (Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Italia, xiv. 447; Ughelli, Ital. Sacr. iv. 693.) [A. H. D. A.]

FILBRITH, bishop of London. [EADBERT.]

FILEAS (Usuard. Mart. Feb. 4), bishop of Thmuis. [PHILBAS.] [C. H.]

FILETUS, apparitor to the office of the court of Africa, mentioned in the history of Carth. Conf. A.D. 411. (Mon. Vet. Don. p. 344, ed. Oberthür.) [H. W. P.]

FILIANUS, fifth bishop of Soissons. (Gall. Christ. ix. 332.) [R. T. S.]

FILIARGIUS, bishop, who subscribed the third council of Arles in 461. (Isid. Mercat. in Pat. Lat. cxxx. 382.) [C. H.]

FILIBERTUS (Alcuin, Carm. 76, Opp. ii. 212, ed. Froben), abbat and founder of the monastery of Jumiéges. [PHILIBERTUS.] [C. H.]

FILIMIRUS (FILMIRUS), bishop of Lamego in Lusitania, signing the acts of the eighth council of Toledo in 653, and of the tenth in 656. (Esp. Sagr. xiv. 158; Aguirre-Catalani, iii. 448, iv. 158.) [M. A. W.]

FILLAN, with Felan, Filan, and Phillan, seems to be the Scotch form of the Irish FAELAN, and the person so named at Strathfillan was no doubt an Irishman, yet as his legend is purely Scotch, and his name of St. Fillan is associated with a memorable epoch in Scotch history, it seems best to treat him under this designation. For the sake of clearness, however, it may be mentioned that two Irish saints of the same name had their churches in Perthshire, viz.: Faelan Amlobhar, of Rath-erann (June 20), whose dedication is at St. Fillan's in the parish of Comrie, at the east end of Loch Earn, [FAELAN, (1)], and Faelan Maosna or Moesna who is the present St. Fillan of St. Fillan's in the quoad sacra parish of Strathfillan, which is part of the extensive parish of Killin. His legend is given in Brev. Aberdon. (Prop. SS. pars hyem. ff. xxvi.-vii.), and quoted at length by Bishop Forbes (Kal. Scott. Saints, 342-43). The Bollandists (Acta SS. Jan. 9, tom. i. 594-95) have a notice, "De S. Filano sive Felano Abbate in Scotia," mostly taken from Camerarius and Boethius, with the Chron. Passl. and Brev. Aberd. Colgan (Acta SS. 49) has a memoir similarly compiled; so also Baring-Gould (Lives of the Saints, Jan. 9, i. 127-28); and O'Hanlon (Irish Saints, i. 134-44) devotes to his Life an article of three chapters, and treats it with great fulness and lucidity.

Fillan was a son of Feradach, or Feriath, of the race of Fiatach Finn, by Kentigerna, daughter of Cellach Cualann, king of Leinster. The date of Fillan is very doubtful, as his legend is evidently full of anachronisms, introduced in order to magnify the saint. The Bollandists follow Camerarius in placing him in the 7th century, and Colgan suggests the beginning of the 9th, but the middle of the 8th seems the most probable date for his death. His chief dedications were at Killin and Strathfillan, where his memory was cherished and miraculous gifts zealously resorted to, specially in mental diseases, till even a late date (Proc. Soc. Ant. Scot. new ser. iv. 259 sq.). His cave is shewn at Pittenween, Fifeshire; his name is found corrupted in Killellan, near Lochalsh, in Ross-shire, and Killallan, an old parish in Renfrewshire; and his wells in other places may mark dedications. (For his dedications, see Bp Forbes, Kal. Scott. Saints, 344-46; O'Hanlon, Irish Saints, i. 139.) There are three of St. Fillan's relics of special interest, viz. his arm, bells, and crozier. (a) The estimation in which St. Fillan was held in Scotland was greatly enhanced by the part he was supposed to take in procuring for the Scots the victory at Bannockburn, he and his arm having been specially venerated before the battle, as related in Bollanden's Boece, ii. 390 sq., and as attested by the subsequent gifts to St. Fillan at the priory built and dedicated to St. Fillan at Strathfillan (Ulst. Journ. Arch. ii. 213-4; Proc. Soc. Ant. Scot. xii. 122 sq.). (b) The Coygerach, Quigerach, Quigrich, or Pastoral Staff of St. Fillan, which was carefully preserved till a recent date at Killin in the custody of the hereditary keepers named Dewar, who had it by regular infestment, and who carried it with them to Canada, has been brought back to Scotland, and was presented to the National Museum of the Society of Antiquaries of Scotland on March 22, 1877, when the late Dr. John Stuart, secretary of the society, read a long, learned, and very interesting paper on St. Fillan's crozier and on his legend generally. (For the literature of the Coygerach, see Proc. Soc. Ant. Scot. ii. 12-5, iii. pt. ii. 233-34, xii. 121, 122 sq.; Spald. Cl. Miscell. iii. pp. xxi. 237; Wilson, Presb. Ann. Scot. 664-65; Reeves, Adamnan, 366-67; Archaeol. Scot. iii. 289; C. Innes, Sket. Ear. Scot. Hist. 389-94, 623-24; Black Book of Taymouth, xxxv.-vii.; Chambers, Encyclopaedia, iv. 324-25, and Book of Days, i. 78-9; Rec. Priory Isl. May, lxxi.) (c) There are two famous bells of St. Fillan, viz. the Buidhean at Strowan, and the bell which was stolen by an English traveller in 1798 from the gravestone on which it had lain from time immemorial in the churchyard of Strathfillan, Perthshire, and after being out of sight for seventy years was recovered by the late Bishop Forbes of Brechin, and the earl of Balcarres in 1869, and is now preserved in the above-named Museum, Edinburgh. (Proc. Soc. Ant. Scot. i. 18-22, viii. 265-76; Old Stat. Acc. Scot. xvii. 377-78; Wilson, Presb. Ann. Scot. 345-6, 662-63.) [J. G.]

FILLEUL, bishop of Rouen. [FLAVIUS (6).]

FILMIRUS, bishop of Lamego. [FILIMIRUS.]

FILOCALUS, FURIUS DIONYSIUS, calligrapher to pope Damasus. The Damascine inscriptions in the catacombs are formed in letters of peculiar beauty, so that a fragment belonging to one of them can be easily recognized (see Vol. I. p. 784). What is known as the Liberian catalogue of the popes formed part of a collection made in the year 354, the ornamented title-page of which bore the inscription "Furius Dionysius Filocalus titulavit." Mommsen

(Über den Chronographen vom Jahre 354; Abhandlungen der königl. Sächs. Gesellschaft, i. 385) identified the writer with the artist of a laminae fragment preserved at the Vatican, "Scribit Furios Dion." All possibility of doubt was removed in 1856 by the discovery (De Rossi, Roma Sotterranea, i. 116) of the epitaph of pope Innocentius, ending—

Scribit Furios Dionysius Filocalus,
Damianus [Damasi sui, De Rossi] pappae cultor atque amator.

De Rossi gives the name Filocalian to the collection just mentioned, objecting to Mommsen's designation by the year 354 on the ground that what was done in that year was in substance the reproduction of a work made twenty years previously. [See CHRONICA HOROSII.] [G. S.]

FILOLOCIUS (PHILOLOCIUS), bishop of Adrametum, the capital of Byzacene, present at Carth. Conf. A.D. 411. (Mon. Vet. Don. p. 403, ed. Oberthür.) [H. W. P.]

FILTERIUS, a Gallic bishop (see unknown), is one of those to whom the letter of pope Celestine, on behalf of Prosper and Hilary, is addressed. (Caillier, Ant. Soc. x. 277.) [R. T. S.]

FILTIOSUS, bishop of Agger in the Byzacene province of Africa, one of the Catholic bishops summoned to Carthage for a conference with the Arians by the Vandal king Hunneric, and subsequently banished A.D. 484. He is identified by some with Fusculus, one of the bishops who were severely beaten by Hunneric before their banishment. (Victor Vit. de Pers. Vandil. i. 21; Not. ad. 57; Migne, Patrol. Lat. lviii.; Marcelli, Africa Christ. i. 72.) [L. D.]

FILUMENUS, a Donatist, perhaps a bishop, who, after the decision of the Roman Court of inquiry in favour of Caecilianus, requested the emperor that he should be detained, for peace's sake, at Brescia, while Eunomius and Olympias were despatched to Africa to ascertain the true position of the rival parties. (Vol. I. 368; Opt. i. 25.) [H. W. P.]

FIMOYNE [FIDHMUINE.]

FINAN, FINNAN. This name assumes a great variety of forms, and, being radically the diminutive of Finn (white), is the Irish equivalent of the Latin albinus. It is found as Finan, Finan, Finnen, Finden, Finnia, Finian, Finnian, Finian, either simply or with a Latin termination: there is also Finnio, Vinnio, and Vinnianus, to which the Scotch add Wynnin, the Italian Indian and Frigidian, and the Irish Findbarr or Finbarr. It was a favourite name in Irish Monasticism. [FINNIAN, FRIDIAN, and WYNNIN.]

(1) Son of Erannán, is commemorated in the Irish Kalendars on Feb. 12, having died A.D. 676 (Ann. Tig.). O'Connor (Rer. Hib. Scriptor. iv. 612) seeks to identify him with that St. Finian, the "soldier of Christ," who, after being present at the battle of Druim-ceatt, A.D. 563, "blamelessly led the life of an anchorite for many years near Darrow," and survived to tell St. Adamnan (R. Columb. i. c. 49) the events of the battle. But evidently the dates will not admit of this, and Dr. Reeves (Adamnan, 96) seems to prefer

Colgan's suggestion (Tr. Thaum. 380 n. 102) that the anchorite was Finan Lobhar. (O'Hanlon, Irish Saints, ii. 505; Mart. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, 47; Kelly, Cal. Ir. Saints, xv.; Four Mast. by O'Donovan, i. 284 n. 1.)

(2) Son of Fergna, Oct. 4, disciple of St. Fintan of Clonenagh. (Colgan, Acta SS. 352, c. 19; O'Hanlon, Irish Saints, ii. 518, 588.)

(3) Son of Pipan, of Rath, commemorated Nov. 25. He was son of Pipan, son of Amalgaidh, of the race of Conal Gulban; he thus was brother of St. Failbhe (Mar. 22), who died A.D. 679, the eighth abbat of Iona. His church was at Rath or Tempul-Ratha, in Cinel-Conaill, and is now known as Raymunterdoney, in the county of Donegal (Colgan, Acta SS. 46, c. 1, and Tr. Thaum. 380 n. 102, 481 n. 21, 490 n. 60; Reeves, Adamnan, 376, who says he is locally called Peenan).

(4) Son of Rimhidh, bishop, commemorated on Jan. 8. Of this person no particulars are known, and yet he must have been one of much importance, as he is mentioned in all the Irish Annals and Martyrologies; he died A.D. 660 (Ann. Tig.). At A.D. 656, the Ann. Clonmacn. calls him "Fynian mac Rivea Bushop." He may possibly be the bishop of Lindisfarne, who is commemorated on the following day, and died in the year 661 [FINAN (7)]. (O'Hanlon, Irish Saints, i. 133, 144; Mart. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, 11; Skene, Chron. Picts and Scots, 71, 250, 347.)

(5) Cam, of Ceann-Eitigh, now Kinnitty. There are three lives of this saint mentioned by Hardy (Descrip. Cat. i. 127-28, 788). Born at Corca Duibhne, now Corkaguiny, in Kerry, he was early associated with St. Brendan (May 6) of Clonfert, whose pupil he is said to have been, and with St. Senan (Mar. 1-8) of Iniscathy or Scatterry Island, to whom he appears to have been related. He belongs to the 6th century, and his monastery is believed to have been destroyed by the northern pirates. But a bee-hive house of Cyclopean style preserves the memory of his sojourn in Kerry; it "is situated on Church Island, in Lough Lee or Curraun Lough, on the boundary of the baronies of Iveragh and Dunkerrin, in the county of Kerry, and four miles to the north of Derrynane abbey, in Irish Doine Fhionain, which derives its name from the saint." His name is also preserved in Rahinnane, Finan's rath or fort, now a townland near Ventry. (Petrie, Round Towers, 130-1; Proc. Roy. Ir. Acad. viii. 430; Colgan, Acta SS. 525, c. 20, 529 n. 16, 534, c. 27, 540 n. 21, and Tr. Thaum. 380 n. 102; Joyce, Irish Names of Places, 3rd ed. 148; Nicolson, Ir. Hist. Libr. 46.)

(6) Lobhar (The Leper), of Swords, Mar. 16. The Bollandists (Acta SS. Mart. 16, tom. ii. 439-42) give, after a learned commentary as preface, a life of St. Finan (communicated by Henry Fitzsimon, but belonging to the 11th century). He was a native of Ely O'Carrol, in King's County, and flourished after the middle of the 6th century. He is connected with four Irish dedications; (a) Swords, near Dublin. (b) Innisfallen, an island in Lough Lein or the lower Lake of Killarney, in Kerry. (c) Ard-finan, in the county of Tipperary; he has probably given his name also to Kilfinane, in Limerick, where his well remains and his festival was celebrated. (d) Clonmore; probably the Clonmore in Carlow. (Colgan, Acta SS. 215, 276-77, 627-28, and Tr. Thaum. 349, 400, 404, 451 n. ⁸⁰, 490 n. ⁸⁹, 509, c. 7; Lanigan, Eccl. Hist. Ir. ii. c. 11, § 10, iii. c. 18, § 3; Reeves, Adamnan, 279; Ware, Ir. Ant. c. 26; Mon. Hib. 60, 68; Joyce, Irish Names of Places, 3 ed. 147-48, 2 ser. 78. In Scotland he had dedications at Elan Finan or Sunart, Argyleshire; Mochrum, Wigtonshire; Migvie, Aberdeenshire; Abersnetheek in Monymusk, Aberdeenshire; and perhaps Kilfinan, Argyleshire, but some count Finan of Lindisfarne, its patron. In the Dunkeld Litany he is called Finnach among the holy bishops, or Finnane in the list of holy abbats. (Bp. Forbes, Kal. Scott. Saints, pp. lviii. lx. 347; C. Innes, Orig. Par. Scot. ii. 14-5, 49, 199.)

[J. G.]

FINAN (7) (FINANUS, FINNAN), a monk of Hii, or Iona, who succeeded Aidan, in A.D. 652, as bishop of Lindisfarne. He was ordained in Scotland, according to the rite of the Columban church, of which he was a member, and was sent to Lindisfarne when the vacancy took place. Finan rebuilt the church "more Scottorum," and made it worthy, as Bede says, to be the seat of a bishopric. The standard was not a high one. The church was constructed only of oaken planks, thatched with reeds. This was afterwards dedicated by archbishop Theodore in honour of St. Peter. (Bede, iii. 25; Symeon, H. E. D. i. 4.) Aidan and Finan had under their charge the whole of Northumbria. The mission of archbishop Paulinus came to an end in A.D. 633, and, after a brief interval, the monks of Hii stepped in, and worked the neglected diocese. Lindisfarne was selected to be the seat of the bishopric instead of York, because it was nearer to Hii, and in its situation was the counterpart of that island. The missionaries also had a fuller scope there for their ascetic life than they could have found in the old Roman capital. The system carried out at Lindisfarne was that of Columba at Hii. The monastery was governed by an abbat, selected by the bishop, with the consent of the brethren, and all the clergy inside and outside the monastery, including the bishop, observed the monastic rule. (Bede, Vita Cuth. c. 16; Skene's Celtic Scotland, ii. 157-159.) The system was then at its best. Missionary exertion extended far and wide, and its fruits were visible in the numbers who were baptized and educated, in the churches that were built, in the monasteries which were founded and endowed. (Bede, H. E. iii. 3.)

Finan had two great missionary successes beyond the boundaries of Northumbria. Peada, son of Penda, king of Mercia, sought the hand of Alchflæda, a daughter of Osuiu of Northumbria. Osuiu made the adoption of Christianity by the suitor and his people the condition of his consent to the union. Peada assented, being chiefly influenced by Alchfrid, Osuiu's son, who was already his brother-in-law. He was baptized therefore by Finan, with all his suite, in one of the royal villas near the Tyne. Bede calls it Ad Murum, which is probably Benwell. Four priests, Cedd, Adda, Betti, and Diuma, went back with Peada as missionaries. Of these, Diuma was ordained afterwards by Finan, as the first bishop of the mid-English and Mercia. (H. E. i. 21.) The special connexion between Northumbria and Mercia, in addition to the over-lordship of Osuiu, contributed largely, no doubt, to this religious victory. Another triumph followed. Sigebert, king of the East Saxons, was converted to Christianity by Osuiu, and was also baptized by Finan at Ad Murum. Sigebert asked for missionaries, and Cedd was sent to him from Mercia. On one occasion, when Cedd, who had been a monk of Lindisfarne, returned home to confer with Finan his superior, his old master, pleased with his success, sent for two other prelates and ordained him bishop. (H. E. iii. 22.)

Finan was of course a rigorous observer of the Columban method of observing Easter. Whenever anyone came into Northumbria from France or Kent, Finan invariably heard that his practice was at variance with the Roman usage. There were some in Northumbria who upheld that use, such as James the Deacon, whom Paulinus had left behind him, queen Eanfleda with her chaplain and suite, and, notably, an ecclesiastic of the name of Ronan, who, although a Scot by birth had learned in France or Italy the incorrectness of the Northumbrian practice. With Finan Ronan had many an argument on the subject, but in vain. Bede says that Finan had a "ferox animus," which was impervious to reason. (H. E. iii. 25.)

Finan died on the 31st August, A.D. 661. There is a notice of him in the Acta SS. Feb. iii. 21, founded chiefly upon Bede. See also Colgan's Acta SS. Hiberniae, i. 357; Hardy's Catalogue, i. pt. 1, 259; and Forbes's Lives of the Scottish Saints, 348-9. Finan's opposition to Rome deprived him of a place in the Roman calendar. He is to be found, however, in the old Scottish lists, and there is a notice of him in the Aberdeen Breviary. [J. R.]

FINAN (8), abbat of Clones, in the barony of Dartry, co. Monaghan, succeeded Nuada, A.D. 751, and died A.D. 778 (Four Mast. A.D. 773; Ann. Ult. A.D. 777). [J. G.]

FINBAR. [BARRY and FINNBHAR.]

FINBIL, abbes of Cluain-Bronaigh, now Clonbrony, in the barony of Clonard, co. Longford, succeeded Ellbrigh in 785 as the fifth abbat, and died in 809 (Four Mast. A.D. 804; Ann. Ult. A.D. 808). [J. G.]

FINCAN, FINCANA (FINCANE, FINTANA, FRINSECA), Oct. 13, daughter of St. Donald of the Glen of Ogilvie, in Forfarshire; probably at the beginning of the 8th century. She is the patron saint of Echt, Aberdeenshire, and perhaps has given her name to Kilfinichen in Mull, Argyleshire (C. Innes, Orig. Par. Scot. ii. pt. 314), but Dr. Reeves (Adamnan, 66) thinks that Finchan has a preferable claim. (Dempster, Hist. Eccl. Gent. Scot. i. 278; Camerarius, Scot. Fort. 168; Boethius, Scot. Hist. ix. c. 21; View Dioc. Aberd. 636; Bp. Forbes, Kal. Scott. Saints, 135, 164, 214, 239, 347. [J. G.]

FINCHAN (FINDCHAN, FINNCHAN), commemorated Mar. 11. In the Irish kalenda there are five saints of this name, and the Mart. Talaght calls the one commemorated Mar. 11, Finnchan ainc i Finnemh.

Finchan of long-continued sufferings." Finchan had come with St. Columba from Ireland, and so approved himself as to be made overseer of the monastery at Artchain in Tiree. There he ruled prudently for some years, till returning to Ireland he met with Aedh Dubh, a notoriously cruel and bloody man. When Finchan came back to Artchain he had Aedh with him, having, as is said by Colgan, induced Aedh to give up the royal crown for the monk's veil. So high was his opinion of his penitent, that in the course of time he sent for a distant bishop to have him ordained, and laid his right hand upon the head of Aedh along with the ordaining bishop's. This sacrilegious ordination was severely denounced by St. Columba. Finchan wiped out the stain of his crime by suffering, but the date of his death is unknown. (Colgan, Tr. Thoma. 346, c. 36, 379 n. 70, 426, c. 97, 490 n. 502, col. 1; Lanigan, Eccl. Hist. Ir. ii. c. 11, § 14; Reeves, Eccl. Antiq. 279, and Adamnan, 66-71, with the elaborate notes on the whole procedure; Todd, St. Patrick, 7-10; Kelly, Cal. Ir. Saints, 93; Bp. Forbes, Kal. Scott. Saints, 347-8; Skene, Celt. Scot. ii. 94, 130; Haddan and Stubbs, Councils, &c. ii. pt. i. 107.) His name is found in Kilfinichen or Killinchine, in the island of Mull, and his chair is pointed out above the church; his Scotch name is St. Fisk, and under that designation Bendochy, Perthshire, is dedicated to him. (C. Innes, Orig. Per. Scot. ii. pt. i. 314; Old Stat. Acc. Scot. ii. 342, 359; New Stat. Acc. Scot. Argyle, 36-97; Reeves, Adamnan, 66, 145; Scott, Fast. Eccl. Scot. iii. pt. i. 83; Bp. Forbes, Kal. Scott. Saints, 347-48.) [J. G.]

FINCHELL (FINCHEALL, FINNCHEALL, FINN-CHALL, FINDCHE, FINNCHE) was commemorated at Slieve-Guaire, now Slieve-Gory, a mountain-district in the barony of Clankee, co. Cavan, on Jan. 25, but is otherwise unknown. She may be the Fincheall, virgin, of April 24. (Mart. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, 27, 421; Mart. Doneg. in Kelly, Cal. Irish Saints, xiii.; O'Hanlon, Irish Saints, i. 437.) [J. G.]

FINCHU (FINNCHU, FINNCHUA, FINNCHUO), son of Finlogh, of Brigown, commemorated Nov. 2. His life in Irish is preserved in the Book of McCarthy Reagh, a MS., now better known as the Book of Lismore. Finchu was baptized by St. Ailbbe, was a pupil of St. Comgall (May 10), and was seven years in the abbacy of Bangor under St. Comgall, but there is no mention of him as such in the Irish Annals, and Sillanus or Aranus is given (Colgan, Acta SS. 423; Mart. Doneg. Feb. 28) as St. Comgall's immediate successor. His name seems to have been originally Chua, with the surname Finn, and by transposition Finnochua. His life was one of extreme austerity in accordance with the spirit of his age or the ideas of a later date (Mart. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, 317-19; Reeves, Acta SS. 381, referring to Fleming, Coll. Sac. 114). In the Felire of Aengus he is said to have resided at Croich, co. Monaghan, but his chief residence was at Bri-gobhann, now Brigown, near Lemoey, in the baronies of Condons and Clan-keena, co. Cork. (Book of Obits, C. C. Dublin, pp. lxxiv.-v. 182.) [J. G.]

of Lismore, co. Waterford, died A.D. 757. (Ann. Ult. A.D. 756.) [J. G.]

FINGAL (FINGHAL), of Lismore, co. Waterford, died A.D. 746 (Ann. Tig.; Four Mast. A.D. 741; Ann. Ult. A.D. 745). [J. G.]

FINGAR (GWINEAR, WYNNER), ST., an Irish saint who gave his name to the parish of Gwinear, close to the Hayle estuary in Cornwall. There is a "passio" of him and his sister Piala, falsely attributed to St. Anselm. (Migne, Anselm, ii. 326-334.) It was written at the request of some member of St. Fingar's church, perhaps in the 12th century, the age of religious biographies and commemorative legends. It is quite unhistorical, except perhaps so far as the names are concerned. The name Gwinear gives the Cymric form of the word meaning "white," which in Irish is Finn. The legend makes Fingar to be one of St. Patrick's converts in Ireland, a son of king Clito, who in anger drives him out, and he flies to Brittany. After returning, he again sets out with his sister Piala, and lands in the port of Hayle, where they suffer martyrdom at the hands of king Theodoric, and a sacred fountain still marks the spot. This may have taken place about 450. (See the Acta Sanctorum, 23 March, iii. 456-59, and suppl. 144; Hardy's Catalogue of Materials, i. 59, No. 167.) It is possible that a different life was seen by Leland. (Itin. ed. 1744, vol. iii. fol. 4.) [C. W. B.]

FINGINN (FINGHIN), son of Fiachra, has his obit given in the Irish Annals at A.D. 619 (Ann. Tig.; Four Mast. A.D. 614; Ann. Ult. A.D. 618). [J. G.]

FINIAN. [FINAN and FINNIAN.] Finianus Scotus, abbas Culdeus, is said by Dempster (Hist. Eccl. Gent. Scot. i. 286) to have flourished A.D. 402, and written De Vita S. Eusebii, lib. i. He is commemorated Feb. 22 (Tanner, Bibl. 280), but he is probably a reflexion, in Dempster's hands, of St. Finnian, bishop of Clonard, who had a commemoration on Feb. 23. [J. G.]

FINIAN, abbat of Swords. [FINAN (6).]

FINK. [FINCHAN.]

FINLAGAN, a saint having dedications in Argyleshire. (Bp. Forbes, Kal. Scott. Saints, 348.) [FINNLUGH.] [J. G.]

FINNBHAR is variously represented as BAIRRE, BARRE, BARRINDUS, BARRY, FINBAR, and FINDBAR; it is also equivalent to FINAN, FINNIAN, &c., and literally means "light-haired." This variety of synonymous names is a cause of great confusion and difficulty. [FINAN.] (Reeves, Adamnan, 103; Caulfield, Life of St. Fin Barre, 11, n. b.) (1) Son of Aedh, of Inis-doimble, abbat, commemorated July 4. This saint, who is to be distinguished from Barry of Cork [BARRY], being of the race of Eochaidh Finn Fothart, and family of St. Brigida, was abbat of Inis-Doimble, now Little Island, near Waterford. St. BARRFINN was his brother (Mart. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, 187, 299). He was a companion of St. Moechoemocus, and with many others is said to have been trained under

St. Comgall of Bangor, so that he would belong to the beginning of the 7th century (Colgan, Acta SS. 590, c. 11, 597 n. ¹⁴). Lanigan (Eccl. Hist. Ir. iii. c. 17, § 5) suggests that Inis-Doimble may really have been Inishlounaght, co. Tipperary, where St. Mochoemocus for some time lived.

(2) Mac Ua Bairdene does not find a place in the Irish Kalendars or in the Felire of Aenghus, yet his death is given in the Four Mast. and Ann. Ult. in the year 437. If he was a son of Restitutus, the Lombard, who is said to have been brother-in-law of St. Patrick, he yet is never quoted among the nephews of the apostle of Ireland. (Four Mast. by O'Donovan, i. p. 132 n. ^k; Petrie, Round Towers, 166-67; Colgan, Tr. Thaum. 226 n. ⁶; Ussher, Eccl. Ant. c. 17, wks. vi. 381 sq.) [J. G.]

FINNCHAN. [FINCHAN.]

FINNCHU, FINNCHUA, FINNCHUO. [FINCHU.]

FINNE, priest of Druim-licce, is commemorated on Feb. 9, and is, O'Hanlon thinks, of an early date. His dedication is probably now Drumlease, co. Leitrim. (See an interesting account of the place and its patrician foundation in O'Hanlon, Irish Saints, ii. 433-37.) [J. G.]

FINNIA, FINDIA. On Sept. 28 the Felire of Aenghus commemorates "the two shining Fin-nias," and the second hand inserts the name in Mart. Doneg. (by Todd and Reeves, 261), but their history is unknown. One called Fine or Finnia died abbess of Kildare, A.D. 805 (Four Mast. A.D. 800; Ann. Ult. A.D. 804; O'Hanlon, Irish Saints, i. 152); and another was sister of St. Ita or Mida, daughter of Cennfaeladh (Colgan, Acta SS. 73, c. 2). [J. G.]

FINNIAN, FINDIAN, FINIAN, FINNEN. Among the Irish saints in the sixth century a foremost place is held by the two Finnians, who connected the period of St. Patrick and St. Brigida with that of St. Columba and St. Comgall. The word Finnian appears to be the diminutive of Finn, 'white,' and as a name has a great variety of forms. [See FINAN and FINNBHAR.]

(1) Of Clonard, bishop or abbat, commemorated Dec. 12. This early Irish saint, the master of so many Christian teachers, has a place in all the Irish Kalendars, and is commemorated in the Scotch Kal. Drummond., Kal. Celt., and Mart. Aberd. (Bp. Forbes, Kal. Scott. Saints, 36, 92, 137). Colgan (Acta SS. 393 sqq.) has published one life "ex codice MS. Salmanticensi," and the special office of St. Finnian; Hardy (Descript. Cat. i. pt. i. 128-29, pt. ii. 789) notices four lives of St. Finnian, and Nicholson (Irish Hist. Lib. 46) refers to a life in Trin. Coll. Dublin. A life in Irish is in a thick quarto volume, among other Irish Lives, in the Burgundian Library at Brussels (Proc. Roy. Ir. Acad. iii. 485).

St. Finnian was descended from Ailill Telduib, from whom he had the designation Ui-Telduib; his mother was named Talech; he was a native of Leinster. For deeper insight into spiritual truth he crossed the Irish Channel to the city of Kilmuine or Menevia, and placed himself under SS. David, Cathmael, and Gildas, with whom some say he remained thirty years, but the time was probably much shorter. During that time he is said to have founded three churches, which are now entirely unknown, unless one of them be Llanffinan subject to Llanfihangel Ysgeifiog, Anglesey (Rees, Welsh Saints, 239-40; Williams, Em. Welshm. 155-56). Returning to Ireland he is said to have founded several churches, his chief foundation being at Clonard, in the county of Meath, from which scholars came out in as great numbers, in the words of Ussher, as Greeks of old from the sides of the horse of Troy. The usual number ascribed is three thousand, and O'Clery (Mart. Doneg.), following Mar. O'Gorman, calls him "a doctor of wisdom, and tutor of the saints of Ireland in his time." He is always known as "the preceptor of the twelve apostles of Ireland" (Todd, St. Patrick, 99 n. ¹; Mabillon, Annal. Bened. i. 208). It is now impossible to establish the date of his commencing his work at Clonard, but considering the celebrity to which it attained, and the dates of those connected with it, it could scarcely have been later than A.D. 520. Even his ecclesiastical position there is undetermined; in the later accounts of him he is called, as by Ware, bishop of Clonard, but the probability is that he was never more than abbat, and it is noteworthy that neither in his Acts, nor in the Irish Kalendars is he called a bishop. Ware says he wrote some Prelections and other things, but nothing is extant. He is reported to have preached before St. Brigida, visited St. Enna at Aran, prophesied the birth of St. Columba of Iona, and received the viaticum from St. Columba of Tirdaglas. He died in the year 550 (Ann. Tig.), or 552, when so many died of the cron-chonail, or yellow jaundice, and was buried at Clonard. His chief feast is Dec. 12, but he is also commemorated on Feb. 23.

(2) Of Moville, bishop, Feb. 11 and Sept. 10. In the more purely Scotch Kalendars he is commemorated as Wynnin, also Femin, Vimin, and Vinnin. By the Welsh he is called Winnin. There seems to be little doubt but Finnian of Moville and Wynnin of Kilwinning in Ayrshire are the same person. But the same cannot be said of Fridian bishop of Lucca. [FRIDIAN.] Capgrave (Nov. Leg. Angl. fol. cxlvii. b) gives an English or British Life of "St. Finan, bp. and confes.," and there seems to be a life or lives preserved in the Burgundian Library at Brussels (Proc. Roy. Ir. Acad. iii. 480, 485). For the rest we are obliged to have recourse to the lives of St. Fridian and contemporary Irish churchmen.

St. Finnian of Moville, near Newtown-Ards, co. Down, belongs to the second order of the Irish saints, and is venerated as the patron saint of Ulster, especially in the county of Down. His father was Cairpre, of the royal house of the Dal Fiatach, his mother was Lassara or Lascair (Colgan, Acta SS. 649, c. 5; Todd, Book of Hymns, Fasc. i. 99 n. ⁴). His education was first under Colman of Dromore, co. Down; by whom he was next recommended to the school of St. Caelan or Mochaoi of Nendrum (now Mahee island, in Strangford Lough), who died A.D. 497. St. Mochaoi sent him to the Magnum Monasterium in Britain, to be under bishop Nennio. The late Dr. Todd (Book of Hymns, Fasc. i. 104-8) concluded that that monastery, called also Futerna, Resnat, and Candida Casa, was the celebrated foundation of St. Ninian at Whithers, Wigtonshire (see also Lanigan, Eccl. Hist. i. c. 2, n. 17; Skene, Celt. Scot. ii. 48-53). From the school of Nennio he proceeded to Rome, and (according to the Life by Capgrave) staying seven years there was promoted to the priesthood. On returning to his native country, he founded a celebrated school at Moville, at which most of the chief Christian teachers were educated. This institution is of peculiar interest in carrying on the tradition of St. Ninian at Whithers, while that of Clonard derived its tradition of learning from the Welsh schools. Both influences were at work simultaneously in forming the minds of the future Irish teachers and missionaries, as the custom then was to make a circuit of the schools. Of Finnian's consecration to the episcopate we have no account. He was one of the chief preceptors of St. Columba, and is always mentioned by St. Adamnan (Vit. St. Columbae, ii. c. 1, iii. c. 4) with the deepest respect. The beauty of his sacred books seems to have been very noticeable, and the affection he had for them brought him into collision with two other famous ecclesiastics in ways peculiarly characteristic of the period, and to have given rise to a war which sent Scotland its greatest teacher. (For the dispute about St. Columba's copy of the Psalter, made from St. Finnian's manuscript against his will, and for the consequences attendant on the decision, see COLUMBA (1); and for the legend told of the same St. Finnian refusing to lend St. Fintan of Dunleisge a copy of his Gospels, see FINNTAN (6).) The year of his death is stated in the Irish Annals with only slight variation, and probably was A.D. 579 (Ann. Tig.). His great foundation was Moville, but he is also named as the founder of Dromin, co. Louth, and here the dispute between him and St. Columba concerning the manuscript is said to have occurred. (Todd, St. Patrick, 102-6, 120-21, and Book of Rights, i. 97-108; Reeves, Eccl. Ant. 151, 188, 200, and Adamnan, lxxii. lxxiv., 103, 198; Four Mast. by O'Donovan, i. 192-95; Ussher, Lat. Ant. c. 17, wks. vi. 522-23; Mart. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, 45, 243; O'Hanlon, Irish Saints, i. 396-97, ii. 486.) [J. G.]

FINNLUGH (FINNLOG, FINNLOGA). Son of Egan, of Tamlacht-Finnlogha, Jan. 3, descended from Fiatach Finn, monarch of Ireland (Reeves, Lat. Antiq. 202, 353; Mart. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, 7). He was brother of St. Fintan of Dunleisge [FINNTAN (6)]. The Irish church which commemorates him is that now known as Tamlacht Finlagan, near Newtown-Limavady, co. Londonderry. He is perhaps the St. Finlagan who has given his name to Loch Finlagan in the parish of Kilarrow in Lslay [FINLAGAN].

[J. G.]

FINNSEACH (FINNSECH, FINNSEGH, FINNECHA, FINNIECHE), etymologically "white woman." (1) Virgin, who had a dedication at Kierre Gorey, a mountainous district in the barony of Clankee, co. Cavan; her chief festival was Oct. 13, but she seems also to have been commemorated on Feb. 17. (Book of Rights, by O'Donovan, 188 n. 7; O'Hanlon, Irish Saints, ii. 61; Colgan, Acta SS. 361; Joyce, Irish Names of Places, 2nd ser. 9; Mart. Doneg. Oct. 13; Kal. Doneg. Oct. 13.)

(2) Virgin, commemorated on Nov. 9, and had her dedication at Croaghan, in Mowney, in the barony of Lower Ormond, co. Tipperary (Mart. Doneg. Nov. 9; Four Mast. by O'Donovan, vii. 85). [J. G.]

FINNTAN (FINDAN, FINTAN, FINNTEN), a common Irish name, which is the same as Finan and Finigan, being the diminutive of Finn, and signifying "little white-haired man."

(1) Son of Aedh, abbat, commemorated Sept. 19. Colgan (Tr. Thaum. 357, c. 31, 384 n. 27, 490 n. 67) strives to identify him with the Fintan, son of Aedh, who (Adamnan, Vit. S. Columbae, ii. c. 31) accompanied St. Columba across Drumalban in Scotland, and founded the monastery of Kailliau-inde; but where this was is unknown.

(2) Son of Gabhren, of Clonenagh, commemorated Feb. 17. Hardy (Descript. Cat. i. pt. i. 192, pt. ii. 789) notices the Lives given by Colgan and the Bollandists. O'Hanlon (Irish Saints, Feb. 17, ii. 574-98) goes fully into details. In most of the purely Scotch Kalendars he is confounded with St. Finan, bishop of Lindisfarne, whose feast was on the same day.

The father of St. Finntan belonged to the house of Eochaidh Finn Fothart in Wexford (Colgan, Acta SS. 355, c. 2; Todd, St. Patrick, 252, 287). His mother's name was Findath. He was probably born about the year 525 or 530, as being slightly St. Columba's junior, and received his education under St. Columba of Tirdaglas, having for his fellow-pupils St. Caemhan of Enach-Truim, and St. Mocumin. While yet a young man (juvenis) he founded the monastery of Clonenagh near Maryborough, Queen's County. There he established about A.D. 548 one of the famous schools of Ireland, and pupils came to him from all the country, the most illustrious being St. Comgall abbat of Bangor.

Of the monastic rule of St. Finntan we have no detailed account, and no trace of it is extant; but both for himself and his pupils he prescribed the utmost severity, so that he was called "chief head of the monks of Erin." Like hermits, they laboured with their own hands, and for a plough used a light hoe. They denied themselves all flesh-meat, and had not even a cow to supply them with milk. The discipline at Clonenagh was deemed unwisely severe, and St. Cainnech is said to have been the means of having had the rule considerably softened. The Book of Cluain Eidhneach, said by tradition to have been written by St. Finntan, is one of the numerous class of lost books of Ireland. In Keating's time in the beginning of the seventeenth century, it was preserved and highly prized, but it has since disappeared (O'Hanlon, Irish Saints, ii. 590-2), and we have no distinct account of its contents. The year of St. Finntan's death is uncertain: Colgan and Ussher say he flourished A.D. 550-60; Ussher (Index Chron.) puts his death at A.D. 603, which is the date in the Ann. Tigernach., and Ware (Ir. Writ. c. 13) apparently accepts it; but Colgan (Acta SS. 355 n. 28), followed by Lanigan (Eccl. Hist. Ir. ii. 229), says he must have died long before St. Columba, whose death took place A.D. 597. Kelly (Cal. Ir. Saints, 74-5) says he was called Stationarius, because he prayed with his arms extended like a cross.

(3) Munna, commemorated Oct. 21. The proper name of this saint was Finntan, but the surname Mun, Munna, Munnu, Mund, Mundus, has almost entirely supplanted the original name in Scotland: whether singly, however, or in combination, Finntan Munna introduces us to one of the most famous of the contemporaries of St. Columba, and to one who is highly venerated both in Ireland and in Scotland. The oldest notice of him is given in his Acts, found in the Codex Marsh., in primate Marsh's library, Dublin (v. 3, 4, fol. 127-129 b); in the Codex Salmant. in the Duke of Burgundy's library at Brussels (fol. 137-140): and the latter portion in Codex E, 3, 11; Trin. Coll. Dubl. fol. 105 a. (See Reeves, Adamnan, pp. xxv.-vi. 22, and Hardy's Descript. Cat. i. pt. i. 226, pt. ii. 789.) According to the Scotch legend he took the monastic habit at Hy under St. Columba, and built many monasteries in the province of Argyle, but on St. Columba's death he returned to Ireland, where he died.

In its details the Irish Life of St. Finntan is in several respects fuller and also different. He was son of Tulchan, of the race of Niall of the Nine Hostages. His mother was Fedelyn, of the race of Maine, and he had a sister, St. Coinchenn the Devout [COINCHENN (2).] There appears to be no doubt that he was in his early years under St. Comgall at Bangor, but that he was also under St. Columba at Kilmore, as stated in his Life, appears to be fabulous. His great foundation was at Teach-munna, the "House of Munna," now Taghmon, in the county of Wexford, where he is said (Mart. Doneg.) to have had two hundred and thirty monks in his monastery. In St. Finntan's day the Paschal controversy ran high, and St. Finntan successfully for the time took the old Scotie side, having as his chief opponent St. Lasarian or Molaisi abbat of Old Leighlin. (See Ussher, Eccl. Ant. c. 17, wks. vi. 501-5, Ind. Chron. A.D. 630; Reeves, Adamnan, 26-8; Lanigan, Eccl. Hist. Ir. ii. c. 15, § 6, for St. Finntan's position in the dispute.) He died in his own monastery at Taghmon, in A.D. 635 (Ann. Tig.), and is very highly spoken of by St. Adamnan (Vit. S. Columb. i. c. 2). He is said to have been a leper. Four Mast. by O'Donovan, i. 253 n.¹.

(4) Maeldubh succeeded St. Finntan at Clonenagh, and died A.D. 630 (Ann. Tig.; Four Mast. A.D. 626). He is commemorated on Oct. 20. (Acta SS. Oct. 20, tom. viii. 896-98; Colgan, Acta SS. 355, c. i., 385; Lanigan, Ch. Hist. Ir. ii. c. 12, § 11; Mart. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, 279; O'Hanlon, Irish Saints, ii. 657.)

(5) Abbat of Druimhing, commemorated Oct. 10. Druimhing is identified by O'Donovan (Four Mast. i. 450 n.⁴) as probably the place now called Dromin, situated near Dunshaughlin, in the county of Meath. There is a small ancient church (now in ruins) dedicated to him on the hill of Howth, in the diocese of Dublin (Book of Obits C.C. Dublin, xlv.).

(6) Of Dunbleisce, commemorated Jan. 3. Of this saint there is a memoir given by Colgan (Acta SS. 11-12) but it is of very little value. He appears to have been under a St. Comgall, probably the abbat of Bangor. His foundations were Dunbleisce, now Doone, and Kell-Finntan, supposed to be Killfinan, both in co. Limerick.

At Kilfountain, near Dingle in Kerry, there is a pillar-stone, on which is engraved the name Finten, the saint from whom the place derived its name, but he may not have been the patron of Dunbleisce (Journ. Kilkenn. Archaeol. Soc. new ser. ii. 189; Arch. Camb. 3rd ser. i. 103). If he lived in the time of St. Comgall of Bangor, he flourished in the end of the 6th century (Lanigan, Eccl. Hist. Ir. ii. c. 12, § 2, 32; Hardy, Descript. Cat. i. pt. ii. 789; Kelly, Cal. Irish Saints, 50).

(7) Bel-na-psalm, commemorated March 27. On this day the Martyrologies of Donegal and Tallaght commemorate St. Finntan Bel-na-psalm, Os-psalmorum, or Mouth of the Psalms, and Colgan (Acta SS. 771) gives a short notice, "De S. Fintano Psalmicano." In his Index Chron. Colgan says, "S. Fintanus, dictus Os Psalmodorum," flourished A.D. 598. (Kelly, Cal. Irish Saints, 106.)

(8) Corach, bishop of Clonfert, commemorated Feb. 21. The Bollandists (Acta SS. Feb. 21, tom. iii. 235) place him among their pretermitted saints, and O'Hanlon (Irish Saints, ii. 657-60) attempts to give a critical memoir founded on Colgan's short account of the saint. In this Colgan (Acta SS. 385) states that he was both abbat and bishop, and as such ruled several churches for many years. (a) Leamchuill, now probably Laughel, Queen's County. (b) Clonenagh, near Maryborough, Queen's County, where he either lived or was buried. (c) Clonfert in Connaught, where by an unusual arrangement he held both the abbacy and the episcopate at the same time. (d) Cluain aithchin in Leix, Queen's County, which was either founded or ruled by him. Colgan suggests several reasons for his receiving the name Corach, "a voice," and the most likely one is that he had a sweet tuneful voice and instructed the monks in some new mode of singing the hymns and services of the church. The year of his death is unknown; he probably flourished about the end of the 6th century, and was succeeded at Clonfert by St. Senach, who died A.D. 620, yet even the order of succession is not without great doubt. (Lanigan, Eccl. Hist. Ir. ii. c. 14, § 2; Kelly, Cal. Irish Saints, 77.)

(9) Son of Eochaidh, and brother of COLMAN (4) and COMAIGH, both of Slanore, was descended from Niall of the Nine Hostages, and is said to have lived at Bealach, but where this "road" or "pass" lay is unknown. His mother was Aiglenn, daughter of Lenin of Killiney, co. Dublin, and his feast Jan. 1. His usual name is Finntan Mac Echach. He probably belongs to the first half of the 7th century. (Mart. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, 5; Mart. Tallaght. in Kelly's Cal. Ir. Saints, xi.; Journ. Roy. Hist. and Arch. Assoc. Ir. 4 ser. iii. 48; O'Hanlon, Irish Saints, i. 24, ii. 557, 607; Colgan, Acta SS. 355, col. 1; Reeves, Adamnan, 173.)

(10) Inclusus. [FINTAN.]

(11) Of Oentrebh, abbat of Bangor, died A.D. 612 (Four Mast. and Ann. Ult.). Oentrebh is the old name of Antrim (Four Mast. by O'Donovan, i. 237 n.²). Finntan was the fourth abbat, and held the abbacy for three years, between Sillan and Mac Laisre.

(12) Of Ilos-coerach, disciple of St. Barry, at lat. lre (Colgan, Acta SS. 607; Caulfield, Life of St. Fa. Barre, v.) [J. G.]

FINTAN, FINDAN, patron of Augia Rheni, or Rheingaw or Rheinau, near Schaffhausen, whose life was published by Goldastus (Rer. German. Scrip. i. 318 sqq.), by Mabillon (Acta SS. O. S. B. tom. v. saec. iv. pt. i. 355), and by Lapf (Itin. tom. i. 233 sq.). Though an Irishman, he has no place in the Irish Kalendars. According to the Life, he was born in Leinster. His sister had been carried off in one of the earliest incursions of the Northmen, and Fintan being sent by his father in search of her, was himself taken captive by the same pirates; this must have been some years prior to A.D. 795. Slipping away from them as they rounded the north of Scotland, he committed himself to the waves, and was carried apparently to the coast of Caithness, where he remained with a bishop for two years. Thence he proceeded to Rome, visiting St. Martin's at Tours by the way; from Rome he went to Switzerland and lived with a nobleman for four years "in clericalia." He then became a monk at Rheinau in the fifty-first year of his age; and in the monastery, and as a monk in an adjacent cell, he spent twenty-seven years, his monastic profession being dated in A.D. 800, and his death in A.D. 827. Though not the founder of Rheinau, he was adopted as the patron, and his feast is Nov. 15. (Lanigan, Ecd. Hist. Ir. iii. c. 20, § 7; Reeves, Monach. pp. xxii.—iii.; Tanner, Bibl. 280; O'Connor, Ep. Nuncup. 61 and Proleg. ii. 186; Ware, Ir. Antiq. c. 24, and Ir. Writ. i. c. 6; Labbe, Ecd. Ant. c. 16, wks. vi. 277, Chron. lat. A.D. 795.) This St. Fintan or Findan is to be distinguished from one of the same name at Augia Dives, now Reichenau, whose feast is Nov. 16, and who is identified with St. Finntan of Lemchoill, or at least having his feast on the same day. [FINTAN (12).] [J. G.]

FINTAN, presbyter, confessor. (Usuard. Mart. Feb. 17.) [FINNTAN (2).]

FIONCIUS, bishop of Lamego, signs the acts of the fifteenth and sixteenth councils of Toledo in 688 and 693 [FILMIRUS]. (Esp. Sagr. xiv. 159; Aguirre-Catalani, iv. 313-333.) [M. A. W.]

FIRMATUS, deacon, commemorated, with his sister, Flavia or Flaviana, virgin, at Auxerre, Oct. 5. (Usuard. Mart.; Hieron. Mart.; Boll. Acta SS. Oct. iii. 163.) [C. H.]

FIRMIANUS, bishop of Centuriones in Samaria, banished by Hunneric, A.D. 484. (Victor Vit. Notitia, 56 in Migne, Patrol. Lat. lxxii.; Morcelli, Africa Christ. i. 136.) [L. D.]

FIRMILIANUS (1), ST., bishop of Caesarea in Cappadocia, one of the greatest prelates of his time; a friend of Origen, ranked with Dionysius the Great, appealed to by Cyprian, and a rebuker of Pope Stephanus.

In A.D. 232, tenth year of Alex. Severus, he already disceperet in his see (Eus. vi. 26, 27), though Cave (Hist. i. p. 123) speaks of A.D. 233 as the year of his elevation. When Origen soon after left Egypt, Firmilian induced him to visit the "climata" of Cappadocia, eis ἐκκλησιῶν ὁφέ-της; subsequently he paid Origen long visits

(χρόνους) in Judea to advance his own knowledge of theology, τῆς εἰς τὰ θεῖα βελτιώσεως ἕνεκα. (Euseb. vi. 26, 27.)

We next hear of him (Euseb. vi. 46) as urging Dionysius of Alexandria to attend the council of Antioch, held for the repudiation of Novatianism (cf. Routh, R. S. iii. 51). Dionysius did not attend, because the death of Fabius, bishop of Antioch (who had leant towards that system) and the succession of Demetrian rendered it in his opinion needless.

In A.D. 256 he is addressed by Cyprian in a letter now lost as to the Asiatic practice of baptizing into the church those who had been already baptized by heretics. In his long reply (Cyp. Ep. 75) he describes it as impossible to add much to the strength and importance of Cyprian's arguments (which he had himself committed to memory) and his letter is little more than a digest of those arguments. The resemblance of its language to Cyprian's has been treated as suspicious, but while it is so close that it must be from the same hand, there is abundant indication of a Greek original [CYPRIANUS, note x, p. 751]. He is quite clear as to the antiquity of the practice in Asia, which he regards as ratified by the council of Iconium (Synnada unnamed) in the instance of the Montanists. It is possible that to those councils severally are due the forty-fifth and forty-sixth Apostolic Canons, two of the five which have been disallowed by popes. He speaks of several meetings of the Cappadocian bishops, and of one having occurred immediately before his writing. Baronius, Labbe, and other Roman writers have been anxious to prove that the baptismal dispute originated with Firmilian and the East, preferring this collision with separate churches to one with the patriarch of Africa. But the attempt is against the whole tenor of Cyprianic correspondence as well as the express statement of Eusebius (vii. 3).

To Firmilian the see of Jerusalem appears to be the central see, so far as such an idea arises. He presided at Antioch, A.D. 266, in the first synod held to try Paul of Samosata, and visited Antioch twice on this business. (Concil. Antioch. contr. Paul. Samos. in Routh, R. S. iii. 304; Euseb. lib. vii. c. 30.) Imposed upon by Paul's promises, he procured the postponement of a decision against him. But when it was necessary to convene a third synod, A.D. 272 (Labbe considers that there were only two, though the two previous visits might seem to imply two already), Firmilian, who was to have again presided, died on his journey at Tarsus. Oct. 28 is the day observed in his honour in the Menologium.

To the eyes of contemporaries he may well—with his forty years of influential episcopate, and the magnificent associations connected with him as the friend of Origen and Dionysius, as appealed to by Cyprian, as censuring Stephanus himself—have seemed the most conspicuous figure of his time. Thus in Dionysius he appears as heading the list of the "περιφανέστεροι whom alone he names," and Nicephorus collects from his authorities that he was περιφανής ἀνὴρ καὶ ἐκατέρας γνώσεως ἡκριβούμενος ἔχων τὰς ἐξεις, skilled alike in philosophy and theology.

Routh (vol. iii. p. 149) points to him as one of the oldest authorities who states with precision the Anti-Pelagian doctrine. Basil (de Spiritu Sancto, xxix.) speaks of his λόγοι as early testimonies to the exactness of his own doctrine, and quotes his agreement with Cyprian on baptism in the epistle to Amphilochius (Ep. 188). The fact that he is not mentioned by Jerome among ecclesiastical writers shews that he cannot have been voluminous. A book upon the persecutions is absurdly attributed to him by Moses Chorenensis. (Routh, R. S. vol. i. p. 103.)

[E. W. B.]

FIRMILIANUS (2), successor of Urbanus as governor of Palestine in the reign of Maximin, whose chief agent he was in the persecution of the Christians in those parts. The horrible tortures which he employed are described at length by Eusebius. The best known of his victims is PAMPHILUS. After the death of Maximin he was beheaded by order of Licinius, probably in A.D. 313. (Euseb. de Mart. Pal. chaps. viii. ix. xi.)

[M. F. A.]

FIRMINUS (1), bishop of Mimate (Mende); commemorated on Jan. 4. Some argue that he must have lived between St. Privatus, who was slain in the time of Gallus and Valerian, and Genialis, who subscribed the first council of Arles, 314. He may possibly have preceded the first of these. His body is said to have been found ipso revelante at La Canourgue (Canonica). (AA. SS. Jan. i. 93; Gall. Christ. i. 86.)

[R. T. S.]

FIRMINUS (2) I., bishop of Amiens, a native of Pampeluna. He was the son of Firmus, a senator of Pampeluna, and became the earliest convert of HONESTUS the apostle of Pampeluna. There he was subsequently ordained a bishop by Saturninus bishop of Toulouse, but apparently only as a missionary bishop for Gaul, though he has been reckoned (Gams, Ser. Ep. 62, 487) first bishop of Pampeluna. In Gaul he is said to have preached in the districts of Albi, Auvergne, Angers, Beauvais, and Amiens. Of the last he was reckoned the apostle and first bishop. He is said to have been martyred by order of the Roman governor, and was commemorated on Sept. 25. But his death is placed at various dates, from the apostolic age down to A.D. 303, and our knowledge of his history rests wholly upon the authenticity of his acts, given at great length by the Bollandists, who defend them (perhaps not very successfully) against the arguments of Tillemont, in his article on St. Saturninus. (Mém. vol. iii. 303; AA. SS. Sept. vii. 51; Gall. Chr. x. 1150.)

[R. T. S.]

FIRMINUS (3) II., bishop of Amiens, cir. 370 or 380, said to have been baptized by Firminus I., and to have ruled the see for forty years. (Boll. AA. SS. 1 Sept. i. 175.)

[R. T. S.]

FIRMINUS (4), driven from Italy under the Arian king Theodoric, and having found refuge at Metz was there chosen bishop on the death of Adelphus. But the duration of his episcopate is variously stated at eight and twenty-eight years. (Gall. Christ. xiii. 684.)

[R. T. S.]

FIRMINUS (5), a native of Toul, raised late in life to the bishopric of Verdun; died A.D. 502, when Clovis was besieging the town. [EUSPICIOUS.] (Gall. Christ. xiii. 1165.)

[R. T. S.]

FIRMINUS (6), ST., fourth bishop of Uzès, born in the province of Narbonne, of noble parentage, about A.D. 516. At twelve years he was sent to Uzès with Ferreolus his brother Ambert's son, and his successor in the bishopric, the seven years old, to be instructed by his uncle Roricus. His progress was so rapid that in the twentieth year he was ordained a priest, though the canon was thereby infringed, and consecrated suffragan and successor of his uncle, upon whose death shortly afterwards he was appointed to the see in the 22nd year of his age (A.D. 538). In his episcopate the see of Uzès was separated from the archbishopric of Narbonne, and joined to that of Arles or Bourges. St. Firminus was present at the fourth council of Orleans in 541, the fifth in 549, and the second of Paris about 551. He is said to have been a joint author with Cyprian and Viventius of the life of St. Caesarius of Arles, and has been supposed by some to have been one of his disciples. Some verses of his contemporary, Arator (A.D. 490-556 or 560), sub-deacon of the church of Rome, prove that he was known beyond his country (quoted in the Gall. Christ. vi. 612). He died in 553, at the age of thirty-seven, and was commemorated Oct. 11. His tomb in the church of St. Baudilius was celebrated for its miracles in the 9th century. (See the letter of Annulo, bishop of Lyons, to Theobald of Langres, s. 6, in Migne Patr. Lat. cxvi. 81.) He is said to have built two churches at Uzès, and there was long existing an abbey called after him in the same city. He was succeeded by his nephew St. Ferreol (Usuard. Mart. Oct. 11; Boll. Acta SS. Oct. v. 635; Mansi, ix. 120, 136, 740, Patr. Lat. lxxvii. 1001, 1253; Gall. Christ. vi. 611.)

FIRMINUS (7), sixth bishop of Vence, following Prosper and succeeded by Deutherius (cir. A.D. 530-540). (Gall. Christ. iii. 1214.)

[S. A. B.]

FIRMINUS (8), bishop of Trieste, who with other bishops of Istria and north Italy, maintained a separation from Rome, on the question of the Three Chapters. He afterwards was reconciled to the church of Rome, and troubled, in consequence, by Severus, patriarch of Grado, head of the separatists. Gregory the Great in 600 writes to encourage him to be firm (lib. xii. 32 indict. v. in Migne, lxxvii. 1243); also in 603 to Smaragdus the exarch, asking him to protect Firminus. (Lib. xiii. 33, indict. vi. in Migne, lxxvii. 1283.)

[A. H. D. A.]

FIRMINUS (9) (FIRMUS), ninth bishop of Tarentaise, between St. Heraclius and Probinus about the commencement of the 7th century. (Gall. Christ. xii. 702.)

[S. A. B.]

FIRMINUS (10), bishop of Bieda (Blevin) south of Viterbo, present at the Lateran synod under Martin in 649, which condemned the Monothelite heresy. (Mansi, x. 867; Hefele, § 307)

[A. H. D. A.]

FIRMINUS (11), said to have been 7th bishop of Lodève, succeeding Anatolius, and followed by Ansemundus (cir. A.D. 652), but the evidence of his existence is dubious. (Gall. Christ. vi. 528)

FIRMINUS (12), June 24; a military martyr with six others, in Armenia, under the emperor Maximin, A.D. 312. Some short time previous

...is, under the teaching of Gregory the ... had embraced the faith with enthusiasm. When, therefore, in May, 311, Maximin at a general persecution on foot throughout the East, the Armenians took up arms in defence of their oppressed brethren, and defeated the emperor with great loss. During this campaign a martyr seems to have suffered. (Martyr. Rom.; Eusebius, H. E. lib. ix. cap. 8-9; Mason, Antique Persecution, pp. 130, 325.) [G. T. S.]

FIRMINUS (13), a young man of high birth and noble parentage, to whom St. Basil wrote, c. A.D. 372, reproaching him for the paucity and severity of his letters, and expressing the sorrow with which he had heard that he had deserted the ascetic life, and, following the example of his paternal grandfather, had adopted the military profession, and beseeching him to return to his home, and enter on the career of civil distinction open to him (Basil. Epist. 116 [174]). Firminus at once yielded to Basil's remonstrances, and wrote, stating that through the influence of powerful friends he felt sure of obtaining his discharge, and declaring his resolution to adopt a celibate life (ibid. 117 [234]). [E. V.]

FIRMINUS (14), a layman of Caesarea, whose friendship Chrysostom formed during his stay in that city on his way to Cucusus A.D. 404. Chrysostom wrote to him on his arrival there to announce the safe accomplishment of his journey, his satisfaction with Cucusus, and the richness of its inhabitants (Chrysost. Epist. 80). [E. V.]

FIRMINUS (15) of Arles, at whose request Severus Apollinaris published his ninth book of Antiquities (ix. Ep. 1; Ceillier, x. 394). [R. T. S.]

FIRMUS (1), bishop of Verona, probably early in the 3rd century. (Ughelli, Ital. Sacr. v. 551; Appellotti, Chiese d'Ital. x. 740.) [R. S. G.]

FIRMUS (2), martyr of Carthage, A.D. 250. [Intro.] [E. W. B.]

FIRMUS (3), Aug. 9, martyr with Rusticus at Verona, 304. He was sprung from a noble family in Bergamo, which rendered his steadfast adherence to the faith the more obnoxious to the emperor Maximian, who at the time was carrying on the persecution with great vigour in north Italy, being a resident at Milan. Firmus was arrested, and in company with a relative, Rusticus, led before the emperor, and by him delivered over to the prefect Anulinus, who took them to Verona, and there put them to death. A story prevailed of the bodies having been taken to Africa and subsequently brought from thence to Verona, which gave rise to a controversy for centuries between the two towns as to which of them possessed the remains, until the question was settled by St. Charles Borromeo in the year 1575 solemnly transferring the relics from a tomb in the suburbs to the cathedral. (Martyr. Rom. ed. Baron.; Petrus de Natal., Calend. SS. lib. 7, cap. 42; Boll. Acta SS. Aug. i. 419-423.) [G. T. S.]

FIRMUS (4), Feb. 4, martyr; whose name occurs nowhere save in the local offices of the church at Genoa. He probably is the same as the Firmus commemorated on Feb. 2, as a martyr at Rome, A.D. 304, with Fortunatus, Felicianus, Candidus, and twenty-four others. (Martyr. Rom., Hieron., Usuardi; Boll. Acta SS. Feb. i. 960.)

[G. T. S.]

FIRMUS (5), June 24, one of the seven brothers; military martyrs, in Armenia, under Maximin. [FIRMINUS (12).] [G. T. S.]

FIRMUS (6), June 1; martyr in Greece under Maximin, A.D. 312. (Martyr. Rom.; Bas. Menol.) [G. T. S.]

FIRMUS (7), a Moorish chief, who revolted against the Romans in the reign of Valentinian. Our chief authority is Ammianus Marcellinus (xxix. 5). From him we learn that Firmus was the son of Nubel, the most powerful of the Moorish chieftains. The revolt soon assumed serious proportions, and Count Theodosius, father of the future emperor, was sent to quell it. He seemed for a moment to have gained his object, whereupon Firmus had recourse to a new expedient. He sent Christian envoys, thinking thereby to mollify his opponent, and he was not disappointed. This unnatural alliance appears from St. Augustine to have been permanent and well-known; since he reproaches the Donatists for having employed this "barbarus rex," whom he characterizes as "Hostis immanissimus Romanorum," to persecute their enemies the Rogatists, and for recognising him as a legitimate king (Cont. Parmenianum, i. 10, 11), so much so, that the Rogatists gave them the nickname of Firmiani (Ep. 87, Migne). In the latter passage, he also mentions an atrocious act of a Donatist bishop of Rusiccada, who formed a plot with Firmus to come into his city and exterminate the Catholics. The revolt appears to have begun in the middle of 372; since Romanus, who was superseded by Theodosius, is mentioned as count in June of that year (Cod. Theod. ad loc.). It must in that case have lasted at least two years, since Ammianus (ch. 6, 1) makes it contemporary with the revolt of the Quadi, which occurred in 374. It is referred to briefly by Zosimus (iv. 16), Orosius (Hist. vii. 33), and Paulus Diaconus (Hist. Miscell. lib. xii.), who quotes Orosius. Symmachus (Ep. i. 64, al. 58) apparently alludes to it, when he says that the barbarians seized a large treasure when they took Caesarea.

There is a medal extant, of uncertain date, with the inscription, D. N. Firmus P. F. Aug. which Spanheim (de Praest. et Usu Numm. Antiq. Diss. xi. p. 364, ed. Amst. 1717) thinks to be our Firmus. This may certainly be supported by Zosimus (loc. cit.). Other authorities have supposed the name to be another form of Firmus, a tyrannus in the time of Aurelian.

[M. F. A.]

FIRMUS (8), ST., bishop of Tagaste in the African province of Numidia, mentioned by St. Augustine in his De Mendacio (xiii. 23), as protecting a fugitive, "for," said he, "I can neither tell a lie by saying that I have not concealed him, nor can I deliver him into your hands." So great was his constancy even when brought before the emperor that he preserved the man who had thrown himself on his protection. He is commemorated on July 31. (AA. SS. Boll. Jul. viii. 180; Morcelli, Africa Christ. i. 299.)

FIRMUS (9), a presbyter in the beginning of the 5th century; an active man and trusted with matters of importance. He visited St. Jerome at Bethlehem first in the year 405, and was charged by him with letters for St. Augustine (Ep. 115, 116, ed. Vall.). He was again with Jerome ten years later, and was requested by him to take charge of the property of Eustochium and the younger Paula at Ravenna on his return to Italy in the year 415. He afterwards proceeded to Africa, where he was in communication with St. Augustine (Jerome to Augustine, Ep. 134, ed. Vall.). We hear of him again as the bearer of a letter from Sixtus (afterwards pope) to Augustine and Alypius, and again returning with the answer in the year 318 (Aug. Ep. 191, 194).

[W. H. F.]

FIRMUS (10), a bishop of the Cappadocian Caesarea, who was present at the council of Ephesus, A.D. 431, and took a rather conspicuous part in its proceedings. He protested against deferring the opening of the council for the arrival of John of Antioch, and called upon Memnon, the bishop of Ephesus, to state how many days had elapsed since the sessions ought to have commenced (Labbe, Concil. iii. 450). On the arrival of the legates of the Roman see, and the reading of the letter of pope Coelestinus, Firmus declared that the sentence against Nestorius contained in it should be regarded as final, and Nestorius pronounced canonically deposed (ibid. 618). He highly praised Cyril's exposition of the Nicene faith for its clearness, which left nothing doubtful, and for its perfect consistency with the Catholic faith (ibid. iv. 163). He was one of the delegates to Theodosius (ibid. 1313). He was deposed by the Oriental party at Tarsus (Tray. Iren. cc. 38, 66, 136, 141, 201), notwithstanding the high commendations lavished on him by John of Antioch (ibid. c. 4). Forty-five letters of Firmus were published by Muratori from a MS. in the Ambrosian Library (Anecd. Graec. Patav. 1709, also in Migne, Patrol. lxxvii. p. 1477 sqq.). These are charming examples of a refined epistolary style, short, bright, playful, and very interesting from the light they throw on the manners of the age. They do not touch at all on theological questions. He died A.D. 439 (Socr. H. E. vii. 48).

[E. V.]

FIRMUS (11), bishop of Tipasa in the African province of Numidia, one of the delegates of his province to the council assembled at Carthage by Boniface A.D. 525 (Mansi, viii. 647). His name is found amongst the five African bishops present at the first session of the council of Constantinople, A.D. 553; but this may have been a successor to his see of the same name. (Mansi, ix. 174; Morcelli, Africa Christ. i. 327.)

FIRMUS (12) (FIARMUS, FARMUS), bishop of Viseo, one of the suffragan churches of Merida, in the years 638 and 646, the dates of the seventh and eighth councils of Toledo, the acts of which he signs. Before and after the Suevian occupation of Galicia, Viseo was a suffragan church of Merida; but during the rule of the Suevi it was transferred to Braga. (Esp. Sagr. xiv. 314; Aguirre-Catalani, iii. 423-448.)

[M. A. W.]

FLABIANUS, the name of two African bishops, one of Bulula in Byzacena, the other of Vicus Pacis in Numidia, banished by Hunneric. A.D. 484, after the conference at Carthage between the Arians and Catholics. (Notitia, Victor. Vit. 57 in Migne, Patrol. Lat. lviii.; Morcelli, Africa Christ. i. 137, 353.)

FLABIANUS. [FLAVIANUS.]

FLACCIANUS (1), a proconsul of Africa, though at what time is uncertain, mentioned by St. Augustine as a man of ability, education, and judgment. Licentius, one of the interlocutors in the dialogue contra Academicos, gives him as an instance of a man who, though unwillingly, could not help bearing witness to the correctness of the conjectures made by a notorious conjurer named Albicerius. One of these was that without previous information, as was said, he named correctly a property which Flaccianus was about to buy, and another that being asked of what Flaccianus was thinking, he quoted, though an illiterate man, a line of Virgil which he had then in his mind. He is also mentioned by Augustine as having brought to his notice a prophecy concerning our Lord delivered by the Erythraean Sibyl. Augustine is also said to have written several letters to him, which are lost. (Aug. c. Acad. i. 18, 21; Civ. Dei, xviii. 23; Tillemont, vol. xiii. p. 33.)

[H. W. P.]

FLACCIANUS (2) (FLAVIANUS), bishop of Rhodope. Baronius quotes a Vatican manuscript purporting to be an epistle of Flaccianus, or perhaps Flavianus, a bishop of Rhodope, to Peter Fullo, patriarch of Antioch, charging him with Arianizing in his interpolation of the Trisagion. The writer says he has been driven to find refuge at Rome from the spiritual tempests of the east. Baronius, placing him in 483, conjectures he may have been among the bishops who came from Egypt with John of Alexandria to Rome. The epistle is probably spurious, but Le Quien thinks the person to whom it is attributed a real one, and puts him among the bishops of Trajanopolis, the metropolitan see of the province of Rhodope. (Baron. ann. 483, lxii.; Le Quien, Or. Chr. i. 1195.)

[C. H.]

FLACCILLA (1), empress and saint, first wife of Theodosius I.

I. Name.—A medal, engraved by Du Cange and by Baronius, has the inscription "Ael. Flaccilla Aug. By the Greek writers, Socrates, Sozomen, Theodoret, Nicephorus, etc., the name is given as Πλακίλλα. Others, e.g. Philostorgius (H. E. x. 7) call her Placidia. The treatise of Faustinus de Trinitate, which professes to be written at the request of the empress, who, from all internal evidence would seem to be Flaccilla, is entitled in the ordinary editions, "Ad Gallam Placidiam." There seems, therefore, to have been a confusion, owing to the similarity of the names Placilla and Placidia, between the subject of this article and the well-known Galla Placidia.

II. Origin, etc.—Claudian tells us that she was by birth a Spaniard (De Laud. Ser. 69), and Valesius (Not. ad Soz. H. E. vii. 6. 3) concludes that she must have been the daughter of Antonius, prefect of Gaul, and consul in 382. This is founded upon Themistius (Or. xvi. p. 203 D, at Harduin.), who says that Theodosius conferred the consulship upon his κηδέστης. This, says Valerius, can be no other than Antonius, his father-in-law. The words, however, seem hardly to warrant such an assumption of certainty. We gather from St. Jerome (Ep. 79. 2, Migne) that her sister was the mother of Nebridius, who married Salina, daughter of the Moorish prince Gildo. [GILDO.]

III. Life and Character.—Her marriage with Theodosius probably took place in 373, since her first child seems to have been born in 377. She was the mother of Arcadius and Honorius, afterwards emperors, and of a daughter Pulcheria, who died just before her mother, and who is commemorated in a funeral oration by St. Gregory Nyssa (vol. iii. p. 863, Migne's ed.). Some think that the Gratian mentioned by St. Ambrose (de Ob. Theodos. § 40, Migne) was also her son, but St. Gregory Nyssen (de Pers. ad fin.) tells us plainly that she had only three children. The Chron. Pasch. (ad ann. 386) makes a mistake with regard to her, calling her the second wife of Theodosius, which is obviously incorrect (cf. esp. Soc. H. E. iv. 31, 18). Her many virtues are celebrated by St. Ambrose, & Gregory Nyssen, Sozomen, Theodoret, and Eusebius, among Christian writers, and equally by the heathen Themistius.

Sozomen (H. E. vii. 6. 3) calls her πιστοτάτη πατρίδος τοῦ δόγματος τῆς ἐν Νικαίᾳ συνόδου, and narrates how she deterred the emperor from having an interview, as he had intended, with the Arian Eunomius.

Theodoret (H. E. v. 19) tells us that so far from being elated by her high position, she made herself the servant of the lowest, and used to visit the hospitals and the homes of the sick and to minister to them with her own hands; and that she continually reminded her husband of the gratitude which he owed to God for the many gifts, and by this means nourished the seeds of good within him. St. Ambrose (de Ob. Theodos. § 40, ed. Migne) speaks of her as fidelis anima Deo.

Themistius (Or. xix. p. 231 A) tells us that it was by her advice that the emperor pardoned the conspirators in 385 [THEODOSIUS], and that thus, as in other cases, their sentiments were in perfect harmony—συμψήφου τῆς δημοσύγου ἀπὸ αὐτῆς καὶ ἀπὸ βουλευούσης εἰς μίαν.

Eusebius Callistus (H. E. xii. 42) repeats almost verbally the account given by Theodoret.

IV. Death, etc.—She died apparently in 385, on Sept. 14 (cf. Tillemont, Emp. vol. v. note 25 on Theodosius), at Scotumia, in Thrace, whither she had gone for the sake of the waters. St. Gregory, to whom we owe this last piece of information, pronounced her funeral oration, which is still extant (vol. iii. p. 878, in Migne's edition of his works), in which he praises her throughout as a model of Christian virtues. (Cf. also Zonaras, xiii. 18.)

The Chron. Pasch. (l. c.) and Du Cange (Cypris. Christ. ii. 5. 3) mention a palace at Constantinople called after her name. A brazen statue erected to her at Antioch was destroyed shortly after her death in one of the tumults which arose on the subject of taxing, and the affection with which the emperor entertained for her memory is strikingly shewn by the signal vengeance which he resolved to exact, and which he was afterwards persuaded to mitigate (Theod. H. E. v. 20; Niceph. H. E. xii. 43). Tillemont (Emp. vol. v. art. 26) says that the Greek church reckons her as a saint. This is founded upon the Menaia for Sept. 14, where the words are: "Καὶ μνήμη τῆς εὐσεβεστάτης βασιλίσσης Πλακίλλης, συζύγου γενομένης τοῦ μεγάλου βασιλέως Θεοδοσίου," followed by the following lines: "Φθαρτὸν λιποῦσα στέμμα γῆς ἡ Πλακίλλα, ἐν οὐρανοῖς ἀφθαρτον εὗρηκε στέφος. Αὕτη πάντα τὸν τῆς ζωῆς χρόνον ἐν εὐσεβείᾳ καὶ τῇ τῶν νοσοῦντων ἐπιμελείᾳ πρὸς Κύριον ἐξεδήμησε." The Bollandist writer on September 14 contends that this commemoration is not sufficient to justify Tillemont's conclusion, since the bishops of the sixth general council are immediately afterwards commemorated in much the same way, and since she is not mentioned in the Menologia, Synaxaria, Typica, etc. His conclusion is "Flaccillae mentio est in Menaia impressis sed potius tanquam venerabilis quam ut Sanctae." In Ferrarius, however (Catal. Sanct. qui in Mart. Rom. non sunt), she is mentioned as being commemorated at Constantinople, on Aug. 14, which seems hardly to bear out the statement of the Bollandist writer "Apud Ferrarium memoria est Placillae, tanquam imperatricis beatæ memoriæ," meaning apparently not as a saint. The fact that she is not commemorated in the Roman calendar seems therefore to have prejudiced the Bollandist writer unduly against her claims, and Tillemont's conclusion is apparently the more correct of the two. [M. F. A.]

FLACCILLA (2), elder daughter of the emperor Arcadius by Eudoxia, born in 397. (Marcellinus, Chron.) She apparently died young, as she is not mentioned by Sozomen or Philostorgius among the children of Arcadius. (Cf. Philost. xi. 6; Soz. H. E. ix. 1.) [M. F. A.]

FLACCILLUS (FLACILLUS), Arian bishop of Antioch, A.D. 333–342. There is a very remarkable discrepancy as to the true form of the name of this bishop. Jerome, in his Chronicle, calls him Placillus; Sozomen, Placetius or Placitus (H. E. iii. 5); Theodoret, Flacitus (H. E. i. 21), while Athanasius (Apol. ii. pp. 797, 799) and Eusebius (in Marcell. lib. iii. pr. p. 57), followed by Theophanes, write the name Flacillus. He appears in the modern catalogue of the patriarchs of Antioch as Placentius (Neale, Patriarchs of Ant. p. 156). After the deposition of Eustathius, A.D. 331, the episcopal succession was singularly rapid. Eulalius held the see but three months, Euphronius, the immediate predecessor of Flaccillus, only fifteen. The episcopate of Flaccillus was much longer, lasting, though the exact dates are uncertain, about nine years. Nothing is known of Flaccillus previous to his becoming bishop of Antioch on the death of Euphronius, and little is recorded of him as bishop save his official acts. He presided at the council of Tyre, 335, held, by the emperor's desire, to investigate the charges against Athanasius, and joined in the sentence of deposition pronounced upon him. From Tyre he passed on with his episcopal brethren to Jerusalem to celebrate the dedication of the Church of the Resurrection, which took place Sept. 13 in that year. Tillemont thinks it probable that Flaccillus resided at the council which succeeded the solemnities of the consecration by which Arius and Euzoius were admitted to communion as orthodox believers, who had suffered from the calumnies of jealous rivals. Six years later, we find him occupying the same position at the celebrated "Council of the Dedication" held at Antioch, 341 (Socr. ii. 8, 9; Soz. iii. 5). Flaccillus is associated by Theodoret with his two Arian successors, Stephen and Leontius, as men whose unjust and impious deeds it would require a volume to recount (Theod. H. E. ii. 24). No definite charge, however, is specified. Flaccillus must have had some reputation for erudition, since Eusebius dedicated to him his work against Marcellus of Ancyra, with the request that he would make any additions or corrections he might think desirable (Euseb. in Marcell. l. iii. pr. p. 57). He must have died about A.D. 345, and was succeeded by Stephen. [E. V.]

FLACCUS (1), bishop of Sanis or Sanaus, in Phrygia Pacatiana, one of the Nicene fathers, A.D. 325. (Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 805; Mansi, ii. 695.) [L. D.]

FLACCUS (2), bishop of Hierapolis, in Phrygia Salutaris. One of the Nicene fathers, A.D. 325 (Mansi, ii. 695); subsequently he joined the Eusebians, and was one of the Easterns whose "indecent and suspicious flight" provoked the anger of the Council of Sardica, A.D. 347. His name is appended to the letter to the churches, which the seceders published at their synod at Philippopolis. (Mansi, iii. 140; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 834.) [L. D.]

FLACOUS (3) ALBINUS. [ALCUIN.]

FLACHERTAC. [FLAITHBHEARTACH.]

FLACILLUS, bishop of Jassus, on the coast of Caria, present at the Council of Chalcedon, A.D. 451. (Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 913; Mansi, vii. 156.) [L. D.]

FLAITHBHEARTACH (1) Abbat of Cillmor-Emhir, now Kilmore, situated three miles to the east of Armagh, died A.D. 812. (Four Mast. by O'Donovan, A.D. 807, i. 419.) [J. G.]

(2) Flaithbheartach or Flachertac, son of Loingseach, became monarch of Ireland A.D. 722, and after reigning seven years, retired A.D. 729 to Armagh, where he died in monastic seclusion, A.D. 760 (Four Mast.) or more truly A.D. 765. (Ann. Ult. A.D. 764.) [J. G.]

FLAITHGHEAL (FLAIGHEL), son of Taichleach, abbat of Druim-ratha, said by Colgan (Acta SS. 876) to be a church in Leyney, Connaught, died A.D. 793. (Four Mast. A.D. 788; Ann. Ult. A.D. 792.) [J. G.]

FLAITHNIA (FLAITNIA), son of Congall, and called The Wise, died A.D. 715. (Four Mast. A.D. 713; Ann. Ult. A.D. 714.) [J. G.]

FLAITHNIADH, son of Congall, abbat of Clonfert, co. Longford, died A.D. 781 (Four Mast. by O'Donovan, i. 381, A.D. 776); but in Ann. Ult. A.D. 782, there is the obit of Mac Flaithniadh, abbat of Clonfert. (O'Connor, Rer. Hib. Scrip. iv. 111.) [J. G.]

FLAMERIS, abbat of Chinon. It is stated in the Life of St. Germanus of Paris by Fortunatus that a letter which Flameris received from Germanus was the means of curing a monk, who was allowed to moisten the signet with his tongue, and so receive the precious into his system. (Vit. S. Germ. § 58, in Mab. Acta SS. O. S. B. l. 230, and in Pat. Lat. ix. 72.) [C. H.]

FLAMINA, May 2, virgin and martyr of Gaul during the Diocletian persecution. She suffered under the president Blasius. She is particularly venerated for her influence on eyes. The offices of the church of St. Hilari near Clermont, under whose altar she rests, begin with a prayer to God that by her intercession the worshippers might be protected from all diseases of the eyes. (Ferrarius, Catal. SS.; Acta SS. Boll. Mai. i. 181-183.) [G. T. S.]

FLANN (FLAINN, FLANNUS) meaning "red" or "crimson," is used as a proper name, and its latinized form is Florentius or Florence: its original idea was probably a ruddy-faced man (Joyce, Irish Names of Places, 2 ser. 145).

(1) Febla, of Armagh, commemorated Aug. 24. His name does not appear in the Irish Kalendars. He succeeded Segene at Armagh A.D. 688, where he is called abbat, bishop, and archbishop, and was there for twenty-seven years. The most celebrated event of his rule was the assembling of the synod at Tara in Meath about A.D. 697 (Petrie, Tara Hill, 171-2). There were forty bishops or abbats presided over by Flann Febla; and the best known person present, and the person at whose suggestion the convention is said to have been held, was Adamnan (Sept. 23), abbat of Hy. Colgan (Acta SS. 454, col. 1) had a copy of the acts of the synod, and copies of the same are now preserved in the Burgundian Library at Brussels (No. 233) and in bishop Marsh's library, Armagh, in a book entitled, Presidents of See of Armagh, 1 (Trans. Roy. Ir. Acad. xviii. 172, Antiquities they have been printed by Martene (Thes. Nov. Anecd. tom. iv. col. 18), and are probably the eight canons known as the "Cain Adhnamain." [ADAMNAN (2).] (Reeves, Adm. l. li., 178, 179; Lanigan, Ecc. Hist. Ir. iii. c. § 10; Colgan, Acta SS. 473, col. 2, 560, and Thaum. 218, col. 1, 503.) He died A.D. 716 (Ann. Tig.; Stuart, Armagh, 94.)

(2) Foibte (Ann. Ult.), Foirbte (Ann. Tig.), son of Fogartach, died A.D. 716 (Ann. Tig.; Ann. Ult., A.D. 715.) [J. G.]

(3) Sinna Ua Colla, abbat of Clonmacnoise, one of the Ui-Creamhthaim, died A.D. 716 (Four Mast. by O'Donovan, i. 323.)

(4) Abbat of Bangor. At Dec. 15, in M. Doneg., there is merely the commemoration "Flann, abbat of Beannchor." In the Irish Annals he is entered as St. Flann of Aentr (the ancient name of Antrim), abbat of Beannchor; he died A.D. 728. (Ann. Tig.; Four Mast. A.D. 722; Ann. Ult. A.D. 727; O'Connor, Rer. Hib. Scrip. ii. 236, iv. 80; Reeves, Ecc. Antiq. 277, 278, 381.)

(5) Son of Conaing, abbat of Cill-mor-dia-raibh (now probably Kilmore, co. Roscommon).

headed by St. Columba), was murdered: the Four Mast. say in A.D. 730, the Ann. Ult. in A.D. 734 (Four Mast. by O'Donovan, i. 327; O'Connor, Rev. Hib. Scrip. iv. 85).

(6) Beg, commemorated July 17. By Colgan Tr. Thom. 509, c. 8), and Lanigan (Eccl. Hist. b. iii. 171) he is identified with the "Flann, son of Ceallach, son of Crunmael, bishop of Reachrainn," who died A.D. 739 (Ann. Tig.). Lanigan accepts this Reachrainn as the small island Rachlin, Rathlin, or Ragharee, off the coast of Antrim; but O'Donovan is unable to decide whether it is that or the island of Lambay, off Inis, near Dublin (Four Mast. by O'Donovan, i. 336 n. 2, 337; O'Connor, Rev. Hib. Scrip. ii. 243, iv. 88; Reeves, Eccl. Antiq. 249, 292).

(7) Fabla, abbat of Gort-conaigh, a monastery in the barony of Cremorne, co. Monaghan; died A.D. 740 (Ann. Tig.; Ann. Ult. A.D. 739).

(8) Aighle, bishop of Aghrim, a village in the county of Galway, died A.D. 741 (Four Mast. by O'Donovan, i. 338 n. 2, 339; Ann. Ult. A.D. 741).

(9) Ua Dachua (Hui Dochruea, Ann. Ult.), abbat of Inishkeen, co. Monaghan, died A.D. 771 (Ann. Ult. A.D. 770; Four Mast. by O'Donovan, A.D. 766, i. 369).

(10) Bishop, wise man, and abbat of Inishkeen, co. Monaghan, died A.D. 784 (Four Mast. by O'Donovan, i. 384, n. 2, 385).

(11) Finn, commemorated Jan. 14. On this day the Irish Calendars commemorate Flann Finn, of Cuilinn, in the vicinity of Corcach (Mart. Donag., Mart. Tallaght). As appearing in the Felire of Aenghus, he probably flourished not later than the eighth century. He is to be distinguished from Flann Finn, son of Meltuile Ua Crunnmaeil, chief of Cinel Eoghain, who died A.D. 698 (Four Mast.), and from Flann Finn, who was known by this name in Ireland, but in England as Aldfrid son of Gwy king of Northumbria.

(12) Son of Ceallach, abbat of Finnghlais, scribe, scholar, and bishop, died suddenly A.D. 812 (Ann. Ult., A.D. 811; Four Mast., by O'Donovan, A.D. 807, i. 419). [J. G.]

FLANNAN, of Killaloe, commemorated Dec. 14. The name is etymologically the diminutive of Flann. Of this saint there appear to have been two lives, which are now lost. Hardy (Unscript. Cat. i. 228) notices a Vita S. Flanniani Episcopi Leacensis, in MS. Bodl. Rawl. B. 505.

Flannan was the son of Toirdhelbhach, baptized Theodoricus, king of the Dalcassians in Munster, who became a monk at Lismore after he had endowed his son's church at Killaloe with ample revenues, and thus prepared his own final resting-place. Flannan had one of the famous schools of Ireland at Killaloe. Colgan calls him "Episcopus Luanensis," and Ware, the first bishop of Killaloe, having been consecrated at Rome by pope John in A.D. 639; but Lanigan (Eccl. Hist. Ir. iii. c. 19, § 2) wholly omits the tale of his Roman visit, and even the date of his consecration. Dr. Petrie, however (Round Towers, 281), seems more inclined to accept the legend. Besides his dedication at Killaloe, the island Inis-flannan in Lough Corrib and Irosflannan Point, with the ruins of St. Flannan's church in Manin Bay, preserve the memory of this saint. In Innisboffin island there is Tobar Flannain (O'Flaherty, Iar-Connaught by Hardiman, 24, 109, 111, 112, 116); and he has probably also given their name to the Flannan islands, to the west of Lewis (Bp. Forbes, Kal. Scott. Saints, 350; Martin, West. Isles, 15-18, 2nd ed.). [J. G.]

FLAVIA DOMITILLA. [DOMITILLA.]

FLAVIANA (FLAVIA), virgin, sister of the deacon Firmatus, commemorated at Auxerre, Oct. 5. (Usuard. Mart.; Hieron. Mart.; Boll. Acta SS. Oct. iii. 163.) [C. H.]

FLAVIANUS, bishop of Rome. [FABIANUS (1).]

FLAVIANUS, bishop of Antioch. [FABIANUS (1).]

FLAVIANUS (1) (FABIANUS), bishop of Eliberi; signing 14th among the nineteen bishops present at the council of Eliberi in 305. The see of Eliberi (so spelt on Gothic coins, Ptolemy wrote Illiberis, Pliny Iliberi), now represented by Granada, makes its first appearance in history with this bishop. (As to the site of Eliberi vid Dozy's "Observations géographiques sur quelques anciennes Localités de l'Andalousie" in his Recherches, i. 328.) For a clever attempt to give historical form to the famous legend of the seven apostolic men, amongst whom St. Cecilius is made bishop of Eliberi, see Gams, P.B. Kirchen-geschichte von Spanien, i. 76-178. (Esp. Sagr. xii. 111; Aguirre-Catalani, vol. ii.)

[M. A. W.]

FLAVIANUS (2), said to have been bishop of Teate (Chieti), c. A.D. 320-340. (Gams, Series Episcoporum, p. 875.) [R. S. G.]

FLAVIANUS (3), bishop, supposed to have belonged to the province of Cappadocia, yet not clearly referred to any see, though by Ceillier (vi. 215) called bishop of Cappadocia, and regarded by the Bollandists (Acta SS. 9 Mart. ii. 9) as Flavian patriarch of Antioch at the same period. [FLAVIANUS (4).] (Tillemont, Mém. Hist. Eccl. ix. 589, Paris, 1703.)

About the year 393, Gregory of Nyssa wrote to Flavian (ep. i.), as he did to other bishops, complaining of the treatment he had received at the hands of Helladius, bishop of Caesarea in Cappadocia, and demanding satisfaction; the letter to Flavian is long and interesting, giving an account of his hurried flight from Sebaste, his unwelcome interview with Helladius, and his delight at escaping from him safe and well. He then reviews his whole relation to Helladius as one of entire superiority. [J. G.]

FLAVIANUS (4) I., bishop of Antioch, 381-404. Flavianus was born at Antioch, of a distinguished and wealthy family. He had several brothers and sisters. One of the latter, who had survived all the rest, was living with him in A.D. 387, in very feeble health, at the time of his journey to Constantinople to appease the wrath of Theodosius. He was still very young when the death of his father left him heir of the family property, which was of considerable amount.

When bishop he continued to occupy the family mansion at Antioch, which he devoted to the reception of the sick and distressed of his flock. We know nothing of Flavianus's early training, or of his instructors in the faith. Chrysostom, in his highly-coloured eulogium pronounced on receiving ordination to the priesthood at his hands, records that although reared in the midst of affluence, he was remarkable from his earliest years for his temperance and control over his bodily appetites and for his contempt of luxury and a rich table. Although the premature death of his father deprived him of parental control at an early age, and he was exposed to the temptations incident to youth, wealth, and good birth, he overcame them all. From his youth he devoted himself to a religious life, sparing no pains to obtain complete self-mastery, and to cultivate his spiritual faculties. He adopted the strictest asceticism, and according to Theodoret (H. E. ii. 24) at the time that a half-concealed Arianism was carrying all before it, and Catholic truth was systematically discouraged, he together with his friend and fellow-champion of the orthodox faith, Diodorus (afterwards the celebrated bishop of Tarsus), left his home and adopted the life of a solitary. The sad necessities of the times soon recalled the two friends to Antioch, where, while still laymen, they exerted a powerful influence in favour of the truth, and by their zealous exertions kept alive an orthodox remnant in the midst of the dominant Eusebians. The crafty Leontius (ὁ ἀνόκωρος) was then the intruding bishop of Antioch, who while a Eusebian at heart sought by concealment of his real sentiments to avoid a breach with the Eustathian or orthodox party, and by a temporizing policy to preserve a hollow peace in his church. The adroitness with which the party to which Leontius belonged eluded any distinct declaration of their belief on the most critical questions, and veiled their heresy by dogmatical statements which, true as far as they went, fell short of the full Catholic belief, menaced the faith with formidable perils. From the time of the expulsion of Eustathius, c. A.D. 328, the orthodox party at Antioch had been destitute of a head, and as the counsel of Eustathius himself before he quitted Antioch was that his adherents should maintain the unity of the church, and, in spite of his illegal deposition, continue in communion with his successors in the see, there was no small risk of their being gradually absorbed by the Eusebians, and losing their hold of the Catholic faith. This danger was strenuously met by Flavianus and his friend Diodorus. They rallied the faithful about them, and by their example and influence accustomed them to assemble round the tombs of the martyrs, where they held nocturnal meetings for worship, and exhorted them to adhere steadfastly to the faith. As a powerful instrument for kindling zeal, Flavianus and Diodorus are said by Theodoret to have revived the practice of the antiphonal chanting of the psalms, which tradition ascribed to Ignatius. (Theod. H. E. ii. 24; Socr. H. E. vi. 8.) The statement of the Arian historian Philostorgius that they altered the lesser Doxology from its older form, "Glory be to the Father by" or "in the Son," to that now used (Philostorg. H. E. iii. 13), though, as St. Basil has shewn, when charged with introducing a similar novelty, at variance with facts (De Spiritu Sancto, c. 29 [70]) probably contains so much of truth that until the rise of the Arian heresy had rendered caution in theological phraseology necessary, the various traditional forms of the doxology had been used indifferently, and that Flavianus and Diodorus were among the first to enforce the exclusive use of the form which was least susceptible of any heterodox perversion. The measure adopted by Leontius to check the growing influence of these religious gatherings by causing them to be transferred from the martyrs without the walls to the churches of the city had the effect of increasing their popularity and strengthening the cause of orthodoxy. Flavianus and Diodorus became all powerful at Antioch. Leontius was unable to resist their wishes. The threat of withdrawing from his communion and travelling to the west to lay their remonstrance before Constantius and the Occidental bishops compelled him to retrace his steps, and inhibit the audacious Arian Aetius from the exercise of the functions of the diaconate to which he had admitted him. (Theod. H. E. ii. 24 [AETIUS].)

Leontius is reported to have said, pointing to his white hairs, "When this snow melts there will be plenty of mud," meaning that his death would be followed by grave disturbances. (Socr. H. E. iii. 20.) The history of the next twenty years fully proves the truth of his words. His successor in the see of Antioch was Eudoxius, the profane and intriguing bishop of Germanicus, the open patron of Aetius. On his promotion to the see of Constantinople in A.D. 360, and the deposition of his successor, the excellent Meletius, Euzoius, the old comrade of Arius, was made bishop of Antioch A.D. 361, and Arianism at once assumed the ascendancy. Euzoius was repudiated with horror by all the orthodox. Those who up to this time had remained in communion with the bishops recognised by the state now separated themselves altogether and recognised Meletius alone as their bishop. The old Catholic body, however, who bore the name of Eustathians, could not bring themselves to submit to the authority of a bishop consecrated by Arians, however orthodox, and continued worship apart from their Meletian brethren, as well as from Euzoius. They had as their head Paulinus, a presbyter so highly esteemed by both parties that even Euzoius abstained from any interference with him, and permitted him to hold his religious assemblies in a small church in the new city, situated on an island of the Orontes. (Socr. H. E. iii. 9.) This schism between the orthodox bodies, who should have united in the defence of the common faith, was the cause of much pain to Athanasius and the orthodox. A council was held at Alexandria, early in A.D. 361, one object of which was the healing of the unhappy dissensions. The wise decision that Paulinus and his flock should unite with Meletius, who had now returned from exile, was unhappily rendered nugatory by the precipitancy of Lucifer of Cagliari, who, instead of accompanying Eusebius of Vercellae to Alexandria, had gone straight to Antioch to accommodate matters, and now perpetuated the schism by ordaining Paulinus bishop. Eusebius, who followed him to Antioch, could do no more to ment the irreparable mischief caused by Lucifer's rash act. The schism thus openly avowed lasted till A.D. 415, and was productive of the greatest injury to the church. (Socr. H. E. i. 6; Soz. H. E. v. 12; Theod. H. E. iii. 5.) Flavianus, however, still continued the ruling spirit at Antioch, and during the unhappy dissensions and severe persecutions of the next twenty years proved the zealous champion of orthodoxy. He and his friend Diodorus having been raised to the presbyterate did much to supply the place of their beloved bishop Meletius during his lengthened banishments. Flavianus's zeal for the truth and courage in maintaining it in the face of fierce opposition was proved during the reign of Valens, when the Arians, secure of imperial favour, tyrannized over the orthodox at their will. Valens took up his residence at Antioch in June A.D. 370. This was the signal for a violent persecution of the orthodox. Meletius was banished for the third time, and the duty of administering to the faithful and supporting them under their prolonged trials devolved on Flavianus and Diodorus. The Catholics having been deprived of the use of their churches took refuge among the ravines and caverns of the abrupt mountain ranges which surround the city. Here they met for worship, exposed to all the inclemency of the elements, and liable to the assaults of a rude soldiery, by whom they were repeatedly dislodged, and compelled to find another place of assemblage. At one time the banks of the Orontes, at another the "Campus Martius" of the city, resounded with the psalms and hymns with which their venerable leaders sought to kindle their courage. Theodoret tells us that Flavianus detained from preaching in public, committing that office to his more eloquent companion Diodorus, whom he furnished with the subjects of his discourse, and scriptural arguments in support of his theses. (Theod. H. E. iv. 25.) The obstinacy with which the orthodox, when driven from one place of assemblage, gathered in another, irritated Valens exceedingly. Many were seized and cruelly punished, and not a few were put to death. The favourite death was burning. The palace occupied by Valens stood on an island of the Orontes, and, by an anticipation of the "noyades," of a later age, the faithful were taken out in boats and thrown out to perish in its rapid waters. (Socr. H. E. iv. 17.) We have no evidence that Flavianus was a sufferer in this persecution, but it is difficult to see how a pronounced leader of the orthodox could altogether escape. The persecution, which had already relaxed, ceased entirely with the death of Valens in A.D. 378. The exiles for the faith were everywhere recalled, and Meletius quickly resumed the charge of his Antiochene flock. His official recognition as the Catholic bishop of Antioch was more tardy. Gratian had commanded that the churches should be given up to those prelates who were in communion with Damasus, bishop of Rome, and that the Arian clerics should be expelled. Easy as the execution of this enactment might be elsewhere, some difficulty was caused at Antioch by the presence of two bishops with equal claims to orthodoxy, Paulinus and Meletius, to whom a third was added, Vitalian, who held Apollinarian views. Sapor, a military officer high in command, to whom Gratian had committed the execution of the edict, was naturally no judge of theological niceties and was much perplexed how to decide. Flavianus came to the rescue and, by cleverly framed questions, involving the critical points, addressed to the other two bishops, convinced Sapor that the right lay with Meletius. The separation, however, still continued. Paulinus declined the proposal of the peace-loving Meletius, that they should unite their flocks, and that placing the volume of the Gospels on the vacant episcopal throne, each should recognise the other as of equal authority with himself, and that at the death of either the survivor should be the sole bishop. The unhappy Antiochene schism continued to divide the Christian world. The Oriental churches recognised Meletius, while the West and Egypt maintained the cause of Paulinus. (Theod. H. E. v. 1-3.) Three years later, A.D. 381, Flavianus accompanied Meletius to the council of Constantinople, where he signed, as a presbyter, with Elpidius (Labbe, Concil. ii. 955). At the death of Meletius, which took place during the session of the council, Gregory of Nazianzus, who had reluctantly succeeded him as president, entreated his brother-bishops to take the opportunity of healing the lamentable schism, by recognising Paulinus as the orthodox bishop of Antioch (Greg. Naz. de Vita Sac. v. 1572, sq. p. 757). But this, however right in itself, would have been to give a triumph to the Westerns. The council was composed of Oriental bishops only. Unworthy jealousy prevailed over the interest of the church, and, in spite of the earnest remonstrances of the aged Gregory, Flavianus was elected as the successor of Meletius. We cannot altogether excuse Flavianus for thus allowing himself to be the instrument of perpetuating the schism. His act becomes less pardonable if it is true, as Socrates and Sozomen state (Socr. H. E. v. 5; Soz. H. E. vii. 3, 11), that he was one of the six leading clergy of Antioch, who had bound themselves by an oath at the death of either Meletius or Paulinus not to seek the bishopric themselves, but to acknowledge the survivor as the rightful bishop. This charge, however, rests solely on the authority of Socrates and Sozomen, whose accuracy is far from being unquestionable, and its truth is rendered very doubtful by the absence of any reference to it in the letters of Ambrose, or any of the contemporary documents published by the adherents of Paulinus during the progress of the controversy. The consecration of Flavianus was performed by his life-long friend, Diodorus of Tarsus, and Acacius of Beroea, and received the ratification of the council. Paulinus remonstrated in vain (Theod. H. E. v. 23), but his cause was sharply maintained by Damasus and the Western bishops, as well as by those of Egypt; while even at Antioch, though the majority of the Meletian party welcomed Flavianus with joy, as seeing their beloved bishop revive in him (Chrys. Homil. cum Presbyt. fuit ordinatus, § 4), some, indignant at the breaking of an engagement, real or implied, separated from his communion, and connected themselves with Paulinus (Soz. H. E. vii. 11). The West refused all intercourse with Flavianus, and the council, meeting at Aquileia in the September of the same year, wrote to Theodosius in favour of his rival, Paulinus.

and requested him to summon a council at Alexandria, to decide that and other controverted questions. Theodosius thought it better that the council should be held at Rome. The Eastern prelates were invited, but declined to attend, and held a second synod of their own at Constantinople in 382. Perfect unanimity could not be secured even here, as the bishops of Egypt, Cyprus, and Arabia recognised Paulinus as the rightful bishop, and demanded the banishment of Flavianus, who was supported by the bishops of Palestine, Phoenicia, and Syria (Socr. H. E. v. 10). A synodal letter was, however, despatched to Damasus and the Western bishops which, among other subjects, recognised Flavianus' ordination as legitimate. (Theod. H. E. v. 9.) Paulinus himself attended the council at Rome, accompanied by Epiphanius and Jerome, the latter of whom espoused his cause very ardently. The result of this council was to confirm the West in their refusal to acknowledge Flavianus as a canonically elected bishop. It is said they even went so far as to excommunicate him and his two consecrators. (Soz. H. E. vii. 11.) Meanwhile the two rival bishops continued to exercise the episcopal functions among their respective flocks. The consequences of thus setting up church against church were very disastrous. Church discipline became impossible, when the attempt to exercise it led to a desertion to the opposite camp. Such a transference of allegiance was rendered easier by the difference between them being simply one of church order, not of doctrine. Some time after his consecration, Flavianus, accompanied by Acacius of Beroea and other bishops, together with some leading laymen, paid a visit to the celebrated solitary, Marcian, with the hope of inducing him to receive holy orders; but the aged ascetic maintained an obstinate silence, and the deputation had to depart baffled. (Theod. Vit. Patr. iii. 4.) Early in his episcopate, Flavianus exercised his authority against the Syrian sect of fanatical perfectionists known as Euchites or Messalians. To make himself acquainted with their doctrines, which it was their habit to conceal, he condescended to an act of deception which we cannot but condemn. Having summoned Adelphius, the head of the sect, to a conference, he threw the old man off his guard by professions of friendship and of a simple desire to become acquainted with his tenets, and thus led him to a full declaration. On this he threw off the mask, denounced his heretical views in the strongest terms, and expelled him and his adherents. (Theod. H. E. iv. 11.) Adelphius professed penitence, and he desired to be re-admitted with his followers to the church. These overtures were rejected at a synod held by Flavianus. He had previously received a synodical letter of a gathering of bishops held at Side, under Amphilochius, bishop of Iconium, acquainting him with the principle held by the sect that the end sanctifies the means, and that falsehood for a good end was no sin; and warning him not to be too ready to credit their professions. Flavianus wrote to the bishops of Osrhoene respecting the punishment and excommunication of the Messalians, for which he received a letter of thanks. Flavianus also wrote to an Armenian bishop, remonstrating with him for patronizing these pestilent heretics. (Photius, Cod. lii. p. 37; Theod. Hæc. Fab. iv. 11, p. 243.)

In A.D. 386 Flavianus ordained Chrysostom presbyter. Chrysostom, on the occasion of his ordination, or very soon after it, preached an inaugural discourse in the presence of his bishop, on whom he passed a very laboured eulogium, which, however well deserved, a modern standard of good taste would have reserved for another occasion. (Chrys. Homil. cum Presb. fuit ordinatus, § 3, 4.) The sedition at Antioch on the occasion of the destruction of the Imperial Statues, A.D. 387, shewed the noble, self-sacrificing character of Flavianus in its grandest colours. His absence from the episcopal palace during the first violence of the storm had prevented his doing anything to arrest its fury. But when the brief fit of popular madness was over, and the Antiochenes awoke to a sense of their danger, Flavianus at once yielded to their entreaties to become their advocate with the emperor, with whom he was a favourite, and endeavour to appease his just wrath. Regardless of his advanced years, the dangerous sickness of his only surviving sister, the inclemency of the season, and the length and difficulty of the journey, the dauntless old man started immediately on his errand of mercy. In the words of Chrysostom—"Having learnt that the good shepherd layeth down his life for his sheep, he took his departure, venturing his own life for us all, notwithstanding there were many things to forbid his absence and enforce his stay. For this reason he would encounter every danger, and nothing would avail to detain him." (Chrysost. de Statuis, iii. 1; xxi. 3.) The success of Flavianus's mission has been stated in another article. [CHRYSTOSTOM, I. p. 521.] It was instant, and it was complete. His wrath having had time to cool, Theodosius was already disposed to mercy; and his favourable disposition towards the Antiochenes was confirmed by the tears and pathetic appeals of the aged bishop, who had risked so much to offer his intercession in person. If Flavianus's bearing is more submissive—it might be almost called abject—than appears to us consistent with the dignity of a Christian bishop pleading for his flock, we must remember the difference between Eastern and Western feeling towards those invested with sovereign authority, and rejoice that his intercession proved so effectual. Theodosius granted a free pardon to the city of Antioch, and urged Flavianus to lose no time in returning, that he might relieve the people of Antioch from the agony of suspense. After the severe strain and anxiety of the last few weeks, Flavianus was unequal to a rapid journey. An express courier was therefore despatched to convey the joyful tidings. The bishop followed at a more leisurely pace, but reached Antioch in time to keep the Easter festival, and had the happiness of finding his aged sister still alive. (Chrysost. de Statuis, xxi.) The next year, A.D. 388, witnessed the death of Paulinus. This event, however, had not at once, as might have been hoped, the effect of healing the schism; for on his death-bed, in direct violation of the nineteenth and twenty-third canons of the council of Antioch, Paulinus, without the authority of a synod, or the assistance of any other bishop, had taken the desired step of consecrating Evagrius, a presbyter of his church, his successor. (Socr. H. E. v. 15; Soz. H. E. vii. 15; Theod. H. E. v. 23.) The scandal of this long-continued schism was deeply felt in the West, and was a cause of trouble to Theodosius, in whose esteem Flavianus stood high. Accordingly, on his return to Constantinople from the West in A.D. 391, he proposed to Flavianus, whom he had summoned to meet him, to appear in person at a synod to be assembled at Capua. Flavianus excused himself on the ground that the winter was just setting in, but promised to obey the emperor's bidding in the spring, and returned to Antioch. (Theod. H. E. v. 23.) Though there is some discrepancy as to whether the Western bishops actually joined communion with Evagrius, there is no doubt that their feeling was strongly in his favour, and that they were indisposed to admit the claims of his rival. Flavianus had some reason to fear that the Western synod would not be altogether impartial in its decision; and, not quite confident of the soundness of his own cause, he declined to attend. It is probable that Evagrius was there. Whether Ambrose or Siricius took part in it is uncertain. The feeling manifested was strongly against Flavianus, but no decision was come to in his absence, and the final adjudication was entrusted to Theophilus of Alexandria, and his suffragans, who had remained neutral. (Ambros. Epist. lvi. (ix).) Flavianus regarded the summons addressed to him by Theophilus, and seems to have appealed to another synod which he urged Theodosius to summon in the East. Ambrose wrote to Theophilus, sharply condemning Flavianus for having recourse to state aid and imperial rescripts to support him in his disobedience to ecclesiastical authority, and for seeking to impose on the bishops—many of whom were old and poor—the trouble and expense of travelling to another synod. Ambrose and the other leading Western bishops were urgent with Theodosius to compel Flavianus to come to Rome and submit to the judgment of the church. Flavianus replied to the emperor with much dignity, that, if the question were one of heterodoxy or immorality, he would not shrink from the trial; but if his episcopal seat only was the object of attack, he would prefer to resign it altogether. The emperor might assign the see to whom he pleased. Such magnanimous sentiments were in harmony with Theodosius's own generous heart. He admired his courage and his wisdom, and commanded him to resume the government of his church. (Theod. H. E. v. 23.) Flavianus's refusal to submit to the arbitration of "the haughty and tyrannical Egyptian" rendered the high commendation of Nestorius. (Theod. H. E. v. 23.) The knot which seemed insoluble was, before long, cut by the death of Evagrius. Flavianus's influence prevented the election of a successor. The Eustachians, however, still refused to acknowledge Flavianus as their bishop, and continued to hold their assemblies apart. (Soz. H. E. vii. 15; viii. 1; Socr. H. E. v. 15.) This separation continued till the episcopate of Alexander, A.D. 414 or 415. The division between Flavianus and Egypt and the West was finally healed by Chrysostom, who took the opportunity of the presence of Theophilus at Constantinople, for his consecration to that see in A.D. 398, to induce him to become reconciled with Flavianus, and to join with him in despatching an embassy to Rome to supplicate Siricius to recognise Flavianus as the canonical bishop of Antioch. The deputies chosen for this mediation were Acacius of Beroea, and Isidore, presbyter and hospitaler of Alexandria, for whom Theophilus had striven to obtain the bishopric of Constantinople, to whom Flavianus added some leading presbyters of his church. Their mission was entirely successful. All were heartily weary of the schism which was a discredit to the church, and were glad to have a decent excuse for bringing it to an end; and Acacius, who was the chief of the mission, returned to Antioch bringing letters of communion from Rome and Egypt. (Socr. H. E. v. 15; Soz. H. E. viii. 3; Theod. H. E. v. 23.) As a proof of the cessation of all angry feeling, and a means of conciliating his opponents, Flavianus put the names of Paulinus and Evagrius on the diptychs. (Cyril Alex. Epist. 56, p. 203.) Flavianus lived just long enough to see with sorrow the deposition and exile of his beloved and distinguished son in the faith, Chrysostom, against the injustice of which he protested with his last breath. His death may probably be placed in A.D. 404. (Pallad. Dial. p. 144; Soz. H. E. viii. 24; Theophan. p. 68.) He governed the church of Antioch for twenty-three years; and Tillemont thinks it probable, from chronological considerations, that he lived to the age of ninety-five years. The Greek church has commemorated him on Sept. 26.

Flavianus was more famous as a bishop than as a writer. He left behind him certain homilies, of which a few fragments are preserved to us by Theodoret and others. Theodoret in his Eranistes quotes one on Joh. i. 14 (Dial. i. p. 46), another on St. John the Baptist (ib. p. 66), on Easter, and the treachery of Judas (Dial. iii. p. 250) or the Theophania, and a passage from his commentary on St. Luke. (Dial. ii. p. 160.) His homilies are also quoted in the proceedings of the council under John of Antioch, and that of Chalcedon (Facund. lib. viii. c. i. 4, p. 319; Labbe, iv. 830); and by Leontius, in Nest. et Eutych. (p. 979). (Tillemont, Mém. Eccl. vol. x.) [E. V.]

FLAVIANUS (5), bishop, present at Carth. Conf. A.D. 411. (Mon. Vet. Don. p. 417, ed. Oberthür.) [H. W. P.]

FLAVIANUS (6), Donatist bishop of Puzosera, a place in Numidia, present at Carth. Conf. A.D. 411. (Mon. Vet. Don. p. 417, ed. Oberthür.) [H. W. P.]

FLAVIANUS (7), bishop of Philippi in Macedonia. He acted as proxy for his metropolitan Rufus bishop of Thessalonica, and sat among the metropolitans at the general council of Ephesus, A.D. 431. In the first session he suggested the second and third summons to Nestorius, that nothing required by ecclesiastical procedure should be omitted; he asked for quotations from the ancient fathers of the church on the points in which Nestorius was said to have erred from the faith, proposed that these should be inserted in the acts of the council, and took an active part in all its proceedings. (Mansi, iv. 2 M 2)

FLAVIANUS (8), eighteenth bishop of Constantinople, between Proclus and Anatolius. The length of his episcopate is a little uncertain, but it was about two or three years. He is described by Nicephorus as being at his election guardian of the sacred vessels of the great church of Constantinople, with a reputation for a heavenly life.

At the time of Flavian's consecration Theodosius was staying at Chalcedon. Chrysaphius his minister appears to have immediately inaugurated his scheme against the new patriarch. He suggested that the emperor should ask Flavian to send him some kind of present or firstfruits in acknowledgment for his elevation. Flavian replied by returning what seems to have been a common compliment on such occasions, some fresh loaves or cakes. These were rudely rejected by the insolent eunuch, who wrote back that the emperor required something in the shape of gold. The prelate answered that unless he used some of the sacred vessels for the purpose, he had nothing of the kind. The ill-will of Chrysaphius achieved its object, for the courageous integrity of the churchman stirred up great bitterness against him; and by some means Pulcheria was kept ignorant of the discreditable proceeding.

Two methods of attack against Flavian now presented themselves to the scheming brain of the minister; the direct subversion of the authority of the emperor's sister Pulcheria and the support of Eutyches, one of the archimandrites of Constantinople, a theological opponent of the archbishop. Stirring up the jealousy of the empress Eudocia, he persuaded her to weary her husband with entreaties that he would remove a person who seems to have been a kind of secretary of state to Pulcheria. Baffled unexpectedly at this point, the wife and the chamberlain tried another; Pulcheria had devoted herself to a religious life; let the emperor order the prelate to ordain her a deaconess. Theodosius, like most weak men, content with his recent firmness, easily gave way at this second assault to the redoubled importunities of Eudocia. Flavian, receiving the emperor's command to ordain the princess-minister, was beyond measure grieved, for he foresaw the scandals which would arise from this dangerous plot. He was obliged, however, for the moment to submit to his prince; and meantime sent a message to Pulcheria, begging that she would give orders to refuse him admittance to her presence "lest I should be forced to do something which would annoy you." Pulcheria divined the scheme, and to avoid a struggle retired to Hebdomum, where for a time she led a private life (Theoph. u. infr.).

Flavian having assembled a council of forty bishops, Nov. 8, A.D. 448, to compose a difference between Florentius bishop of Sardis, metropolitan of Lydia, and two bishops of his province, in the chapter-house or council hall of the great church of Constantinople, Eusebius bishop of Dorylaeum appeared and presented his indictment against Eutyches. The speech of Flavian remains: "What has been read has indeed confounded me, because it brings a charge of so heavy a kind against the reverend presbyter and archimandrite Eutyches. But (to the bishop of Dorylaeum) let your reverence condescend to visit him and argue with him about the true faith, and if he shall be found in verity truth to err, then he shall be called to our holy assembly, and shall answer for himself." For the particulars of the great controversy thus inaugurated we must refer to the articles DIOCORUS and EUTYCHES, confining ourselves here to what more immediately concerns Flavianus. When, for instance, on Aug. 8, 449 the Latrocinium assembled at Ephesus and Eutyches was introduced, he made this violent harangue against the archbishop: "Bishop Flavian," he said, "has had no regard for the appeal which I made to you, nor any respect for my white hair and the combats I have fought with the heretics; he has condemned me with his authority. He gave me to be torn in pieces as a heretic by the mob assembled for that purpose in the Cathedral and in the Place; providence alone preserved me. He caused my sentence to be read in different churches, and subscribed by monasteries: and that is never done even against heretics. He sent it to the East and in many places made many bishops and monks sign it who had not been judges; where he ought to have begun by sending it to the bishops to whom I had appealed."

We need not repeat what has been so fully described elsewhere, the violent proceedings which this address was a prelude. On Aug. 1, 449, Flavian expired at Hypepe in Lydia, from the effects of the barbarous ill-usage to which he had been subjected.

When Pulcheria returned to power, after her brother's death, she sent for Flavian's remains which had been buried obscurely after his death. They were brought with great pomp to Constantinople. It was more like a triumph, than the chronicler, than a funeral procession. Pulcheria, his unfailing supporter, had not been able to prevent the troubles from falling on his faithful ally which had caused his death; but she could shew his dead body all the honours which affection and respect could dictate.

Among the letters which touch on the career of Flavianus, may be mentioned the reply of Petrus Chrysologus, archbishop of Ravenna, a circular appeal issued by Eutyches against condemnation by Flavian; the letter of Theodoret congratulating Flavian on his condemnation of Eutyches; another from the same, complaining of an uncanonical condemnation by Dioscorus at a council of Alexandria, and begging him to take the violated canons under his protection; and another from Theodoret, when the bishops of Syria had taken up Theodoret's sentence, which was one of twenty-two with which he entrusted the deputation which they sent to Theodosius. Leo, who was plunged in the profoundest grief, wrote him a beautiful letter before hearing that he was dead.

FLAVIANUS (9) (FLORIANUS), bishop of Centia (Piacenza), c. A.D. 449-451. He succeeded St. Maurus, and appears to have held his less than two years. Majorianus bishop of Phœntia subscribed the synodal letter at Milan in 451. (Leo. Mag. Ep. 97, ed. Migne; Ughelli, Ital. Sacr. ii. 248; Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Ital. iv. 14.) [R. S. G.]

FLAVIANUS (10), ST., bishop of Adramyttium in the province of Asia, present at the Latreconium Ephesinum, 449 (Mansi, vi. 932); his name was subscribed in his absence by Hesperius of Pitane at the instance of Stephen of Ephesus to the definition of the faith that was read before the emperor Marcian at the sixth session of the council of Chalcedon, A.D. 451. (Mansi, vii. 168; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 701.) [L. D.]

FLAVIANUS (11), bishop of Gabala in Syria, south of Laodicea. He signed the synodical epistle of the province of Syria Secunda to the emperor Leo, in reference to the murder of Proterius, A.D. 458. (Mansi, vii. 551; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. ii. 798.) [J. de S.]

FLAVIANUS (12), twelfth recorded bishop of Paris, between Felix and Ursicinus, about A.D. 480, judging from his position in the list, which is here undated. (Gall. Christ. vii. 15.) [R. T. S.]

FLAVIANUS (13), bishop of Caesena (Cesena), c. A.D. 465–499. He was succeeded by Iguatius. (Ughelli, Ital. Sacr. ii. 441; Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Ital. ii. 527.) [R. S. G.]

FLAVIANUS (14), bishop of Vamalla in Mauritania Sitensis, banished by Hunneric A.D. 484. (Victor. Vit. Notitia, 60 in Migne, Patrol. Lat. lviii.; Morcelli, As. Chr. i. 346.) [L. D.]

FLAVIANUS (15), patriarch of Constantinople, A.D. 489. [FRAVITTA.]

FLAVIANUS (16) II., bishop of Antioch, 483–512. Vacillating in faith, and of little moral strength, he occupied a more prominent than honourable position in the unhappy dissensions which troubled the Eastern church at the close of the 5th and beginning of the 6th century in connection with the Monophysite troubles at Alexandria, and the deposition of Acacius by pope Felix, A.D. 484. After much unworthy compliance with the demands of the emperor Anastasius, he was ultimately driven from his see, and ended his life in banishment A.D. 518. He had previously been a monk in the monastery of Ithogoon, in Coele-Syria (Evagr. H. E. iii. 32), and at the time of his elevation to the episcopate filled the office of “apocrisiarius” or nuncio of the church of Antioch at the imperial court of Constantinople (Vict. Tun. Chron.; Theophan. Chronogr. p. 122). Before his consecration Flavian passed for an opponent of the decrees of Chalcedon, and on his appointment he sent Solomon, a presbyter of Antioch, to announce the fact to John Haemula, bishop of Alexandria, and to convey letters of communion with the request that he would grant the same to him (Evagr. H. E. iii. 23). He speedily, however, withdrew from intercourse with the patriarchs of Alexandria, and joined the opposite party, uniting his name with Elias of Jerusalem, and Macedonius of Constantinople (Liberat. c. 18, p. 128). Flavian soon found a bitter enemy in the turbulent Monophysite, Xenaïas or Philoxenus, bishop of Hierapolis, originally a Persian slave, raised to the episcopate by Peter the Fuller, who pursued him with uncompromising hatred, never resting till he had succeeded in working his overthrow. On Flavian's declaring for the council of Chalcedon Xenaïas denounced his patriarch as a concealed Nestorian. Flavian made no difficulty in anathematizing Nestorius and his doctrines. Not content with this concession, Xenaïas demanded that he should anathematize Diodorus, Theodore, Theodoret, and a host of others, declaring that unless he publicly condemned them he was himself a Nestorian, even if he should anathematize Nestorius ten thousand times over (Evagr. H. E. iii. 31). On his refusing, Xenaïas stirred up against him the party of Dioscorus, in Egypt, and uniting with himself Eleusius of Sasima, and Nicias, of the Syrian Laodicea, personal enemies of Flavian, he laid a complaint against Flavian as a Nestorian before Anastasius, A.D. 507 (Evagr. u. s.; Theophan. p. 128). Anastasius used a severe pressure, to which Flavian thought it most politic to yield partially, vainly trusting that his concessions would satisfy his enemies, and that they would allow him to live in peace. He convened a synod of the prelates of his patriarchate which drew up a letter to Anastasius confirming the three first councils, passing over that of Chalcedon in silence, and anathematizing Diodorus, Theodore, and the others. It was asserted that Flavian also added some clauses respecting the two natures, at variance with the decisions of Chalcedon (Evagr. u. s.; Theophan. p. 129; Labbe, Concil. iv. 1414). These concessions provoked fresh demands. Xenaïas, whose object was Flavian's overthrow, pursued his advantage, and required of him a formal anathema of the council of Chalcedon, and all who admitted the two natures. On his refusal, Xenaïas again denounced him to the emperor, who received with cold aversion the complaints and remonstrances addressed to him, as well as the formal profession of belief in which Flavian declared his acceptance of the decrees of Chalcedon, only so far as they condemned Nestorius and Eutyches, not as a rule of faith. The untiring Xenaïas having gathered the bishops of Isauria and others induced them to draw up a formula of faith anathematizing Chalcedon and the two natures, and as Flavian and Macedonius refused to sign this, they declared them excommunicate, A.D. 509 (Evagr. u. s.; Theophan. p. 131). The next year we find the vacillating Flavian receiving letters from Severus, the uncompromising antagonist of Macedonius, on the subject of anathematizing Chalcedon, and the reunion of the Acephali with the church (Liberat. c. 19, p. 135). This intelligence so irritated Macedonius that he pronounced an anathema on his former friend, and drove with indignation from his presence the apocrisarii of Antioch (Theophan. p. 131). On the expulsion of Macedonius, A.D. 511, Flavian yielded to the emperor so far as to recognise his successor Timotheus, on being convinced of his orthodoxy, but without disguising his displeasure at the violent and uncanonical measures by which he had been deposed. This exasperated Anastasius, who readily acceded to the request of Xenaïas and Soterichus that a council should be convened, ostensibly for the more precise declaration of the faith on the points at issue, but really to bring about the deposition of Flavian and Elias of Jerusalem.

The synod met at Sidon early in A.D. 512. About eighty bishops assembled, under the joint presidency of Xenaias and Soterichus. Flavian and Elias resorted to unworthy means to secure themselves from the menaced deposition. They sent adulatory letters to Anastasius, containing fresh concessions, which even went so far as to reject the decrees of Chalcedon, but diplomatically concealing their divergence of opinion on other critical points. The council was broken up by the emperor's mandate, to the extreme vexation of Soterichus and Xenaias, without pronouncing any sentence on the two patriarchs (Labbe, Concil. iv. 1414; vii. 88; Theoph. p. 131, Cotelier. Monum. Eccl. Græc. iii. 298). Their reprieve, however, was but short. Anastasius was easily convinced that he had been made the dupe of disingenuous declarations, and that Flavian and Elias secretly held to the decrees of Chalcedon, which they had openly repudiated. These calumnious charges received the powerful support of the Monophysite leader Severus, then at Constantinople, who became his successor in the see of Antioch. Elias managed to retain his see for a time through the intercession of St. Sabbas. As for Flavian his perplexities were increased by the inroad of a tumultuous body of monks from Syria Prima, clamouring for the anathematization of Nestorius and all supposed favourers of his heretical doctrines. Some of the rabble of Antioch, bribed, it was said, by Xenaias, joined this turbulent body, but the citizens generally rose against them, slew many of them, and threw their bodies into the Orontes. The confusion and bloodshed was increased by the appearance of a rival body of monks pouring down from the mountain ranges of Coele-Syria, eager to do battle in defence of their metropolitan and former associate. Flavian was completely unnerved, and as the only means of restoring peace to the city, and maintaining his see, he yielded to the demands of the stronger party, and pronounced a public anathema in his cathedral on the decrees of Chalcedon, and the four so-called heretical doctors. This was a severe mortification to his enemies, who were determined to get rid of him in order that his patriarchate might be given to one of their own party. The old charges of disingenuousness were revived, and he was accused to the emperor of condemning with his lips what he still held in his heart. The guilt of the recent disturbances at Antioch was also attributed to him, which afforded the civil authorities a sufficient pretext for desiring him to leave Antioch for a time, as the only way of restoring quiet. His quitting Antioch was eagerly seized on by the emperor as an acknowledgment of guilt. He declared the see vacant, and sent Severus to occupy it, and at the same time banished Flavian to Petra, in Arabia. Here he spent the last six years of his life. His death is placed by Moschus close to that of his chief enemy, the emperor Anastasius, in July, 518. Flavian's restoration to his see was one of the points demanded by Vitalian in his rebellion, A.D. 513 or 514 (Kutysh. Alex. Annal. Eccl. p. 140; Marcellin. Chron.; Theophan. p. 134; Evagr. H. E. iii. 32). Flavian is commemorated as a confessor by the church of Rome, together with Elias of Jerusalem, on July 4. (Baron. Annal. 496-512; Tillemont, Mém. Eccl. xvi. 675-680, 703-708.) [E. V.]

FLAVIANUS (17), bishop of Cotena in Pamphylia, present at the council held at Constantinople under Mennas, A.D. 536, which condemned Anthimus. (Le Quien, Oriens Christ. 1010; Mansi, viii. 1147.) [L. D.]

FLAVIANUS (18), bishop of Vercelli, c. 536 (Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Italia, xiv. 365; Ughelli, Ital. Sacr. iv. 762.) [A. H. D. A.]

FLAVIANUS (19), bishop of Crotona, c. A.D. 537. (Ughelli, Ital. Sac. ix. 528.) [R. S. G.]

FLAVIANUS (20), bishop of Como, 542 (Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Italia, xi. 313; Ughelli, Ital. Sacr. v. 261.) [A. H. D. A.]

FLAVIANUS (21), 14th bishop of Le Puy succeeding Forbuis or Fortius, and followed by St. Aurelius, in the latter part of the 6th century. (Gall. Christ. ii. 690.) [S. A. B.]

FLAVIANUS (22) (FLAVINIUS, FLAVINIANUS), ST., a bishop of Autun, placed by the authors of the Gallia Christiana, following Le Cointe, twenty-first in the series, between Lefastus and Auspicius, about A.D. 610. He was commemorated Aug. 23. (Gall. Christ. iv. 347; Le Cointe, Ann. Eccl. Franc. an. 610 a ii., 614. n. xiv., tom. ii. 598, 663.) [S. A. B.]

FLAVIANUS (23), bishop of Utica, the well known town in proconsular Africa, subscribed the letter of his province to Paul, patriarch of Constantinople, against the Monothelites A.D. 646. (Mansi, x. 942; Morcelli, Africæ Christ. i. 363.) [L. D.]

FLAVIANUS (24) (FLAVINUS), bishop of Novaria (Novara), c. 660. He was preceded by Vigilus (or perhaps Virginus), and followed by Pamphronius. (Ughelli, Ital. Sacr. iv. 948; Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Italia, xiv. 448.) [R. S. G.]

FLAVIANUS (25) II., bishop of Como, 691 (Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Italia, xi. 318; Ughelli, Ital. Sacr. v. 262.) [A. H. D. A.]

FLAVIANUS (26), bishop of Tortona, 761 at earliest. (Ughelli gives 765.) One of a somewhat doubtful list of bishops. (Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Italia, xiii. 672; Ughelli, iv. 628.) [A. H. D. A.]

FLAVIANUS (27) (FABIANUS), May 21 a deacon and martyr in Africa with SS. Meletianus, Lucius, Julianus, and four others. They were all disciples of St. Cyprian, and in holy orders. Arrested by the proconsul Maximus soon after the death of St. Cyprian, they were detained in prison for several months. In the spring of A.D. 259 they were brought up for examination. The friends of Flavianus endeavoured to secure his safety by denying that he was a deacon and therefore outside the scope of the emperor's edict, which ordained death against the clergy alone. (Cyprian's Epist. 82, ad Sacerdotes.) Flavianus, however, avowed that he was a deacon, and suffered three days after his companions. The acts of these martyrs are described by Ruinart as "worthy of all faith, and such may be numbered among the most precious and truthful monuments of antiquity." They are divided into two parts—1, a letter which he wrote to the faithful from prison; 2, the narrain of their death, written at the command of Flavians by a Christian who was an eye-witness thereof. (Mart. Rom.; Ruinart, Acta Sincera, p. 229; Ceillier, ii. 389; Baron. A. E. ann. 32, v.) [G. T. S.]

FLAVIANUS (28), governor of Syria in the time of Diocletian, and charged with carrying out the law against Christians, A.D. 303. (Euseb., Mart. Pal. ap. Migne, Patr. Gr. xx. 1458.) [J. G.]

FLAVIANUS (29), Jan. 30, martyr in the Diocletian persecution at Centumcellae (Civita Vecchia), where he appears to have discharged the office of deputy-prefect under the prefect of the city of Rome, whose jurisdiction extended 160 miles from the city. Baronius commemorates him on Jan. 28. (Martyr. Rom., Usuardi.) [G. T. S.]

FLAVIANUS (30), vicarius of Africa, 377. In the October of that year, the emperor Gratian addressed an edict to him commanding him to see that all churches then occupied by the Donatists were given up to the Catholics, and ordering all private houses used by the Donatists as places of meeting to be confiscated (Cod. Theod. XVI. vi. 1). Flavian was himself a Donatist (Augustin. q. 87, § 8 in Patr. Lat. xxxiii. 296); he was also a friend and a correspondent of the Athenian sophist Himerius. (Photius, Biblioth. eccl.) [T. W. D.]

FLAVIANUS (31), praetorian prefect at the time of the death of Valentinian II. He had a reputation for skill in augury, and encouraged Licinius to rebel against Theodosius, assuring him of victory. (Soz. H. E. vii. 22. 5; Zosim. i. 11.) He was prefect of Italy and Illyria in 382, 383, and 391, and consul in 394. He was the brother of Symmachus, many of whose letters to him are extant, comprising the whole of the second book according to the present arrangement. He comes before the notice of students of church history in connexion with St. Ambrose. It was at the request of Flavianus that Eugenius restored the altar of Victory at Milan. (Paulin. Vit. Amb. xxvi.) In consequence of this, St. Ambrose refused to accept his presents for the church, and so enraged Flavianus that, on his departure from Milan, he threatened as soon as he returned to make the church a stable for his horses, and to force the clerics to serve as soldiers. (Paulin. Vit. Amb. xxxi.) However, he did not live to carry out his threat. He seems to have died soon afterwards in guarding the Alps against Theodosius I., A.D. 394. Theodosius, after his victory, restored much of the property of Flavianus to his son, who bore the same name, and was afterwards prefect of Rome (393). (Symm. Ep. iv. 7.) [M. F. A.]

FLAVIANUS (32), a presbyter and archimandrite of the monastery of Hermillus, or Hermans, in Constantinople. He subscribed the deposition of Eutyches at the council of Constantinople in A.D. 448. (Labbe, iv. 232 B.) [C. G.]

FLAVICHO, succeeded Euphronius as bishop of Antioch. Cir. A.D. 500. (Gall. Christ. iv. 340.) [R. T. S.]

FLAVINUS, bishop of Novara. [FLAVIANUS (24).]

FLAVINUS, thirty-seventh bishop of Chartres, following Hado and succeeded by Godalsadus, perhaps late in the 8th century. (Gall. Christ. viii. 1102.) [S. A. B.]

FLAVITA, bishop of Constantinople. [FRAVITTA.]

FLAVIUS (1) LATINUS, legendary bishop of Brixia (Brescia), c. A.D. 84 or 90, preceded by St. Clatus a martyr, and followed by St. Apollonius. (Ughelli, Ital. Sacr. v. 728; Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Ital. xi. 550.) [R. S. G.]

FLAVIUS (2), bishop of Antioch. [FABIUS (2).]

FLAVIUS (3), addressed in a letter by Dionysius of Alexandria in A.D. 260 or 261 on the Paschal question. (Eusebius, Hist. Eccl. vii c. 20.) [J. G.]

FLAVIUS (4) BOETHIUS, Roman senator, belonging to the Anician family, and probably the sole consul in the year 487 (Clinton, Fast. i. 700) he is probably, and is usually regarded as, the father of the celebrated statesman and philosopher Anicius Manlius Severinus Boethius (Migne, Patr. Lat. lxxiii. 555; Ceillier, Auteurs sacrés, x. 645) [BOETHIUS], though Baronius (Ann. a. 487, i.) identifies the consul in A.D. 487 with the philosopher. He seems to have died while his son was yet young (Boethius, Consol. Phil. ii. 3), but nothing is definitely known. (Gibbon, Hist. c. 39; Robertson, Ch. Hist. iii. c. 6.) [J. G.]

FLAVIUS (5), bishop of Chartres. His date is approximately fixed by the fact that his successor was ruling in A.D. 490. (Gall. Christ. viii. 1095.) [R. T. S.]

FLAVIUS (6) (FLIEU, FILLEUL), ST., sixteenth bishop of Rouen, following St. Gildardus, or Godardus, and succeeded by St. Praetextatus; was present at the second council of Orleans in A.D. 533, the third in 538, and the fourth in 541. He is commemorated Aug. 23. (Mansi, viii. 838, ix. 20, 120; Gall. Christ. xi. 10; Boll. Acta SS. Aug. iv. 640.) [S. A. B.]

FLAVIUS (7), seventeenth bishop of Rheims, succeeding Romanus and followed by Mapinius, was present at the council of Clermont, A.D. 536. (Mansi, viii. 863; Gall. Christ. ix. 13.) [S. A. B.]

FLAVIUS (8), ninth bishop of Chalon-sur-Saône (Cabilo), succeeding St. Agricola and followed by Lupus; secretary, or referendarius, to king Guntram. He subscribed the first council of Mâcon (581), that of Lyons in 583, the second of Valentia, and the second of Mâcon (both in 585), and in 591 was present at Nanterre at the baptism of Clotaire. In the Epitomata of Fredegarius to the history of Gregory of Tours, he is said to have favoured the faction of Gundocald, who came to France from Constantinople, asserting himself to be the son of Clotaire. He is said to have founded or restored the monastery of St. Peter in the suburba. The date of his death is unknown. (Greg. Tur. Hist. Franc. v. 46, x. 28; Mansi, ix. 937, 944, 946, 958, x. 469; Gall. Christ. iv. 867.) [S. A. B.]

FLAVIUS (9), bishop of Porto, signs the acts of the tenth council of Toledo, A.D. 656, in the thirty-sixth place, before fourteen other bishops. (Esp. Sagr. xxi. 30; Aguirre-Catalani, iv. 158; Mansi, xi. 43.) [M. A. W.]

FLAVIUS (10), bishop of Derthona (Tortona), probably between A.D. 765 and 786. (Ughelli, Ital. Sac. iv. 855; Cappelletti, Le Chiese d' Ital. xiii. 672.) [R. S. G.]

FLAVIUS (11), May 7, bishop and martyr at Nicomedia with his brothers Augustine and Augustus. (Mart. Rom.; Mart. Hieron., Rabani, Usuardi, Adonia, Notkeri.) [G. T. S.]

FLAVIUS (12), a title of dignity frequently used by the Lombard kings as a prefix to their names. (Paulus Diac. Gest. Lang. iii. 16, 27; Catalogus Regum Langob. in Monum. Rerum Ital. et Lang. 1878, p. 504.) [A. H. D. A.]

FLAVOSUS, Donatist bishop of Cigisa, Cicsita, or Sigisa, a town of proconsular Africa, present at Carth. Conf. A.D. 411. (Mon. Vet. Don. p. 460, ed. Oberthür.) [H. W. P.]

FLESAUR, a surname of Ethelfrid king of Northumbria (Nennius, Hist. Brit. in M. H. B. 74 b, 76 a). Henry of Huntingdon speaks of the same king, "Edelfert qui vocatur ferox," "Edelfert rex ferus," which determines the meaning of the word. (Hen. Hunt. Hist. Angl. ii. in M. H. B. 714 d, e.) [C. H.]

FLEWYN (FFLEWYN), Welsh saint of the beginning of the sixth century, son of Ithel Hael, and brother of Gredifael. The two brothers were made superintendents of the monastic school at Tywyn ar Daf, Carmarthenshire; Flewyn is patron and founder of Llanfflewyn, a chapel subject to Llanrhyddlad, in Anglesey (Rees, Welsh Saints 187, 223, 324; Williams, Emin. Welsh, 156; Myo. Arch. ii. 42, 44). [J. G.]

FLIEU, bishop of Rouen. [FLAVIUS (6).]

FLOBARGISUS (FLOBRIGIS, FLOGIBRIS), bishop of Salzburg (Juvavia) in A.D. 739 (Gama, Ser. Episc. 307; Pertz, Mon. Germ. xi. 6). But in quoting the names of the early bishops of Salzburg, Pertz (ib. ix. 757, n., 760, n.; xi. 19) does not attach much value to the lists he uses. In the Ser. et Success. Salisb. Ant. (No. 6, Salisb. 1682) he is said to have ruled thirty-six years, and died in 747. [J. G.]

FLOCELLUS, martyr at Autun under Antoninus. (Baron. A. E. ann. 154, iii.) [C. H.]

FLOCOALDUS (FOCOALDUS, FOCALDUS, SOCOALDUS), twenty-fourth bishop of Auxerre, succeeding St. Tetricus and followed by Savarius, at the commencement of the 8th century. He is said to have died on March 15, after an episcopate of 5 years 4 months and 10 days, and to have been buried in the church of St. Eusebius. (Gall. Christ. xii. 270.) [S. A. B.]

FLODULFUS, bishop. [CLODULFUS.]

FLOGIBRIS, bishop of Salzburg. (Pertz, Mon. Germ. ix. 757.) [FLOBARGISUS.] [J. G.]

FLORA (1), addressed by Ptolemaeus. [PTOLEMAEUS.] [G. S.]

FLORA (2)—July 29. Virgin, and martyr, with Lucilla, at Rome under Valerian and Gallienus, A.D. 258. She suffered with twenty-two others. A sermon of Petrus Damianus on them is extant. (Pet. Dam. Opp. par. ii. p. 500, in Pat. L. cxliv. 1025; Mart. Rom.; Baron. A. E. ann. 262. lvii.) [G. T. S.]

FLORA (3), lady of rank, mother of Cynegius. [CYNEGIUS (2).]

FLOBERTUS (1) (FLOREBERTUS, FLORIBERTIUS), thirty-first or thirty-second bishop of Liège, succeeding St. Hubert, whose son he was, and followed by Fulcarius. He is said to have been abbat of Stavelo (Stabulans), a monastery in the diocese, before his elevation. His death is placed in A.D. 745, after an episcopate of about eighteen years, in which he enriched the church with many gifts. He was buried in the church of St. Lambert, in the same tomb with Peter and Andoletus, who suffered martyrdom with that saint. (Gesta Pontificum Leodiensium, tom. i. 145, ed. Chapeauville, Liège, 1612; Gall. Christ. iii. 830.) [S. A. B.]

FLOBERTUS (2), first abbat of the monastery of Ghent. He received St. Livinus and his companions after their departure from Ireland. (S. Livini Vita, 22; Migne, Patr. Lat. lxxxvii. 338.) It was at his request that St. Livinus wrote an epitaph on St. Bavo, the martyr of Ghent, which, with an accompanying letter, he sent to the abbat. Both are in elegiac verse, and are extant. (Patr. Lat. lxxxvii. 345.) [S. A. B.]

FLOREIUS, a presbyter of Eporedia. [EULOGIUS (9).]

FLORENCIUS, bishop of Merida. [FLORENTIUS.]

FLORENCIUS, bishop of Saetabis, signs the acts of the fourth and fifth councils of Toledo, 633 and 636. He is the second bishop of the see known. Saetabis (referred to by Silius Italicus, Punic. iii. 373) is the modern Xativa, and we have no mention of the see after the Moorish conquest. (Esp. Sagr. viii. 47; Aguirre-Catalani, iii. 385-405.) [MUTRUS.] [M. A. W.]

FLORENDUS (FLORENDINUS), tenth bishop of Châlons-sur-Marne, following Amandus, and succeeded by Providerius, in the latter half of the 5th century. (Gall. Christ. ix. 862.) [S. A. B.]

FLORENTIA—Nov. 10. Martyr with Modestus and Tiberius in the Diocletian persecution at Agatha (Agde). (Mart. Adonia, Usuardi, Wandalberti; Petrus de Natal. lib. 10, c. 46.) [G. T. S.]

FLORENTIANUS (1), bishop of Midia in Numidia, banished by Hunneric A.D. 484. (Victor. Vit. Notitia, 56 in Migne, Patr. Lat. lviii.; Morcelli, Africa Christ. i. 227.) [L. D.]

FLORENTIANUS (2), bishop of Utica. [FLORENTINUS (5).] [C. H.]

FLORENTIANUS (3), bishop of Vicus Pacis in Numidia, present as the delegate of his province at the council held by Boniface at Carthage A.D. 525, where he made excuse for the absence of his primate (Misor) on the ground of old age, and handed his letter to the archbishop. (Mansi, viii. 638, 647; Morcelli, Africa Christ. i. 553.) [L. D.]

FLORENTINA (1), a young lady to whom St. Augustine wrote expressing his willingness to give her all the help in her studies that he could give. He enlarges on the great responsibility of all who profess to teach, and reminds her that after all God is the true impartor of all knowledge. (Aug. ep. 286.) [H. W. P.]

FLORENTINA (2), ST., the sister of Leander, Isidore, and Fulgentius; younger than Leander, and older than Isidore, who was the youngest of the family. When the family exile took place she was young. "You have, therefore," says Leander in the last chapter of Lib. ad Florentinam, "no recollections which need stir your soul with longings (to return), and blessed art thou who knowest nothing of what I suffer." After their parents' death Leander, metropolitan of Seville before 579, assumed the position towards her of guardian and parent, and at an unknown date, but in any case before Leander's death in 600, she became a nun. Tradition places her convent near Astigi (Ecija), of which her brother Fulgentius was bishop, and identifies its site with a little village on the banks of the Xenil, called Nuestra Señora del Valle, whither a procession goes every year from the Hospital of Santa Florentina in Ecija. According to various MS. breviaries (the evidence of the breviaries, however, in such points as these is seldom worth much), she was not only superior of her own convent, but of many others which voluntarily placed themselves under her guidance—a position of which there is no trace in any of the contemporary documents. To her, after her profession, Leander addressed the treatise which Isidore (de Vir. Ill. cap. xli.) calls de institutione virginum et contemptu mundi seculi, and which is commonly known as the rule of St. Leander, or the Libellus ad Florentinam. There is no indication in it that Florentina was at the time it was written the superior of her convent. On the contrary, the senior who, in cases where it was necessary to distinguish within the convent walls, between the high-born and wealthy and the poor and low-born, "is to be praised, if she bear herself discreetly towards individual persons, judging to each what is necessary"—and with regard to whom, Leander directs, when forbidding private property in the convent, "Whatever thy hand shall touch, seniori ostende, in communi reponere," seems to be distinct from the Soror Florentina to whom the treatise is addressed. Florus gives the name of the superior as Turtura (Esp. Sagr. x. 120), supposing that the famous passage at the end of the rule—"Noli ab eo avolare nisi ubi turtur reponit pullos suos. Simplicitatis filia es, quae Turture nata es. . . Turturem pro matre respice. Turturem pro magistra attende," &c.—from which the name of Turtura as the wife of Severianus, and mother of Florentina and her brothers, was commonly obtained by older writers, really refers to the abbess of Florentina's convent, and that she, and not the wife of Severianus, was called Turtura. The passage, however, must always remain of doubtful meaning. The rule opens with a long introduction in the form of a letter devoted to the praises of virginity, and consists of twenty-one chapters. Intercourse with women still in the world must be avoided by the nuns; communication even with holy men is forbidden; they must be frugal in eating and drinking, and persevering in reading and prayer. The Old Testament is to be read in a spiritual sense; in fasting regard is to be paid to the weak and infirm; wine is only to be used as a medicine; they must remain within the convent (in monasterio), must avoid all appearance of vita privata, and not imitate those virgins who remain in the world (cap. 17). Can. 13 of the council of Eliberi, and Gams's remarks upon it (K. G. ii. (1) 64) may be compared with this last passage. These women vowed to celibacy, but remaining in their parents' or relations' houses, represented in Leander's time the older type of monachism which existed before the conventual type. Of this older type Eulalia of Merida is commonly taken as the most famous Spanish representative (although neither in the Acta, nor in Prudentius's well-known hymn, is there any mention of vows in her case, whereas the council of Eliberi speaks of "virgines dicatas Deo, and of the pactum virginitatis"). One sees from the Libellus ad Florentinam that in Leander's time the practice, though still continued, was discredited and passing away, and we remember no later notice of it in Spain. For certain modern instances of it elsewhere see Gams, l. c.

Leander's, however, was not the only rule which Florentina possessed, if we are to take the words "Habes Regulam quam sequaris" (cap. 14) in the sense which Gams assigns to them (K.-G. ii. (2) 45). It is doubtful, however, whether the word regula is not used here in the same sense as the word exemplum farther down, and does not refer to the example of the Virgin Mary, quoted in this same chapter. We know of only one earlier Spanish treatise on Virginity, that of Hosius, of Cordova, also addressed to his sister (Isid. de Vir. Ill. cap. v.). Considering the familiarity which Isidore, Leander's pupil, shews with this and other lost works of Hosius, it is not improbable that Leander may have modelled his own treatise upon it. The last chapter of the Regula is full of interest for the light it throws upon the early history of the family to which the brother and sister belonged. We have already quoted part of it (see above, and under FULGENTIUS). Towards the end Leander asks for his sister's prayers: "Nor do thou forget our younger brother, Isidore, whom our common parents left under God's guardianship to the care of his surviving brothers and sister (tribus superstitionibus germanis), and thus joyfully, and without fear for his infancy, departed to God. . . . Love him the more dearly and pray the more to Jesus for him as thou knowest him to have been the more tenderly loved by our parents. . . . For I am well assured that thy virginal prayer for us will touch the Divine ear." It was at Florentina's request that this younger brother in after years, drew up, in the height of his reputation, the treatise, Contra Judaeos (Isid. Opera, ed. Arevalo; Braulion's list of Isidore's works appended to the De Vir. Ill. Esp. Sagr. vi. 468). Gams thinks that Florentina outlived all her brothers. There is, however, no evidence one way or the other. Her remains, according to Florez, shared the same fate as those of her brother Fulgentius (q. v.). Her festival is on June 20. (AA. SS. June, iv. 18. 21; Esp. Sagr. x. 119; Gama, K.-G. ii. (2) 43; Tamayo de Salazar, Martyr. Hisp. iii. 555, prints the Lib. ad Floren. entire. It is also given in the Cod. Reg. ed. Brockie, i. 405, and cap. 21, in Esp. Sagr. ix. App. 5.) [M. A. W.]

FLORENTINUS. See also FLORENTIUS.

FLORENTINUS (1) (FLORENTIUS), bishop of Treves, succeeded St. Severinus, and said to have been martyred. Our only information, however, with regard to him comes from the Roman Martyrology and the Treves breviary, in which he is related to have lived and suffered in the 4th century, before the conversion of Constantine. But the Bollandist Van Hecke swells these small materials by a long dissertation to prove that Christianity in Gaul, and at Treves in particular, had its origin in the apostolic age. Herein he differs from the Bollandist author of the life of St. Maternus. (AA. SS. 17 Oct. viii. 16.) [R. T. S.]

FLORENTINUS (2), bishop of Merida. [FLORENTIUS (8).]

FLORENTINUS (3) (FLORENTIUS), Donatist bishop of Adrumetum, in Byzacene, present at the Donatist council of Cabarsussia, A.D. 393. (Aug. En. in Psal. 36, c. 20.) [H. W. P.]

FLORENTINUS (4), the name of three bishops at the Carthaginian conference of 411, viz. one (also called FLORENTIUS) of Hippo Diarrhytus, or Zaritus, in proconsular Africa (Ben. Zert.), assistant on the Catholic side (Mon. Vet. Don. pp. 288, 345, 425, ed. Oberthür); (Donatist) of Furni in Byzacene (M. V. D. p. 447); (Donatist) of Tubusuptus or Thugusubtus in Mauretania Sitifensis (Borj Ticha, Ant. Itin. 32, 2). (M. V. D. p. 440.) [H. W. P.]

FLORENTINUS, bishop of Tenedos. [FLORENTIUS (19).]

FLORENTINUS (5), bishop of Utica, and another bishop, of Tuzurus in the Byzacene, banished by Hunneric, A.D. 484. (Victor. Vit. Notitia, 55, 57 in Migne, Patr. Lat. lviii.; Morcelli, Africa Christ. i. 342, 362.) [L. D.]

FLORENTINUS (6), bishop of Tisili, in the proconsular province of Africa, present at the council of Carthage, A.D. 525. (Mansi, viii. 648; Morcelli, Africa Christ. i. 328.) [L. D.]

FLORENTINUS (7) (FLORENTIUS), the first known bishop of Clusium (Chiusi), c. A.D. 465. He was at the council held at Rome in that year. (Ughelli, Ital. Sacr. iii. 667; Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Ital. xvii. 576.) [R. S. G.]

FLORENTINUS (8), bishop of Paestum (Capaccio), c. A.D. 499, attending the Roman synods of Symmachus (Mansi, viii. 235 B, 269 A; Volti, Vescovi Pestani, p. 1). Ughelli (Ital. Sac. vii. 465) misreads the name Laurentius. [C. H.]

FLORENTINUS (9), bishop of Ancona c. 603 Florentinus archdeacon of Ancona (No. 17), has been supposed identical with this bishop, but it seems more probable that our bishop had been previously a deacon at Ravenna (No. 18), and that he was chosen bishop of Ancona on the recommendation of Gregory the Great. (Ughelli, Ital. Sacr. i. 373; Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Ital. vii. 27-29.) [R. S. G.]

FLORENTINUS (10), bishop of Gubbio (Eugubium), present at the Lateran synod concerning the election of popes and image worship under Stephen IV. in 769. (Mansi, xii. 715; Hefele, § 343.) [A. H. D. A.]

FLORENTINUS (11), a Christian official to the count of Africa, who had carried off Faventius by force, and to whom St. Augustine wrote on the subject (Ep. 114). [FAVENTIUS (1).] [H. W. P.]

FLORENTINUS (12)—Sept. 27. Martyr with Hilarius at the village of Sémont, near Autun. He had been a soldier, but retiring therefrom he devoted himself to the religious life. In one of the irruptions of the barbarians his tongue was torn out, after which, continuing to preach, he was beheaded. He died about A.D. 406. His relics were translated in A.D. 855 to the abbey of Ainay-de-Lyon. His acts are extant in a twofold shape, one longer, the other shorter. They were written by a monk of the abbey of Bonneval after the translation of the relics. They are of course very corrupt. There has been a long controversy between Mabillon, Castellan, Ruinart, and others about the exact place of his martyrdom, some contending for the ancient town of Sion in the Rhone valley in Switzerland, others for Sémont and Suin in France, of which there is a full account in the Boll. Acta SS. Sept. vii. 404-427. (Mart. Rom. Hieron., Usuardi; Ruinart, Hist. Persec. Wandal. p. 409; Boll. Acta SS. Sept. vii. 420; Gall. Christ. xii. 734.) [G. T. S.]

FLORENTINUS (13), a presbyter of Idassa, a place in Numidia. (Mon. Vet. Don. p. 437, ed. Oberthür.) [H. W. P.]

FLORENTINUS (14), a correspondent and friend of Sidonius Apollinaria. Ambitious like many others of possessing a letter from Sidonius, he wrote to the bishop complaining of his delay in coming to see him and in writing to him. Sidonius, either not inclined to encourage his admirers in this way, or too modest to think his compositions of any consequence, disappointed Florentinus by this brief reply, "I come and I write." (Sid. Apol. Ep. 19, in Migne, Pat. Lat. lviii.) [C. H.]

FLORENTINUS (15), first abbat of the monastery of the Apostles at Arles, established by St. Aurelian. He is said to have been born in 483, made abbat in 548, and to have died in 553. Januarius, a monk of the same foundation, composed on the occasion of the translation of his remains, in 588, from the monastery burial-ground to the church of the Sancta Crux, an acrostic epitaph, which is given by Boll. Acta SS. Mai. v. 39. He was commemorated on April 12, as the day of his death, and May 21, the day of his translation. (Gall. Christ. i. 599.) [S. A. B.]

FLORENTINUS (16), Irish missionary at Amboise, said by Ussher (Eccl. Ant. c. xvi. was

vi. 309-10, and Ind. Chron.) to have lived in A.D. 560, but the dates and facts of his life are confused. (Lanigan, Ecol. Hist. Ir. ii. c. 16, § 16; Boll. Acta SS. Oct. 24, tom. x. 850-58.)

[J. G.]

FLORENTINUS (17), archdeacon of Ancona. He was one of three candidates recommended to pope Gregory to succeed to the vacant see of Ancona, the others being Rusticus deacon of Ancona, and Florentinus deacon of Ravenna. Gregory hears this character of him, that he is well versed in the Scriptures, but too bowed down by age, and too parsimonious, and moreover has solemnly sworn never to be a bishop. (Greg. Mag. Epp. lib. xiv. ind. vii. ep. 11 ed. Migne); Jaffé (Reg. Pontif. 153) dates this letter Dec. 603. The vacancy appears to have been filled by either this Florentinus or the following; see Cappelletti (Le Chiese d'Ital. vii. 28, 190).

[C. H.]

FLORENTINUS (18), deacon of Ravenna, one of three candidates, and the most popular, recommended to pope Gregory for the vacant see of Ancona. (See preceding article.) In the case of his being appointed it would be necessary, Gregory observes, to procure the free approval of his own bishop, whose consent ought not to appear constrained by any mandate of the pope. (Greg. Mag. Epp. lib. xiv. ind. vii. ep. 11 ed. Migne.) [FLORENTINUS (9)]

[C. H.]

FLORENTIUS (1), sixth recorded bishop of Tongres, between St. Severinus and Martinus, belonging apparently to about the year 230, judging from his position in the list, which is here dateless and without further record. (Gall. Christ. iii. 809.)

[R. T. S.]

FLORENTIUS (2), the first known bishop of Pisaurum (Pesaro), c. A.D. 247. He is said to have built a cathedral at Pesaro, and to have placed in it the relics of the martyr St. Terentius. (Ughelli, Ital. Sacr. ii. 948; Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Ital. iii. 340.)

[R. S. G.]

FLORENTIUS (3) PUPPIANUS, a bishop and confessor in the Decian persecution, of whom nothing is known but what is contained in Cyp. Ep. 66. He had written a slanderous letter to Cyprian and receives a warm and singular reply. He had apparently written to him as "Thascius Cyprianus," omitting the specially Christian name Caecilius [CYPRIAN], and the reply is headed, "Cyprianus qui et Thascius Florentio qui et Puppiano," &c. Through the epistle he calls him Puppianus carefully, as if to annoy, and quotes with precision the Caecilius Cyprianus Episcopus Christianorum of the edict. He sarcastically contrasts with his own exile "the dignity of charity and martyrdom," "the highest sublimity of martyrdom," which Florentius had attained, and asks him to confirm him in the episcopate. Florentius had doubted the truth of his visions, and Cyprian promises to inquire in vision whether he may admit him to communion. Pearson (p. 47) takes Florentius to have been a Novatianist, but it may be doubted, considering this last threat, whether the "cum in ecclesia esses et mecum communicares" is more than a sneer (like that of Firmilian to Stephen), as if he had excommunicated himself. [E. W. B.]

FLORENTIUS (4) I. (FLORENTINUS), bishop of Vienne, martyr, cir. A.D. 253. Ado in his Chronicon (Act. Scot. ann. 241) calls him Florentinus, and says he was eminent in life and learning in the reign of Gordian, and remained until the time of Gallienus and Volusianus, when he was exiled and martyred. In his Martyrology Ado records him as Florentius under Jan. 3, and calls him eighth bishop of Vienne. (See also Boll. Acta SS. 8 Jan. i. 127; Gall. Chr. vi. 10.)

FLORENTIUS (5), bishop of Treves [FLORENTINUS (1)].

FLORENTIUS (6), bishop of Ancyra in Phrygia Pacatiana; one of the Nicene fathers, A.D. 325 (Mansi, ii. 695), and afterwards one of the Eusebian seceders to Philippopolis from the Council of Sardica, 347. (Mansi, iii. 139; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 799.)

FLORENTIUS (7), bishop of Puteoli (Pozzuoli), c. A.D. 355. He appears to have been deposed for misconduct, but to have returned and taken repossession of his see (by force, as would appear from the expression "eam ecclesiam invasit") fifteen years after his condemnation. (Ughelli, Ital. Sacr. vi. 318; Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Ital. xvii. 681.)

[R. S. G.]

FLORENTIUS (8) (FLORENCIUS, FLORENTINUS), bishop of Merida from about 321 to about 357. Our first notice of him is probably as the Florentius Diaconus, who accompanied his bishop, Liberius, of Merida, to the first council of Arles (A.D. 314). Among the signatures to the council of Sardica, he appears as "Florentius ab Spanis de Emerita"; and later on his name became well known from the strange story of his death given in the Libellus Precum of Marcellinus and Faustinus, addressed to Valentinian and Theodosius (Sirmond. i. 136). According to these Luciferian presbyters, Florentius, for the sin of having continued in communion with Hosius of Cordova after his signature of the Sirmium Formula, was stricken with a sudden and awful death in the church of Merida, before a great concourse of people. Twice he fell senseless, and twice recovered sufficiently to remount the episcopal throne. The seat, however, again repelled him "ut quasi indignum," and he fell for the third time and expired. The writers of the Libellus call the whole "great city of Emerita" to witness to the truth of their story. It may no doubt have a basis of truth; various forms of sudden and fatal illness would present the appearances mentioned; but considering the accounts given in the same document of the deaths of Hosius and Potamius, and the animus of the whole, not much faith need be given to the story. Florentius was probably the first Metropolitan bishop of Merida. On the subject of the changes in the church organisation of Spain during the 4th century, see Gams, Kirchengeschichte von Spanien, ii. (1) 166. (Esp. Sagr. xiii. 133; Harduin, i. 259.) [M. A. W.]

FLORENTIUS (9), bishop of Cahors about the year 370. He may be the same whom Paulinus of Nola addresses (lib. iv. Ep. 30). He was succeeded by his brother Alethius, mentioned by Gregory of Tours. (Greg. Tur. Hist. Fr. ii. 13; Gall. Christ. vii. 575.)

FLORENTIUS (10), bishop of Ravenna, appears to have succeeded Probus in that see, c. A.D. 361, and to have been followed by Liberius, c. 374. He is said to have been a man of great learning and eloquence. (Ughelli, Ital. Sacr. ii. 330; Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Ital. ii. 26.)

[R. S. G.]

FLORENTIUS (11) II., bishop of Vienne, assisted at the Council of Valence, A.D. 374, and may possibly have presided there as metropolitan. (Ceillier, iv. 600; Tillemont, iii. 623; Labbe, Conc. ii. 904; Gall. Christ. xvi. 10.)

[R. T. S.]

FLORENTIUS (12) (FLORINTIUS), sixth in the list of bishops of Arretium (Arezzo), between Severianus and Maximus, succeeded A.D. 375, died A.D. 377. (Ughel. Ital. Sacr. i. 409.)

[C. H.]

FLORENTIUS (13), bishop of Adrumetum. [FLORENTINUS (3).]

FLORENTIUS (14), bishop of Hippo Diarrhytus. [FLORENTINUS (4).]

FLORENTIUS (15), African bishop, whose name, as well as that of Secundinus, is associated with that of St. Augustine in a letter concerning Leporius, addressed to Proculus and Cylinnius. (Ep. 219.)

[LEPORIUS.]

[H. W. P.]

FLORENTIUS (16) (FLORENTINUS), bishop of Tibur (Tivoli). His accession is variously stated at from A.D. 402 to 417. He appears to have died c. A.D. 449. Innocent I. once wrote to him, reproving him for having infringed on the diocesan rights of Ursus bishop of Nomentum. (Ughelli, Ital. Sacr. i. *216; Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Ital. vi. 654; Ceillier, Auteurs Sacr. vii. 525.)

[R. S. G.]

FLORENTIUS (17), A.D. 448, bishop of Sardis and metropolitan of Lydia. He had a difference with two bishops of his province. This gave occasion to Flavian, bishop of Constantinople, to assemble a council, probably of prelates who were at that city on various business. The best known present are Saturninus of Marcianople, Basilus of Seleucia, Seleucus of Amasea, and Julian of Cos. The council assembled in the chapter-house of the cathedral. (Ceillier, x. 669; Labbe, vi. p. 495.)

[W. M. S.]

FLORENTIUS (18), a bishop of the Western church, whose name stands at the head of the 117th letter of Theodoret. This has, with reason, been thought to have been a circular letter addressed to the Occidental bishops generally. It was written at the same time with that to pope Leo (Epist. 113), A.D. 449, after Theodoret had been deposed by the Latrocinium of Ephesus, and when attempts were being made to drive him into exile, and was conveyed to the West by two chorepiscopi, Abramius and Hypatius, and Alypius, the exarch of the monks of the diocese of Cyrrhus. Theodoret exhorts his correspondent to come forward as the champion of the apostolic faith, and help in driving away the heresy then troubling the East, and not to look coldly on those who, like himself, were suffering for the truth's sake, but give them the benefit of his protection, and thus prove to his enemies that they could not have their own way in everything (Theod. Epist. 117).

[E. V.]

FLORENTIUS (19), bishop of Lesbos, Tenedos, Proselene, Aegiali, according to signatures affixed to the third and sixteenth acts of the council of Chalcedon. He appears also as "Episcopus, Lesbi, Tenedi, Hellesponti" (in the acts of the "Robber" Council), "Episc. Lesbi, Tenedi" (Act. vi. Chalced.), and as "Episc. Lesbiteriae" (Lesbi Tenedi? synodal letter to Leo I., Leo Mag. Ep. 98, 1106, Migne; Oriens Christ. i. 949). Though he was present at the Robber Council at Ephesus in A.D. 449, and assented to the condemnation of Flavian and Eusebius, he appears to have recognised his error before the council of Chalcedon in A.D. 451, at which he was also present, and on the orthodox side. At this latter council his weakness prevented him from writing, and he employed a chorepiscopus, by name Euelpistus, to subscribe for him. (Mansi, vi. 932, vii. 160, 408—here described as "of Mitylene," 436; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 955.)

[C. G.]

FLORENTIUS (20), bishop of Hadrianopolis in Pisidia; present at the oecumenical Council of Chalcedon, A.D. 451; he also signed the synodal letter of Pisidia to the emperor Leo, A.D. 458. (Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 1049; Mansi, vii. 160, 571.)

FLORENTIUS, bishop of Clusium. [FLORENTINUS (7).]

FLORENTIUS (21), one of three bishops, Severus and Equitius being the others, to whom pope Simplicius wrote, Nov. 19, 475. (Mansi, Concil. vii. 973; Jaffé, Regest. Pontif. 49.)

[C. H.]

FLORENTIUS (22), bishop of Centenaria, in Numidia, banished by Hunneric, 484. (Victor. Vit. Notitia, 56 in Migne, Patrol. Lat. lviii.; Morcelli, Africa Christ. i. 136.)

FLORENTIUS (23), bishop of Nova Germania in Numidia, banished as the preceding. Notitia, 56; Morcelli, i. 244.)

[L. D.]

FLORENTIUS (24), bishop of Semina in proconsular Africa, banished to Corsica as the preceding. (Notitia, 56; Morcelli, i. 274.) He died in Corsica, and was venerated there as a saint, though his remains were carried into Italy (AA. SS. Boll. ii. Jun. 179).

FLORENTIUS (25), ST., eighth bishop of Orange, between Verus and Vindemialia. According to the Proprium of the church of Placentia in Italy, where he is commemorated Oct. 17, he was a native of Tours. He subscribed the council of Epaon, A.D. 517, and the fourth of Arles, A.D. 524. A bishop of his name too was present at the first of Lyons in 517, but it is doubtful whether the signature belongs to him or the bishop of St. Paul de Trois-Châteaux, who was contemporary with him. His death is placed about A.D. 526. He was honoured as the patron of the town of Florentiola, in the diocese of Placentia, which possessed his relics, the translation of which was commemorated March 19. (Ado and Usuard. Oct. 17; Migne, Patr. Lat. cxxiii. 380, cxxiv. 585; Boll. Acta SS. Oct. viii. 76; Labbe, Sacr. Conc. viii. 565, 570, 627, Flor. 1759-98; Gall. Christ. i. 767.)

[S. A. B.]

FLORENTIUS (26), 11th bishop of St. Paul de Trois-Châteaux, succeeding St. Michael and allowed by Heraclius. He is known only by his subscription of the council of Epaon (A.D. 517). He must be distinguished from the priest of this diocese (45), who wrote the life of St. Rusticula. (Mansi, viii. 565; Gall. Christ. i. 707.)

FLORENTIUS (37), bishop of Lamsorta, in Samidia; present at the council of Carthage A.D. 525. (Mansi, viii. 647; Morcelli, Africa Christ. i. 198.)

FLORENTIUS (38), bishop of Campilia, in the district of Massa Populonia in Etruria, c. 540-546; possibly bishop of Populonia itself; but he is of doubtful authenticity. (Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Ital. xvii. 681, 724; Acta Sanct. Boll. 15 Mai. iii. 470.)

[A. H. D. A.]

FLORENTIUS (39), bishop of Matelica. His name is joined with that of pope Vigilius in the Donatio Theodori, i.e. the document issued by Vigilius in Constantinople, August 551, and containing sentence of deposition against Theodore Asidas, bishop of Caesarea, and Mennas, patriarch of Constantinople. (Mansi, ix. 60; Hefele, § 264.)

[A. H. D. A.]

FLORENTIUS (30), bishop of Epidaurus (Ragusa) in Dalmatia, c. A.D. 600. (Farlati, Lyr. Sacr. vi. 410.)

[J. de S.]

FLORENTIUS (31), the name of two bishops in the proconsular province of Africa, viz. of Igages and of Zempta (Zenta), who signed the letter of the synod of his province, which was sent to Paul patriarch of Constantinople against the errors of the Monothelites, A.D. 646. (Mansi, i. 941; Morcelli, Africa Christ. i. 370.)

FLORENTIUS (32), ST., twentieth bishop of Strasburg, succeeding St. Arbogastus and followed by Wiggernus, or Wiggerus (A.D. 679-687), was born in Ireland. Together with his predecessor, also an Irishman, and two others, he came to Alsace early in the reign of Dagobert II., possibly in company with that prince, who upon his father Sigebert's death (c. A.D. 655) had been privily sent away to Ireland by Grimoald the mayor of the palace, and did not return to his kingdom till about the year 670. In Alsace he settled himself in the forest of Hasle or Haselac, near where the Bruscha flows from the Vosges, and built, probably with Dagobert's aid, the monastery of Haselac at about six leagues from Strasburg. Elected to the bishopric upon the death of Arbogastus, he founded at Strasburg the monastery of St. Thomas, mainly as a refuge and house of entertainment for the Irish. He retained the friendship of Dagobert, whose daughter he was said to have freed from demonic possession, or according to another account restored to speech and sight. After an episcopate of eight years he died A.D. 687, on Nov. 7. He was buried in the monastery church of St. Thomas, but at the beginning of the 9th century his remains were translated to Haselac by Ratho, one of his successors in the see. (Gall. Christ. v. 702, 831; Lanigan, Ecclesiastical Hist. of Ireland, vii.; Florentii Vita, Surius, de Vitis Prob. Sanct. Nov. 7; Vita S. Deodati, Boll. Acta SS. Jun. iii. 873; Mabill. Ann. Bened. an. 676, n. lxiv. tom. i. p. 533.)

[S. A. B.]

FLORENTIUS (33), June 1, martyr at Perugia with Marcellinus, Cyriacus, Faustinus, and Julianus under Decius, A.D. 250. The Rom. Mart. commemorates them on June 5. (Rom. Mart. ed. Baron.; AA. SS. Boll. Jun. i. 33-37.)

[G. T. S.]

FLORENTIUS (34), July 15, martyr at Carthage with the deacon Catulinus. [CATULINUS (2).]

[G. T. S.]

FLORENTIUS (35), July 25, martyr with Felix. They were natives of Sipontum, an ancient town in Apulia. They belonged to a body of eighty-three soldiers who suffered martyrdom at one time under Maximian at Furconium, a town of Central Italy. (Martyr. Rom. ed. Baron.; Ferrarii, Catal. SS.; Acta SS. Boll. Jul. vi. 167.)

[G. T. S.]

FLORENTIUS (36), Oct. 13, martyr by burning at Thessalonica in Maximian's persecution, A.D. 312. (Mart. Rom. ed. Baron.; Basil. Menol.)

[G. T. S.]

FLORENTIUS (37), May 11, martyr at Osimo (Auximum), not far from Ancona. He suffered with Sisinius, a deacon, and Diocletius under Maximian. (Mart. Rom. ed. Baron.)

[G. T. S.]

FLORENTIUS (38), Oct. 10, martyr at Bonn with Cassius and many others. Probably they were soldiers, as Bonn was the headquarters of a legion, and a fortress. (Mart. Rom. ed. Baron.; Mart. Usuard.)

[G. T. S.]

FLORENTIUS (39), Oct. 27, martyr at Trois-Châteaux. (Mart. Rom. ed. Baron., Usuardi.)

FLORENTIUS (40), presbyter and confessor, commemorated on Sept. 22; placed by Usuardus "in pago Pictavensi," and by the Bollandists at a mountain of Gaul called Glonna, at the extremity of Aquitaine, near the Loire (Acta SS. 22 Sept. vi. 410-438).

According to his very legendary Acts, which are said to belong to the 9th century, Florentius came to Lyons, thence proceeded to Tours and thence to Glonna, where he built an oratory. He paid a yearly visit to St. Martin at Tours, lived to the age of 123 years, of which 63 were after the death of St. Florianus, and was buried at Glonna.

[J. G.]

FLORENTIUS (41), priest of a church near Subiaco, where St. Benedict of Nursia had one of his twelve monasteries. It was to avoid the jealousy of Florentius at his growing fame that St. Benedict removed from that spot to Monte Cassino. (Mabill. Annal. Bened. p. 53.)

[C. H.]

FLORENTIUS (42), father of St. Nicetius (Nizier) of Lyons. The story is that the see of Geneva being vacant, Florentius, who was a senator, was chosen for the office, the king confirming the election. Coming to his house he announced the fact to Artemia his wife, who exclaimed, "Cease, I pray you, to desire this bishopric. In my womb I carry a bishop of your own flesh!" Florentius thereupon declined the office, in compliance with the text of Scripture which said, "In all that Sarah hath said unto thee, hearken unto her voice." Gen. xxi. 12. (Greg. Tur. Vitae Patrum, viii.)

[S. A. B.]

FLORENTIUS (43), a recluse in the district of Nursia. For the story of his friend Eutychius and himself, see Greg. Mag. Dial. (lib. iii. cap. 15 in Migne, lxxvii. 249), and Mabillon (Acta Scriptorum, O. S. B. i. 120). [A. H. D. A.]

FLORENTIUS (44), subdeacon of Rome. He was elected by the Neapolitans as their bishop, but not being able to make up his mind to accept the appointment, he took to flight. Gregory, distressed, wrote to Scholasticus, judge of Campania, to assemble the people of Naples for a new election. (Greg. Mag. Epp. lib. iii. ind. xi. ep. 15); Jaffé (Reg. Pont. p. 102) dates this letter Dec. 592. The bishop who succeeded was Fortunatus (No. 21). [C. H.]

FLORENTIUS (45), a presbyter of Trois-Châteaux, author of the life of St. Rusticula, an abbess of the monastery of St. Caesarius at Arles (Mabillon, Acta SS. Benedict. ii. 139). It was written soon after her death, A.D. 631, at the instance of her successor, Celsa. Its literary style is good. (Ceillier, xi. 695.) [S. A. B.]

FLORENTIUS (46), magister officiorum under the emperor Constantius II. He was son of Nigrinianus, and acting for the magister officiorum in A.D. 355 (Ammianus Marcellinus, Res. Gest. xv. 5, 12); in his official capacity he presented to the emperor Constantius the two books which Lucifer of Cagliari wrote in behalf of St. Athanasius. They were so bold and outspoken that the emperor directed Florentius to return the codex to Lucifer, and ask definitely if he acknowledged it to be his. Florentius's letter accompanying the codex and Lucifer's reply, acknowledging the authorship to the fullest extent, are given in Migne (Patr. Lat. xiii. 935-6). In the days of Julian (A.D. 361) he was banished to the island of Boa or Ravo, on the coast of Dalmatia. (Amm. Marcell. ib. xxii. 8, 6; Tillemont, Mém. Hist. Ecol. vii. 517; Ceillier, Auteurs sacrés, iv. 242.) [J. G.]

FLORENTIUS (47), a wealthy man of Italy who retired to Jerusalem to pursue the monastic life late in the 4th century. He was known to Jerome, Evagrius, Heliodorus, and Rufinus; but Jerome had not actually seen him when their correspondence took place in the year 374. Florentius had already at that time established himself at Jerusalem, and was becoming known throughout the world for his kindness and munificence towards the strangers who went there. Heliodorus (afterwards bishop of Altinum), who had gone with Jerome to Antioch in 374, appears to have gone on to Jerusalem, leaving his friend behind. At Jerusalem he was entertained by Florentius, and on his return gave a glowing description of his charities. Jerome begs Florentius to be the intermediary of his correspondence with Rufinus, and asks him to transmit several books to him, and promises others in return. We hear nothing of him after Jerome himself went to Jerusalem; perhaps he may have died early; perhaps he may have taken the part of Rufinus in the controversy between the two former friends. But in the year 382, when Jerome wrote the continuation of Eusebius's Chronicle, he thus speaks of him (sub ann. A.D. 378): "Florentius, Bonosus et Rufinus insignes monachi habentur; e quibus Florentius tam misericors in egenos fuit ut vulgo pater pauperum nominatus sit."

(Jerome, Ep. 3-5, ed. Vall.; id. Chron. loc. cit.) [W. H. F.]

FLORENTIUS (48), tailor of Hippo Regius who, having prayed to the Twenty Martyrs for means to buy himself clothing, found on the shore a fish, from whose inside the cook extracted a gold ring, which he sold and purchased what he required. (Aug. Civ. Dei, lib. xxii. cap. 8, § 9.) [FLORENTIUS (2).] [H. W. P.]

FLORENTIUS (49), a Donatist, accused by Victor bishop of Sufeta, or Sufes, a town of Byzacene (Esbyah, Ant. Itin. 47, 5), of persecution and illegal imprisonment during three years. (Mon. Vet. Don. p. 426, ed. Oberthür.) [H. W. P.]

FLORENTIUS (50), one of the chief ministers of state at Constantinople under Theodosius II. and Marcian, a man of the highest reputation for soundness of faith, purity of life, and statesmanlike wisdom (Labbe, Concil. iv. 220). He was consul in A.D. 429, patrician in 448, prefect of the praetorian guards, and before 449 had six times attained the high dignity of prefect of the East, which was bestowed on him a seventh time by Marcian in the first year of his reign, A.D. 450. In A.D. 428, when he was prefect of the East for the first time, two new enactments were addressed to him by Theodosius; the one for the punishment of heretics; the other forbidding the prostitution of their children and slaves by parents and masters (Theodos. Novell. pp. 30, 32). Both of these laws are attributed by Baronius to the powerful influence of Nestorius, then bishop of Constantinople (Baron. Annal. 428, § 26), but it is probable that Florentius lent his powerful aid. The nobility of his character is shewn by his offering one of his estates to make up for any loss the imperial treasury might suffer by the diminution of the odious tax on prostitutes, an offer which it is said Theodosius had the meanness to accept.

In A.D. 448, when Flavian had resolved to put Eutyches on his trial for heretical doctrine, the powerful influence exercised by him on the emperor through the eunuch Chrysaphius was shewn by Theodosius's demand that Florentius should have a seat at the synod as his representative. It was no new thing for imperial officers to be present at ecclesiastical synods, but hitherto the ostensible reason was to ensure the preservation of order, and to regulate external matters. But the ground expressly assigned by the emperor for requiring the admission of his officer of state, viz. that the matters under discussion concerned the faith was a startling innovation which Flavian was by no means ready to accept. Besides, that a lay man should be deputed to watch over the maintenance of sound doctrine implied a distrust of the synod's orthodoxy and sense of justice which could not fail to be felt as insulting. Flavian withheld his consent as long as he dared. Magnus the Silentary had several interviews with him before he would give way, which he did finally so as to make it appear that he was only yielding to superior force (Acac. Histor. brevicul. p. 112; Liberat. Breviar. c. xi.; Labbe Concil. iv. 247). On the opening of the trial, a letter was read from the emperor desiring the mission of Florentius to the synod. Flavian replied that everybody knew the soundness of Florentius's faith, and that he might take his place in the council if Eutyches wished it. Eutyches replying that he would consent to anything God and his holiness the bishop thought right (ibid. 220). Florentius was sent for. He took his seat among the metropolitans, next to Seleucus, bishop of Amasea (ibid. 238; Liberat. c. ii. p. 60). Florentius disclaimed all desire to legitimize, or to forget his position as a layman; but it is evident that he took a very leading and authoritative part in the discussion, and manifested a strong leaning towards the acquittal of Eutyches. But his efforts to induce the archimandrite to acknowledge the two natures in Christ, or, at least, to adopt language which might satisfy the council, were fruitless, and he was compelled in the interests of orthodoxy to give the word for his condemnation (ibid. 507, 517). As Eutyches left the hall, which was resounding with the acclamations of the assembled bishops at the much-desired sentence, he lodged with Florentius an appeal against his condemnation to the churches of Rome, Alexandria, and Jerusalem, which he asserted he had just publicly made, but which in the uproar had been disregarded. Florentius ran to apprise Flavian of it in order that it might be entered in the minutes of the trial. But the bishop had already left the hall of judgment, and availed himself of the plea that the trial was closed to exclude the registration of the appeal (ibid. 244).

Eutyches having taxed Flavian with having falsified the records of the proceedings of the synod, an investigation was held in the following April to examine and verify them, at which Florentius virtually presided at the command of the emperor and the desire of Eutyches, who evidently expected greater impartiality from a layman, accustomed to judicial proceedings, than from a prejudiced clerical body (Liberat. Breviar. c. ii. p. 60; Labbe, iv. 250). On the deacons of Eutyches requiring to be present to watch the case for their master, he overrode the opposition of Flavian to their appearance (ibid. 239), and compelled the reluctant Aetius, who had acted as notary, to produce the minutes of the trial. No inaccuracy of importance was detected, though Eutyches complained that there were many omissions. The most important of these was the absence of any mention of the appeal he declared he had made to the leading Christian churches, which was consequently disallowed (ibid. 242-247). When the council of Chalcedon met for the consideration of the doctrines of Eutyches, Florentius was present, with other high civil dignitaries; but there is no record of the part he took.

We have a letter to Florentius from Theodoret, written A.D. 449, defending himself from the charges of unsoundness in the faith, protesting that he holds and ever has held the truth as delivered by the apostles and prophets, and taught by Ignatius, Eustathius, Basil, and other chief doctors of the church, and declared by the same fathers, and beseeching Florentius to close his ears against all calumnies against him (Theod. Epist. 89). Isidore of Pelusium also wrote to him to complain of a bad governor named Gigantius, whom he begs Florentius to punish as he deserves (Isid. Pelus. Epist. lib. i.

486). We have a letter to him from Firmus of Caesarea, begging his acceptance of some Easter gifts (σύμβολα). (Firm. Epist. 29.) [E. V.]

FLORENTIUS (51), father of Gregory bishop of Tours. He was the son of Georgius, a member of one of the senatorial families of Auvergne. Gregory relates that he was cured of an attack of recurrent fever by the prayer of St. Martius, abbat of Clermont. (Vitas Patrum, xiv. 3.)

FLORESINDUS, metropolitan of Seville from about 682 to before 693, signing the acts of the thirteenth council of Toledo, summoned by Ervig in 683. He signs last among the metropolitans. At the fourteenth council of Toledo, 684, he is represented by the abbat Gaudencius. At the fifteenth council, 688, he signs in the third place among the metropolitans. (Esp. Sagr. ix. 224; Aguirre-Catalani, iv. 270, 287, 304, 313; Gams, Kirchengeschichte von Spanien, ii. 2, 219; Mansi, xi. 1075, 1091, xii. 21.) [M. A. W.]

FLORIANI. Under this title, with the alternative names Carpocratiani and Milites, Philaster (57) describes a sect of heretics who denied the resurrection and judgment, who disbelieved Christ's birth from a virgin, and who taught and practised immorality. Philaster had given a separate article to the CARPOCRATIANS, and the name Milites would rather lead us to think of those Gnostics whom Epiphanius (xxvi. 3) calls Στρατιωτικοί and Phibionites. The name Floriani does not elsewhere occur, and all that can be said about it is that there seems no reason for connecting it with FLORINUS. [G. S.]

FLORIANUS (1), bishop of Caesena, in Gallia Cispadana, a member of the Court of Inquiry held at Rome concerning Caecilianus. (Opt. i. 23.) [CAECILIANUS (2).] [H. W. P.]

FLORIANUS (2), Donatist bishop of Putiza, a place in Numidia, prevented by illness from attending the Carthaginian conference, but having given his signature as a member of the same, A.D. 411. (Mon. Vet. Don. pp. 430, 432, ed. Oberthür.) [H. W. P.]

FLORIANUS, bp. of Placentia (Piacenza). [FLAVIANUS (9).]

FLORIANUS (3), bp. of Oderzo (Opitergium) in Venetia. He was desirous of martyrdom, and is supposed to have been martyred c. 620, probably by the Lombards according to tradition. (Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Italia, x. 322, 323.)

[A. H. D. A.]

FLORIANUS (4), bishop of Piacenza, c. 648. (Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Italia, xv. 15; Ughelli, Ital. Sacr. ii. 198.) [A. H. D. A.]

FLORIANUS (5), said to have been 25th bishop of Arles, following St. Virgilius, and succeeded by Cyprianus, or Theodosius, in the early part of the 7th century. (Gall. Christ. i. 541; Le Cointe, Ann. Eccl. Franc. an. 604, n. viii. tom. ii. 563; Gams, Series Episc. 493.)

FLORIANUS (6), May 4, martyr in the Diocletian persecution at Lorch (Laureacum), the chief town of Noricum Ripense. The president of Nericum, one Aquilinus, as soon as the edict of persecution arrived, called upon the officials to sacrifice. Florianus held the important post of "princeps officiorum." He refused to obey, and was sentenced to be hung into the Anisus with a stone tied round his neck. (Mart. Rom. ed. Baron., Usuardi, Rabani, Nothkeri, Wandalberti; Suri, Vit. SS. t. iii.) [G. T. S.]

FLORIANUS (7), addressed in a letter which is attributed to St. Ambrose. He is represented as having asked direction from St. Ambrose on the subject of repentance and amendment. The letter is given among St. Ambrose's works as genuine in the Roman edition (tom. v. p. 202, Ep. 29, Rom. 1582), but is reckoned spurious by the Benedictines (Patr. Lat. xvii. 749 sq.) and by Ceillier (xi. 511). Florianus is otherwise unknown. [J. G.]

FLORIANUS (8), abbat, addressed in a poetical epistle by Arator, who compliments him as being spiritually instructed in the grace of Christ, but he is not otherwise identified (Patr. Lat. lxviii. 63 and note). He is said by Ceillier (xi. 197) to have been abbat of Romain Moutier in the present canton of Vaud. [J. G.]

FLORIANUS (9), martyr with Calanicus and fifty-eight others at Beit Jibrin (Eleutheropolis), between Jerusalem and Gaza. According to the Roman martyrology he suffered at the hands of the Saracens, who invaded Palestine and took Jerusalem by an honourable capitulation in A.D. 637, Heraclius being emperor. We read, however, of no persecution of Christians by them at that time. But in 614, the Persians under Choeros took Jerusalem by assault, when ninety thousand Christians are said to have been massacred. (Baron. Annal. Eccles. A.D. 610, 614, 626, 627.) [G. T. S.]

FLORIBERTUS, bishop of Liège. [FLORIBERTUS.]

FLORIDA, virgin, Jan. 10, mentioned by Gregory of Tours (de Glor. Conf. c. 43, ap. Migne, Patr. Lat. lxxi. 81) as buried at Dijon in the same church as St. Paschasia. (Boll. Acte SS. Jan. i. 617: Ferrarius, Cal. Gen. Sanct. 20; [J. G.]

(1), bishop of Tivoli (Tibur), the Great with material for Dial. iii. 13, 35 in Migne, lxxvii. [A. H. D. A.]

(2), bishop of Tarragona (Turtib) signatures to the so-called uari (A.D. 610) is found "Flurasonensis Episcopus subscripsi" Rep. Sagr. xlii. 114; Aguirre.) [M. A. W.]

FUS, Irish saint. [BLATHMAC.]

May 1, virgin and martyr killed during the ravages of the sul, A.D. 365-368. (AA. SS.; Ammianus, lib. xxvi. xxvii.; [G. T. S.]

(1), for some time in the latter ed century a presbyter of the church of Rome, which office he lost on account of his having fallen into heresy. He is known to us by two notices (v. 15, 20) in the ecclesiastical history of Eusebius, who drew his information from works written by Irenaeus in opposition to Florianus. One was a letter to Florianus, of which Eusebius has preserved a most interesting fragment, in which Irenaeus records his youthful recollections of Polycarp, representing how that bishop, whose good opinion he remembered Florianus had once been anxious to gain, would have been shocked at his present opinions. Scholten, in order to save a theory of his from destruction, has found it necessary to assail the genuineness of this letter (Der Apostel Johannes in Kleinasien, p. 41), but his arguments are too weak to need refutation, and the fragment contains unmistakable internal evidence of genuineness. It states that Florianus at the time of his acquaintance with Polycarp was doing prosperously at the royal court in Lower Asia, Irenaeus being still a boy. It has not been found possible to explain the expression "royal court" by referring to any known sojourn of an emperor in Asia Minor within the limits which the chronology demands, and Lightfoot has plausibly suggested (Contemp. Rev. May 1875, p. 832) that the expression may have been loosely used of the court of T. Aurelius Fulvus, afterwards the emperor Antoninus Pius, and who was proconsul of Asia, A.D. 135 (Le Bas and Waddington, Fastes des Provinces asiatiques, p. 724). Florianus may possibly have come from Italy in the proconsul's retinue. The title of the letter to him was 'On Monarchy, or that God is not the author of evil,' and Eusebius remarks that Florianus seems to have maintained the opposite opinion concerning God. It would be rash in us, who have not seen the letter, to assert that this inference of Eusebius was erroneous, but since the characteristic of dualism is not to make God the author of evil, but to clear Him from the charge by ascribing evil to an independent origin, the title would lead us to think that the letter was directed not against one who had himself held God to be the author of evil, but against one who had charged the doctrine of a single first principle with necessarily leading to this conclusion. And we should have supposed that the object of Irenaeus was to shew that it was possible to assert God to be the sole origin and ruler of the universe without holding evil to be his work. However this may be, later writers have naturally followed the report of Eusebius. Philaster (79) having described it as the heresy of COLLUTHUS that he denied things evil to be God's work, contrasts with this the doctrine of another unnamed heretic, who taught that things which God made were in their own nature evil. Augustine (86), in other respects following Philaster, calls the anonymous heretic Florianus, and with little probability, as we shall presently see, makes him the founder of a sect of Floriniani. He probably arrived at this result by combining the notice in Eusebius with Philaster's mention in another place of Floriani. The great work of Irenaeus does not mention Florianus, and he nothing which we can conjecture as likely to have been common with the letter of which we have been speaking. The tract of Tertullian against Hermogenes in some measure deals with the same subject, but freely as Tertullian used the of others, and of Irenaeus in particular, there is nothing which entitles us to say that he employed the letter to Florinus. If Florinus was in a heretical sense made God the author of evil, his errors afterwards took the opposite direction, and he became a Valentinian. It was a reply to him that Irenaeus composed his work de Ogdoad, to which he must himself have attached considerable value; for he prefixed to it an adjuration to ensure fidelity in his transcribers, which pleased Eusebius so much that he not only copied it into his ecclesiastical history, but prefixed it to his own work on Chronology. Concerning the time of the controversy of Irenaeus with Florinus, we have to balance the arguments that, if it had taken place before the publication of the treatise on heresies, we should expect to find some trace of it in that work; and, on the other hand, that, after the publication of a treatise which deals so fully with the whole subject of Valentinianism, a separate treatise on the Ogdoad would have been unnecessary. The scale seems to be turned in favour of the later date by the fact that there is extant a Syriac fragment (Harvey, ii. 457), which purports to be an extract from a letter of Irenaeus to Victor of Rome concerning Florinus, a presbyter, who was a partisan of the error of Valentinus, and had published an abominable book. No such letter is mentioned by Eusebius, but otherwise the extract presents no ground for suspicion. The letter calls the attention of the bishop of Rome to writings which would seem to have been uncensored by him, and which were doing mischief, as bearing the authority of a presbyter of his church. It may be inferred that however the doctrines of Florinus may have verged on Valentinianism, he had not formally joined that sect, else he could not have retained his position. Whether the interference of Irenaeus was followed by the deposition or the retraction of Florinus, it does not appear that he was the founder of any heretical sect; probably he did not long survive, for he must have been a considerably older man than Irenaeus. He is not named by Epiphanius, by Philaster, or by Pseudo-Tertullian, who has so many notices of Roman heretics; and it is likely, therefore, that he was not named in the earlier work of Hippolytus, nor in the lectures of Irenaeus, on which that work was founded; he is not named in the later work of Hippolytus, nor by Tertullian. This silence is easily explained if either Florinus or any school of Floriniani were a source of danger to the church after his exposure by Irenaeus.

FLORINUS (2), bishop of Cesena. [FLORINUS (1).]

FLORINUS (3), a Greek, eighth in the list of the bishops of Eugubium or Gubbio in Umbria, between Decentius and Anastasius, A.D. 426. (Ughell. Ital. Sacr. i. 634.) [C. H.]

FLORINUS, bishop of Cesena. [FLORUS (5).]

FLORINUS, bishop of Aemonia (Cittanova) in Umbria, about ten miles north of Parenzo, c. 524. On a journey to Constantinople he died at Pola. (Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Italia, viii. 747; Ughelli, Ital. Sacr. v. 229.) [A. H. D. A.]

CHRON. BIOGR.—VOL. II.

FLORIUS, Oct. 26, martyr at Nicomedia with Lucianus and some others; in the Decian persecution, Sabinus being proconsul. (Rom. Mart. ed. Baron.) [G. T. S.]

FLORUS (1), said to have been bishop of Calaris (Cagliari), in the 2nd century. (Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Italia xiii. 48; Coscu, Città di Cagliari, &c., p. 56.) [R. S. G.]

FLORUS (2), traditionally the first bishop of Lodève; but according to the Sammarthani the ancient tradition rests on no evidence. (Tillemont, Mém. iv. 506; Gall. Christ. vi. 526.) [R. T. S.]

FLORUS (3), one of twelve Gallic bishops congratulated by Leo the Great, Aug. 22, 449, on the consecration of Ravennius by them to the see of Arles (Leo Mag. Ep. 40). He occurs again among about 40 Gallic bishops in the synodal letter of Ravennius to Leo, and likewise in Leo's reply. (Leo Mag. Epp. 99, 102, ed. Migne, Patr. Lat. liv.; Mansi, Concil. vi. 161, 181.) [C. H.]

FLORUS (4), bishop of Amisus or Pompeiopolis, in Pontus, A.D. 590. He was born at Constantinople. His father's name was Florus, and his mother's Euphemia. He is stated to have attained to great knowledge and skill both in secular and sacred literature. He married, and had two sons, but in later life took monastic vows. He was later made bishop of Amisus, a town which being close to Eupatoria shared with it the common name of Pompeiopolis. He held his see under the younger Justin, Tiberius, and Mauritius. In the Myrales of the Greek church his name is found to be celebrated on Dec. 18. (Basil. Menol.) [F. A.]

FLORUS (5), bishop of Cesena, c. 588. (Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Italia, ii. 530; Ughelli, Ital. Sacr. ii. 445.) [A. H. D. A.]

FLORUS (6), the name of three Italian bishops, viz. of Cesena, Forconium, and Foligno, who signed the second epistle of pope Agatho, which was sent in 680 after a synod in Rome to the third council of Constantinople. (Mansi, xi. 303, 315; Hefele, § 314; Ughelli, Ital. Sac. i. 421.) [A. H. D. A.]

FLORUS (7), bishop of Mentesa, signs the acts of the thirteenth, fifteenth, and sixteenth councils of Toledo, 683, 688, 693 (Mansi, xi. 1076; xii. 22, 84). The see of Mentesa disappears at the time of the Moorish invasion. Taric destroyed the town, and Florus is the last bishop. (Esp. Sagr. vii. 260; Roderic. Tolet. lib. iii. cap. 22, ap. Schott, Hispania Illustrata; Aguirre-Catalani, iv. 287, 313, 333.) [PARDUS.] [M. A. W.]

FLORUS (8), a Roman officer, probably consular of Numidia, A.D. 303, by whom the persecution against the Christians was carried on with extreme severity. (Böcking, Not. dig. Occ. p. 17; Optatus, iii. 8; Aug. conf. Cresc. iii. 27, 30.) [H. W. P.]

FLORUS (9)—Aug. 18. Martyr with Laurus his brother in Illyricum under Licinius, between 313 and 315. They were twins, and natives apparently of Byzantium, where they were employed by two Christian sculptors, Proculus and Maximus, who suffered martyrdom there. Upon this Florus and Laurus escaped into Illyricum, where they obtained employment from the president of the province. Pleasing him by their skill, they were sent to the emperor Licinius, who was then probably living at Sirmium, the capital of Illyricum. He gave them orders to erect an idol temple, which they did, but ended by dedicating it to the true God and breaking the idols, for which the emperor cast them into a deep well. Their relics were translated to Constantinople in the time of Constantine the Great. (Martyr. Rom. ed. Baron., Usuard.; Bas. Menol.) [G. T. S.]

FLORUS (10), deacon of the church of Syracuse, accompanied his bishop, Chrestus, to the council of Arles (A.D. 314), and was his only companion, though the invitation of the emperor (Eusebius, x. 5) allowed two ecclesiastics to go. (Mansi, ii. 475; Ceillier, ii. 628.) [J. G.]

FLORUS (11), magister officiorum under Theodosius the Great in the Eastern empire in A.D. 381. At the end of that year he became pretorian prefect. During A.D. 381-3 many of the imperial decrees are addressed by Theodosius to him for execution (Cod. Theodos. i. pp. 107-115, ed. Ritter), entrusting him, among other duties, with the putting down of the heathen sacrifices, and with the establishing an inquisition against the Manichean and Encratite heretics. [J. G.]

FLORUS (12), circ. A.D. 426, a young monk of Adrumetum. He made a visit to a monastery at Uzalis with his friend Felix, another young monk. Here he read Augustine's letter (No. 194) to the presbyter Sixtus. It struck him so much, that he asked permission of the monks of Uzalis to make a copy, and transcribed it at the dictation of Felix. After their sojourn at Uzalis, Florus went on to Carthage, Felix returned to Adrumetum. Here Felix read the letter to the brothers of that house. Some of them considered it fatal to the doctrine of free-will; and, when Florus returned, accused him of being the author. The monastery was in quite a turmoil of theological disputation, of which the abbat Valentinus was kept in ignorance. Florus felt himself obliged to tell him the truth of the matter; whereupon Valentinus read the letter, recognized the style of Augustine, and allowed one of the recalcitrant brothers, Cresconius, to make a pilgrimage with Felix to Hippo, which restored peace to the monastery. When they arrived, the bishop explained the letter to Sixtus, and wrote a letter on the subject to the abbat of Adrumetum and his confraternity. He had intended to give them other treatises on the subject of Pelagianism, but they were unwilling to wait until copies were made. He kept them, however, till after Easter, to give them more complete instruction on the theory of grace. Besides a second letter to Valentinus, he composed for them the treatise De Gratia et Libero Arbitrio. He subsequently received a letter from the abbat, and a visit from Florus. This gave rise to his chapter on the subject in the Liber Retractationum, where he explains that he had been under the impression that the disputants of Adrumetum had maintained that free-will was denied in defending grace. (Augustinus, Liber de Gratia et Libero Arbitrio; Liber Retractationum II. 66; Epist. 194, &c.; Patrol. Lat. xxxii. 656, &c.; Ceillier, ix. 513.) [W. M. S.]

FLORUS (13), a Gallic noble in the middle of the 6th century, said to have shewn St. Maurus the spot whereon to build his monastery and to have entrusted his son Bestulphus to the saint for education, an example that was followed by many other nobles. (Wend. Flor. Hist. an. 553, ed. Coxe.) [C. H.]

FLORUS (14), Dec. 22, martyr at Ostia, with Demetrius and Honoratus. (Mart. Rom. ed. Baron., Usuard.) [G. T. S.]

FLORUS (15), martyrologist, called by Cave (Script. Ecol. Hist. Lit. i. 632) monk of the Gallican congregation of St. Trudo in the diocese of Lyons, about the year 760, but more frequently identified with Florus Magister, deacon or priest of Lyons, who was commentator on Scripture and one of the chief opponents of Joannes Scotus in the Predestinarian controversy about the middle of the 9th century. His personal history is thus doubtful, but his work in martyrology is very important from its close connexion with that of Bede. He is said to have materially enlarged the imperfect Martyrologium of Bede, and when Henschenius first discovered the complete Martyrologium in the library of M. Bouhier, the French senator at Dijon, and compared it with the fragment he had previously found in queen Christina's library at Rome, he imagined that in the different characters in which the former was written, he could detect the original Martyrologium of Bede and the later additions by Florus: and hence in the Bollandine edition (Acta SS. Jan. tom. i. 40 sq.) an attempt is made to distinguish the genuine work of Bede from the additions by Florus and others. But the original and additions are really indistinguishable, and there is no separate and entire Martyrologium of either; while the extent to which others may have extended the work of Florus is also unknown. Ado's Vetus Romanum Martyrologium (Migne, Patr. Lat. cxxiii. 143 sq.) professed to be merely a filling in of martyrs to the days omitted by Bede and Florus, while Usuardus's Martyrologium was a condensing of the other martyrologies. The martyrologist Wandalbert (Migne, Patr. Lat. cxxi. 577) expresses his obligation to a subdeacon of Lyons named Florus, who excelled in Scripture studies; but it is doubtful whether this is the martyrologist. (Boll. Acta SS. Mart. ii. praef. p. v. sq., giving Henschen's account of his finding the Martyrologium of Bede and the reasons for his distinguishing the parts belonging to Bede and Florus from others; see also ib. Jan. i. praef. Gen. § vi. p. xlviii, for the sources whence the Martyrologium is taken; Giles's Bede, iv. praef. pp. iii, iv; Migne, Patr. Lat. xciv. 799 sq., giving both the Cologne and Bollandine editions, with Smith's preface and notes; Ceillier, Auteurs sacrés, xii. 485.) [J. G.]

FLOS, Dec. 31, martyr at Catana in Sicily, with nine others. (Rom. Mart. ed. Baron.) [G. T. S.]

FLOSCULUS (FUSCULUS), thirteenth bishop of Orleans, succeeded St. Prosper, and died about the year 450. He is entitled martyr or confessor in some MSS., but not in the Roman Martyrology, nor by Saussey in the Gallican. There is a strange legend that St. Evurtius, on occasion of a difficulty in selecting a bishop, caused Flosculus when a mere baby to take a name from the altar; whereupon the child cried three times "Anianus is bishop," and spoke no more for a year. His feast is kept on Feb. 2. (Hieron., Usuard., Mart.; Gall. Christ. viii. 1413.)

FLUMINIUS, bishop of Tabudium (Tabuda) in Numidia, banished by Hunneric, 484. (Victor. Vit. Notitia, 56 in Migne, Patr. Lat. lviii.; Morcelli, Africa Christ. i. 294.)

FOALDUS, bishop of Lyons. [FULCOALDUS.]

FOCALDUS, FOCOALDUS, bishop of Auxerre. [FLOCOALDUS.]

FOEGADIUS (FAEGADIUS, PHAEADIUS, SEGATIUS, SABADIUS, or PHITADIUS, called in Gascony St. FIARI), bishop of Agen. His name, which suffers many corruptions, appears to be Greek, a tongue then common in Aquitania. His accession to the episcopate was probably later than 347, since he is not mentioned in the acts of the Sardican council. He rejected the second Sirmian formulary sent by Constantius into Gaul, and refuted it in a work contra Arianos. He attended the council of Ariminum, and took an active part in the first proceedings, but refused to sign the Arian confession, even after nearly all his brethren had yielded. But, importuned by the prefect Taurus, he was at last deceived into subscribing by a trick of Valens, who to the statement Christ is "not a creature," had privily added the words "as other creatures." (Sulp. Sev. Chron. ii. 44.) Foegadius, on discovering the fraud, protested so vehemently as to clear himself in the eyes of all, and he attended the councils of Valence, 374, and probably that of Saragossa in 380 (Agen, belonging then to Spain), for the name Fitadius occurs among those subscribed, and his friend Delphinus, of Bordeaux, was there. He was alive in 392 when St. Jerome wrote his catalogue of illustrious men, but he was in decrepitude. St. Ambrose addressed a letter jointly to him (under the name Segatius) and Delphinus (Ep. 86, ii. 1106). The two books against the Arians were the only work of his which Jerome knew. It may be found in Patr. Lat. vol. xx. It is an able treatise, but contains nothing very remarkable, unless it be the definition (lib. i. cap. vii.) of substance in its ecclesiastical use. "Substantia dicitur id quod semper ex sese est; hoc est, quod propriâ intra se virtute consistit, quae vis uni et soli Deo competit." In addition to the above work the treatise De Fide Orthodoxâ contra Arianos, and the Libellus Fidei, which stood as Nos. 49 and 50 of the Orations of Gregory Nazianzen, really belong to Foegadius. They also are in Pat. Lat. vol. xx. The former is written to explain some points which had been misunderstood in the treatise against the Arians; the latter is a formal confession of orthodox faith. (Ceillier, Aut. Eccl. v. 372; Gall. Christ. ii. 895; Tillemont, Mém. vi. 427; Boll. AA. SS. Ap. 25.)

[R. T. S.]

FOENDALACH (FOENDELACH, FOENNELACH), son of Maenach, bishop of Armagh, succeeded Ferdachrich or Ferdachry A.D. 768, but sat with difficulty for only three years, when Dubhdaeth obtained the primacy, Gormgal being an unsuccessful claimant at the same time. Foendalach lived till A.D. 794. (Lanigan, Eccl. Hist. Ir. iii. c. 19, § 14, c. 20, § 6; Ware, Ir. Bishops, "Armagh.")

[J. G.]

FOILLANUS. [FULLANUS (2).]

FOLACHTACH (FOLACHTACHUS). (1) Son of Teach Tuae, abbat of Clonmacnoise, died A.D. 770 (Four Mast. A.D. 765; Ann. Ult. A.D. 769). Teach Tuae, the House of St. Tua, now Taghadoe or Taptoo, is situated near Maynooth, co. Kildare, and Folachtach had probably been born there; the ancient church has disappeared, but the round tower remains to shew its ecclesiastical importance. (Four Mast. by O'Donovan, i. 368, n. p. 369.)

(2) Son of Sarfaeladh, abbat of Birr, died A.D. 765 (Ann. Tig.; Four Mast. A.D. 760; Ann. Ult. A.D. 764; Lanigan, Ch. Hist. Ir. iii. 192). [J. G.]

FOLCBERHT (1) An abbat who attests a grant of Offa to archbishop Jaenberht in 774 (Kemble, C. D. 121, 122); his name is attached also to questionable charters of the same king, granted to Worcester a little later (ib. nos. 145, 150).

(2) A priest of the diocese of Elmham, who attended the council of Clovesho in 803 (K. C. D. 1024; Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 547). [S.]

FOLCBURG, a nun of Bath, to whom, in conjunction with the abbess Bernguidi, Ethelmod, with the consent of king Ethelred of Mercia, gave land on the Cherwell. (K. C. D. 21.) [S.]

FOLCRED, a Mercian abbat, who attests an act recorded in the council of Cealchyth, probably belonging to the year 801 (Kemble, C. D. 116; Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 531). [S.]

FOLCWINUS (FOLCWINUS, WOLTWICUS), noticed in the Gallia Christiana (v. 742) among the abbats of Weissenburg on the Lauter in Alsace, and (ib. v. 663) among the bishops of Worms; he appears first as successor to Vernharus in the abbacy of Weissenburg and in the see of Worms in the year 766. He was buried in the nunnery of Mons Sti. Andreae, beside his predecessor Vernharus. [J. G.]

FOLLIANUS, martyr. [FAELAN.]

FOLRADUS, abbat. [FULRADUS.]

FONTEIANUS, bishop of Sagalassus, in Pisidia, present at the council of Chalcedon A.D. 451, signs the synodical letter of the council to Leo I. (Harduin, Concilia, ii. 369 n; Leo Mag. Ep. 98, 1106, Migne.) His name appears in the list of bishops signing the decrees of the council held at Rome in 503. The list, however, belongs certainly to some earlier council (Harduin, ii. 987 n; Baron. 503, ix.; Origins Christ. i. 1041.) [C. G.]

FONTEIUS (1), bishop of Vaison. He was bishop in 450, in which St. Leo wrote him a letter (Ep. 50), and also in 472, the first year of the episcopate of Sidonius Apollinarius, who addresses him, describing him as charming in manner, yet without injury to his priestly dignity. (Ep. vi. 7, comp. with vii. 4.) (Gall. Christ. i. 921; Ceillier, Aut. Sac. x. 390.)

[R. T. S.]

FONTEIUS (2), bishop of Feltre, one of the ten bishops who signed a letter to the emperor Maurice c. 591, which was sent by certain bishops of Venetia and Rhaetia II. (after they had held a synod of which we have no record) to justify their refusal to condemn the Three Chapters (Mansi, x. 466; Hefele, § 281). His name is also in the list of those bishops who are supposed to have held a synod in 579 under Elias, archbishop of Aquileia, concerning the translation of his see to Grado (Hefele, § 280; Mansi, ix. 926). This synod is probably fictitious. (Mansi, ix. 929; Chronica Patriarcharum Gradenensium in Mon. Rerum Langob. 1878, p. 393, and note by Waitz.)

[A. H. D. A.]

FORANNAN (FARANNAN, FARNAN, FORANDANUS, FORINNAIN). (1) Son of Aedh, commemorated Feb. 15. Colgan (Acta SS. 336-38) calls his father Quintus or Constans, descended from Niall of the Nine Hostages. While St. Forannan was preaching in Ireland, St. Columba went to Hy. When he returned, about A.D. 575, to heal the divisions of the church, a numerous assembly met together to welcome him. At that time St. Forannan is said to have received from St. Columba the church called at first All na fairgiona, and afterwards All-Farannan, now Alternan, parish of Easkey, in the north-west of the county of Sligo. There he lived in a cave. Colgan (Acta SS. Ind. Chron.) says he flourished A.D. 565. He is probably the original of Ferranus in the Scotch annals (Reeves, Culdees, Evid. D.). He is not to be confounded with Forannan, son of Ronan, bishop of Wassor-on-the-Meuse in the end of the 10th century, commemorated on April 30 (Colgan, Tr. Thaum. 463, cc. 51-6, 490 n. 46; Todd, St. Patrick, 33-5).

(2) Abbat of Clonard, commemorated Feb. 12. Colgan (Acta SS. 338 n. 2) has made the curious mistake of placing the death of this St. Forannan at A.D. 751, which is really (according to the Four Masters, whom Colgan usually follows) the year of the death of "S. Forannan, bishop of Meathas Truim," a place not yet identified [FORANNAN (4)] (Four Mast. by O'Donovan, i. 353). St. Forannan of Clonard died A.D. 745 (Ann. Tig.; Four Mast. A.D. 740; Ann. Ult. A.D. 744; O'Hanlon, Irish Saints, ii. 508).

(3) Abbat of Kildare, commemorated Jan. 15. In his list of the prelates of Kildare, Colgan (Tr. Thaum. 629, col. 1) attaches to this day the feast of St. Farannan, who was abbat of Kildare, and died in A.D. 697, according to the Annals of Ulster and of the Four Masters. He succeeded Loichene Meann, the Wise, in A.D. 697, but Colgan probably intends to identify him with the son of Aedh, whose feast is Feb. 15, as the Kalendar have no such name on Jan. 15 (Four Mast. by O'Donovan, i. 297, 299; O'Hanlon, Irish Saints, i. 219-20; Lanigan, Ch. Hist. Ir. iii. c. 19, § 4).

(4) Forandanus, bishop of Meathas Truim (Four Mast.) or Metuis tuirinn (Ann. Ult.), died

A.D. 756 (Ann. Tig.; Four Mast. A.D. 751; Ann. Ult. A.D. 755), but his place is unrecognised.

(5) Scribe and bishop of Trexit, now Trevet, co. Meath, died A.D. 774 (Ann. Ult. A.D. 773; Four Mast. A.D. 769). In Ann. Ult. he is called Forninnain.

[J. G.]

FORBFLAITH (FORBFLAIT), daughter of Connla, abbess of Clonbroney, near Granard, co. Longford, died A.D. 780 (Ann. Ult. A.D. 779; Four Mast. by O'Donovan, A.D. 775, i. 380, n. 2, 381).

[J. G.]

FORBHASACH (FORBASA, FORBASACH, FORBOSACH, FORBUSAICH). (1) Forbasa or Forbasaich, abbat of Rath-Aedha, now Rathhugh, in the barony of Moycashel, co. Westmeath, died A.D. 776 (Ann. Ult. A.D. 775; Four Mast. by O'Donovan, A.D. 771, i. 375).

(2) Forbhasach or Forbosach, son of Maeltoia, abbat of Roscommon, died A.D. 779 (Ann. Ult. A.D. 778; Four Mast. A.D. 774).

(3) Ua Cearnaigh, abbat of Clonmacnoise, and descended from the Ui-Bruin, died A.D. 771 (Ann. Ult. A.D. 770; Four Mast. A.D. 766).

[J. G.]

FORBIUS (FORTIUS), thirteenth bishop of Le Puy, succeeding Faustinus, and followed by Flavianus, in the latter part of the 6th century. (Gall. Christ. ii. 690.)

[S. A. B.]

FORCORON (FORCRONIUS), abbat of Clonmacnoise, in the barony of Garrycastle, King's County, died A.D. 686 (Ann. Tig.; Four Mast. A.D. 684).

[J. G.]

FORDRED. [FORTHERE, FORTHRED.]

FORMARIUS, a bishop of Cingulum (Cingoli) in the 6th century. It is uncertain whether he was the predecessor or the successor of Julianus, who held the see A.D. 544-559, and consequently whether he acceded c. A.D. 510 or 559. (Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Italia, vii. 454, 465.)

[R. S. G.]

FORMENIUS (FIRMIN, FIRMINUS, PARMENIUS), a legendary king of Thrace, who had abdicated his kingdom and retired as a hermit among the Alps, at the time that Dathi, son of Fiachra king of Erin, led his army as far as the Alps, and perished there by lightning in the beginning of the 5th century. Dathi's death is represented as a divine vengeance upon him for destroying St. Formenius's cell, with its round tower of sod and stones. This legend is given in the Book of Lecan, f. 302 b, and in the Leabhar na h-Uidhri, f. 35, p. b. col. a; it is also quoted at length in Mac Firbis's Genealogies, &c., of the Hy-Fiachrach (by O'Donovan, pp. 18-23), and referred to by O'Flaherty (Ogygia, ii. pt. iii. c. 87, p. 351); Keating calls him Parmenius. [J. G.]

FORMERIUS, martyr. [FERMERIUS.]

FORMINUS, bishop of Blera (Bieda), c. A.D. 649. He sat in the Lateran council held by Martin I. in that year. (Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Italia, vi. 180.)

[R. S. G.]

FORTCHERN (1), son of Fedlimidh, commemorated Feb. 17 and Oct. 11. Of this saint we have several ancient notices, though none of then actually taking the form of a Life. Colgan (Acta SS. 364-65) has a memoir; the Bollandists (Acta SS. Feb. tom. iii. 13-15) give a Commentarius Criticus, quoting mostly from Ussher, Joceline, and Evinus. Ussher (Eccl. Ant. c. 17, Wks. vi. 413-14) and Todd (St. Patrick, 257-62) quote extracts from Tirechan from the Book of Armagh (fol. 16 a b). St. Fortchern was son of Fedhlmaidh, son of Laeghaire king of Ireland, and his mother was Scotha, daughter of a British king. Under St. Patrick he laid aside all earthly pomp, became one of his "three smiths expert at shaping" (Four Mast. A.D. 448), and made bells, chalices, and other sacred vessels, in a place called Rath-aide. At his master Loman's urgent desire before death, he accepted the episcopal charge of the church at Athtruim, now Trim, in Meath, but held it only three days, and then, retiring into entire privacy, built the monastery of Roscrea. St. Finnian of Clonard is stated to have stayed with him thirty years before going over to Britain. He is venerated on different days at different places: at Killfortchern in Monaghan, in the present county of Carlow, on Oct. 11, and at Trim in Meath, along with other seventeen patrons, on Feb. 17, as a second dedication. (Mart. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, 273; Four Mast. by O'Donovan, i. 137 n. 1; Todd, St. Patrick, 150-51, 258-62; Lanigan, Eccl. Hist. Ir. i. 127-29; O'Hanlon, Irish Saints, ii. 558, 601-3.)

(2) Son of Deaga or Deagus, is classed among the ancient Irish writers, in company with Fiacca or Fiacc, Cennfaeladh, and Maelduire; some fragments of his writings remain in Bodl. Laud. 195, and Cod. Stow. iii. f. 7, vi. f. 4. Tigernach is said to have drawn his materials from him, and Cennfaeladh to have interpolated his poetry. Though some place him as far back as the days of Julius Caesar, he probably belonged to the 7th or 8th century. (O'Connor, Proleg. ii. 66 sq. and Apst. Nuncup. 63, 100.) [J. G.]

FORTHHERE (1) (FORTER), the second bishop of Sherborne (M. H. B. 620). He succeeded Aldhelm whose death occurred in 709, and was alive at the time when Bede completed his history (Bede, H. E. v. 18, 23); the venerable historian describes him as a man very learned in Holy Scripture. He ruled his diocese from 709 to 737, in which year he went with queen Frithogith of Wessex to Rome (Chr. S. M. H. B. 328), after which no more is heard of him. During this long time his name frequently appears in charters; in 712 as "famulus famulorum Dei," he was a benefactor to Glastonbury (Kemble, C. D. 63; Mon. Angl. i. 47); in 716 he attested the act of the council of Clovesho by which Wihtred's privilege was confirmed (Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 300); his name is attached to two doubtful grants of land to Glastonbury in 725 (K. C. D. 73, 74), and to a similar charter of Ethelheard dated in 729 (ib. 76). Glastonbury was locally within his diocese, and the fixity of his date was a great convenience to the forgers of these documents. A grant to Abingdon (ib. 81), which purports to have been signed by Forthere "in Banesinga villa," is scarcely more trustworthy. There is also a charter of the date of archbishop Nothelm, which is attested both by Forthere and by his successor Beorwald, a conjunction which, considering the circumstances of Forthere's resignation, raises a presumption in favour of its genuineness (K. C. D. 82). More interesting and undoubtedly trustworthy are the notices of Forthere which occur among the remains of St. Boniface; one of these is a letter of Brihtwald, archbishop of Canterbury, addressed to Forthere, in which he begs him to insist that Beorwald, abbat of Glastonbury, should release a captive girl, for whom her brother Eppa was ready to pay a ransom of 300 solidi (Ep. Bonif. ed. Würdtwein, No. 155; Mon. Moguntina, ed. Jaffé, pp. 48, 49). The other is a letter of bishop Daniel, of Winchester, to Forthere, recommending to him a newly ordained deacon, named Merwalh (ib. ed. Würdt. Ep. 148; Mon. Mog. p. 99). [S.]

FORTHHERE (2), a priest, by whom St. Boniface sent letters and presents to bishop Daniel of Winchester, 732-746 (Mon. Mogunt. ed. Jaffé, p. 161). [S.]

FORTHRED (1) (FORDRED, FORTHREDUS), a Northumbrian abbat, who is mentioned in a letter from pope Paul I. to Eadbert king of Northumbria, in A.D. 757 or 758. It appears from it that Eadbert had deprived Forthred of three monasteries, which had been given to him by a certain abbess, viz., Staninggrave, Cuchawalda, and Donaemuthe, and bestowed them on a person of the name of Moll, Forthred's brother. Forthred went to Rome to complain, and Paul writes to Eadbert (archbishop Egbert's name being also inserted in the letter) desiring him to make restitution. The places referred to are probably Stonegrave in Ryedale, co. York, where there are some very early remains, the neighbouring church of Coxwold, and Jarrow on the Tyne, which is situated at the mouth of a rivulet called the Don (cf. Symeon, Chron. 33, and n.). The letter is printed in Wilkins, i. 144, and in Haddan and Stubbs, i. 394-6.

It is improbable, from the difference in date, that this Forthred is identical with a Mercian abbat of the same name, who died A.D. 803 or 805 (cf. Haddan and Stubbs, ut supra), or with Forthred, a priest, to whom Alcuin, about the same time, gave a general letter of recommendation when he was setting out for Rome (Epp. ed. Jaffé, p. 894). [J. R.]

FORTHRED (2), Mercian abbat, whose death is noted in the Anglo-Saxon Chronicle under the year 803 (M. H. B. 341), to be corrected to 805. In the list of signatures to the act of Clovesho in 803 Forthred appears as a priest and abbat of the diocese of Leicester (Kemble, C. D. 1024). There is among Alcuin's letters (Mon. Alcuin. ed. Jaffé, p. 894) an epistle of commendation written in favour of a priest named Fordrad, who was going on pilgrimage; this possibly refers to the abbat. The earlier notice of an abbat, Forthred in Northumbria, can scarcely be referred to him. (See No. 2.) Forthred's name is attached to charters from 790 to 803 (K. C. D. 159, 161, 166, 170, 171, 172, 173, 175, 185, 1018, and 1020.) [S.]

FORTIS (1), ST., martyr and, according to a vague tradition, an early bishop of Bordeaux. Venantius Fortunatus, in a poem on Leontius, archbishop of the same diocese, tells him "tertius a decimo huic urbi antistes haberis" (Lib. i. cap. 15, Migne, Patr. Lat. lxxxiii. 78). As we have only eight names before that of Leontius, Gams notes (Ser. Episc. 519) that four must have been lost, and suggests St. Fortis as possibly one of them. It has also been conjectured that he followed Orientalis, the first archbishop (A.D. 314), and suffered martyrdom at the hands of the Arians under Constantius, but by others that he preceded Orientalis, and suffered under some one of the pagan emperors. His day of commemoration is May 16. (Boll. Acta SS. Mai. iii. 573.) He is not included in the list of the Gallia Christiana (tom. ii.). [S. A. B.]

FORTIS (2), a Donatist bishop mentioned in the history of the inquiry before Zenophilus. He endeavoured to reconcile Silvanus, Donatist bishop of Cirta, to Nundinarius, a deacon of the same church, who accused him of "tradition" and other crimes. He wrote letters to this effect to Silvanus, and to the clergy and elders of the church, and received one to the same effect from another bishop, Sabinus, imploring him, as a personal friend of Silvanus, to lose no time in effecting the reconciliation before the festival of Easter. (Mon. Vet. Don. iv. pp. 174-176, ed. Oberthür.) [NUNDINARIUS, SILVANUS.] [H. W. P.]

FORTIS (3), Donatist bishop of Cedia, in Numidia, who joined with others in an address to Primianus and other Donatist bishops, requesting them to undertake the management on their side of the controversy to be held at Carthage, A.D. 411. (Mon. Vet. Don. pp. 429-432, ed. Oberthür.) [H. W. P.]

FORTIS (4), bishop of Caputcula in Mauretania Caesariensis; banished by Hunneric, A.D. 484. (Victor. Vit. Notitia, 58 in Migne, Patr. Lat. lviii.; Morcelli, Africa Christ. i. 120.) [L. D.]

FORTIS (5), archbishop of Milan, 641 to 643, lived at Genoa, and probably died there, as did several of his predecessors, after the invasion of the Lombards. (Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Italia, xi. 132; Ughelli, Ital. Saec. iv. 67.) [A. H. D. A.]

FORTIS (6), bishop of Aga (Aggya) in the proconsular province of Africa, signed the letter of his province to Paul, patriarch of Constantinople, to warn him against the errors of the Monethelites, which he was favouring, A.D. 646. (Mansi, x. 942; Morcelli, Africa Christ. i. 71.) [L. D.]

FORTIUS, bishop of Le Puy. [FORBIUS.]

FORTUNA, martyr, Carth. A.D. 250. [ARISTO.] [E. W. B.]

FORTUNATA, Oct. 14, virgin and martyr at Caesarea in Palestine, under the proconsul Urbanus, in the Diocletian persecution. She suffered with Carponius Evaristus and Priscianus, her brothers. Her body is said to have been translated to Naples, out of the records of which church Baronius transferred her name to the Roman martyrology. He tells us that her relics were found at Naples, A.D. 1561, in the church of St. Gaudiosus. (Mart. Hieron.) Usuardus writes the name Fortunatus, and commemorates him as bishop of Tudertum. He also notes another of the same name on Oct. 15. [G. T. S.]

FORTUNATIANUS (1), bishop of Assurae in Afr. Procons. Lapsed (as a sacrificator; aras)

in Decian persecution; endeavoured to resume office without penance, though admissible even with penance only to lay communion. Pamelius, copied by Fell, calls him a Novatianist; plainly wrong. Cyprian (Ep. 65) insists on his being repelled, and counsels other lapsed against forming a sect round him. [EPICTETUS (3).] [E. W. B.]

FORTUNATIANUS (2), bishop of Aquileia in the middle of the 4th century; known to us chiefly through St. Jerome, who includes him in his catalogue of Viri Illustres (c. 97). He was born in Africa, but became bishop of Aquileia in the reign of Constantius. In 343 he was present at Sardica (Mansi, iii. 39). He was a man of considerable influence, and judged less hardly of the semi-Arian opinions than most of the Catholics. He persuaded Liberius, the bishop of Rome, who was ready to go into exile for his faith, that he might properly subscribe the formula of the council of Sirmium; and he even went so far as to consent to the condemnation passed upon Athanasius in the council of Milan (A.D. 355. See Ceillier, iii. 523). He wrote a commentary on the Gospels, divided into sections or chapters, in an abrupt, unpolished style. Jerome condemns him vehemently ("detestabilis habetur") for the advice given to Liberius; but in his earlier days, when in the desert, Jerome highly valued his commentary, which he begged Paulus of Concordia to send him in the year 374 (Ep. 10, ed. Vall.), calling it "a pearl from the Gospels, the word of the Lord which is tried as silver." [W. H. F.]

FORTUNATIANUS (3), bishop of Capua in the Byzacena, a town to be distinguished from the one of the same name in Numidia; present at the council held at Carthage by Gratian, A.D. 349: as his name occurs first among the Byzacene bishops he is supposed to have been primate of his province. (Mansi, iii. 153; Morcelli, Africa Christ. i. 119.) [L. D.]

FORTUNATIANUS (4), bishop of Sitta Veneria, an important town of Numidia, on a branch of the river Bagradas (Keff, Shaw, p. 95), perhaps the same person as the bearer of the letter to Paulinus (see No. 12). St. Augustine wrote a letter to him requesting him on his behalf to ask pardon of a bishop, not named, whom he thought that he had offended by some expressions in a letter concerning the seeing God in a merely human or physical sense. This Augustine declared to be impossible, for God is a spirit, and therefore not limited to time or space, but if his language had seemed to be in any way scornful or derisive, he desired to apologise. He proceeds to explain his meaning, viz., that God can only be seen on earth in a spiritual, or, to use his own expression, an invisible manner. He quotes on his own side Ambrose, Jerome, Athanasius, and Gregory Nazianzen, and shews that any other view of the question must savour of anthropomorphism. After the resurrection the human body will cease to be animal and become spiritual, but into any minute explanation of the matter he professes himself incompetent to enter, or to quote any authority on the point. "We know," he says, that we shall see God "as He is" (1 John iii. 2), and that He will be "all in all" (1 Cor. xv. 28), and that "without holiness no man can see" Him (Heb aff. 14), and with these assurances he ought to be content. The courtesy and true humility of Augustine are no less conspicuous in this letter than his soundness of judgment (Ep. 148). To this letter, as well as to a previous one addressed to Paulina on the same subject, Augustine alludes in Retract. ii. 41, Ep. 148.

Fortunatianus appears also as one of the Catholic managers at Carth. Conf. A.D. 411, and to have taken an active part therein, as a zealous and keen champion of the Catholic cause, and remorseless in his criticism of the Donatist tactics, e.g. in sending incompetent representatives, deacons and presbyters, in the place of absent bishops, and for creating unnecessary delay in the progress of the proceedings. He also requested the president that the court might be cleared of strangers, whose presence interrupted them. At times his zeal carried him into irrelevant questions and bitter wrangling with these opponents, and for these excesses he received from the president more than one calm and just rebuke. On the third day Petilianus attempted to raise a storm against Augustine by asking who had ordained him. This called up Fortunatianus, who asked what this enquiry had to do with the real question before the conference, and drew forth the dignified reply of Augustine already described (Vol. I. p. 894). (Mon. Vet. Don. pp. 288-552, ed. Oberthür.) The name of Fortunatianus, probably the same person, occurs in a letter to pope Innocent from the councils of Carthage and Milevis against Pelagianism, A.D. 46. (Aug. Ep. 175, 176.) [H. W. P.]

FORTUNATIANUS (5), bishop of Neapolis (Nabal, Shaw, p. 90), a seaport town on the east coast of proconsular Africa, present at Carth. Conf. A.D. 411. (Mon. Vet. Don. p. 404, ed. Oberthür.) [H. W. P.]

FORTUNATIANUS (6), Donatist bishop of Metae, a place in Numidia, present at Carth. Conf. A.D. 411. (Mon. Vet. Don. p. 404, ed. Oberthür.) [H. W. P.]

FORTUNATIANUS (7), Donatist bishop of Sememsalae, a place in proconsular Africa, present at Carth. Conf. A.D. 411. (Mon. Vet. Don. p. 451, ed. Oberthür.) [H. W. P.]

FORTUNATIANUS (8), Donatist bishop of Vensana, a place in Numidia, present at Carth. Conf. A.D. 411. (Mon. Vet. Don. p. 452, ed. Oberthür.) [H. W. P.]

FORTUNATIANUS (9), an African bishop, present at the synod of Hippo Regius concerning the appointment of Heraclius as successor to Augustine. (Aug. Ep. 213.) [H. W. P.]

FORTUNATIANUS (10), bishop of Aradia, a town in the proconsular province of Africa, which received its name from L. Aradius, the proconsul; one of the Catholic bishops summoned to Carthage for a conference with the Arians, A.D. 484, and subsequently banished to Corsica to cut wood for the royal fleet. (Notitia, Victor Vit. 55 in Migne, Patrol. Lat. lviii.; Morcelli, Africa Christ. i. 82.) [L. D.]

FORTUNATIANUS (11), the name of four African bishops, viz. of Cilium, of Leptis Minor on the shore of the lesser Tyrtis, of Tagarbala, all in Byzacena, and of Naracata in Numidia, banished to the deserts on the same occasion as the preceding. (Victor Vit. 57, 58; Morcelli, i. 140, 203, 239, 298.) [L. D.]

FORTUNATIANUS (12), a presbyter of Tagaste, by whom St. Augustine sent a letter to Paulinus and Therasia, some time between A.D. 394 and 410. (Aug. Ep. 80.) [H. W. P.]

FORTUNATIANUS (13), a heathen, yet advocate for his sister St. Victoria in the Diocletian persecution in Numidia. He tried to gain his sister off from death by suggesting that she was merely misled for a time, but she repudiated the evasive suggestion, and disavowed even his fraternal relationship except as he should keep the commandments of God. There is no notice of his conversion. (Baronius, Ann. Eccl. a. 303, lviii.; Boll. Acta SS. Feb. ii. 518, 519; Ruinart, Act. Sinc. Mart. 389. All authorities follow the Acta S. Saturnini et Soc. Mart. in Numidia. See also Ceillier, Auteurs sacrés, i. 21.) [J. G.]

FORTUNATUS (1), bishop of Thuccabor in Proc. Prov. of Africa, near Carthage. He attended all Cyprian's synods of which we have lists (his seniority identifying him), viz., Syn. Carth. 2 sub Cyp. de Pace, A.D. 252. (Ep. 57.) Syn. 4 de Basilide, A.D. 254. (Ep. 67.) Syn. 5 de Bap. 1, A.D. 255 (Ep. 70), and spoke seventeenth among the eighty-seven bishops of Syn. vii. de Bap. iii., possibly the same as (2) and (3). [E. W. B.]

FORTUNATUS (2), to whom Cyprian's De Exhortatione Martyris is addressed, is possibly the preceding. [E. W. B.]

FORTUNATUS (3), the colleague of Caldonius in the embassy to Rome (Cyp. Ep. 44 and 45). From the neighbourhood of the bishop of Thuccaboris (No. 1) to Carthage, and his frequent presence there, one may conjecture that he was this colleague. [E. W. B.]

FORTUNATUS (4), the African bishop mentioned in Cyp. Ep. 56, is more likely to have come from the neighbourhood of Capsa. [AHIMNIUS.] [E. W. B.]

FORTUNATUS (5). Though he is named in some lists as an early bishop of Aquileia, it appears doubtful whether there was any bishop of that or similar name before Fortunatianus, who was present, 343, at the synod of Sardica. [FORTUNATIANUS (2).] (Ughelli, Ital. Sacr. v. 31; Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Ital. viii. 24-27.) [R. S. G.]

FORTUNATUS (6), bishop of Caesarea, the metropolis of Mauretania Caesariensis, present at the council of Arles A.D. 314. His name is inserted among the Gallic bishops. (Mansi, ii. 477; Morcelli, Africa Christ. i. 114.) [L. D.]

FORTUNATUS (7), bishop of Dionysiana in the Byzacene province of Africa, present at the council held at Cabarsussum in the same province, which is mentioned several times by Augustine, where the Maximianists condemned Primian, the rival Donatist bishop of Carthage A.D. 393. (Mansi, iii. 847; Morcelli, Africa Christ. i. 151.) [L. D.]

FORTUNATUS (8), probably ninth bishop of Naples, c. A.D. 344. He is recognized as bishop of Naples in a circular addressed to him and many others by the Arian bishops assembled in the "pseudo-synod" of Philippopolis in 343. He seems to have died before A.D. 359. (Mansi, iii. 126; Ughelli, Ital. Sac. vi. 42.) [R. S. G.]

FORTUNATUS (9), the name of six bishops present at the Carthaginian conference of 411, viz. the bishop of Capse (Gafsa, Ant. Itin. 77, 7), an important town south of Numidia; of Undesita, or Bajesita in Numidia; of Abensa in proconsular Africa; of Casae Calaneae in Numidia; (Donatist) of Vesceria, a town of Mauretania Sitifensis; of Rusucurria, Rusucurro, or Rusucurrium (Dellia, Ant. Itin. 16, 4), a seaport town of Mauretania Caesariensis. (Mon. Vet. Don. pp. 399, 404, 405, 419, 421, ed. Oberthür.)

[H. W. P.]

FORTUNATUS (10), bishop of Cirta or Constantinia, chief town of Numidia, associated with St. Augustine on several occasions. He was present together with Alypius (var. lec. Absentius) and Augustine, when some of the clergy of Cirta put into their hands a letter, written no doubt by Petilian, Donatist bishop of Cirta, to his own clergy concerning the claims of Donatism. It was perhaps the same letter which a Donatist presbyter, at the command, he said, of an angel, placed in the hands of Generosus, a Christian gentleman, of whom we hear elsewhere as consular of Numidia. To this letter Augustine replied in his own name and in those of Alypius and Fortunatus. (Ep. 53; 1 Petil. i. 1, ii. 99-228; De Unico Bapt. xvi. 29.) It was to Fortunatus that Augustine wrote concerning Faventius. He appears also as one of the seven Catholic managers at Carth. Conf. A.D. 411, but took no prominent part in the proceedings, except to remark on the delays caused by the Donatists. (Mon. Vet. Don. pp. 288-470, ed. Oberthür; Tillemont, 126, vol. xiii. p. 328-329; Ceillier, ix. p. 390.) He also appears to have joined in a letter concerning Pelagianism, sent to pope Innocent by the council of Milevis, A.D. 416. (Aug. Epp. 53, 176.) [FAVENTIUS (1).]

[H. W. P.]

FORTUNATUS (11), bishop, to whom PRIMASIUS appears to have written three books (not extant) upon heresies. (Primasius, Opp. Prolog. ap. Migne, Patr. Lat. lxxviii. 407; Tillemont, Mém. Hist. Eccl. xxxiii. 54.)

[J. G.]

FORTUNATUS (12), bishop of Mozotcori in the Byzacene, banished by Hunneric A.D. 484. (Victor. Vit. Notitia, 58 in Migne, Patr. Lat. lviii.; Morcelli, Africa Christ. i. 233.) [L. D.]

FORTUNATUS (13), the name of four bishops, viz. of Anagni, of Foligno, of Value near Solmona in Abruzzo, and of Sessa (Suessa) in Campania, present at the 1st, 3rd, 4th, 5th, and 6th synods under pope Symmachus, from 499 to 504, according to the reckoning of Dahn (Die Könige der Germanen) who accepts, with a slight alteration, the arrangement of Hefele, § 220. (Mansi, viii. 234, 253, 268, 299, 315.)

[A. H. D. A.]

FORTUNATUS (14), bishop of Catania (Catana), c. A.D. 514. He was sent with Ennodius, bishop of Pavia, and others by pope Hormisdas on an embassy to the emperor Anastasius in the year 515. (Mansi, Concilia, viii. 389; Jaffé, Regesta Pontif. 65.) [R. S. G.]

FORTUNATUS (15), bishop of Putput (Pupit), in proconsular Africa, present at the council of Carthage A.D. 525. (Morcelli, Africa Christ. i. 258; Mansi, viii. 648.) [L. D.]

FORTUNATUS (16), bishop of Todi ("Tudertinae civitatis"), c. 528. His life and miracles are related by Gregory the Great. (Dial. i. 10, in Migne, lxxvii. 200-209; Acta Sanctorum, Boll. 14 Oct. vi. 520; Usuard. Mart.; Cappelletti, v. 218; Ughelli, Ital. Sac. i. 1351.) [FORTUNATA.]

[A. H. D. A.]

FORTUNATUS (17), VENANTIUS HONORIUS CLEMENTIANUS, bishop of Poitiers, and the last representative of Latin poetry in Gaul, was born about the year 530 at Ceneta, the modern Ceneda, in the neighbourhood of Tarvisium (Treviso). (Vit. Sanct. Martia. lib. iv. 668.) Nothing is known for certain of his family, but he seems to have resided at an early age at Aquileia, where he came under the influence of one Paulus, who was instrumental in his conversion. Paulus Diaconus (Hist. Longobard. lib. ii. 23) relates that he studied grammar, rhetoric, and poetry at Ravenna. Here he became almost blind, but was restored to sight by the oil of a lamp which burned at the altar of St. Martin of Tours in the church of St. Peter and St. John. In fulfilment of a vow made in gratitude for his recovery, he set out on a pilgrimage to the tomb of St. Martin of Tours about 565. He himself describes his journey in his principal poem, the Life of St. Martin. Quitting Italy, he crossed the Alps, and, passing into Austrasia, visited the court of king Siegbert, by whom he was hospitably entertained, and for whom he composed an epithalamium, on the occasion of his marriage with Brunehaut, couched in terms of extravagant flattery, which accord ill with the expressions of disgust levelled at the Northern barbarians in the dedication of his poems to Pope Gregory. Siegbert helped him on his way to Tours, and assigned him Sigouldus as a guide (Miscell. ix. 20). Euphronius was at this time bishop of Tours, with whom, on arriving at his destination, Fortunatus entered into a close friendship (Miscell. iii. 1-3). After fulfilling his vow he continued to travel in Gaul, receiving everywhere the admiration and sympathy of the best Gallo-Roman society, and employing his time in correspondence with his former hosts, or in the composition of those fugitive poems which form the staple of his works. The disturbed state of his native country, owing to the incursions of the Lombards, seems to have been the prime cause of his prolonged sojourn in Gaul, but an additional inducement was the society of Rhadegund of Poitiers, for whom he conceived a Platonic attachment, which the imaginative genius of Aug. Thierry (Récits mérovingiens, tom. ii. rec. vi.) has invested with a romantic interest hardly warranted by the generally heartless and sensual tone of the poet's writings. Rhadegund was the daughter of Bertharius, king of the Thuringians, who, having been espoused against her will to Lothair I., king of Neustria, had separated from him, and retired in 550 to Poitiers, where she founded the convent of St. Croix, more for purposes of literary than of religious mission, appointing her own domestic Agnes the first abbess. At what date Fortunatus visited Poitiers is uncertain, but it was no more than natural that a visitor of his literary eminence should find a welcome in the cultivated society of St. Croix, or have been induced to take up his residence as chaplain and almoner to the convent. Here he had abundant opportunity for indulging his literary and social tastes. Rhadegund, being in close relation with the most distinguished prelates of Gaul, not merely employed her poet-chaplain in correspondence with them, but despatched him from time to time on delicate missions, for which his courtly manners qualified him in no ordinary degree. In this way he became intimate with Gregory of Tours, Syagrius of Autun, Felix of Nantes, Germanus of Paris, Avitus of Clermont, and many others, to whom his poems are addressed. His leisure hours were employed in composing Lives of the Saints, Theological Treatises, and Hymns, among which latter are to be found the famous "Vexilla Regis," composed for a religious ceremony at Poitiers, and the "Pange Lingua," which, though generally ascribed to his pen, was more probably composed, as Sirmond has shewn (Sirmond in Notis ad Epist. Sidon. Apollin. lib. iii. ep. 4), by Claudianus Mamertus. After residing for some time at the convent of St. Croix, he was ordained priest, and, subsequently to the death of Rhadegund in 597, succeeded Pto in the bishopric of Poitiers; but this dignity he only attained shortly before his own death, at the commencement of the 7th century.

(1) Eleven Books of Miscellanies, chiefly in elegiac verse, being a collection of fugitive pieces upon a great variety of subjects, interesting for the light they occasionally throw upon the manners of the time, or upon the history of art (Miscell. lib. i. 12; lib. iii. 13), but from a literary point of view all but worthless. Among them are to be found two prose treatises of doubtful authenticity on the Lord's Prayer, and an epitomized version of the Aquileian creed of Rufinus.

(2) The Life of St. Martin of Tours in four books, consisting of 2245 hexameter lines. This was hastily composed in the space of two months, and is little more than a metrical version of Sulpicius's incomparably better prose. In the fourth book the saint is represented as presenting to the poet a pilgrimage to his own relics at Tours, to which fiction we owe the latter's description of his travels.

(3) An elegiac poem in three cantos, unless they are three distinct poems, written in the same character, and evidently under the inspiration of Rhadegund. The first, entitled "De Excidio Thuringiae," is dedicated to her cousin, Amalfred (or Hermanfred); the second is a panegyric of the emperor Justin II. and the empress Sophia, who had presented Rhadegund with a piece of the true cross; the third is addressed to Artachis, the young son of Amalfred, upon the death of his father.

(4) To these have been added in recent times (i.) a collection of 150 elegiac verses addressed to Rhadegund and Agnes, which was discovered by M. Guérard in the Royal Library at St. Germain, and published by him in the twelfth volume of his "Notices des Manuscrits." (ii.) A short epigram "Ad Theuchildem," brought to light by Mai in the Ambrosian Library at Milan, and first published in his Spicilegium.

(5) The Lives of Eleven Saints—St. Hilary of Poitiers, St. Germain of Paris, St. Aubin of Angers, St. Paternus of Avranches, St. Rhadegund of Poitiers, St. Amant of Rodez, St. Médard of Noyon, St. Remy of Rheims, St. Lubin of Chartres, St. Mauril of Angers, and St. Marcel of Paris—but the first book of the Life of St. Hilary and the lives of the three last-named saints are to be attributed in all probability to another name (see next article). To these must be added an account of the martyrdom at Paris (A.D. vii. Id. Octobr.) of St. Denys, St. Rusticus, and St. Eleutherius.

The following works of Fortunatus are lost:—

(1) The Life of St. Severinus (Greg. Turon. de Glor. Confess. c. 45).

(2) Hymns for all the festivals of the Christian year (Paul Diac. Gest. Langob. lib. ii. 23).

He is also said to have composed an Itinerary of his Travels, and a treatise upon the Art of Reigning addressed to Siegbert.

The poetry of Venantius Fortunatus represents the expiring effort of the Latin Muse in Gaul. Even the poet himself felt the decadence not merely of language, but of thought, which characterizes his verse:—

"Ast ego sensus inops . . .

Faecte gravis, sermone levis, ratione pigrescens,

Mente hebes, arte carens, usu rudis, ore nec expertus."

Wl. S. Martin. v. 26-28.

and it is difficult to dissent from the severe judgment he has passed upon himself. His style is pedantic, his taste bad, his grammar and prosody seldom correct for many lines together. Two of his longer poems, however, display a simplicity and pathos which are foreign to his usual style. One of these treats of the marriage of Galesuintha, sister of Brunehaut, with Chilperic; the other is the Elegy upon the Fall of Thuringia. For what is of real merit in these two pieces we are in all probability indebted to the genius of Rhadegund rather than to any sudden access of inspiration in the poet himself.

The first edition of the works of Fortunatus was published at Cagliari in 1573, but this contained only the hymns. The earliest edition which can lay claim to any completeness is that of the Jesuit Christopher Brower, published in 4to at Mainz in 1634. The best is that of Michael Angelo Luchi, 2 vols. 4to, Rome, 1786, which is reprinted in Migne's Patrologia, vol. lxxxviii., together with an appendix containing the discoveries of Guérard and Mai.

For the life of the poet the reader is referred to Luchi's edition; to Ceillier's Auteurs sacrés et ecclésiastiques, tom. xi. p. 402; Augustin Thierry, Récits mérovingiens, tom. ii. Recit. vi.; and Ampère, Hist. Lit. de la France, tom. ii. ch. 13.

[E. M. Y.]

FORTUNATUS (18), a bishop, see unknown, who has been confounded with Venantius Fortunatus bishop of Poitiers. He was born at Vercellae, migrated from Lombardy into Gaul, and became intimate with St. Germanus, who induced him to write the Life of St. Marcellus. He was in all probability the author of the first book of the Life of St. Hilary of Poitiers, and of three other lives of saints ascribed to his more distinguished namesake. He died at Celles, in the diocese of Sens, cir. A.D. 569. (Rivet, Hist. Lit. de la France, tom. iii. p. 298.) [E. M. Y.]

FORTUNATUS (19), bishop of Forlimpopoli (Forum Popilii), merged in the 14th century in the see of Bertinoro, c. 582. (Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Italia, ii. 440; Ughelli, Ital. Sacr. ii. 598.) [A. H. D. A.]

FORTUNATUS (20), bishop of Treviso c. 599. (Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Italia, x. 603.) For a long legend concerning bodies of saints brought from the east during his time see Ughelli, Ital. Sacr. v. 490-496. [A. H. D. A.]

FORTUNATUS (21), bishop of Naples, who received letters from Gregory I. concerning the redemption of slaves bought by Jewish negotiators. See lib. ix. indict. iii. Ep. 36, Migne, 270. He received also many other letters, e. g. lib. iii. indict. xi. Epist. 63; lib. ix. indict. ii. Epist. 75 and 103; lib. x. indict. iii. Epist. 24 and 25. (Migne, lxxvii. 660, 1009, 1026, 1082, and 1083.) In the last two letters he is blamed for neglecting his monasteries and for avarice. He was present at the synod of 595, about the service of the pope, the goods of the church, etc.; and at the synod of 601, which tended towards the independence of monasteries from episcopal control. These are two separate synods according to Hefele, § 288, § 289. According to Jaffé (Regesta Pont. p. 114) there was only one synod, and that in 595 (Mansi, ix. 1228, x. 488). [A. H. D. A.]

FORTUNATUS (22), bishop of Fano, receives a letter from Gregory the Great (lib. vii. ind. xv. ep. 13; Migne, lxxvii. 867), allowing a special sale of sacred vessels for the redemption of captives only. (Cf. Acta Sanct. Boll. June 8; ii. 106; Life, by John, of Nonantula, with no important information.) [A. H. D. A.]

FORTUNATUS (23), intruding metropolitan or patriarch of Grado c. 628. He stripped the churches, was repelled from Grado apparently, and fled to Cormons ("super civitatem Aquileiam miliario 15"), see Chronica Patr. Gradensium in Mon. Rerum Langob. 1878, p. 394. The schism between Grado and Aquileia was not yet closed. [EPIPHANIUS (24).] It seems possible, therefore, that, as he was unsound on the matter of the Three Chapters, he may have been a patriarch of Aquileia, endeavouring to obtain possession of Grado. An appeal was made by the bishops of Venetia and Istria in 628 to pope Honorius I., who wrote condemning and degrading Fortunatus, and recommending a new bishop. (Jaffé, Regest. Pont. ep. 1562, p. 157. See also Pertz, Monum. SS. vii. p. 45, for the chronicle of Grado; Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Italia, viii. 69.) [A. H. D. A.]

FORTUNATUS (24), bishop of Osimo (Auximum), present at the Lateran synod under pope Martin in 649, which condemned the Monothelite heresy. (Mansi, x. 866; Hefele, § 307.) He appears to be the first bishop of Auximum of certain date. (Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Italia, vii. 493.) [A. H. D. A.]

FORTUNATUS (25), bishop of Sarsina (now united to Bertinoro), 702-730. (Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Italia, ii. 488.) [A. H. D. A.]

FORTUNATUS (26), bishop of Pola, c. A.D. 806, succeeding Peter. (Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Italia, viii. 803.) [R. S. G.]

FORTUNATUS (27), bishop of Trieste in 788; translated to the patriarchate of Grado in 802, succeeding John (Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Italia, viii. 682). In 803 he received the pallium from pope Leo III. His life was an eventful one. The murderers of his predecessor suspected him, probably correctly, of intending to avenge his death, and forced him to fly from his see. He went to France to Charles the Great, to whom he accused his enemies of partisanship for the emperor of Constantinople. Charles sent him back with a charter of confirmation given in the third year of his empire. Meanwhile his office had been usurped by a deacon named John, and he appears to have fled again into France. However, in 818 he obtained from Louis the Pious a charter confirming him in the patriarchate. In 821 he was accused of favouring the designs of Liudevit, king of Pannonia, against Louis, and fled to Constantinople. There he remained three years, till 824, when he presented himself before Louis with other ambassadors from the emperor Michael. The king sent him to Rome to clear himself of the charge of treason before the pope, but he died soon after while still in France. He is described as a man of unbending spirit and distinguished virtue, and he is said to have conferred many benefits on his church, partly of his own munificence, partly by his influence with Charles the Great. His successor in the patriarchate was Venerius. (Ughel. Ital. Sac. v. 1180; Einhard, Annal. an. 803, 821, 824 in Pertz. i. p. 191, 208, 212; Bar. xiii. 802, x.; Pag. xiv. an. 821. xviii. an. 824. viii.)

Mabillon identifies him with the Fortunatus who, as abbat of Moyen Moutier (mon. Medaenense), disputed with his monks as to the distribution of the revenues of the monastery, to the administration of the whole of which he laid claim. Smaragdus, abbat of the monastery of St. Michael on the Meuse, was deputed by the king to arrange the quarrel, which he did on the terms of the monks receiving a portion of the revenues for their due sustenance and the abbat taking the rest. The quarrel broke out afresh in the time of Hismundus, his successor. (Frotharii Epist. iii. in Migne, Pat. Lat. cvi. 865; Mabillon, Annales, xxvi. n. 83; xxviii. n. 27; xxix. n. 64; tom. ii. pp. 340, 414, 491.) [S. A. B.]

FORTUNATUS (28), July 12, deacon of the church at Aquileia, and martyr there under Nero, with its bishop Hermagoras. [HERMAGORAS.] (Mart. Usuardi, Adonis.) [G. T. S.]

FORTUNATUS (29), April 23, deacon and martyr at Valence. [FELIX (203).] [G. T. S.]

FORTUNATUS (30)—Aug. 8. Martyr at Salerno in Italy with Caius and Anthea. They suffered under Maximian, A.D. 304, or thereabout, Leontius being proconsul. Their acts are extant, but in a very corrupt shape. (Mart. Rom. ed. Baron.; AA. SS. Boll. Aug. vi. 163-169.) [G. T. S.]

FORTUNATUS (31), Aug. 23, deacon of the church at Belgrade, and martyr there with other deacons, Donatus, and several others of the clergy in the Diocletian persecution under Victorinus, president of Mysia. (Ferrarius, Cat. E.) [G. T. S.]

FORTUNATUS (32), martyred with cruel tortures with his brother Felix [FELIX (207)], at Aquileia, in the reign of Diocletian; commemorated June 11. (Usuard. Mart.) [C. H.]

FORTUNATUS (33), martyred with Septimius, both of them readers, at Venusia, in the reign of Diocletian; commemorated Oct. 24. (Usuard. Mart.) [C. H.]

FORTUNATUS (34), Oct. 15, martyr at Beneventum, on the Aurelian Way (Mart. Rom. ed. Baron., Usuard.) at Capua with Lupilus (Ferrarius, Cat. E.) [G. T. S.]

FORTUNATUS (35), Jan. 9, martyr at Carthage with Vitalis and Revocatus (Mart. Rom. ed. Baron., Usuard., Wandalbert.); in Africa (Hieron.). [G. T. S.]

FORTUNATUS (36), Feb. 2, martyr at Beneventum with several others. A curious instance of the way in which the number of martyrs was increased by the mistake of transcribers occurs in connexion with this name. Canisius, in his edition of the Martyrologium Germanicum, reads: "Eodem diebus ipsi in urbe, triginta milia martyrum qui in persecutione Diocletiana cruciati sunt." Canisius copied from Galesinius who used a codex which read thus: "et xxxiii. milia," and which he took as "xxxm." Mart. Rom. seems to place their martyrdom on the Flaminian Way, at the 174th milestone from the city, a place now called Fossombrone. (Mart. Rom. ed. Baron., Hieron., Usuardi.) [G. T. S.]

FORTUNATUS (37), subdeacon of Carthage (Ep. Ep. 84.) [PHILUMENUS.] [E. W. B.]

FORTUNATUS (38), subdeacon of Carthage, bearer of Ep. 35 to Rome. (Cyp. Ep. 36.) [E. W. B.]

FORTUNATUS (39), presbyter of Carthage (Ep. Ep. 84.), one of the five who opposed the election of Cyprian (Cyp. Ep. 59), who subsequently became the pseudo-bishop of the lax party about Maximinus, on the question of the lapsed (Ep. Ep. 84.); consecrated by the excommunicated heretic Bishop Privatus of Lambaese. [CYPRIAN.] [E. W. B.]

FORTUNATUS (40), deacon of the church of Beneventum, and bearer of a letter from Gregory the Great, to Alypius governor of Cappadocia; in an accompanying letter St. Gregory very highly recommends his deacon's probity, and recommends him to the governor's good offices. (Greg. Naz. Ep. 84, in Migne, Patr. Gr. xxxvii. 45-7; Caillier, Auteurs sacrés, v. 254.) [J. G.]

FORTUNATUS (41), a Donatist presbyter, whom it was alleged at the council of Cabar-
don, A.D. 394, that Primianus had cast him into a sewer because he had baptized sick people. [PRIMIANUS.] (Aug. En. in Ps. 36, 20; Fd. Dom. p. 256, ed. Oberthür.) [H. W. P.]

FORTUNATUS (42), subdeacon, by whom pope Coelestine wrote to Patroclus bishop of Arles, A.D. 428. (Jaffé, Regest. Pontif.; Caillier, Aut. sacr. viii. 180.) [C. H.]

FORTUNATUS (43), abbat of the monastery of St. Laurentius and St. Zeno, at Cesena in Romagna. Gregory the Great writes to Marinianus, archbishop of Ravenna, desiring that he shall be restored to his monastery, if it be found that he has been unjustly deposed. (Greg. Magn. Epist. lib. xiv. indict. vii. epist. 6. Migne, lxxvii. 1308.) [A. H. D. A.]

FORTUNATUS (44), abbat of a monastery called "Balneum Ciceronis" ("aut Puteolia, aut in agro Tusculano"), gave to Gregory the Great some of the materials for his Dialogues. (Dial. lib. i. 4, 10; Migne, lxxvii. 165, 209.) [A. H. D. A.]

FORTUNATUS, deacons who were martyrs. See Nos. 28, 29, 31.

FORTUNATUS (45), one of the bearers of the letter of Clemens Romanus. [CLEMENS ROMANUS, I. 556, col. 2.] [G. S.]

FORTUNATUS (46), ANASTASIUS, prefect of the legion of Trajan, at the martyrdom of Marcellus the centurion, A.D. 298. (Ruinart, Acta Sinc. Mart. p. 303, 2nd ed.) [C. H.]

FORTUNATUS (47), a member of the Donatist congregation at Tacara, a town of Numidia, of which Verissimus was the bishop. (Mon. Vet. Don. p. 401, ed. Oberthür.) [H. W. P.]

FORTUNATUS (48), a Manichaean presbyter with whom Augustine held a public disputation, at the request of his fellow-citizens, Donatists, and others, in the baths of Sosius at Hippo, August 28, A.D. 392. (Possidius, Vit. Aug. in Aug. Op. i. 38, ed. Migne, Patrol.; Aug. Retract. ib. 611; Disp. contr. Fortunat. ib. viii. 111.)

Fortunatus had a numerous following at Hippo, but being worsted by his great antagonist, he was compelled to flee from the city. He was soon succeeded, however, by another presbyter who seems to have been Felix. (Aug. Ep. 79. u.s. ii. 272.) [FAUSTUS (34), FELIX (233).] [T. W. D.]

FORTUNIO, martyr, Carthage, A.D. 250. [ARISTO.] [E. W. B.]

FORTUNIUS (1), Donatist bishop of Tubursicus or Tubursica, a town of Numidia, with whom St. Augustine held a controversy c. A.D. 397, of which he gives an account in a letter to the Donatists, Eleusius, Glorius and Felix (Ep. 44). Partly in consequence of the tumult, partly because of the unwillingness of the reporters to do their duty, no proper report was made of the controversy. Augustine therefore transcribed from memory as much as he was able to report, and laid it before his correspondents. The arguments used by Fortunius to support the principle of his sect appear to have been—(1) its universality; (2) the divine command to eschew false prophets, and the false charge so often made and refuted of the "tradition" on the part of Felix of Aptunga; (3) the complicity of foreign churches in the cruelties of Macarius; (4) a letter said to have been addressed by the council of Sardica, A.D. 347, to the African bishops of the Donatist communion. To this Augustine replied by shewing the absence of authority to support this document, which was in truth of Arian origin. He also shewed that the Donatists were not the only persons who had suffered persecution, and that their having been exposed to it was no proof of their superior holiness. After shewing that evil persons are frequently tolerated by God, as for example the Traitor himself Judas Iscariot, Augustine enforced his favourite argument that on earth there must be toleration of evil until the time of final separation. When Fortunius eulogized Genethlius, a former bishop of Hippo, for his forbearance towards Donatists, Augustine remarked that on Donatist principles even he ought to have been rebaptized. After some further discussion, Augustine proposed that a conference should be held of ten persons on each side in some quiet place, and he undertook that all necessary documents should be forthcoming. (Aug. Ep. 44.) The name of Fortunius is mentioned as one of the bishops present at the council of Bagaia, A.D. 394, and it is very probable that this was the same person as the one mentioned above. (Aug. cont. Cresc. iii. 53, iv. 10.) [H. W. P.]

FORTUNIUS (2), a person unknown, who had married a woman, Ursa, probably before the wars of Alaric. She was carried off into captivity, and afterwards returned to find Fortunius married to another woman named Restituta. The question referred to pope Innocent was, which of the two was his wife. In his letter to Probus (Ep. 36, Migne, Patr. Lat. xx. 602), dated by Jaffé (Regesta, 26) between the years 402 and 417, Innocent decided, "fide Catholica suffragante," that Ursa, still alive and undivorced, was his only wife. (Ceillier, Auteurs sacrés, vii. 524.) [J. G.]

FORTUNIUS (3), bishop of Regia in Numidia, banished by Hunneric A.D. 484. (Victor. Vit. Notitia, 57 in Migne, Patrol. Lat. lviii.; Morcelli, Africa Christ. i. 260.) [L. D.]

FORTUNIUS (4), bishop of Eugubium (Gubbio), c. A.D. 603. He succeeded St. Gaudentius or, according to Ughelli, Gaudiosus. Cappelletti doubts whether there was a bishop of Gubbio of that name. (Ughelli, Ital. Sacr. i. 677; Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Ital. v. 380.) [R. S. G.]

FORTUNIUS (5), bishop of Cellae in the Byzacene province, a name common to several African towns, subscribed the letter of his province to Constantine the son of Heraclius, against the errors of the Monothelites A.D. 641, which was read at the first Lateran council. (Mansi, x. 927; Morcelli, Africa Christ. i. 134.) [L. D.]

FORTUNIUS (6), bishop of Ofita in the proconsular province of Africa, signed the letter of the synod of his province to Paul, patriarch of Constantinople, against the errors of the Monothelites, which he favoured, A.D. 646. This letter was read at the first Lateran council, 649. (Mansi, x. 940; Morcelli, Africa Christ. i. 250.) [L. D.]

scopate. Morcelli (Afr. Chr. iii. 365) makes his succession to Dominicus, after an interval, in 630, somewhat conjecturally. In 644 he is believed to have imbibed Monothelite opinions under the influence of Pyrrhus, who had then recently come as an exile into Africa and was a zealous proselytizer (Morcelli, 375). One of the speakers in the council of Constantinople, A.D. 680, remembered Fortunius having visited that capital and celebrated Mass in the church of St. Sophia during the patriarchate of Paulus (Mansi, xi. 594 e). This visit must have occurred before 648, when Paulus was deposed for Monothelitism. Morcelli (377) puts it in 646. His fraternizing with Paulus at Constantinople was regarded by his brethren in Africa as an open profession of heresy, and they seem to have construed his absence as a desertion of his church. A council was held without him in 646 at Carthage, the senior bishop, Gulosus of Pupa, presiding, and Monothelite doctrine was condemned. From that time Fortunius disappears, and Morcelli commences the episcopate of Victor. [T. W. D.]

FORTUNUS (also called FORTUNATUS), April 21, a martyr at Alexandria with Arator, a presbyter, Felix, and Vitalis. According to Mart. Hieron., Felix was son of Arator. In later martyrologies the ascetic views prevalent about clerical celibacy converted the word "filii" into "silvii," and another martyr was thus added to the list. (Mart. Hieron., Ussuardi, Adonia.) [G. T. S.]

FORTY MARTYRS, THE. The following groups occur under this title:—

(1) Forty soldiers, March 9, who suffered under Licinius, 320, at Sebaste in Armenia. A list of their names is given in the martyrology of Ado under March 11. For their various festivals see art. SEBASTE, FORTY MARTYRS OF, in the Dict. Chr. Antiq. They were young, brave, and noted for their services. The emperor having ordained that the military police of the cities should offer sacrifices, the governor called upon these forty to comply with the law. They refused, and withstood every attempt by bribe or threat to influence their resolve. Thereupon a new punishment was devised. They were immersed for a whole night in a frozen pond in the midst of the city, and, to render their sufferings the more acute, a hot bath was placed within their sight ready for any who might choose to avail themselves of it, their doing so however being the sign of apostasy. The trial was too great for one. He left the pond and flung himself into the bath, gaining, however, nothing thereby, for as soon as he touched the hot water he died. The number of forty was not however broken. The sentinel who watched the bath had a vision. He saw angels descend and distribute rewards to all who were in the pond save to the one unhappy apostate. The guard at once stripped off his clothing and took the vacant place in the pond. The next morning they were all taken in vehicles and flung into fires. There was one Melito, younger and more vigorous than the rest, whose resolution they thought they might possibly yet shake. His mother, however, who was present, with her own hands placed him in the executioner's cart, exhorting him thus: "Go, my son, finish this happy voyage with thy comrades, that thou mayst not be the last presented to God." Their relics were carefully preserved and carried to various cities, where many churches were built in their honour. The mother Emmelia, and the sister Macrina, of St. Basil obtained some for their monastery near the village of Annesi in Pontus, where already a church had been built in their honour (Greg. Nyss. Vit. S. Macrin.). Sozomen (H. E. ix. 2) tells a strange story about the adventures of another set of their relics. In addition to the authorities above quoted consult Pitra, Analect. Sacr. t. i. p. 599, in Spicileg. Solesmens. Their popularity throughout the entire East has ever been very great (cf. Dr. Zirecek, Geschichte der Bulgaren). In Burton's Unexplored Syria, App. ii., a church in their honour is noted at Huma, near Damascus; cf. also Melchior de Vogüé, Les Églises de la Terre Sainte, p. 367.

(2) Another set of Forty Martyrs in Persia, 375, is commemorated on May 20 (Assemani, Mart. Orient. i. 141). Among them were the bishops Abdas and Ebed-Jesu. [EBED-JESU.] Ceillier, iii. 82, 336; Bas. Menol.)

(3) Under Dec. 24 Forty Virgin Martyrs under the emperor Decius at Antioch in Syria are noted in Mart. Hieron., Adon., Usuard.

[G. T. S.]

FOSSONIUS (FOSSONUS, COSONIUS), fifth bishop of Vermandois, between Maximus and Aeternus, or Fraternus. The first eleven bishops of this see are mere names undated; the twelfth was living in A.D. 511. (Gall. Christ. ix. 979.)

[C. H.]

FOTAIDE is the name given in the Four Mast., A.D. 432, to the father of Calphran, father of St. Patrick, but he is usually called POTRUS in the Lives.

[J. G.]

FOTHAD, the canonist, receives special honour from the Irish annalists for his efforts on behalf of the clergy. He was a teacher at Armagh and abbat of Fathan Mura, now Fahan (Upper), in the barony of Inishowen West, co. Donegal; he had been tutor of Aedh Oirdnidhe, monarch of Erin A.D. 793-817, to whom on his accession he dedicated a Royal Precept or Rule of Government, a vigorous poem of seventy-two stanzas, still preserved in the Book of Leinster. He appears to have then, or some time after, been taken by Aedh into the number of his councillors. When Aedh assembled his forces consisting of clergy and laity, and led them into Leinster as far as Dun-Cuair (now Rathcore, a small village in the barony of Lower Moyfenrath, co. Meath,—Four Mast. i. 408 n. 4), a controversy arose between the king and northern clergy whom he had compelled to accompany him to the war, the case was referred by king and people to the decision of St. Fothad. The clergy objected to being called to the field at the will of the king, and when the dispute was submitted to St. Fothad at the suggestion of Conmach, bishop of Armagh, he decided in the metrical sentence or "canon" from which his name "na canoine" is said to have been derived, exempting the clergy from all compulsory military service. And this sentence, being acquiesced in by king Aedh, continued ever after to be the rule throughout Ireland. It was as follows (from the Four Masters, by O'Donovan, i. 409):

"The Church of the living God, let her alone, waste her not,

Let her right be apart, as best it ever was.

Every true monk, who is of a pure conscience,

For the Church to which it is due let him labour like every servant.

Every soldier from that out, who is without [religious] rule or obedience,

Is permitted to aid the great Aedh, son of Niall.

This is the true rule, neither more nor less:

Let every one serve in his vocation without murmur or complaint."

(O'Curry, Man. Cust. Anc. Irish, ii. 61, 95, 175-76; O'Conor, Rer. Hib. Scriptor. iv. 132, 202, and Epist. Nuncup. 65; Reeves, Adarnan, 255; Lanigan, Ecol. Hist. Ir. iii. c. 20, § 9.) This took place, according to the Four Mast., in A.D. 799, but more correctly in A.D. 804. His name, however, may have been based upon his acquaintance with canon law. In Colgan's Breve Chronicon (Tr. Thaum. 292) there is at A.D. 799 "S. Fothadus cognomento De Canonibus, Doctor et Scriptor Ardmachanus, Scriptis et Sanctimoniis claret." At A.D. 805 the Ann. Inisfall. have, as rendered by O'Conor (Rer. Hib. Scriptor. vol. ii. pt. ii. 26), "Fothad Othna, i. e. Fothad Canoine [Fothadius Monasterii Othnae, i. e. Fothadius Canonum Scriptor] quievit," but according to the calculation (ib. ii. pt. ii. § 7) this date should be A.D. 819, which agrees with the corrected date of the Ann. Ult. "An. 818. Fothad monasterii Othnae moritur." [J. G.]

FOTINIANI (Cod. Theod. XVI. v. 6, 65, v.) [PHOTINIANI.] [T. W. D.]

FOTINUS seems to be the Scotch ecclesiastical name of Pothinus, bishop and martyr at Lyons, A.D. 177. (Miller, Arbroath and its Abbey, 162, 167; View Dioc. Aberd. 255; Bp. Forbes, Kal. Scott. Saints, 351.) [J. G.]

FOTINUS (Ambros. de Fid. i. 1), heretic. [PHOTINUS.] [T. W. D.]

FOUR CROWNED MARTYRS, Severus, Severianus, Carpophorus, Victorinus, who suffered at Rome in the Diocletian persecution, and were commemorated on Nov. 8 (Mart. Adon., Us.). A martyrdom in their honour existed at Canterbury from the earliest times of the Augustinian mission (Bed. ii. 7). For an account of their festival and other particulars, see Dict. Chr. Ant. art. CORONATI QUATUOR. [C. H.]

FRAECH (FIRAICH, FRAICH, FREGIUS, FROECH, FROGIUS). Cruimther Fraech, i. e. priest Fraech, is commemorated, in the Irish Kalendars, at Dec. 20, as "of Cluain Collaing, in Muintir Eoluis," now Cloone, a parish in the baronies of Carrigallen and Mohill, the diocese of Ardagh, and the county of Leitrim. He was son of Carthagina, and of the race of Conma; son of Fergus, son of Ross, son of Rudhraighe (Colgan, Acta SS. 598, c. 3; Mart. Doneg., by Todd and Reeves, 843; Proc. Roy. Ir. Acad. vii. 142). He was maternal uncle of St. Berach (Feb. 15), of Cluain-cairpthe, and gave him baptism and the rudiments of education. [BERACH (2).] His exact date is not known, but he appears to have flourished about A.D. 570, and thus been contemporary with many well-known saints and founders of schools and monasteries, such as St. Columba, St. Kevin, St. Comgall, the Finnians, the Brendans, and St. Daigh (Colgan, Acta SS. 340, cc. 2-4, 345, c. 2, 346, nn. 2-3, 753, c. 17, 756 n. 10, and Tr. Thawn. 410, c. 8; Lanigan, Eccl. Hist. Ir. ii. c. 14, § 6). Etymologically, Fraech is the Irish for heath. (Joyce, Irish Names of Places, 2nd series, 99.) [J. G.]

FRAGITANUS, a priest of Cordova, unjustly deposed by the bishop of Cordova (probably Agapius) on his own authority only. The second synod of Seville, held A.D. 619 under the presidency of St. Isidore, ordered his restoration, and laid down the principle that no priest or deacon could be expelled from his office without the consent of a council. (Esp. Sagr. x. 233; Aguirre-Catalani, iii. 355.) [M. A. W.]

FRAID, FFRAID, the Welsh form of St. Bride. [BRIGIDA.] (Myo. Arch. ii. 42, 51; Welsh Saints, 189-90; Williams, Emin. Welsh, 156-57.) [J. G.]

FRAMBALDUS, FRAMBAUDUS (FRAUBALDUS), abbat of Senlis (Silvanectum) and confessor, perhaps belonging to the first half of the 6th century, is fully treated of by the Bollandists (Acta SS. 16 Aug. iii. 300-302) in a commentarius prefixed to Labbe's Elogium S. Frambaldi Abb. ex vet. Brev. Silvan. According to the Elogium he was born in Aquitaine, of noble parents; when a priest, he went to Le Mans (Cenomaunum) and retired with some brethren to a neighbouring wood. But regarding his life and acts there is the utmost uncertainty; to Ado, Usuardus, and even later martyrologists he was unknown. He was probably venerated at both Le Mans and Senlis, on Aug. 16 or 23. His relics are specially mentioned as having been preserved in the church of St. Frambaldus in Senlis. [J. G.]

FRAMBOLDUS, ST., fourteenth bishop of Bayeux, succeeding St. Gereboldus and followed by St. Hugo I. early in the 8th century. (Gall. Christ. xi. 350.) [S. A. B.]

FRAMECHILDIS, FRAMEHEUT, mother of St. Austreberta, and wife of the count Palatine Baderfridus (Bauffroy). Her legend is given in the Vita S. Austrebertae (Bolland. Acta SS. 10 Feb. ii. 419-23), and again critically presented by the Bollandists (ib. 17 Maii, vii. 800-2). She flourished under king Dagobert I. (A.D. 628-638), and is venerated at Montrenil in Picardy on May 17, or, as some less probably say, 27. [J. G.]

FRAMENGERUS, twenty-sixth bishop of Noyon, between Guarulfus and Hunuanus, said to have sat two years, and died A.D. 723. (Gall. Christ. ix. 985.) [S. A. B.]

FRANCILIO (GANCILIUS, VINCIUS), fourteenth bishop of Tours, following Leo, and succeeded by Injuriosus. He was a native of Poitiers, where his family was of senatorian rank. He had a wife, who was named Clara, but no family, and both were possessed of landed estates, the bulk of which they bestowed upon the church of St. Martin at Tours, the rest upon their relations. He held the see for two years and a half, dying A.D. 529. Gregory of Tours, who is the authority for all that is known of him, relates that on the night of the Feast of the Nativity ere he descended to observe the vigils, he bade his servant fetch him a draught, after swallowing which he immediately expired. Gregory infers that he was poisoned. He was buried in the church of St. Martin at Tours. (Greg. Tur. Hist. Franc. iii. 17, x. 31, § 14; Gall. Christ. xiv. 19.) [C. H.]

FRANCIO, metropolitan bishop of Philipopolis in Thrace, present at the council of Chalcedon 451, and appears among the bishops who subscribed the synodal letter of the council to Leo I. (Harduin, Concilia, ii. 367 c; Leo Mag. Ep. 98, 1104, Migne; Oriens Christ. i. 1157.) [C. G.]

FRANOLA (FRACLA, FRANDA), one of the three sisters of SS. Tressan, Gibrian, &c.; she went from Ireland to Gaul in perhaps the 5th century, but her acts are unknown. (Boll. Acta SS. 8 Maii ii. 298-9; O'Hanlon, Irish Saints, ii. 377.) [J. G.]

FRANCO, seventh bishop of Aix, succeeding Avulus, and followed by Pientius (fl. circ. A.D. 566). Gregory of Tours has the following story of him. Childeric, chief of the household of king Sigebert, claimed some of the church lands of Aix. The bishop appealed to the king, who decided against him, and fined him 300 pieces of gold for wrongfully withholding lands from the payment of taxes. Returning to his see, the bishop threw himself upon the tomb of St. Metrias, the confessor of Aix, and exclaimed with tears, "No lamp shall be kindled here, nor psalm chanted, most glorious saint, until thou hast revenged thy servants upon their enemies and restored to holy church the lands taken from her." So saying, he threw thorns upon the sepulchre, and as he went out fastened the doors and placed more thorns against them. Childeric was forthwith stricken with a fever, but his pride was not broken till his sickness had lasted a whole year, when he sent messengers to restore the lands, and to offer by way of restitution 600 pieces of gold. This done, he expired where he lay, and the church was revenged upon her foes. (Lib. de Glor. Confess. lxxi.; Gall. Christ. i. 301.) [S. A. B.]

FRANCO L, 23rd bishop of Le Mans, between Josephus and Franco II., born at Hasbain of noble Frank parents. In his youth he repaired to Charlemagne's court at Aix, and in 794 was appointed by him bishop of Le Mans. The influence he had won at court he employed for the aggrandisement of his see. In 796 he obtained a grant of privileges from the king in favour of his diocese (Bouquet, v. 766). In 802 he extended his jurisdiction over the monastery of St. Calais (Carilefus) by means of forged records, as was said, which deceived the king's chancellor (Bouquet, v. 766). In the same year he obtained decree for the payment of certain church dues. And finally in 814 he received a confirmatory charter for the privileges of the church of Le Mans from Louis the Pious (Bouquet, vi. 459). He died in 816 at a place then called Balian, one of the possessions of the see, but was buried in the church of St. Vincent at Le Mans, where an epitaph fixed the duration of his episcopate at twenty-two years. (Gall. Christ. xiv. 356.)

FRANCOLINUS, sixth bishop of Conserans, following St. Licerius. He subscribed the council of Narbonne, A.D. 788 or 791. His successors in the diocese are not known for nearly a hundred years. (Mansi, xiii. 823; Gall. Christ. i. 1127.)

[S. A. B.]

FRANTA, one of the obscure Suevian kings of Spain after the defeat of Rekiar in 456 by Theodoric II. of Toulouse. He appears to have been the head of certain Suevian districts, while Maldra was king in the north and west of Galicia. "Suevi in partes divisi pacem ambiunt Gallaeciarum, e quibus pars Frantanem, pars Maldram Regem appellant," says Idatius. Franta belongs, therefore, to a time of confusion between the death of Rekiar and the accession of Remismund to the undivided monarchy at Frumari's death, when the Suevi, split up into various parties, were making the best head they could against the allied Goths and Provincials. The period was ended in 460 by the death of Frumari and by the renewal of the alliance between the Suevi and Goths, which alone enabled the Suevi to keep down the provincials of Galicia. (Idatius, apud Esp. Sagr. iv.; Isid. Hist. Suevorum, id. vi.; Dahn, v. 565.)

[M. A. W.]

FRATER, bishop of Geneva, said to have attended the council of Milan, A.D. 347, and died 361. (Gall. Christ. xvi. 369.)

[R. T. S.]

FRATERNUS. The name occurs among the signatures to the epistle of the bishops of Gaul to Leo the Great, A.D. 451; and the lists of the see of Glandève identify him as bishop of that place (Gall. Christ. iii. 1236).

[R. T. S.]

FRATERNUS, bishop of Auxerre. Gams (Ser. Episc. 501) says he was consecrated Sept. 26, A.D. 448, and slain by the Huns in Sept. A.D. 451. This supposes him to have immediately succeeded St. Germanus, but Tillemont (Mém. xv. 26, 838, 839) while shewing that the chronology of the period is very difficult, thinks that Alodius succeeded St. Germanus, and that, after Alodius died in 482, there was a vacancy for ten years; then Fraternus was appointed, and his death took place at the hands of the barbarians on the day of his consecration. The Gallia Christiana (xii. 266) and many martyrologies say he was martyred, but the Bollandists do not state this. (Acta SS. 22 Sept. viii. 185-188; see also Jul. ii. 670, vii. 280.)

[J. G.]

FRATERNUS I. and II., bishops of Langres in the 4th or 5th century. (Gall. Christ. iv. 516.)

[R. T. S.]

FRAVITTA (FLAVITA, FLAVIANUS, PHRAVITTAS, or PHRAITAS), 23rd bishop of Constantinople A.D. 489, between Acacius and Euphemius. Evagrius, Theophanes, and Liberatus Diaconus are very short in their account of him; the principal authority is Nicephorus Callistus. He relates that on the death of Acacius, the emperor Zeno placed on the altar of the great church of Constantinople two sheets of paper. One was blank; the other contained a written supplication to Almighty God that He would deign to send an angel to inscribe on the blank sheet the name of him whom he wished to be raised to the patriarchal throne. A fast of forty days was proclaimed, and all were exhorted to pray earnestly for a favourable issue. The church was given into the custody of a confidential eunuch, the imperial chamberlain, and the imperial seal was set on the casket in which the papers lay. There was a presbyter named Fravitta in charge of the church of St. Thecla, in one of the suburbs of the city. He appears to have been a Goth; at any rate, at the beginning of the century, a Goth of that name was consul and commander-in-chief of the forces of the East. Fired with the ambition of leaping into so magnificent a position at one bound, he sounded the integrity of the eunuch. Finding him accessible to gold, he paid him large sums, and made him large promises on the understanding that he would write his name on the blank sheet, and seal up the casket afresh with the imperial signet. At the end of the forty days the casket was opened; the name of the presbyter of St. Thecla was found; the emperor and the religious world of Constantinople rejoiced at the Divine interposition; and amid universal acclamations Fravitta mounted the chair of Gregory Nazianzen and of Chrysostom. But his abominable wickedness was not to remain hid. Death spoilt his calculations; within four months he had breathed his last, and the powerful eunuch was pressing his executors for the promised gold. Unable and unwilling to discharge so scandalous a debt, they fled to the emperor, and revealed the odious tale. Zeno was at first dumb with amazement; but though Fravitta was dead, the fraudulent forger remained to expiate his crime: he was turned out of all his employments and driven from the city. Zeno, ashamed of his failure, entrusted the election of the new patriarch to the clergy.

Such is the account of Nicephorus Callistus. In the correspondence between Zeno, Fravitta, and pope Felix on the subject of the appointment no trace is to be found of such a story. The fact that the replies of the bishop of Rome extol the piety of his most glorious son the emperor, and exhibit delight that so holy a person Fravitta had been from his childhood chosen by God to fill the see, cannot be construed into an allusion to so remarkable a mode of episcopal election. It is true that Fravitta shewed peculiar anxiety to secure the acquiescence of the Western patriarch in his elevation, and refused to ascend the vacant throne without his acquiescence; but there would be reason enough for that in the uncertain character of the times, the former banishment of his patron Zeno, and his own recent obscurity.

To strict theologians Fravitta must have been a strange enigma; for at one and the same time he wrote letters to Peter Mongus asking for his communion, and the synodal to pope Felix begging his sanction and co-operation. To shew an earnest of good intentions, this document was carried to Rome with another from the emperor, by the catholic monks of Constantinople, who had always kept distinctly separate from Acacius the late patriarch, and his friend Mongus. The accompanying letter of Zeno demonstrated great affection for Fravitta; he had only laboured for his appointment, because he thought him worthy of the dignity; and to restore peace to the churches and unity to the faith.

Pope Felix was delighted with the letters, and had that of the emperor read aloud in presence of the deputation and of all the clergy of Rome, who repeatedly expressed loud approval. When the pope however wished the monks from Constantinople to engage for the rejection of the names of Acacius and Mongus from the diptychs, they replied that they had no instructions on the point. Felix therefore hastened to write to Zeno and Fravitta, disclaiming authority, but beseeching them as a matter of conscience. Before his letter reached Constantinople, Fravitta was no more.

Felix wrote also to Thalassius and other abbats of Constantinople forbidding them from communicating with their bishop until they should be authorized by the see of Rome. This was hardly in keeping with the disclaimers of the letters to Zeno and Fravitta. The joy of the pope, moderate as it must have been by this time, was altogether destroyed by the arrival at Rome of a copy of the letter which Fravitta had sent to Mongus. Directly contrary in tenor to that which Felix had received, this document actually denied all communion with Rome. The deputation of monks had not yet left for Constantinople, but the pope would not hear a word more from them. Whether Fravitta obtained his chair by the dishonourable means recorded by Nicephorus Callistus or not, he stands disgraced by this duplicity. (Niceph. Callist. xvi. 19. Pat. Graec. cxlvii. § 684, p. 152; Joann. Zonar. Annal. xiv. iii. Patr. Graec. cxxxiv. § 53, p. 1214; Liberat. Diac. Brev. xviii. Patr. Lat. lxviii. ; Felicis Pap. Epist. xii. and xiii. Patr. Lat. lviii. p. 971; Evagr. iii. 23. Patr. Graec. lxxxvi. part 2; Theoph. Chronogr. 114. Patr. Graec. cviii. p. 324.) [W. M. S.]

FREARDUS, recluse, near Nantes. (Usuardus, Mart. Aug. 1.) [J. G.]

FREDEBERTUS, twelfth bishop of Angoulême, succeeding Damatus or Tomianus, and followed by Launus I., in the middle of the 8th century. He is said to have obtained the concession of a charter from king Pippin. (Gall. Christ. ii. 982; Gams, Series Episc. 490.)

FREDEGAND (FRIDEGANDIS), commemorated July 17. He was one of the Irish missionaries who followed St. Fursey into Gaul, and he built his monastery upon the Sambre; it is now the monastery of St. Peter, and stands two miles from Namur. He was also held in special honour at Turvinum or Dorne, near Antwerp, as he is said by Miraeus to have died and been first buried there. (Colgan, Acta SS. 51 n. ¹, 96, c. 6, 292, c. 13, 299 n. ¹⁸; Lanigan, Eccl. Hist. Ir. ii. 462.) Dempster (Hist. Eccl. Gent. Scot. i. 281-2) has compiled a short notice of St. Fridegandis, mostly from continental sources, attributes to his pen Homilies de Sanctis, lib. i. and says he flourished about A.D. 600 or 656. (Tanner, Bibl. 298.) [J. G.]

FREDEGARIUS. The name assigned to a chronicler, whose chief claim to attention arises from his taking up the history of France and Burgundy at the point where it is left by St.

Gregory of Tours [GREGORIUS TURONENSIS], and continuing it to A.D. 641, with some incidental notice of events of his own time occurring as late as A.D. 656-658. The chronicler is distinguished from others of his name by the surname Scholasticus.

Authorities.—(1) His own work, for which see below; (2) Adrien de Valois, Gesta Francorum, lib. xv. Paris, 1646; (3) Fabricius, Bibliotheca mediae et infimae Aetatis. Discussions on this writer may also be found in the preface by Dom. Ruinart to his edition of Gregory of Tours and Frédégaire (Paris, 1699); in the notice prefixed by M. Guizot to his translation of Frédégaire, and in the article "Frédégaire," seemingly from the pen of M. Guadet, in the Nouvelle Biographie générale (Paris, Didot, 1856).

Life.—Of the career of this annalist we are wholly ignorant. Inasmuch as the only original portion of his writings is all but exclusively occupied with Burgundy, the very chronology being marked by the reigns of Burgundian kings, it is naturally inferred that he was an inhabitant of that realm. Adrien de Valois (better known by his Latinized title of A. Valesius) fixed upon Avenches as his birth-place, and maintained that he had found the name Fredegarius assigned to the chronicler in an ancient manuscript. The evidence for these statements seems but slight. D. Ruinart vainly sought the name, but as it had already been given to our author by Marquard Freher and Joseph Scaliger, it will probably be considered as his title for all time. As Fredegarius writes in the tone of a contemporary concerning events which occurred in the middle of the 7th century, we must assume that he flourished at that period.

Writings.—The editio princeps, published in 8vo. at Basle, in 1568, was printed as an appendix to the works of St. Gregory of Tours under the following title: Fredegarii scholastici Chronicon, quod ille, jubente Childebrando comite, Pipini regis patruo, scripsit. It consists of five books. The first three are a mere compilation from the works of Julius Africanus, St. Jerome, and the early Spanish chronicler, Ildatus. The fourth book is an abridgment of the first six books of the history of St. Gregory of Tours; while the fifth is an independent continuation of the work of Gregory. This fifth book is naturally the one which has attracted attention. Besides the Basle edition, that of Ruinart, and the translation by Guizot already named, may be mentioned the transcript in the Lyons Bibliotheca Patrum Maxima (tom. xi. pp. 815 et seqq.).

Frédégaire is strictly the chronicler as distinguished from the historian. He gives a dry summary of the invasions of Burgundy by barbarians, of inundations, of the death of a count by order of the king, without one word of regret at the national calamities, or any hint whether he regarded the death of the chieftain as a murder or a just punishment. He was probably a monk. Certainly his point of view, in the few passages where it is made manifest, is ecclesiastical. He naturally rejoices over the conversion of the Goths from Arianism; and relates with evident appreciation the boldness of St. Columbanus [COLUMBANUS] in bearing the wrath of Brunehild by his refusal to bless the illegitimate children of her son, king Thierry.

The above estimate will be found confirmed by Guizot (l.c.), who remarks on the downward course of the France of this period, and also by Sismondi in his Histoire des Français (tome i. chap. ix.). Sismondi, though not partial to St. Gregory of Tours, speaks feelingly of the descent experienced on turning from his works to those of this mere chronicler of events; but in turn evinces some gratitude, when he comes to a later generation, which had not even a Fredegarius to hand down its history. [J. G. C.]

FREDEGUNDIS, FREDEGUND, originally a slave of Chilperic I. (Gesta Reg. Fr. 31), became his wife by supplanting Audovera. Whilst Chilperic was absent on an expedition against the Saxons, Audovera brought forth a daughter. At Fredegund's instigation the daughter was baptized before the return of Chilperic, and Audovera was induced by Fredegund to hold the child at the font, thereby becoming godmother to her own daughter. Chilperic on his return discarded Audovera, compelling her to take the veil, and took Fredegund to his bed. (On the authenticity of this story v. Löbell, Gregor von Tours, i. 23, note.)

The position of Fredegund was little more than that of a concubine, one wife of many (cp. Löbell, pp. 21 sqq.); and in 567 Chilperic, in order to have a wife of equal station and rank to that of his brother Sigebert, married Brunchilde's elder sister, Galswintha, daughter of the Visigothic king Athanagild. Chilperic promised his father-in-law to discard his other wives. But before the year was out Fredegund recovered her influence. Quarrels arose between Fredegund and Galswintha; the unhappy Galswintha thought to be allowed to return home if she left her treasure behind. Chilperic dissimulated, and Fredegund had her rival foully murdered, and a few days afterwards was openly married to Chilperic (Fredegundim receptit in matrimonio, Greg. Turon. iv. 28).

The duty of revenging Galswintha's death devolved upon Sigebert, her sister's husband, and it would appear that he and his brother proceeded to take steps to depose Chilperic, but that an arrangement was arrived at by the intervention of Guntram, by which the wrath of Brunchilde and Sigebert was bought off by the presentation to Brunchilde of Galswintha's "morning-gift" of five Aquitanian cities. (Greg. ix. 20; see G. Richter, Annalen d. Deutschen Reichs, note, s. a. 567.)

Bloodthirsty though her contemporaries were (such as Goiswinda of Spain, Greg. v. 29, Austrechildis, Guntram's wife, ib. v. 36), Fredegund far exceeded them all. Her biography is simply a history of the murders she committed. She studied the art of assassination, and was no mean adept at it. See her address to the two clerks whom she employed in one of her attempts to murder Childebert. (Greg. viii. 29.) Having once begun the policy of getting rid of her enemies by assassination, she did not scruple to continue it to the end. She brought about the deaths of her stepsons Meroveus (v. 14, 19 a.f.) and Clovis (v. 40), she made more than one attempt on the lives of Brunchilde and Brunchilde's son Childebert (vii. 20, viii. 29, x. 18, also against Guntram viii. 43, 18), and an exceptionally horrible attempt with her own hand on her own daughter Rigunthis (ix. 34). According to the Gesta (c. 35) she caused her husband Chilperic to be murdered because inadvertently she had discovered to him her adulterous intercourse with Landerich. Löbell (p. 25, note) doubts the truth of this charge. Gregory has not alluded to it, nor does he ever mention Landerich. Compare, however, bk. vii. 7, where Childebert, in demanding the surrender of Fredegund, accuses her of this murder amongst others.

She crowned her wickedness in the eyes of her contemporaries by having Praetextatus, bishop of Rouen, who had given her mortal offence by blessing the marriage of Meroveus and Brunchilde, murdered before the altar, and by openly poisoning a Frank noble who protested against her wickedness (viii. 31, 41).

But her political assassinations were almost the least horrible that she committed. Her personal revenge was absolutely implacable. Once offended, she never rested satisfied with anything short of the blood of her victim. And her revenge was prompted by various motives, indignation at affront or false accusation, as in the case of Leudastes, towards whom she shewed the most calculating cold-blooded cruelty (v. 50, vi. 32); superstition, as in the case of Mummolus (vi. 35); and lastly, the frantic rage of disappointed passion or balked vengeance (vii. 20, v. 19). No wonder that Guntram, her brother-in-law, calls her "an enemy of God and man" (ix. 20); and Gregory adds "that she had no fear of God before her eyes" (vii. 15). Devoid of natural affection as she generally appeared to be (vi. 23, cp. vii. 7), even she felt remorse for her wicked deeds when she saw her children dying before her face. Seized, Gregory says, with a tardy repentance, she addressed her husband thus: "Long has the divine mercy suffered our evil deeds; we have been warned by fevers and by other ills, but we have not repented. And now we are to lose our children, now they die, slain by the tears of the poor, the wailing of the widow, the sighs of the orphan. We are bereft, and without hope, none remains to us for whom to hoard. Do not our cellars overflow with wine, our granaries with corn, our chests with gold, silver, and precious stones? And yet the dearest treasure we possess, that we lose. Come, let us burn these unjust taxation rolls, let us be content with the revenue that satisfied our father Clotaire." The king hesitated. "What!" she cried, "you shrink? Follow me. Even though we lose our beloved children we shall at least escape eternal punishment." Chilperic yielded, the rolls were burned, and the tax remitted (v. 35, cp. also x. 11).

That she really ruled rather than Chilperic, or that at any rate she was the moving spirit in much political action that was taken, is evident from what has already been narrated or referred to, especially from the stories of Praetextatus and Leudastes. Nor was she without vigour and resources in adversity as well as in prosperity. On the murder of her husband she was left with her infant son Clotaire, apparently defenceless and surrounded by implacable and unscrupulous enemies. She took refuge and sanctuary at Paris, and was astute enough to place herself for the moment under the protection of Guntram, the least dangerous of her enemies, escaping but only just escaping the vengeance of Childebert. "Let my lord come," she wrote, "and take the kingdom of his brother. I have a little child that I desire to place in his arms. For myself I submit to his rule" (vii. 4-6, 7). Subsequently she had to retire to Rueil (vii. 19), but even when her fortune was at its lowest ebb she still hoped to find an escape for herself by the murder of her foes (vii. 20). Later on her capital was at Tournai, and it was there that in order to maintain internal peace within her realm she caused three turbulent Frankish chiefs to be murdered at her table (x. 27). Apparently a rising took place, Fredegund was seized, and was to be delivered over to Childebert. She contrived, however, to raise a counter revolution within Childebert's kingdom in Champagne, and was herself rescued. Again she appealed to Guntram, and got him solemnly to preside at the baptism of Clotaire (x. 28). In 593 Guntram died, and Childebert became sole king of the Franks. Clotaire's kingdom and Fredegund's rule at this time appear to have embraced little more than the Frisian, Flemish, and Norman coast lands, the extreme north-west of Neustria (Bonnell, Anfänge d. karol. Hauses, p. 218). On Childebert's death, however, in 596, Fredegund seized Paris, Soissons, and other cities (Fred. 17) without warning or declaration of war (ritu barbaro), and ravaged the country around Soissons, defeating the forces of Theodebert and Theoderic at Lafaux (Fred. 17). A few months afterwards she died, in 597, and was buried in St. Germain-des-Prés, at Paris.

Even though she may not have been guilty of the murder of her husband, it is preposterous to attempt to exalt her in any way into a heroine. The eulogy upon her by Fortunatus (Carm. iv. 1) may have been prompted by flattery or fear. But apologies such as were made in the last century by M. Drex du Radier (Mémoires historiques etc. des Reines et Régentes de France, vol. i. Amsterdam, 1776), and in this century by Lûden, can only be maintained, as Löbell (pp. 342-4) has pointed out, at the expense of the authenticity of Gregory or of the character of the Frankish nation. Much relating to the history of Fredegund is to be found in Thierry's Écrits des Temps mérovingiens. [T. R. B.]

FREDERICUS. [FRIDERICUS.]

FREDESINDUS (FRIDESINDUS), the first bishop of Braga after the Moorish invasion, according to a document said to have been discovered in the Braga archives in 1589 by Fray Geronymo de Roman, who left a MS. history of the church of Braga, from which Flores extracts. The document, from Roman's account of it (Flores does not seem to have seen it himself or even a copy of it), purported to be a donation by Alfonso the Chaste of certain parts of the diocese of Braga together with Braga itself to the bishopric of Lugo in exchange for territory taken from Lugo and given to the new church of Oviedo. (The bishopric of Oviedo was founded 802-812, Gams, K. G. ii. 2, 348.) The deed, however, describes an unsuccessful attempt made by Alfonso I. the Catholic (737-757) to restore the see of Braga in the person of Fridesindus in the seventh year of his reign, about 744 therefore. The attempt failed, says the document, because of the wars and uncertainties of the time, and Braga is now handed over to Lugo. As far as Alfonso I. and Fridesindus are concerned, the fact is a priori possible. Braga was one of the first towns deserted by the invaders at the time of the Berber insurrection [ALFONSO I.], and Alfonso may well have cherished the thought of incorporating part of Galicia with the ancient metropolis and strong town of Braga, and may then have found his resources not equal to the task of re-population and defence against such straggling bands of Berbers as became the ancestors of the modern Maragatos, near Astorga and Leon [MARAGATOS]. But the ecclesiastical history of northern Spain in the 8th and 9th centuries, and indeed for a good deal later, is a chaos, through which, in the present state of information, it is almost impossible to see one's way, and these Oviedo and Lugo documents are specially suspicious. (Esp. Sagr. xv. 168.)

FREDIANUS, bishop of Lucca. [FRIDIAN.]

FREDOARIUS, bishop of Acci (Guedix) after the Moorish invasion, about A.D. 720, according to Isidore Pacensis, who praises him for learning and piety, together with URBAN and EVANTIUS. (Isid. Pac. apud Esp. Sagr. viii. 297.)

[M. A. W.]

FREGUS, a man of holy life, whom St. Kentigern found on his death-bed in old age at a place called Kernach, now Carnock, in the parish of St. Ninian's, Stirlingshire. After his pious death on the following day, his body was placed on a wain drawn by two untamed bulls, brought by them to Cathures, now Glasgow, to a cemetery which had been consecrated by St. Ninian, and there buried by St. Kentigern, who thus seems to have had Glasgow pointed out as his dwelling-place. (See the legend in Vita S. Kentigerni, c. 9; Bp. Forbes, Lives of SS. Nin. and Kent. xliii. 50-2, 178-9, 329; Skene, Celt. Scot. A. 184.)

[J. G.]

FREHELM, an abbat whose death is noted by Simeon of Durham (M. H. B. 663), under the year 764. His name occurs as a priest abbat in the Liber Vitae Dunelmensis, p. 6.

[S.]

FREOTHOMUND, an abbat in the diocese of Worcester, who attested the act of the council of Clovesho in 803. (Kemble, C. D. 1024; Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 546.) His name, under the form of Friomund, is likewise appended to a charter of 824. (C. D. 218.) His monastery was probably Westbury.

[S.]

FREOTHORED, a priest of the diocese of London, who attested the act of the council of Clovesho in 803. (Kemble, C. D. 1024; Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 546.)

[S.]

FREOTHUBERT, a priest of the diocese of Elmham who attested the act of the council of Clovesho in 803. (Kemble, C. D. 1024; Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 547.)

FRETELA, a learned man, living in Getica at the beginning of the 3rd century. He is known to us by the reply made by St. Jerome to a letter from him and his colleague Sunnius (Jerome, Ep. 106, ed. Vall.). It is not certain from Jerome's expressions what the condition of

His correspondents was. It might appear that they were, or had been, military men. Vallarsi in his note gives reason to think that they became bishops. [FRITILAS.] They were diligent students of Scripture, perhaps engaged in translating parts of it for the use of the northern tribes. Finding that in the psalter, of which they had Jerome's version made at Rome in 383, there were many things disagreeing with the LXX, they wrote to Jerome in the year 403, he living then at Bethlehem, to obtain an explanation of these differences. He replies at full length, going through the whole list of passages which they had sent him. He points out that the edition of the LXX called Kewh, which they and most persons used, was faulty, and differed in many ways from the other versions given by Origen in the Hexapla; and that, when Greek versions of the Old Testament differed, recourse must be had to the Hebrew. Jerome dwells also with delight on the evidence given by the letter of Fretela and Sunnas that even among the Getae were now found students of Scripture, and that, while Greece preferred to live on in ignorance, the hands of men of the north, which had grown callous by handling the bow, now turned the pages of the Scriptures. It is from these expressions that Ceillier and others have assumed that Fretela and Sunnas were soldiers. [W. H. F.]

FREYDO (FRAYDO, FRAIDO), ninth or tenth bishop of Spire, succeeding Basinus or Otho, at the end of the 8th or beginning of the 9th century. (Gall. Christ. v. 717.) [S. A. B.]

FRIARDUS, recluse, has his history given as a moral tale by St. Gregory of Tours (Vitae Patrum, c. 10, Patr. Lat. lxxi. 300, 1054 sq.). He was specially pious as a youth. In manhood he retired with an abbat Sabandus (or Baudus) and a deacon Secundellus, to an island called Vinduntum near Nantes, where he died and was buried. His death is said (ib.) to have taken place on Aug. 1, A.D. 576 or 577, but his feast was on Aug. 2. (Usuard. Mart. Aug. 1; Boll. Acta SS. 1 Aug. i. 56 sq.; Le Cointe, Ann. Eccl. Franc. ii. 188, Paris, 1666.) [J. G.]

FRICOREUS (FRICORAEUS, FRICOR, FRICORIUS, FRICORUS), also called HADRIANUS on the continent on account of the harshness of the Irish name to the foreign ear, was a close companion of St. Caidocus, the apostle of the Morini, and their work is undistinguished. [CAIDOCUS.] He is mentioned with Caidocus in Alcuin's Vita B. Richardi, c. 1, according to one reading (Alcuin, Opp. ii. 176, ed. Froben). Fricoreus became an inmate of the monastery of Centula, and was buried there about the middle of the 7th century. In the 10th his tomb was prepared by abbat Angilbert, and an inscription placed on it, like that on St. Caidocus. (Hartulfas, Cent. Chron. i. c. 6, iv. c. 33; Boll. Acta SS. 31 Mai. 262; Mabillon, Ann. Ben. A.D. 615, 627; D'Achery, Spic. t. v. p. 176, t. vi. p. 429; O'Connor, Epist. Nuncup. 149, 228-9.) [J. G.]

FRIDEGANDIS. [FREDEGAND.]

FRIDEGILS, priest. [FRITHEGILA.]

FRIDERICUS (FREDERICUS, FRETIRICUS, FRICDARIUS, FRICDERICUS), brother of Theodoric

II., king of the Visigoths, assisted Theodoric in the murder of their brother, Thorismond, in A.D. 452 or 453 (Idatius, Chron. A.D. 453; Dubos, Hist. Crit. i. l. ii. c. 19; Baronius, Ann. a. 451, li.). He complained to Hilary bishop of Rome, through a deacon named John of the irregular appointment of Hermes, A.D. 462, to the see of Narbonne, as related by St. Hilary in Ep. vii. to Leontius (Mansi, Conc. vii. 933-4; Migne, Pat. Lat. lviii. 24; Ceillier, Auteurs sacrés, x. 337). He fell in battle against Aegidius, the Roman commander, about A.D. 463. (Bouquet, Recueil des Hist. ii. 701, 704.) [J. G.]

FRIDERIUS, son of Felectus, Fava, or Phaeba, king of the Rugi, a Norican tribe. Felectus (see Vita S. Severini Noricorum Apostoli by Eugippius (Migne, Pat. Lat. lxii. 1167 sq.)) was a friend to St. Severinus, but his wife Gisa was a bitter enemy, and Fridericus their son, though anxiously warned by the saint before his death, became a violent oppressor, and a sacrilegious robber. He is said to have been murdered by another Frederic, his nephew. (Baronius, Ann. Eccl. 482, 487, 488.) [J. G.]

FRIDESINDUS, bishop of Braga. [FREDESINDUS.]

FRIDESWIDA, ST. (FREDESWINDA, FREDESWYTHA, FRÉVISE, FREVISE, FREWISSE, FRIDSWIDA, FRITHESWITHA), of Oxford. Her reputed period makes her just contemporary with Bede, her birth being placed cir. 650, and her death cir. 735; but she is not mentioned in Bede, nor does her name occur in the Monumenta Historica Britannica. Gosceline, who collected his early English memoirs just after the conquest, has none of Frideswide. Yet at the conquest neither her name nor her foundation had perished. She is named as having been buried at Oxford in the Anglo-Saxon catalogue of Saints printed in Hickey's Thesaurus (pt. iii. p. 120), and in the Oxfordshire Domesday the canons of St. Frideswide are mentioned. Her biography begins to be written in the twelfth century, to which period belongs a Bodleian manuscript life, noticed by Hardy (Dona. Cat. i. 462). William of Malmesbury too in that century gives an account of her in his Gesta Pontificum (p. 315, ed. Hamilton), and in his Gesta Regum (i. 297, ed. Hardy) he speaks of her monastery. His story of the saint has every appearance of a genuine tradition, being as vague and undecisive as might be expected under the circumstances. She was a king's daughter; she refused her hand to a king, and to escape his importunity fled to Oxford, the suitor being smitten with blindness in attempting to gain the town. There she founded a monastery, ruled it, died, and was buried, and when Malmesbury wrote her house was still existing, occupied by regular canons. Malmesbury died about 1142, and wrote therefore a little before the date of the earliest recorded Oxford professor, Vacarius. This legend therefore would have been written just when Oxford University was commencing its historic life; but the legend gives no hint of St. Frideswide being as yet connected with Oxford in any tutelary sense. In 1180 occurred St. Frideswide's translation, afterwards commemorated on Feb. 12. This is briefly recorded as an event in the chronicle of Wykes (Gule, ii. 22), but somewhat circumstantially described, though without a date, by prior Philip of St. Frideswide's, whose manuscript is placed by Hardy (i. 460) at about 1200. The translation was in this instance a removal of the relics from the obscure spot of their original interment in the church (on the site of the present Christ Church), to a conspicuous shrine in the same, and prior Philip's statement must be accepted as authentic, from his proximity to the event. The ceremony was evidently regarded as important. Wood understands from the prior's language that king Henry II. was present. The Bollandist questions this interpretation, and the language perhaps admits some room for question; but it is certain that Henry was at Oxford in Jan. 1180. At all events the king expressly sanctioned the proceedings, which were witnessed by the archbishop and several of the bishops and nobility. Wood states that it was from this date that St. Frideswide began to be regarded as the tutelary saint of the town and university, that her church became the mother church of both, and that a ceremonial procession of the municipal and academic bodies in common was made to it on certain stated occasions (see Wood, Annals of Oxford, ann. 1268). The significance of the event of 1180 will be appreciated when it is recollected that in 1187 or thereabouts is the first express mention, by Giraldus Cambrensis, of students coming to Oxford. The assemblage of prelates and nobles to create the festival of Feb. 12 would indicate that an effort was being made to promote the academic reputation of the place. It is, moreover, at this period, the reign of Henry II., that historians have seen the first revival of the English race and its commencing amalgamation with the Norman. It may have been a sign of this tendency, and a stimulant of it, that the English youth found a saint of their own ancient blood distinguished as their patroness when they flocked in to study under the shadow of the Norman castle. Henceforth, accordingly, St. Frideswide's tradition grows more definite. A fourteenth-century Lansdowne manuscript (Hardy, i. 462) names her father Didan, her mother Safrida; the suitor king is Algar, a Mercian; she dies and is buried at Thornbury, now Binsey, near Oxford, and her translation thence to Oxford takes place 400 years afterwards. In the fourteenth century again her story was told by John of Tynmouth, in whose roll of Anglo-Saxon saints she stands No. 122 (Smith, Catalogue of Cotton MSS. p. 29), and this memoir was adopted by Capgrave. Here likewise appear the names Didan, Safrida, Algar; but the burial and translation are placed at Oxford, as they also are in the traditions collected by Leland (Collect. vol. i. p. 342), who adds to our information, above eight centuries after the event, that the pious woman who taught Frideswide to be a saint was named Algiva.

On the whole, the defect of early mention in contrast with posterior and late celebrity need not create any suspicion against St. Frideswide. Her celebrity was factitious, but not her existence. It is in her favour that her principal commemoration day, Oct. 19, was that of her death, not that of her translation. It is also in her favour that through all the Danish period, when monastic history was blotted out of so many localities, Oxford was probably one of the safer parts of England, and Frideswide's foundation seems to have been nearly continuous as a religious house of some kind, so preserving a continuous and authentic memory of her. Malmesbury Abbey too, where William of Malmesbury wrote, was not a great distance off, and its history was nearly continuous from the heptarchy downwards, a circumstance which adds to the trustworthiness of its records, and this again is in her favour.

St. Frideswide had an office in the Sarum Breviary, and she occurs in our present calendar (Oct. 19), but only one church in England out of Oxford is known to have been dedicated in her name, that of Frilsham in Berkshire. In France she was the tutelary saint, as St. Frewisse, of Bomy in Artois. She also had her special offices in the Norman abbey of Fontenelle, out of the manuscript legendary of which house Mabillon has contributed to her published biographical literature. (Mab. Acta SS. O. S. B. iii. part i. p. 524.) Mr. J. H. Parker in his Calendar of the Anglican Church, gives an engraving of St. Frideswide from the Evangelistarium of cardinal Wolsey. It represents her carrying an abbatial staff, with an ox crouching at her feet.

The Acta SS. Boll. (Oct. viii. 560 sqq.) are very full on St. Frideswide, and print some of the MSS. noticed by Hardy. See also Mon. Angl. ii. 143. [C. H.]

FRIDIAN (FRIGDIAN, FRIGIDIAN, PHRIDIAN), of Lucca, commemorated Mar. 18. He is mentioned by Gregory the Great (Dial. iii. 9). For his Lucca episcopate see Ughelli, Ital. Sic. i. 794; Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Italia, xv. 497, 498. Regarding this person we have a difficulty in obtaining a clear representation. Colgan (Acta SS. 633 sq.), O'Conor (Rer. Hib. Script. iv. 124, 125) and Ware (Ir. Antiq. c. 26), wholly identify him with St. Finnian (Sept. 10) of Moville. [FINNIAN (2).] But Lanigan (Ecccl. Hist. Ir. ii. c. 10, § 6), Todd (St. Patrick, 102, n., and Book of Hymns, Fasc. i. 97 sq.), and Reeves (Ecccl. Ant. 151) are of opinion that Finnian and Fridian or Frigidian are entirely different persons, whose histories are mixed up together in medieval legend. The bishop of Lucca may probably have been an Irishman, and born like St. Finnian in the province of Ulster, but no account or explanation can be given of the confusion in the Acts. Colgan (ut supra) gives two lives of St. Fridian, which are allowed by him to be of late compilation and are of nearly the same contents. According to Colgan's First Life of St. Fridian, bishop of Lucca, taken from the office of the saint that was celebrated at Lucca, the blessed Fridian, "ut prius catholici tradiderunt," belonged to "Hibernia, an island of Scotia," and was educated from infancy in the love of Christ, and how to please Him. He was put under Mugentius, who was a bishop and taught him the liberal arts in a city called Candida. There Mugentius plotted against him, and fell in his own snare. Grieving over his enemy's death, he forsook his kindred and country (dimissa gente et patria sua), went into Hibernia, and took the religious habit at a place called Mactile. After performing many miracles on the quick and the dead, he left all and went to Italy. In Tuscany led an eremitic life, aiming always at perfection, and proving himself a truly faithful servant to Christ. At the urgent request of the clergy, and with the consent of the citizens, he became bishop of Lucca, where he laboured with great care and watchfulness for twenty-eight years, and built as many churches. But this First Life gives no account of his death or of leaving Lucca. Colgan's Second Life of St. Fridian, bishop of Lucca, and of the order of the Canons Regular of St. Augustine, taken from a MS. in the Chartreuse of Cologne, goes over almost the same ground as the first, but gives additional particulars at the beginning and the end. He was the son of the great king of Ulster, whose name was Ultach (but Capgrave thinks this a mistake, and would regard Ultach as not a proper name, but an appellative equivalent to "of Ulster;" Colgan, ut supra, pp. 641, n. 2, 649, c. 5, Append.). Refusing his father's proposals of marriage, and despising earthly honours, he set out for Rome, and was honourably received by pope Pelagius (apparently the first of that name, A.D. 555-60). He afterwards returned with many gifts and relics, put himself under Eugenius at Candida, left that place for the reason given above, and, forsaking his nation and country, took up his abode at Macbille in Hibernia. But he went again to Italy, and died bishop of Lucca, in Tuscany. His body lay buried in the basilica of St. Vincentius, till the time of Charles and Pepin, the most serene kings, when John, bishop of Lucca, had the remains removed and placed in a splendid shrine, with all pomp and ceremony. It is plain that in these two Lives we are in the main upon a purely Scotie track, and can easily follow the saint as he attends the famous schools at Candida Casa and Moville, and perhaps pays a visit to the Continent. But the difficulty is, at the same time, to identify Fridian with the founder of the school at Moville, and to give any reasonable account of St. Finnian's being made bishop of Lucca, or of St. Fridian's coming to have such a purely Irish history. Butler (Lives of the Saints, iii. pp. 252-53), in giving a short account of St. Fridian, says he was the eleventh bishop from St. Paulinus founder of the church, and that he died A.D. 578, which is the year in which the Ann. Ult. place the death of St. Finnian. But Ussher and Reeves say he flourished about A.D. 570, and Colgan places his death about the year 595. Tanner (Bibl. 299) refers to Liber de Canonibus and Canones B. Fridianus as works still extant, but erroneously attributed to St. Frigidian. (Bp. Forbes, Kal. Scot. Saints, 463-466 on "Wynnin," and SS. Nis. and Kent xlii.; Ussher, Eccl. Ant. c. 17, Wks. vi. 412, and Ind. Chron. A.D. 570; Lanigan, Eccl. Hist. Ir. ii. c. 10, § 6; Todd, St. Patrick, 102-5, and Book of Hymns, fasc. i. 98-100.) [J. G.]

FRIDOLIN (WINFRED), abbat of Seckingen, commemorated March 6. Of St. Fridolin, the Traveller, and abbat of Seckingen on the Rhine, we have a full account, from the Bollandists (Acta SS. Mart. 6 tom. 429-40), and Colgan (Acta SS. 479-93). Baring-Gould (Lives of the Saints, March 6, iii. 91 sq.) has a memoir, with references to the continental authorities.

Fridolin was Irish by birth, and of noble descent, but we know neither his family nor native place; some would represent him as the son of a Scoto-Irish king. In Ireland he was ordained and taught: he sought for a wider field in France, and became a member of St. Hilary's monastery at Poitiers, where he became abbat, and rebuilt the church of St. Hilary, a work in which he was assisted by king Clodonaenus, who was either Clovis I. (A.D. 481-511), the founder of the Frank monarchy, or Clovis III. (A.D. 691-695). After depositing part of the body of St. Hilary in its new tomb, he took the relics he had reserved for himself, and went as far as the banks of the Moselle, where he founded the monastery of Helera. He next built a church amid the Vosges mountains, which was called, from its dedication, Hilariacum, and afterwards known as the monastery of St. Nabor. Thence he went to Strasburg, and Coire in the Grisons, and finally settled at Seckingen on an island in the Rhine above Basle. In this neighbourhood there is a circle of churches dedicated to St. Hilary and St. Fridolin, which seems to attest the historical reality of his work as one of the pioneers of Christian enterprise. He was at first received at Seckingen with the utmost rudeness by the inhabitants, but obtaining a grant of the island from the king he built a church and a double monastery, according to the Celtic custom (first one part for males, and then one for females), which was endowed by Urso, a nobleman of Glarus, a town and canton in the east of Switzerland. There he died, and his feast is March 6, but the year and even century of his death are uncertain. [J. G.]

FRIDUINUS (FRIDUCINUS), addressed by Alcuin in Ep. ccxx. (Opp. i. 283, 284, ed. Froben), and congratulated on his appointment to the charge of a monastery, which is evidently in a declining state, as he is reminded that the restorer is equal in merit to the original founder. The letter contains most excellent advice as to purity of intention and faithfulness in work, but there is nothing distinctive of locality. Carmen cclxxxii. (ib. ii. 258), in elegiac verse, is addressed to Friducinus, and is full of beautiful moral maxims. Froben (ib. i. 285, ii. 258) supposes that the person under these two forms of name was abbat of the monasteries of Jarrow and Wearmouth, and was next after Eadbaldus. But Raine (Hist. and Ant. Durham, ii. 1 sq., 66 sq., Surt. Soc.) thinks that these monasteries at the close of the 8th century are in total obscurity. (Migne, Patr. Lat. c. 498, 499; ci. 846.) [J. G.]

FRIGDIAN. [FRIDIAN.]

FRIGNUALDUS (Kemble, Cod. Dip. 12, note, A.D. 676), bishop subscribing charter of Osric, king of the Hwiccas, the true reading being probably Ercennualdus. [ERKENWALD.] [C. H.]

FRIGYD, a nun of Hackness, who is mentioned by Bede (iv. 23) as receiving from the nun Begu an account of her vision at the death of St. Hilda. [S.]

FRISIUS, June 24, martyr, about A.D. 741, in the province of Aquitaine, celebrated for miracles upon epileptics. (Acta SS. Holl. Jun. iv. 818.) [G. T. S.]

FRISWIDE, abbess. [FRIDESWIDA.]

FRITHBERT, bishop. [FRITHOBERT.]

FRITHEGILS (FRIDEGILS), a priest of that northern monastery of which Ethelwulf wrote the metrical history. [ETHELWULF (2).] (Acta SS. O. S. B. saec. iv. pt. 2, p. 824; compare Lib. Vit. Dunelm. p. 34.) [S.]

FRITHEGITHA (FRITHOGITHA), the wife of Ethelheard, king of the West Saxons, 728-739. In the year 736 or 737, probably the latter, she renounced the world, and, accompanied by Forthere, bishop of Sherborne, went to Rome, where she probably died. (Chr. S. M. H. B. 328; Flor. Wig. 542; H. Hunt. 727.) Her name is associated with her husband's in a grant to Glastonbury, dated 729 (Kemble, C. D. 76; Mon. Angl. i. 58), and she is mentioned in the grant of Taunton to Winchester as especially urging Ethelheard to make the gift. (K. C. D. 1002.) [S.]

FRITHEWALD (FRIDWOLD), an ealdorman of Surrey, who assisted St. Earconwald in the foundation of the abbey of Chertsey. He is described as a dependent of Wulfhere, king of Mercia (Kemble, C. D. 986, 987), and is said to have married Wilburga, a daughter of Penda, and sister of Wulfhere, by whom he became father of St. Osyth. V. S. Osieth, ap. Surium, Oct. 7, f. 222; R. de Diceto i. 111, 115. The Chertsey Cartulary contains a charter of Frithewald, bestowing on Chertsey which he describes as founded first under king Egbert of Kent, 300 manentes on the banks of the Thames, and near the port of London. The charter is a fabrication of no authority, as is another granted by Frithewold and Earconwald together, to the same monastery (K. C. D. 986, 987), but the tradition which connects him with Chertsey is ancient and not inconsistent with probability. See Will. Malmesb. G. P. (ed. Hamilton), p. 143; Flor. Wig. M. H. B. 535; Mon. Angl. i. 422, 426. [S.]

FRITHOBERT (FREDBERT, FRIDENBERTUS, FRIOTHUBERT, FRITHEBRYHT) was consecrated bishop of Hexham, in the place of Acca, the friend of Wilfrid, on Sept. 8, A.D. 734 (Symeon, Chron. p. 12; Ric. of Hexham, p. 37.) In A.D. 740, during the disgrace of Cynwulf of Lindisfarne, he had the charge of that see for a year (Symeon, H. E. D. ii. 2.) There is little more known about him. He died on Dec. 23, A.D. 766 (Symeon, Chron. p. 22; Ric. of Hexham, p. 37; A. S. C.). At the translation of the remains of the saints of Hexham in A.D. 1154, Frithobert's bones were discovered, with an inscription on the coffer which contained them. (Memorials of Hexham, ed. Surtees Soc., pp. 199-200.) One of his teeth was among the relics at Durham. (Hist. Dun. Scr. Tres. app. p. 427.) [J. R.]

FRITHOWALD, a Mercian monk to whom, under the designation of "Monacho Winfridi Episcopi," a grant is made by Oshere, ealdorman of the Hwiccia, by the leave of Ethelred, king of Mercia. (Kemble, C. D. 17.) The charter is either corrupt or spurious. Bishop Winfrith had been deposed in 675, and might have been still alive, but the indiction given in the date does not agree with the year 680. [S.]

FRITHWALD (FREDWOLD, FRITHEWOLD, FRITHOWALDUS), succeeded Pecthelm as bishop of Candida Casa or Whithorn in A.D. 735 (Flor. Wigorn. i. 54). He died in A.D. 764 (Symeon, Chron. 22.) [J. R.]

FRITIGIL, a queen of the Marcomanni, at the end of the 4th century. She was so much impressed by what she heard of the Christian character of St. Ambrose, that she begged him to send her instruction in the Christian faith, and became a zealous believer. She travelled to Milan to see Ambrose, but arrived after his death. (Paulinus, Vita Ambrosii § 37.) [J. L. D.]

FRITILAS, bishop of Heraclea, and metropolitan of Thracia. His name is of Gothic derivation and he may have been possibly the Fritilas or Fretelas to whom Jerome wrote his 106th epistle. [FRETELA.] He attended the third general council at Ephesus, A.D. 431, but seceded and signed the protest against the condemnation of Nestorius. (Mansi, iv. 1269; Le Quien, Or. Christ. i. 1107.) [J. de S.]

FROARICUS, bishop of Porto (Portucale) from about A.D. 675 to 690, signs the acts of the third council of Braga, and of the twelfth, thirteenth, and fifteenth councils of Toledo. His absence from the fourteenth, which was somewhat hastily convened, immediately after the termination of the thirteenth, to meet the demands of some envoys from Rome [EUVIA, JULIAN], is easily explained by the distance of his see from Toledo. (Esp. Sagr. xxi. 30; Aguirre-Catalani, iv. 262, 270, 287, 313.) [M. A. W.]

FRODA, an abbat who attests the grant of Ini to Malmesbury dated May 26, 704. (Kemble, C. D. 50.) [S.]

FRODOBERTUS, abbat of the Monasterium Cellense, near Troyes. His life, written by a monk of his own monastery, or perhaps by Adso abbat of Montdidier, was published by Camuzat (Camusat, Prompt. Sac. Ant. Tric. Dioc. 1 sq. Trec. 1613); by the Bollandists (Acta SS. 8 Jan. i. 505); and by Mabillon (Acta SS. O. S. B. ii. 598).

He was born at Troyes and educated under Ragnegisilus the bishop (c. 650). After becoming a cleric he went to Luxeuil, and was there under abbat Walbert. After some years he returned to Troyes, and remained under bishop Bertold (a. 658). But burning to be free from the world and all human conversation, he chose out a fitting place for his purpose, and procured a grant of it from king Clovis, in a marsh which lay in a suburb of the city of Troyes. There building this monastery, frequently called Insula Germanica (also Insula Trecentis and L'Île), he formed a school which became famous, and died in the time of bishop Abbo (666-673). He was commemorated on Jan. 8. In the Life, he is said to have been a contemporary of the French kings Clovis son of Dagobert, and Clotaire his son, i.e. Clovis II. and Clotaire III. [J. G.]

FRODOMUNDUS (RODMUNDUS), twelfth bishop of Coutances, succeeding Hughbertus or Hilderic, and followed by Willebertus. He was the founder of a nunnery, dedicated to St. Mary, in his diocese, as appears from an inscription discovered in the 17th century, and given by Mabillon in his Annales ad an. 677, n. lxxvi. tom. i. p. 538. (Gall. Christ. xi. 866.) [S. A. B.]

FROILA (1), bishop of Mentesa. He signed the acts of the eighth council of Toledo, A.D. 653. (Flores, Esp. Sagr. vii. 360; Aguirre-Catalani, iii. 448; Massi, x. 1222.) [PARDUA.]

[M. A. W.]

FROILA (2), brother of Alfonso I. (the Catholic) king of Asturias. He is mentioned by Sebastian of Salamanca (Esp. Sagr. xiii. 481) as having shared in his brother's successful forays against the Moors, that is to say, according to Professor Dozy's most interesting explanation of this period from Arabic sources (Recherches, etc. i. 126), in his expeditions over that tract of deserted country lying between the mountainous districts of northern Galicia, Asturias, and Cantabria, and the frontier line of Coimbra, Coria, Talavera, Toledo, Guadalajara, Tudela and Pampeluna, upon which the Berber insurrection (l. c. p. 128) followed immediately by the great famine of 750-755, had obliged the invaders to fall back towards the middle of the 8th century. Alfonso's and Froila's expeditions, therefore, were not exactly victorious campaigns, as the Christian chroniclers represent them. Rather the two brothers seem to have explored the abandoned districts, to have put to death what Mussulmans remained, and to have carried back with them the Christians of the deserted towns, most of whom had embraced Mohammedanism under the rule of their conquerors (Dozy, l. c. from the Atbar Madjmona, fol. 75 r), but who now gladly returned to their old faith. (Omnes quoque Arabes occupatores supradictarum civitatum interficiens, Christianos secum ad patriam duxit (Alfonso). Seb. Sal. cap. 13.) Froila was the father of Aurelius and Veremundus (Bermudo I.), both of whom were among the successors of Alfonso I. (Seb. Sal. cap. 17, 20.)

[M. A. W.]

FROILA (3) I. (FRUELA), king of Asturias from 759 to 768, son of Alfonso the Catholic and of Pelayo's daughter Ermesinda.* He reigned eleven years with considerable success, both at home and abroad. Sebastian of Salamanca (circa 880) speaks of his many victories over "the Cordovan enemy, hostem Cordubensem," and especially mentions a battle at Pontumio, in Galicia (to the north-east of Tuy), where 54,000 infidels perished—"quingenta quatuor millia Chaldaeorum"—a number only to be outdone by the slaughter at Covadonga! The Mussulman general Haumar, son of Aderrahman Ibn Hiscan was taken prisoner, and put to death. On this defeat, the Mohammedan annalists, so far as Prof. Dozy's Recherches, vol. i., enable us to consult them, are silent, although Ibn Khaldoun (Dozy, l. c. p. 101) speaks of Froila's constantly increasing power, and of the recovery by him of certain important towns, in which last particular, however, he appears to confuse him with his father, Alfonso I. Later on a rebellion of the Basques, who had never acknowledged the authority of the Gothic kingdom for long together (Dahn, v. 199), and who were now a thorn in the side of the new state, was put down and punished. A certain young girl, by name Munia (q. v.), among the captives, attracted Froila's attention. He made her his wife, and she became the mother of his famous son, Alfonso the Chaste (Seb. Sal. cap. 16). Disturbances arising in Galicia, where the Suevi had never been wholly amalgamated (Wittiza was probably sent by Egica to Tuy in 698 for the purpose of keeping down a disaffected country), Froila devastated the whole district, not so effectually, however, as to prevent another rising some years later under his successor Silo (Seb. of Sal. cap. 16, 18). Apparently in the last year of his reign he murdered (propria manu, says Sebastian) his brother Vimaranus, "ob invidiam Regni," according to the Chron. Albeld., while Sebastian is altogether silent as to the cause. The murder, if political, was not successful. In vain did Froila, according to the 13th-century chronicles, adopt his brother's son Veremundus (Rod. Tol. iv. 6). The party of the murdered man was not to be conciliated, and Froila speedily paid the penalty of his act, "non post multum temporis talionem juste accipiens a suis interfectus est" (Seb. Sal. l. c.). He was buried with his wife, Munia, at Ovetum.

Froila appears to have left an impression of harshness and cruelty upon his generation, which has descended into all subsequent accounts of his reign. "Victorias egit," says the unknown author of the Chron. Albeld., "sed asper moribus fuit. . . . ob feritatem mentis in Canicas interfectus est." The monk of Silos (about 1100) repeats the charge of harshness, without, however mentioning the murder of Vimaranus. He is bent upon adding to most of the particulars already chronicled the fact or tradition that Froila checked the marriage of the clergy which had prevailed under Wittiza. "Iste imposuit finem illi nequissimo scelere quod Wittiza rex inter Christicolae sacrosancto altario ministrantes misere seminaverat, scilicet ne Christi sacerdotes carnalia corjugia ulterius sortirentur." (For an account of the growth and intentions of the clerical tradition respecting Wittiza, see art. under his name.) Rod. of Toledo, d. 1249, incorporates all previous accounts and adds a wholly new detail about Froila, which, if trustworthy, is the most important fact in the internal history of his reign. "He peopled Ovetum," says the archbishop, "and built there the cathedral church," i.e. the church of San Salvador.

As far as chronicles are concerned, we have here the first appearance of this statement, in this form at least. Lucas of Tuy's earlier statement, "iste episcopatum in Ovetum transtulit a Lucensi civitate," based upon the acts of the so-called council of Oviedo in the Cod. Ovet., must not, however, be overlooked. (Hisp. Ill. iv. 73.) Roderic of Toledo, whose historical work is of a high order for his time, spoke on the authority of the Oviedo archives, which, in the first half of the 12th century, had been overhauled, compiled, and to a large extent falsified by Pelayo, bishop of Oviedo, from 1101-1129.^b

* One of the documents included in the Chron. Albeld. makes him the brother of Alfonso I. This is a confusion, however, with the real brother Froila (No. 2).

^b The famous Codex Ovetensis, some part of which, at any rate, was written by bishop Pelayo's own hand, and

It appears, indeed, upon examination that Froila's connexion with Oviedo (beyond the mention of his burial there by Sebastian of Salamanca) rests upon a privilege granted by Alfonso the Chaste to the church of St. Salvador at Oviedo, in confirmation of his father's will, in which Froila is spoken of as having built and endowed the churches of the Saviour and of SS. Julian and Basilissa (Exp. Sigr. xxxviii.; Mariana, ed. Valencia, 1787, iii. 511), and upon an inscription in the church of the Saviour not now existing, but which was copied and described by Pelayo of Oviedo in the Cod. Ovet. before 1129. (Hubner, Inscr. Hisp. Christ. No. *93.) Both document and inscription speak of a destruction and rebuilding of Froila's churches. "Noscito," says the first stone of the inscription, "hic ante istum fuisse alterum, hoc eodem ordine situm quod princeps condidit salvatori domino supplex per omnia Froila," &c. The second stone speaks of the destruction of the older church by the pagans, "a gentilibus decretum sordibusque contaminatum," and of its restoration by Alfonso. The inscription is thus in complete agreement with the donation in which Alfonso, on the occasion of the "recuperationem domus tue" (the donation is addressed to Christ in the curious rhymed prose of the time, see art. ISIDORUS PACENSIS), confirms all that had been granted by his father to the older church.

Very much might be written on the subject of these two sources, which, if genuine, are the earliest certain records of the second kingdom. Hubner has placed the inscription among the falsae vel suspectae, no doubt on account of its connexion with the too well-known Pelayo of Oviedo. Professor Dozy, however, has been able to bring forward from the Arabic side what appears a very strong confirmation of the genuineness of both these sources. For his description of the campaign of Hicham I. against the Asturian kingdom, in 794, during the reign of Alfonso the Chaste, of the capture of the capital (which can be no other than Oviedo) and of the destruction of the churches of the royal residence, which is expressly mentioned by the Arabic annalist Nowairi, see his Recherches, l. c. vol. i. p. 145. Both the capture of the capital and the destruction of the churches are passed over in complete silence by the Christian chroniclers, who otherwise describe the campaign. The Oviedo inscription, if genuine, would thus furnish our only knowledge of the fact, from the Christian side. In all probability, then, Froila built two churches at Oviedo, and occasionally all of which was compiled under his superintendence, plays an important and often misleading part in Spanish history. It contained all the older chronicles known to Pelayo, interpolated by him, as far as the post-conquest history is concerned in the interests of the see of Oviedo, the famous division of bishoprics attributed to Wamba, in its present shape at least, an exploded forgery, many documents relating to Oviedo, &c. In Morales' time it was still in the Cathedral Library of Oviedo. Risco, however, sought for it there in vain at the end of the last century, and there seems to be little doubt that it had disappeared like so many others of the famous Oviedo MSS. Luckily, Morales took an admirable copy of it, which is now in the Madrid Library, and other copies are known. (For Morales's full description of it, extracted from the Viage Santo; see Exp. Sigr. xxxviii.; see also preface to Kuzietz's Formules Visigothiques.)

lived there (in the privilege above quoted Alfonso speaks of having been born and baptized at Oviedo, "quo solo natus, locoque renatus extiti"), though it was not made the capital of the new state, until the reign of his son.

At his death he was buried in the church he himself had built, as his uncle Fafila had been before him, in the church of Santa Cruz. Then in 794 and 795 came the storm of the Moorish invasion, and Froila's churches were either partially or wholly destroyed. (The foundation of what is still existing of Alfonso's buildings in the cathedral may very well be Froila's work. If this is so, Froila's reign marks an important stage in the history of the infant kingdom. The first period, when the refugees as mere mountain guerrilleros maintained a precarious independence under a warlike chief, is past. The reign of Alfonso the Catholic, and the backward rush of the wave of invasion which marked it, had changed all this. When Froila succeeds his father a belt of uninhabited country divides the Christian from the Mohammedan state, and the Mohammedan frontier line, which under Pelayo touched Leon, runs now between Pamplona and Coimbra. Sheltered behind the deserted plateaux of Castille as well as by their own mountains, the refugees of Pelayo's time begin to develop a settled polity, threatened, however, on the one side by the Suevian population of Galicia, and on the other by the turbulent Basques. The move inland from Pravia and Cangas to the site of Oviedo, with its splendid natural capabilities both for defence and cultivation, made by Froila, opens a new time and prepares the way for the more definite steps taken by his son, under whom the kings of Asturias become kings of Oviedo, to remain such till the next forward move is made to Leon, and by whom "all things were ordered at Oviedo as they had been ordered at Toledo, both in the church and in the palace." (Chron. Alheid. ap. Exp. Sigr. xiii. 452.) [For the supposed first foundation of Oviedo itself in the fourth year of Froila by the priest Maximus and his uncle, the abbat Fromistan, see FROMISTAN.]

[M. A. W.]

FROILUBA, the queen of Fafila, Pelayo's son and successor in the kingdom of Asturias. She was buried with him in the church of Santa Cruz, near Cangas de Onís (Seb. Sal. cap. 12), and her name appears in the well-known inscription still existing there. [FAFILA (2).] At various places in the Asturias, stones are found roughly engraved with the story of Fafila's fatal encounter with the bear, and in these Froiluba appears as holding back, or saying farewell to her husband. Sandoval (Historia de los Cinco Obispos p. 91) and Florez, Reynas de España, i. 35, describe the most famous of these stones, inserted in the doorway of the church of San Pedro de Villanueva, and which tradition supposes to have been placed there by Alfonso I. the Catholic, and Ermesinda, Fafila's sister, in memory of his tragic death. The Rev. H. F. Tozer describes another ancient stone-carving of the same subject of Fafila and his wife at Santa Maria de Villamayor. (Genl. Mag. August, 1865.)

[M. A. W.]

FROISCLUS (FRUISCLUS), an Arian, was made bishop of Tortosa in the reign of his Catholic predecessor Julian [JULIANUS] by the Arian king Leovigild. In 589, however, under Leovigild's converted successor, Recared, Froisclus, with the other Arian bishops, attended the famous third council of Toledo and renounced his heresy in the following form: "Fruisclus in Christi nomine civitatis Dertosanae episcopus anathematizans haeresis Arrianae dogmata superius damnata, fidem hanc sanctam catholicam quam in Ecclesiam Catholicam veniens credidi manu mea de toto corde subscripsi."

After the renunciation of the Arian bishops the council proceeded to its work, and among the signatures to its decrees are found those of the two bishops of Huesca, Julian, and Froisclus (five other pairs of bishops appear among the subscriptions). Julian signs first, as bishop of Tortosa; "Froisclus item ibi episcopus," follows. In the year 599 Julian and Froisclus appeared at the council of Barcelona, and both signed as bishops of Tortosa, the signatures of Calahorra and Ampurias intervening. It is not known which survived the other. (Esp. Sagr. xlii. 81; Aguirre-Catalani, iii. 238.) [URSUA.]

[M. A. W.]

FROMISTAN, first abbat of the monastery of St. Vincent at Oviedo, and first discoverer of the site of Oviedo itself, according to a certain document, which in Morales' time (Viage Santo, 1792, p. 129), was shewn in the library of the monastery. (For the text, see Esp. Sagr. xxxvii. Append.) It is an agreement between twenty-five persons whose names are given, headed by Montanus presbyter, and the abbat Fromistan and his nephew Maximus, presbyter, upon the subject of the foundation of a monastery in connexion with the church of St. Vincent, founded twenty years before the agreement by Fromistan and Maximus. "It is known to all," say the twenty-five, "that this place which they call Ovetto, thou, Maximus, didst first establish, and, together with thy serfs, didst first level and clear it (aplanasti illum), when it was but a mean, unowned and uninhabited mountain, and afterwards in company with thy uncle, 'Domino Fromistano Abba,' didst found in the aforesaid place the church of St. Vincent, Levite and Martyr of Christ." Later on, the twenty-five signatories renounce the world, and, "as is the custom of the churches, et eruditio regulae," transfer themselves and their property to the use and possession of the church of St. Vincent, under the rule of Fromistan "abbati nostro" and of Maximus. Then follows, "And I, 'Fromista Abbas, who now twenty years ago, together with my nephew Maximus, priest, discovered this mean and uninhabited spot, and founded the church of St. Vincent, and took upon us the rule of the Blessed Abbat Benedict (to which place also we gave all our possessions) so receive you to the service of God, and so make confirmation and testament with you all and with my nephew Maximus, as that, &c.——" Then follow threats of excommunication against those who shall at any future time transgress the rule of St. Benedict, or tamper with the possessions of the monastery, and the agreement is signed by Fromistan and Maximus on the one side, and Montanus on behalf of the twenty-five monks on the other, in the era 819 (A.D. 781).

If this document is genuine, it is the earliest historical mention of the Benedictine rule in Spain (leaving out the more than doubtful foundation charter of the monastery of Obona, supposed to have been granted by Adelgaster, son of Silo, in the era 818, just a year earlier than St. Vincent of Oviedo (Esp. Sagr. l. c. Append. v.) It is far from universally accepted, however, by modern Spanish critics, and it will be impossible to assign it its proper place in the religious history of Spain until a more thorough comparative investigation has been made of the early monastic charters of northern Spain than has yet been attempted. [Esp. Sagr. xxxvii. 108; Ferreras, Hist. d'Espagne, ed. D'Hermilly, III. 498; Yepes, Antonio de III. apend.; Dozy's Recherches, &c. I. 143, where Fromistan and Maximus are accepted without question as the first founders of Oviedo, by whose labours the attention of FROILA I. (q. v.) was called to the site. On the general question of the entry of the Benedictine rule into Spain, see art. ST. MARTIN OF BRAGA.] [M. A. W.]

FRONIMIANUS, brother of Braulio of Saragossa, to whom that bishop sent his life of San Millan. [EMILIANUS (8).] [M. A. W.]

FRONIMIUS (1), bishop of Besançon, related in an anonymous life to have completed the church of St. Stephen in that town, and established there a coenobium, obtaining privileges for it from popes Damasus and Siricius. If this statement could be relied upon, the period of Fronimius would be the latter end of the 4th century (Gall. Chr. xv. 17). [R. T. S.]

FRONIMIUS (2), 5th bishop of Agde, succeeding Leo, and followed by Tigradius, and 8th of Vence, succeeding Deutherius and followed by Aurelianus. He was a native of Bourges, but migrated into Septimania, where he found great favour with Leuvanis, the successor of Athanagild, king of the Visigoths, and was consecrated to the see of Agde. But after his patron's death he was accused by the Arian Leuvichild, whose son Hermenigild was betrothed to Ingundia, the daughter of Sigebert, of attempting to poison her mind against him as a heretic, and was compelled to flee from his diocese to escape assassination. He repaired to king Childerbert, who made him bishop of Vence upon the death of Deutherius. He subscribed the second council of Mâcon in A.D. 585, though his see is not appended, and died in 588. Gregory of Tours, who is the authority for the foregoing narrative, also recounts how a servant of this bishop was cured of epilepsy at the tomb of St. Nicetius. (Greg. Tur. Hist. Franc. ix. 24; Vitae Patrum, cap. viii. a. 8; Labbe, Sacr. Conc. ix. 959, Flor. 1759-98; Gall. Christ. iii. 1214, vi. 668.) [S. A. B.]

FRONTASIUS, Jan. 2. martyr in Gaul with Severinus, Severianus, and Silanus, his companions. They were disciples of St. Fronto, reputed to have been appointed bishop of Vesunna (afterwards Petricorium, now Périgueux) by St. Peter himself. They were sent by Fronto to preach the gospel among the Gauls. They were seized by the president Squindo and put to death by him in the first persecution under Nero. The Bollandist says Claudius was emperor, but then Claudius was one of Nero's names after he was adopted by the emperor Claudius, A.D. 50. Dodwell, in Disert. Cyprian. xi. 13, shews how doubtful are the stories of all martyrdoms under Nero, except those which happened in Rome. "Aliam itaque persecutionem comminiscantur necesse est, quam illam cujus meminit Tacitus, siquos alios praeterquam Romae Christianos in ea passos comminiscuntur." (Acta SS. Boll. Jan. i. 79.) [G. T. S.]

FRONTEIUS, bishop of Feltre. [FRONTEIUS (2).]

FRONTINIANUS (1), bishop of Salona (Spalato) in Dalmatia, c. A.D. 300; supposed to have suffered martyrdom A.D. 303. (Farlati, Ill. jr. Sacr. i. 707.) [J. de S.]

FRONTINIANUS (2), bishop of Gerona in the early part of the 6th century. In the 5th century, owing to the political troubles of the country, the lack of councils leaves us almost without information as to the succession of bishoprics all over Spain. From the year 404, in which the bishopric of Gerona is mentioned by Innocent I. in his letter to the synod of Toledo (Innoc. ep. 3, cap. 2 in Patr. Lat. xx. 489 c), to the signature of Frontinianus, at the council of Tarragona in 516 (Mansi, viii. 544), we have no record of the see, which must have been fought over during all that time again and again by Goths, Suevi, and Provincials. In 517, on the prayer of Frontinianus, a council was assembled at Gerona, which drew up ten canons concerning liturgical and disciplinary matters, for which see Aguirre-Catalani, iii. 129-134; Mansi, viii. 547; Esp. Sagr. xliii. 44, 220, 475; Hefele, Conc. Gesch. ii. 655. [M. A. W.]

FRONTINIANUS (3), bishop of Ancyra towards the close of the 6th century. He had previously been bishop of Salona, but had been deposed for refusing to subscribe the condemnation of the "Three Chapters," and banished to Antinoë in the Thebaid. In 562 he was recalled from exile, and translated to Ancyra (Victor. Tununens. Chron. a. a. 562, Migne, Patr. lxxviii. 961; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 455, 456). The next known bishop of Ancyra was Paulus, c. A.D. 590. [T. W. D.]

FRONTINIANUS (4), bishop of Salona, A.D. 620-638. (Farlati, Illyr. Sacr. ii. 295.) [J. de S.]

FRONTINIANUS (5) was one of the series of bishops who held the see of Huesca or Osca during its occupation by the Moors, and did not therefore assume that title, but styled themselves bishops of Aragon, or bishops of Jacca after that town was recovered from the Moors. They resided at the monastery of St. Pedro de Ciresa or that of St. Juan de la Peña. The only information we have about Frontinian is derived from the Life of St. Urbez or Urbicius, who was a hermit, and lived near Huesca. Frontinian is said to have been devoted to St. Urbez, to have frequently visited him, and to have been miraculously cured by him of a fever. He appears to have been bishop about A.D. 802. (D. Ayura, Fundacion de Huesca, 278, 351.) [F. D.]

FRONTINUS (1), reckoned the first bishop of Florence, c. A.D. 56, and probably its first introduction in the Christian faith. (Ughelli, Ital.

Sacr. iii. 14; Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Ital. xvi. 432.) [R. S. G.]

FRONTINUS (2), Jovinianist, condemned by pope Siricius. In Ceillier (iv. 652) he is called Felix Prontin, but the more common form is Plotinus and Prontinus. Baronius (Ana. vi. ann. 390, xlvii. ed. Theiner) has Protinus, with the alternative readings Pontinus and Frontinus. (See also Patr. Lat. xiii. 1171 n.) [J. G.]

FRONTINUS (3) (FRONTINIUS), bishop of Avignon, 308-324. He was born of an opulent family at Alba in Italy, became a presbyter at Rome, fled from the persecution of Galerius into Gaul and settled at Avignon. Here he led a retired life for two or three years, and so gained the affections of the people that he was unanimously chosen to succeed Primus as bishop. This account is stated by the Sammarthani to rest on the authority of the manuscript registers of the see of Avignon and Savaro's catalogue of the bishops. (Gall. Chr. i. 856.) [C. H.]

FRONTINUS (4) (Victor. Tununens. Chron. ann. 562), bishop of Salona. [FRONTINIANUS (4).] [T. W. D.]

FRONTO (1). That the first bishop of Périgueux was St. Fronto all the authorities agree. But all else, age, country, and particulars of his life, are uncertain. There is, as the Sammarthani pithily observe, profound silence concerning him in all the ancient writers, long and minute accounts of him in the more recent. (Gall. Christ. ii. 1446; Tillemont, Mém. iv. 502; Gams, Ser. Episc. 597.) Usuard's account of him is that he was ordained a bishop at Rome by St. Peter, along with Georgius, a presbyter, who was raised from the dead by the apostle's staff, and became Fronto's companion in travel. St. Fronto was the apostle of Périgueux, died in peace, and was commemorated Oct. 25. (Usuard. Mart. Oct. 25.) [R. T. S.]

FRONTO (2), a member of the Ephesian church, sent by that church to meet IENARIUS at Smyrna on his way to Rome. (Ign. Ep. ad Eph. 3.) [G. S.]

FRONTO (3), M. CORNELIUS. We learn from Minucius Felix (ix. xxxi.) that an oration against the Christians was published by Fronto, in which the charge was dwelt on that promiscuous and incestuous intercourse took place at the Christian meetings. This Fronto is described as a native of Cirta, and therefore may be safely identified with the tutor of Marcus Aurelius, concerning whom, see DICTIONARY OF GREEK AND ROMAN BIOGRAPHY; Teuffel, Gesch. der röm. Lit. 730. No reference to the Christians is found in Fronto's extant remains. [G. S.]

FRONTO (4), FRONTONUS, FRONTONIUS, abbat, is commemorated by Usuard (Apr. 14, ap. Migne, Patr. Lat. cxxiii. 934, and note); also by Ado (ib. cxxiii. 247), and by Notker (ib. cxxxi. 1065). The Bollandists (Acta SS. 14 Apr. ii. 201-3) treat De S. Frontone abbate in Eremo Nitriensi in Aegypto, giving prefatory notes and a Vita, auctore coarcto, ex MS. et Rosweido in Vitis Patrum. The same life is given from Rosweyd by Surius (de Prob.

Sanct. ii. 158-9), and is said to have been written by one who received the information from one of St. Fronto's monks; by some it is attributed to St. Jerome, yet probably only as a collector of lives. According to the Life, Fronto, there called Frontonius, abhorring the common life and seeking for solitude, gathered to him some brethren (called seventy), and led them into the Nitrian desert, where they cultivated the ground and lived in pious austerity; the special trials of the abbat were from the brethren becoming restive under the monastic severity. The last clause of the life says he flourished in the thirteenth year of Antoninus the emperor, which would be A.D. 151 or 152.

[J. G.]

FRONTO (5), priest of Malum, is said in the Passio S. Theodoti Ancyrae (Boll. Acta SS. 18 May, iv. 163-5; Ruinart, Acta Mart. Sincer. 350-2) to have carried away the body of the martyred Theodotus. He had come to Ancyra on the evening of the day on which St. Theodotus suffered, and by giving the soldiers, who were watching the body, to drink freely of the wine with which his ass was laden, he snatched the corpse while they slept, and laying it on the ass sent it by a safe messenger to Malum. This was in A.D. 303. Fronto raised his own wine: "agriculturam enim exercet egregius iste vir."

[J. G.]

FRONTO (6), martyr, April 16. [SARAGOSSA, MARTYRS OF.]

FRONTO (7), Arian bishop of Nicopolis, a town in the mountain district of Lesser Armenia. He seems to have originally belonged to the orthodox party, and was one of the clergy at Nicopolis; but he was won over by the Arians, and by their assistance was consecrated bishop of Nicopolis. Basil (Ep. 238, 239, 240) consoles the clergy of Nicopolis for the defection of one of their number, he declares Fronto to be an object of execration throughout the whole of Armenia, and refuses to acknowledge him as a bishop or to accept his ordinations; (Ep. 246, 247) he exhorts the people of Nicopolis to endurance under the trials and persecutions arising from their bishop's conduct and opinions. It appears that Fronto held the see only for a brief period between A.D. 372-375 (Patr. Graec. xxxii. 368; Ceillier, Aut. sacr. iv. 481; Le Quien, O. C. i. 427.)

FRONTO (8), bishop of Phaselis in Lycia, present at the council of Chalcedon, A.D. 451. (Le Quien, Or. Chr. i. 985; Mansi, vi. 1086.)

FRONTO (9), bishop of Milan, c. 555-566, said to have been ejected as a schismatic. There appears, however, a doubt whether any bishop of Milan so named lived at that date. If he did, he must have been the successor of Vitalis and the predecessor of Auxanius, which last seems clearly to have been elected A.D. 566. (Ughelli, Ital. Sacr. iv. 82; Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Ital. xi. 117.)

[R. S. G.]

FRONTO (10) appears in the Series Episcoporum of Gams as an archbishop of Bordeaux in the early part of the 8th century, between Antonius and Verebulphus, but a doubt is suggested whether he and his predecessor should not be attributed to the see of Angoulême. He is omitted by the authors of the Gallia Christiana (ii. 795). [S. A. B.]

FRONTONIUS, seventh bishop of Angoulême, succeeding Mererius and followed by Heraclius. Before his elevation he was sent by Abthonia, the predecessor of Mererius, on a mission to Sabaudes bishop of Poitiers, or Saintes, to ask that the holy monk St. Eparchius, might be at liberty to make his abode in the diocese of Angoulême. Frontonius obtained the see of Angoulême by murdering the occupant, Mererius, but enjoyed the fruits of his crime for one year only (A.D. 576-7). (S. Eparchii Vita, a. 4, Boll. Acta SS. Jul. i. 113; Greg. Tur. Hist. Franc. v. 37; Gall. Christ. ii. 980, 1452.) [S. A. B.]

FROTGONEG, an agent of Alcuin in Gaul, mentioned with Eanfrigidus. (Alcuin. Monum. ed. Jaffé, ep. 16, p. 171.) [C. H.]

FRUCTUOSA, Aug. 23, martyr at Antioch with fifteen others. (Mart. Adonis, Usuardi.) [G. T. S.]

FRUCTUOSUS (1), martyr, bishop of Tarragona in the 3rd century. The Acta of his martyrdom, and of that of his two deacons, Eulogius and Augurius, who suffered with him, are the most ancient of Spanish Acta, and are marked by a realistic simplicity which contrasts very favourably with the style of many of the Acta of the Diocletian persecution, with those of the two Eulalias for instance. Prudentius made use of them in his hymn to the martyrs (Felis Tarraco Fructuosus vestris, etc., Peristeph. vi.), and they are largely quoted by St. Augustine in one of his sermons (No. 273, Migne, Patr. Lat. xxxviii.). The Hieronymian Martyrologies confuse both names and place, but in Bede, Usuardus, and Ado, they are correctly given, as in the general mass of later martyrologies. In the fine 10th century Sanctorale, from the monastery of Cardena, mentioned under St. Eulalia of Barcelona (q. v.), the Acta of Fructuosus and his companions are given at fol. 131-136 (Brit. Mus. Addit. MSS. 25, 600), Acta. Under Valerian and Galliennus, in the consulate of Aemilianus and Bassus (ann. 259), Aemilianus Praeses of Tarragona, "aut feritatis impulsu aut imperantis applausu," issued an edict directed against the Christians, compelling all to sacrifice to the gods. Hearing this, the bishop Fructuosus, together with the whole church of Tarragona, gave themselves to unceasing prayer. One night, after Fructuosus had retired to rest, four apparitores appeared at his gate and summoned him and his deacons before the Praeses. He roused his companions, they dressed hastily and were led to prison. This was Sunday, and they remained in prison till Friday, enjoying, however, a certain amount of intercourse with the brethren outside. Fructuosus even baptized a catechumen within the prison. On their appearance before the Praeses, a short dialogue ensued between themselves and the judge, in which all three simply and steadfastly avowed their faith. Finally the Praeses asked Fructuosus "Art thou the bishop of the Christians?" He answered, "I am." To whom the Praeses, "Thou wast," and he gave orders for them to be scourged and burnt alive. On their way to the amphitheatre a crowd both of Christians and heathens—for Fructuosus had made himself beloved by all alike—surrounded them. Some offered him a cup full of an aromatic strengthening drink. He refused, saying, "It is not yet time to break the fast"—(it being Friday, and ten o'clock, whereas the Friday fast lasted till three). At the gate of the amphitheatre Fructuosus turned and addressed the people. "Be of good cheer, a pastor shall not be wanting to you, nor shall the love and promise of God fail you, either here or hereafter. For this which you behold is but the infirmity of an hour." After the flames were kindled, the ligatures binding their hands were quickly burnt; then Fructuosus consuetudinis memor fell on his knees and so passed away. After the martyrdom, the three appeared entering heaven in glory to two of the brethren, and to the daughter of Aemilianus,—Aemilianus himself was called, but was not worthy to see. At night the brethren came, collected the relics, and divided them amongst each other. But Fructuosus, appearing to several of them in a vision, warned them to give back the relics, and to bury all together in one place, which was accordingly done. The bones were buried in the house of Fructuosus, thenceforward made into a church (quae deinceps sacra fuit), "sub altario sancto." Subsequently Fructuosus and his deacons appeared to Aemilianus admonishing and threatening him "terribili visione."

In this account we have followed the Acta printed by Tamayo in the Martyr. Hisp. (vol. i. Jan. 21) which were taken (Tamayo may be believed on this point) from a 14th-century calendar in the library of the cathedral of Astorga. They omit various important points contained in the Bollandist Acta (AA. SS. Jan. ii.), which are the same as those printed by Florez. (Esp. Sag. xxv.). In the Bollandist Acta the account of the seizure is more minute, two more apparitors appear (called beneficarii), and the names of two of Fructuosus' congregation, who minister to him on the way to execution, are given. But the most important omission is of certain very striking words which we know to have been contained in the Acta used by St. Augustine, and which are found in the majority of MSS. On his way to death one Felix caught Fructuosus by the hand, and asked him to remember him. The bishop replied, "In mentem me habere necesse est ecclesiam catholicam ab Oriente usque ad Occidentem diffusam." For Augustine's fine comments on this passage, see the sermon above quoted. The incident appears somewhat differently in Prudentius:—

"Cur lamenta rigant genas madentes
Cur vestri memor ut flammam rogatis?
Cunctis pro populis rogabo Christum."

Lesley supposes (Pref. in Missale Mixtum, &c. no. 210) that Fructuosus had in his mind certain words of the Missa omnium offerentiarum as they appear in the Mozarabic Liturgy (p. 224, l. 35, and at p. 3, l. 81), and brings forward the speech, as one proof among others, of the antiquity of the Liturgy. ("Ecclesiam sanctam catholicam in orationibus in mente habeamus, ut eam Dominus et fide et spe et charitate propitius ampliare dignetur," &c.) But it is of course quite possible, if we are to suppose any connexion between the two passages, that the words of the Acta were absorbed into the Liturgy, though Gams thinks it not likely (Kirchengesch. von Spanien, i. 275). The Acta quoted by Augustine seem to have contained a statement about the age of Fructuosus, which is not found in any of the printed copies. Comparing the relative power of the martyrs and the gods, and referring, of course, to the mythical founder of Tarragona, he says, "Contra unum infirmum et trementem omnibus membris senem, quid valet Hercules?" This would throw the birth of Fructuosus into the 2nd century, and is interesting as bearing upon the date of the introduction of Christianity into Tarracensis. Fructuosus is the first bishop of Tarraco whose name remains. In Hübner's Inscriptiones Hisp. Christ. nos. 57, 85, are two inscriptions from Morera in Estremadura, and Medina Sidonia, of the 6th and 7th centuries respectively, containing the names of Fructuosus and his deacons. Their festival was on Jan. 21. (Esp. Sagr. xxv. 9; Gams, K.-G. i. 265.) [M. A. W.]

FRUCTUOSUS (2), a person present at the search for sacred books and utensils in the case of Silvanus, during the persecution, A.D. 303-304. (Aug. c. Cresc. iii. 29; Mon. Vet. Don. p. 170, ed. Oberthür.) [H. W. P.]

FRUCTUOSUS (3), bishop of Abzera in proconsular Africa, present at Carth. Conf. A.D. 411. (Mon. Vet. Don. p. 408, ed. Oberthür.) [H. W. P.]

FRUCTUOSUS (4), a bishop present at the council of Carthage, against the Pelagians, A.D. 416. (Aug. Ep. 175.) [H. W. P.]

FRUCTUOSUS (5), bishop of Gira Marcelli (Marcelliana) in Numidia, banished by Hunneric, A.D. 484. (Victor. Vit. Notitia, 56, in Migne, Patrol. Lat. lviii.; Morcelli, Africa Christ. i. 172.) [L. D.]

FRUCTUOSUS (6), bishop of Emporias (Ampurias), appears at the third council of Toledo, A.D. 589, represented by his archpriest Galanus. (Esp. Sag. xiii. 269; Aguirre-Catalani, iii. 238.) [M. A. W.]

FRUCTUOSUS (7), bishop of Eugubium (Gubbio), said to have been consecrated by Benedict I. A.D. 577, and if so was probably the immediate predecessor of Gaudiosus. Doubts, however, of his existence have been expressed. (Ughelli, Ital. Sac. i. 677; Cappelletti, Chiese d'Ital. v. 380.) [R. S. G.]

FRUCTUOSUS (8), bishop of Lerida in 633, when his signature is found among those given to the acts of the fourth council of Toledo. He may possibly be identified with the Fructuosus diaconus who signs the acts of the council of Egara in 614 as the representative "Domini mei Gomarelli episcopi." (Esp. Sagr. xvi. 105, 106; Aguirre-Catalani, iii. 385, 342.) [Petrus.]

FRUCTUOSUS (9), bishop of Bina (Vina) in the proconsular province of Africa, subscribed the letter of his province against the errors of the Monothelites to Paul, patriarch of Constantinople, who favoured their views, A.D. 646. This letter was read at the first Lateran council. (Mansi, x. 939; Morcelli, Africa Christ. i. 103.) [L. D.]

FRUCTUOSUS (10), ST., bishop of Dumium, and afterwards of Braga, a famous Spanish saint of the 7th century, whose life was written shortly after his death by St. Valerius, abbat of the Monasterium Rufianense (San Pedro de Montes), near Astorga, one of the houses founded by St. Fructuosus. The father of Fructuosus was a Gothic noble who had led the country's forces in war, and who possessed lands and flocks in the Vierzo. (A mountainous district between Astorga and Lugo—the Asturica Augusta and Lucus Augusti of the Romans—watered by the Sil and its tributaries, and bounded to the north by the Asturias mountains, and to the south by the plateaux of central Spain. It owes its name to the Roman town of Bergidum, once the centre of the district.) Once when going upon a round of inspection of his estates the father took the boy Fructuosus with him, and the child, struck with the loneliness and beauty of the mountain valley, inwardly resolved to found a monastery there when he should have grown to man's estate, and the land should be his. On his father's death he placed himself under the teaching of the neighbouring bishop, Comantius (q. v.) of Palencia, as a preparation for a hermit's life. Here marvels already began to surround him, and to point him out as a future saint. As soon, however, as he was sufficiently instructed, he left Palencia for the innermost recesses of the Vierzo, founding his first monastery, the Monasterium Complutense (so called from its dedication to the martyrs of Complutum, SS. Justus and Pastor), in the "narrow plain of emerald green, nearly half a mile long, and about 100 ft. wide, deeply sunk in the heart of the wild mountains," where stands the modern village of Compludo. Without reserving anything for himself, St. Fructuosus gave up his property to the use of the brotherhood, and presently the solitary valley was full of monks flocking thither from all parts of Spain. One person only saw the rising house with envy and dissatisfaction—the brother-in-law of the saint, who had hoped apparently for the inheritance of the saint's property, and now saw it all given to strangers. He accordingly went to the king, and petitioned that some of the property of the new monastery might be assigned to him on the pretence of using it in some state service. Fructuosus no sooner heard of it than he stripped the altars, covered them with ashes, and wrote a letter of rebuke and warning to the delinquent, who, indeed, speedily died without any heirs to enjoy the property he had wished to plunder. Meanwhile the fame of the saint grew day by day, and soon the numbers of his adherents grew so large that, leaving others in charge of the convent, he withdrew farther into the wilderness in search of more undisturbed solitude.

Near the source of the Oza, a river rising among the heights of the Montes Aguianus (or Aquilanus, the Eagle's Crags), and running thence into the Sil below Ponferrada, he founded his second monastery, the Monasterium Rufianense, afterwards the famous San Pedro de Montes, of which his biographer Valerius was abbat, which was restored in the 10th century by San Gennadio, and existed as a monastery until the general dissolution of the religious houses in the present century. Later on he founded the Visuniense, north of the Sil, among the Aguilar mountains, which passed long afterwards into the possession of the Cistercian house of Caracedo, the Peonense, on the coast of Galicia, and many others, whose names are not given. Thus the saint, "giving the last remains of his great fortune to churches, to the poor, and to the freedmen of his house, penetrated every day into great deserts, peopling them with monks by means of the convents which he built, giving them the wherewithal of living holily, and instructing them for a time by his example. Then he himself would fly deeper into the rocks and woods to avoid the commerce of man, and to be known and seen of God only." Once some jackdaws, which had been tamed in the convent, found out his retreat, and proclaimed it by their cries of joy. Again a doe, which was pursued by the hounds, fled to him for shelter. The saint protected her, and the animal followed him home, and thenceforward never left him. When the saint slept she slept at his feet, when he went far away she tracked his footsteps. At last, to the grief of the saint, an ill-disposed youth killed her. The youth was seized with fever, and nothing but the prayers of Fructuosus saved him from death.

After this half legendary time in the Vierzo we come to the more public portion of the saint's life. He set out southwards on a pilgrimage to the shrine of St. Eulalia of Merida, and thence to Seville and Cadiz. Near Cadiz Fructuosus founded a monastery nine miles from the sea, to which monks flocked so abundantly that the Dux exercitus of that province complained to the king that there would soon be no men left for the army. Hither came also a noble lady, Benedicta by name, who lived first in a hermitage built for her by the saint, and became afterwards the abbess of a convent of eighty nuns. Here also Fructuosus determined to end his life in the Holy Land, and he accordingly chartered a vessel for the voyage. But the king (Rekesvinth), warned of his intention, and fearing lest such a light of sanctity should be lost to Spain, ordered that the saint should be brought before him. When he appeared at Toledo the king compelled him to accept the see and abbacy of Dumium, founded by St. Martin. Thence, in 656, at the tenth council of Toledo, he was transferred by the unanimous voice of the bishops to the metropolitan see of Braga, in the place of the deposed Potamius. A question arose in the same council concerning the will of the deceased bishop of Dumium, Rechimir, which was found to contain provisions contrary to the canons. For the amending of these clauses the council deputed the management of the whole matter to Fructuosus (Mansi, xi. 43 B).

After his elevation to the see of Braga Fructuosus, still leading the hermit's life of austerity and almsgiving, founded one more monastery on the road from Braga to Dumium (which, under the name of San Fructuoso, and under Franciscan rule, was still existing in the 18th century), and began also to build various churches. While they were building he was inwardly warned of his approaching death, and, being eager to leave his work perfected and complete, he carried on the work of building, not only by day but by night also, the masons working by torchlight under the saint's direction. At last the final touch was given, and the work stood completed. Then Fructuosus knew that his last day was come. He told his disciples, who wept bitterly, while he alone was joyful. One of them asked him whether he feared death. "No, indeed," he answered; "for though a sinner, I am going to the presence of my Lord." They bore him to the church, and there, after he had received the penitential habit, he remained prostrate before the altar through the day and night. "As the day dawned he lifted his arms in prayer, and yielded his stainless and holy soul into the hands of God."

The preceding account is taken from the life by Valerius, with the exception of the connexion of the saint with the bishopric of Dumium, and of the proceedings with regard to Rechinier. Valerius, whose life was in many points similar to that of Fructuosus, was, as we have said, abbat of San Pedro de Montes towards the end of the 7th century, and from the opuscula of his remaining (Esp. Sagr. xvi.) as well as from his biography of the saint, we see that he gathered up many of the local memories and stories of Fructuosus remaining in the Vierzo. He speaks of intercourse with old pupils and servants of Fructuosus, and for the general story of the saint's life he says that he was indebted to Cassian, abbat of San Fructuoso, and the saint's first disciple, and to the priests, Renenatus and Julian, who had accompanied him in his journeys. Our only other sources of information respecting Fructuosus are—(1) the acts of the tenth council of Toledo, or rather the decretum appended to the acts, on the subject of the crime, penitence, and deposition of Potamius (q. v.), and the succession of "venerabilem Fructuosum ecclesiae Dumienensis episcopum communi omnium nostrorum electione," to the see of Braga; (2) certain apocryphal poems attributed to the saint, and addressed to Peter, bishop of Narbonne, to the king Sisenand, and to an unnamed deacon, together with a letter, also of doubtful authenticity, addressed to Rakesvinth, on the subject of the release of certain prisoners (Esp. Sagr. xv. 152; Tamayo de Salazar, Martyr. Hisp. ii. April 16); (3) two collections of rules bearing his name, one of which was drawn up apparently for the Monastery of Compludo (Brockie, Cod. Reg. i. 208); and (4) the interesting letter from Fructuosus to Braulio of Saragossa, which, together with Braulio's reply, are found among the letters of that bishop (Esp. Sagr. xxx. 383). The first letter, Fructuosi presbyteri ad Braulionem, speaks of the fame of Braulio, and how the news of his life and deeds "pleases our humble ear amid the hoarse sounding waves of the foaming brine, of the eddying ocean, and the unquiet seas," which looks as if the letter were written from that monastery on the Gallician coast, of which we hear in the life. Braulio is asked to solve certain biblical questions (of a curiously trifling kind), and finally Fructuosus winds up with a request for the loan of certain books, for seventeen of the Collations of Cassian, for the lives of the holy men, Honoratus and Germanus, "vestrique beatissimi novi Aemiliani" [EMILIANUS (8)], and with a prayer for his kindly remembrance of those "far off and sunk in the dark district of the west," who thus address him. The bishop's letter, of much greater length and pretensions, answers his questions, which, however, Braulio thinks Fructuosus might have answered for himself, and contains a panegyric on the life and work of the saint. As to the books, the bishop is not able to give a satisfactory answer. Of some of them he has no duplicates, others have been taken out of his cupboard, and cannot be found (see preface to the Vita Sancti Aemiliani, for an interesting correspondence between this passage and what he there says of the loss of his MS.). But when found they shall be sent to Fructuosus.

Finally, Fructuosus is not to talk despondently of the province in which he lives, but is to remember its Greek origin ("Graecam originem sibi defendit," conf. Isid. Etym. ix. 2, Hi (Gallaeci) graecam sibi originem asserunt), and the illustrious men it has brought forth, such as Orosius, Turribius, Ilatius, and Carterius. Only let him beware of the venom of the Priscillianists, peculiar to that country, and which has in bygone times infected even such men as the holy Orosius.

Various inferences may be drawn from these letters as to the youth of Fructuosus at the time, and the comparative immaturity of his work on the one hand, and as to the possible influence on him of the example of the life of San Millan on the other. There is no indication of date in the letters, but they must have been written before the year 651, in which Braulio died, and are probably a good deal earlier, as there is no trace or complaint in them of that decay of intellectual power of which Braulio speaks sorrowfully elsewhere. The dates of San Fructuoso's life are quite unknown. That of his appearance at the tenth council of Toledo, in 656, is the only fixed point. Gams (Kirchengesch. ii. 153-157) thinks he did not long survive the year 660, which would throw the period of his principal monastic activity back to the first third of the century. He was buried in the convent of San Fructuoso, near Braga, whence his remains were removed to Compostella in the 12th century, by the well-known archbishop Diego de Gelmirez. The cult of the saint began immediately after his death (see conclusion of Acta), and in the 10th century San Genmadio appears as the restorer or second founder of the monastic system inaugurated by Fructuosus in the "holy Vierzo." (Boll. A.A. SS. April 16, ii. 431-436; Mabillon, A.A. SS. O.S.B. sac. ii. 581; Montalembert, Moines de l'Occident, ii. 221; and for a description of the present state of the Vierzo and of the remains of Fructuoso's monasteries, a paper by the Rev. H. F. Tozer, Genl. Mag. Feb. 1865.) [M. A. W.]

FRUCTUOSUS (11), bishop of Orense (Auria) in Spain, said by Gams (Ser. Episc. 53) to have ruled from before A.D. 688 to 693. He was one of the bishops present at the fifteenth council of Toledo, A.D. 688, and signed the canons. (Tejada, Coll. de Can. ii. 554 b; Florez, España Sagrada, xvii. 46-7.) [J. G.]

FRUCTUS, martyr, Carthage, A.D. 250. [ARISTO.] [E. W. B.]

FRUELA, a king of Asturias. [FRUELA (3).]

FRUGIFERUS, supposed to be the first known bishop of Trieste, c. 524, of somewhat doubtful authenticity. (Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Italia, viii. 679.) [A. H. D. A.]

FRUIDBERT (Bed. v. 24, append.), bishop of Herham. [FRITHOBERT.] [C. H.]

FRUIDUUALD (Bed. v. 24, append.), bishop of Whithern. [FRITHWALD.] [C. H.]

FRUISCLUS, bishop of Mentesa. [FROMCLUA.]

FRUMARIUS, Suevian king of Spain from cir. 460 to cir. 463. He belongs to the period from 456 to 463, when the Suevi were struggling against the allied Gothic and Roman armies. Theodoric II., who had been the ally of the Suevian king Rekiar (448-456) up to 456, fell back in that year upon the foedus with Rome, which his successor Euric was soon to set aside altogether. The Suevi, attacked by the allied Goths and Provincials, were hard pressed. In the course of the campaign Rekiar was taken and executed, and Theodoric appointed Aiulf governor of the Suevian territory. In the extreme north-west of Galicia, however, a band of Suevi made Maldra king. (Idat. ann. 460.) A time of great confusion follows. Maldra, Aiulf, and Franta all appear as Suevian kings between 456 and 460. In 459 (?) Maldra made his son Remismund district-king (Basirke-König, regulus, Jord, c. 44), and in 460, after Maldra's murder, we have the first appearance of Frumari (Idat. ann. 460). Who Frumari was is far from clear. He may have been a son of the brother murdered by Maldra in 460 (Dahn, vi. 566), and if so, a cousin of Remismund. At any rate, he seems to represent a time of anarchy and confusion, when the West Suevi, who after Rekiar's defeat and death, made Maldra king, appear as distinct from, and at one time even in disunion with the East Suevi under Remismund. Under the year 460 Idatius speaks of the descent of Frumari upon Aquae Flaviae, of the capture of himself, "capto Idatio Episcopo, septimo Kalendae Augusti in Aquae Flaviensi Ecclesia," and the devastation of the district. [IDATIUS.] Meanwhile Remismund, who appears so far to have acted in concert with Frumari, was ravaging the country of the Auregenses on the Minho and the coast about Lugo. Immediately afterwards dissensions arose between the two chiefs, followed by a short truce between the Suevi and Provincials, and negotiations between the Suevi and the Goths, at that time occupying the position of Roman foederati in various towns of the peninsula, possibly set on foot by Remismund with the object of obtaining help against Frumari. (Dahn, l. c.) The Gothic and Suevian legates meet in Lugo, and Remismund goes twice to Theodoric at Toulouse. During his absence, in spite of the presence of certain Gothic troops commanded by Cyria in Galicia, collisions occurred between the Provincials and Frumari's Suevi. (Idat. ann. 462.) In 463 (according to Dahn; Florez gives 464) Frumari died, and Remismund thereupon united all the Suevian districts in one kingdom, strengthening his position moreover, by a close alliance with Theodoric II.

The supposition that after Maldra's death Frumari at first ruled the West Suevi as district-king (Basirke-König) in dependence on Remismund, and that he subsequently broke loose and assumed an independent position, Dahn thinks "not likely" — though it remains quite possible. (Idatius, FRUMENTIUS (1), founder of the Ethiopian church. He was consecrated as bishop of Auxume (modern Axum) by Athanasius before A.D. 368, and, under the title of Abba Salama, was regarded as the apostle of Ethiopia, traditionally credited with the translation of the Scriptures and the Apostolic Canons. For his romantic history, preserved by Rufinus, see arta. EDESIIUS and ETHIOPIA CHURCH. [H. R. R.]

FRUMENTIUS (2)—March 23. Two African martyrs of the same name are commemorated on this day. They were merchants who suffered for the Catholic faith, at the hands of the Arians, in the Vandal persecution under Hunneric, A.D. 477. (Mart. Rom. Vet.; Adonis, Usuardi; Victor. Vicensis, de Persecut. Vandal. lib. 3.)

[G. T. S.]

FRUMENTIUS (3), the name of two African bishops, viz. of Tibursica near Tagaste, in Numidia, and of Telepte in the inland part of the Byzacene, banished by Hunneric A.D. 484. (Victor. Vit. Notitia, 56, 58; Patrol. Lat. lviii.; Morcelli, Africa Christ. i. 311, 318.) [L. D.]

FRYGES. (Cod. Theod. XVI. v. 40, 59, 65, v.) [PHRYGEA.] [T. W. D.]

FUGATIUS, a form of FAGAN (Cressy, Ch. Hist. Brit. iv. cc. 5-7); also used by Baronius (Ann. Eccl. A.D. 183, l. 227). [J. G.]

FUGITIVUS, metropolitan of Seville in Dec. 656, when the tenth council of Toledo was held. Florez identifies him with the abbat Fugitivus, whose signature, together with that of the abbat Ildefonsus, afterwards the famous Ildefonsus of Toledo, occurs among those of the ninth council of Toledo (provincial not national), which met Dec. 2, 655. (Esp. Sagr. ix. 219; Aguirre-Catalani, iv. 145, 158.) [MARCELLUS.]

FULARTACH (FALENTUS, FELERTUS, FOLARATAIG, FULARTUS). (1) Son of Brec, commemorated Mar. 29, Dec. 21. Colgan (Acta SS. 787) gives a brief notice of this hermit, whose sanctity is more carefully recorded in kalendars and festilogies than in other histories. He was descended from the most illustrious family of Rudhraighe, and of the race of Conal Cearnach, in Ulster. He had a hermit-cell at Offally, on the borders of Kildare and King's County: this was named Disert-Fulartaigh. Some say the hermit afterwards became bishop at Clonard, but the Annals, like the Four Masters, place the death of "Fulartach, son of Breac, an anchorite," at A.D. 755, and that of the bishop of Clonard at A.D. 774 (O'Connor, R. r. Hib. Scriptor. ii. 255, iv. 108). Evidently the Annals contemplate different persons, but O'Gorman and later writers regard them as one.

(2) Of Donaghpatrick, bishop. In the Tripartite Life of St. Patrick there is mention made of Felartus, whom Colgan (Acta SS. 788) calls Fulartus, giving at the same time a memoir of St. Fulartus, bishop. In the middle of the fifth century he was a steady and active disciple of St. Patrick, and for many years was his constant companion and assistant. It is said in the Vita

S. Benigni that when St. Patrick came into the west of Connaught, he was refused the hospitality he sought at the house of Echinua, son of Brian, son of Ethac, king of Connaught, and that, retracing his steps, he came to a place afterwards known as Donaghpatrick, near Lough Corrib, where he built a church and gave it to bishop Fulartus. Fulartus had two virgin sisters, who were dedicated to the Lord, namely, Callecha, who may have been at the church called Tempull-Cailliche in the diocese of Clonfert, and Crocha, who was on an island of the name of Cuil-chonmaicne on the coast of Connemara. (Colgan, Tr. Thaum. 134, c. 39, 136, c. 52, 178 n. ¹¹⁰, ¹¹¹; Ussher, Eocl. Ant. c. 17, wks. vi. 518; Lanigan, Eocl. Hist. Ir. i. c. 5, § 10, c. 7, § 6; Kelly, Cal. Ir. Saints, 108, 109.)

(3) Folartaig (Maelfothartaigh, Four Mast. A.D. 678), bishop of Ardsratha, now Ardstraw, bar. Strabane, co. Tyrone, died A.D. 680 (Ann. Ult. A.D. 679). [J. G.]

FULCARIUS (FULCHER, FOLERICUS), 32nd or 33rd bishop of Liège, succeeding Florbertus and followed by Agilfridus, is said by Aegidius to have sat for fifteen years. He is one of the bishops addressed in the twelfth letter of pope Zachary, written probably A.D. 748. (Migne, Patr. Lat. lxxxix. 948.) In 757 he signed a charter for the monastery of Gorze, confirming the privileges granted by St. Chrodegangus. (Migne, Patr. Lat. lxxxix. 1121-6.) His signature is also found appended to two charters given in A.D. 762 by king Pippin for the foundation of the monastery of Prüm. The Placitum Attiniacense was subscribed by a "Folericus Episcopus civit. Tungri." This can hardly be other than Fulcarius, especially as variations in the spelling of the name from that of Baronius above given, are found in other accounts. This, however, involves the rejection of Aegidius's fifteen years for the duration of the bishopric, unless with Pagius we believe the placitum to be properly dated three years earlier than the date above given. (Gall. Christ. iii. 830; Bar. Pagius, anu. 762 n. iv.; Labbe, Sacr. Conc. xi. 675, Flor. 1759-98; Aegidius, Gesta Pontif. Leod. i. 147, ed. Chapeauville, Liège, 1612.) [S. A. B.]

FULOILIUS, eighth bishop of Nevers, succeeding Agricola and followed by Rauracus, or according to Coquille's list, ninth, succeeding St. Agricola and followed by St. Arigius, about the close of the 6th century. (Coquille, Hist. du Nivernois, sub fin. Paris, 1612; Gall. Christ. xii. 627.) [S. A. B.]

FULCOALDUS (1) (EOALDUS, BOALDUS, FRALDUS, FOALDUS, FALDUS), forty-third bishop of Lyons, succeeding Godwinus, and followed by Madalbertus, or Maubert. All we know of him is derived from the life of St. Bonitus (St. Bon or St. Bonét), bishop of Clermont, who died and was buried at Lyons, and whose remains his successor, Nordobert, had vainly sought to obtain from Godwin, the predecessor of Fulcoaldus. Proculus was more successful with Fulcoaldus, and installed the relics at Clermont (Vita S. Boniti, § 31 et seq., Acta SS. Ord. S. Bened. saec. iii. pars 1, p. 98. Paris, 1668-1701). It was during his episcopate that Lyons, in common with a great part of France, fell under the domination of the Saracens. In that calamitous period, and, if we may believe the ecclesiastical historians, the yet more dreadful time of Charles Martel's ascendancy, which followed the battle of Tours (732), the archbishopric of Lyons, like the see of Vienne, was long vacant, while no less than ten years elapsed between the death of Fulcoaldus in A.D. 744 and the consecration of his successor. (Gall. Christ. iv. 51; cf. Ado, Circom. Migne, Pat. Lat. cxiii. 122.) [S. A. B.]

FULCOALDUS (2), abbat of Farfa (between Rome and Rieti), from A.D. 740 to 759. He came originally from Aquitaine. In 745 he received a gift of land from Lupus duke of Spoleto. His name is found in connexion with various exchanges of land and other transactions in diplomas of various dates from 744 to 756. (Troja, Cod. Dipl. Noe. 567, 574, 586, etc.; iv. 148, etc.; Catal. Abb. Farf. p. 385, and Constructio Farfensis, p. 528, in Pertz, Monumenta, vol. xi.) [A. H. D. A.]

FULGENTIUS (1), legendary bishop of Atina in Campania, cir. A.D. 100. (Boll. Acta SS. Sept. 29; Ughelli, Ital. Sacr. vi. 529.) [R. S. G.]

FULGENTIUS (2), bishop of Otricoli in Umbria (Utriculensis), mentioned in Greg. Magn. Dial. (lib. iii. cap. 12; Migne, lxxviii. 240) as having been ill-treated by Totila and the Goths. His date is 545 according to Cappelletti. (Le Chiese d'Italia, iv. 573, 579.) [A. H. D. A.]

FULGENTIUS (3), FABIVS CLAUDIVS GORDIANUS, bishop of Ruspe, was born in the year A.D. 468 and died A.D. 533. His life was spent for the most part in those provinces of north-western Africa which were brought under the cruel tyranny of the Vandal kings, Genseric, Hunneric, and Thrasimund, and he witnessed and suffered from the persecutions inflicted by these enemies of the Catholic faith. The writings of Fulgentius himself, a biographical memoir of the saint prefixed to his works, and addressed to Felicianus his successor in the bishopric of Ruspe, supposed to be written by Ferrandus, a deacon of the church at Carthage [FELICIANUS (14), FERRANDUS], and a treatise De Persecutione Vandolica, written by Victor Vitensis in 487 (vid. Bibliotheca Maxima Patrum, tom. vii. and Migne, Patr. Lat. tom. lviii.), are the principal sources of information concerning this outbreak of barbaric malice. Every refinement of cruelty seems to have been visited upon the presbyters, bishops, and virgins, of the north African church during the reigns of Genseric and Hunneric. At the first incursion of the Vandals the whole country was desolated, the houses of prayer and basilicas were often razed to the ground; neither age nor sex was any shield from these cruelties, and the tombs of the martyrs were rifled for treasure. The bishops were banished from their sees, the virgins were basely used, and every effort was made to alienate the masses of the people from the Catholic faith. At the commencement of the reign of Hunneric (Victor, lib. ii.), a gleam of sunshine cheered the church, during which the vacant see of Carthage was filled by Eugenius [EUGENIUS (21)], whose extraordinary virtues are duly recorded by his biographers. His popularity with the people excited the rage and animosity of the conquerors, who forbade their own people to enter the church where he ministered. Those who disobeyed these orders were submitted to torture, were blinded, and many died of the inhuman treatment. Women were scalped and stripped and paraded through the streets. Victor says, "We knew many of these." Hunneric must have hated Christianity in any form, as Jocundus, the Arian patriarch was burned alive, and Manicheans were hunted down like wild beasts. At the end of the second year of his reign, the king refused all position in the court or executive to any but Arians, and banished to Sardinia all who refused to conform; heavy pecuniary fines were imposed whenever a bishop was ordained; peculiar and malicious inhumanity was visited upon Christian women, from the consequences of which many died and many were crippled for life. In 486, the bishops and priests were exiled into the desert [FELIX OF ABDEIRA], and in the eighth year of the reign of Hunneric, that prince issued an edict, still preserved (Victor, ib. lib. iii.), in which the Homoousians were summoned to renounce their faith, a date being fixed for their submission, their churches were doomed to be destroyed, their books burned, their pastors banished. The consequences of this bloody edict are detailed with horrible circumstantiality by Victor, and even Gibbon allows that they must have been inhuman in their severity. The cruelties of the Diocletian persecution were equalled if not surpassed by the measures thus taken to extirpate the homoousian faith. Gordian, the grandfather of Fulgentius, a senator of Carthage, was exiled by Genseric. His two sons returned to their home during an interval of grace, to find their property in the hands of Arian priests. They were not allowed to remain at Carthage, and settled themselves at Telepte, in the province of Byzacene. One of them, Claudius by name, married Maria Anna, a Christian lady, and she gave birth in 488 to Fulgentius.

The mother of Fulgentius was particularly careful to secure the best education for her son. She compelled his study of the Greek language, and would not allow him to indulge in the perusal of Roman literature, until he should have committed to memory the greater part of the poems of Homer, and of the plays of Menander. He was then allowed to pursue a more varied course of study. He displayed great talent for business and much versatility. His fine character recommended him to the court, and he was appointed fiscal procurator of the province, and learned his first lessons in the art of ruling men. But in the midst of these pursuits he became enamoured of heavenly things, and after perusing Augustine's comment on Ps. xxxvi. [xxxvii. Heb.], he was attracted by the "pleasures of a mind at peace with God, which fears nothing but sin." At the time when Hunneric had banished bishops to the neighbouring deserts, with the hope of weakening their confidence in the Catholic faith, young Fulgentius began to retire from society, deprived himself of ordinary recreation, and devoted himself to fasting, prayer, and various austerities. One of these exiled bishops, Faustus, had formed a little monastery not far from Telepte, to which Fulgentius retired himself. The old bishop was induced by the eager protestations of the youth to admit him to the confraternity. Mariana put forth all her power to dissuade him from his resolution and failed. The story of her passionate grief and reproaches reminds the reader of the mother of Chrysostom. The biographers of Fulgentius dilate on the almost incredible extent to which he pursued his austerities. Though his once noble form was emaciated and diseased, his spirit waxed stronger, his resolution never flinched. He handed his patrimony over to his mother, and utterly renounced the world. The persecution then prevailing suggested a change of abode, and at the advice of Faustus, Fulgentius removed to another small monastery, under the direction of one Felix. Between this recluse and Fulgentius sprang up a powerful and enduring friendship. They divided the superintendence of the monastery between them, Fulgentius undertaking the duties of teacher of the brethren. Troubles arose from an incursion of the Numidians, and compelled the entire body to emigrate into the interior, where they settled at a place called Sicca Venena or Siccensis. (Vita, c. ix. called Sicque by Ceillier.) An Arian presbyter, also Felix by name, in the neighbourhood, was alarmed at the personal influence rapidly exercised over the members of his flock by the saintly Felix and Fulgentius, and laid a plot to rob and torture them. They were brutally used, and their patience under the rack and lash only provoked fresh outbursts of rage. This dastardly attack roused the indignation even of the Arian bishop of Carthage, who would have called his Arian presbyter to account for his conduct, if Felix and Fulgentius had not prayed for mercy on their tormentors. From this place of dangerous retreat the little company again migrated to Ididi in Mauritania, and, says the author of the Vita, the proximity of the Moors was far more conducive to their peace than that of the Arians. At Ididi Fulgentius read the Institutiones Cassiani, and formed the resolution to migrate to Egypt, in order to follow a more severe rule of mortification and obedience. With a solitary monk he started for Carthage, and, without any provision or preparation for so formidable a journey, embarked for Syracuse, where he was kindly received by Eulalius. This distinguished bishop, who rejoiced in the title of Papa, soon found out that he had a remarkable man at his table, and discovered moreover his intention to proceed to the Thebaid in order to secure a more thorough realisation of monastic regimen. Eulalius strongly discountenanced the enterprise, on the ground that at that time the Thebaid was separated by a "perfidious herey and schism from the communion of St. Peter." He referred to the Monophysite doctrine and personal contest which led to the schism in the Egyptian church after the council of Chalcedon, A.D. 451. "Revertere fili," said Eulalius, "ne vitæ meliori intuitu periculum rectæ fidei patiaris." This advice was eventually followed, though for some months he resided in the neighbourhood of Syracuse. In the year 500, he visited Rome, and was present at the gorgeous reception given to Theodoric, and heard that monarch's address to the senate. In the course of the year he returned to Africa. His brethren did not blame him for his ill-considered departure. He received from Sylvester, the primarius of Byzacene, a plot of ground for the erection of a spacious monastery, which was at once crowded by inmates. The fertility of the soil, and the other advantages it possessed, seemed a positive defect in the pursuit of the divine life. Restless under physical comfort he fled once more to a lonely island, which was more satisfactory to him, seeing that neither wood nor drinkable water could be found upon it, and that access to the mainland was almost interdicted. Here he occupied himself with manual toil and spiritual exercises. Felix having discovered the retreat of Fulgentius persuaded Faustus to ordain him as a presbyter, and under pain of excommunication to compel his return to his monastery. Faustus hoped by these means to keep him under jurisdiction, to intercept these romantic escapades, and curb the restlessness of his nature. This ordination occurred shortly after the death of Hunneric, and accession of Thrasimund. The latter monarch, though a bigoted Arian, was more liberal and refined than his predecessors. (Gibbon, Smith's ed. vol. iv. c. 37.) He had forbidden the churches which had been deprived of their bishops during the reign of Hunneric to fill up the vacant sees, yet many of these churches dared to disobey the order. No sooner was a bishop appointed than he was at once banished to Sardinia or elsewhere. (Victor, ib. lib. iii.) Several churches contended for the privilege of having Fulgentius as their bishop, but with his marvellous faculty in concealing himself, he was able for a while to baffle their importunity, and he returned with a genuine Nolo Episcopari upon his lips to his monastery. It was not, however, for long. The little town of Ruspe (or Ruspae), a small sea-port on a projecting spur of the coast, not far from the Syrtis Parva—lat. 35° 1', long. E. 11° 1'—had remained without a bishop. This had been the case, not from obedience to the royal mandate, but from the machinations of another Felix, a deacon who had prevented a suitable man from accepting the office. Ruspe fixed its heart on Fulgentius, and he was actually taken by force from his cell to Victor the primate of Byzacene and consecrated bishop of Ruspe. This was in the year 508, when he was forty years of age. He made no change in his costume or daily regimen, he declined to wear the orarium, the ornamental chasuble, or any coloured garment. He walked barefoot, or at least shod with nothing more luxurious than a monk's sandal; he wore a little white or black cloak, a linen scarf around his neck, a leathern girdle round his loins, and must have looked more like a Hebrew prophet than a Christian bishop of the 6th century. It is expressly stated that he wore no different costume in the celebration of the mysteries, saying that the heart and not the clothes needed changing. He never allowed himself meat or wine. Eggs, herbs, and seed-corn, unground and undressed, were his food. His prayers, vigils, and fastings were incessant as before. His first demand from the people of Ruspe was a plot of ground on which to build a monastery. This was soon granted, and the building erected, and his old friend Felix summoned to preside over it. This blending of episcopal and monastic rule was soon brought to an abrupt end by Thrasimund, who dismissed him and other newly elected bishops to Sardinia. He accepted his fate with joy, at the privilege of suffering for his Master. As he passed through Carthage presents were heaped upon him, which he sent to the new monastery at Ruspe. Though the last of the exiled bishops he was soon recognised as the greatest of them, and was entrusted with delicate and difficult duties. In the name of the sixty exiles he wrote important letters on various questions of theological and ecclesiastical importance. His literary faculty, his great knowledge of Scripture, and his repute as a theologian, probably induced Thrasimund to summon him from Sardinia to Carthage, and to enter into personal dispute with him. It is possible that the king, supposing by his threats and promises, his banishment of the bishops, his cajolery and other devices, that he had gained a victory, and, moreover, being thoroughly convinced of the truth of his own profession, wished to discuss the Catholic doctrine and crush it by fair argument. Ten objections to the Catholic faith were thus presented to Fulgentius. To these he was requested to give satisfactory replies. The result was his earliest treatise, viz., One book against the Arians, Ten Answers to Ten Objections. The third of these objections resembles a common argument of the earlier Arians, viz. that the passages of Scripture, Prov. viii. 22, John xvi. 29, Psalm ii. 7, and others imply that the Son is "created," "generated in time," and therefore not of the same substance with the Father, to which Fulgentius replied that they all refer to the Incarnation, and not to the essence of the Son of God. He used the argument of Athanasius, which makes the customary worship of the Son of God verge either on Polytheism or Sabellianism if we do not at the same time recognise the consubstantiality of the Son. To deny, said Fulgentius, the Catholic position, compels the objector to adopt the alternative of saying that the Son of God was either from something or from nothing. The supposition that He was made "out of nothing" reduces Him to the rank of a creature; the other supposition that He was made "from something," in essence different from God, involves a co-eternal Being, and some form of Manichaean dualism. Throughout this ingenious polemic, Fulgentius laid the greatest emphasis on the unity of God's essence, and assumed, as a point not disputed between himself and his opponents, that Christ was the object of Divine worship. This argument throws some light upon the later Arianism. The reply was not considered satisfactory by Thrasimund, who could not but have perceived that logically and rhetorically Fulgentius had the best of the argument. He, therefore, in order to cover him with reproach in the eyes of his Arian supporters, sent another group of objections, which were to be read to Fulgentius. No copy was to be left with him, which might enable him by mere logical agility to gain a superficial victory, but yet he was expected to return categorical answers. The statement of this Nebuchadnezzar-like policy might appear to be a biographical exaggeration, if it were not sufficiently vouched for by the opening chapters of the Ad Thrasimundum Regem Vandulorum Libri tres (cf. Schroeckh, Christliche Kirchengeschichte, xviii. 168). The first book treats "of the Mystery of the Mediator, Christ, having two natures in one person." The second book "of the Immensity of the Divinity of the Son of God." The third book, "of the Sacrament of the Lord's Passion." In the first of these books he displays great familiarity with Scripture, and endeavours to establish the eternal generation of the Logos, and the birth in time of the Christ, when the Logos took flesh, and by "flesh" he endeavours to shew is meant the whole of humanity, body and reasonable soul, just as occasionally by "soul" is denoted not only reasonable soul but body as well. In bk. i. the author shews that the whole of humanity needed redemption, and was taken up into union with the Eternal Word; in bk. ii. he shews that nothing less than Deity in His supreme wisdom and power could effect the redemption. As the assurance that Christ is "the First and the Last," does not mean that Christ will have an end, so the ἐν ἀρχῇ of John i. 1, cannot mean that the Godhead of the Logos had a beginning. He cannot be localis by whom locus is made, nor temporalis by whom tempus is originated. The Godhead of Christ may be "everywhere" in His "power," but not "everywhere" in His "grace." He ingeniously explains the "Noli me tangere," addressed to Mary, as a refusal to admit her affectionate treatment of his body, until she had appreciated His Divinity. The church is now His body, and they who do not appreciate His unity of essence with the Father must not have the privileges of His church. In many other ways he argues the immensity of the Son and also of the Spirit of God, and here again the common ground held by the Arians and himself, as to the worship of Christ, is worthy of special note. In bk. iii. he opposes strongly not only Patricianism, but all theopatia, Θεοπατρισμός and the supposition that the Deity of Christ felt substantialiter the sorrows of the Cross. The dyophysite position is urged with remarkable earnestness, and held to be completely compatible with the unity of the person of Christ. The personality of the Christ the Son of God is distinguished from the personality of the Father, with an almost semi-Arian force, while he holds that the nature and substance of the Father and the Son are one and the same. Sicut inseparabilis est unitate naturae sic inconfusibilis permanet proprietate personae (lib. iii. c. 3). (Cf. here unus omnino; non confusione substantiae; sed unitate personae, of the Athanasian Creed.) Yet though Christ emptied Himself of His glory, He was full of grace and truth. The two natures were united, not confused, in Christ. Totus in patre et totus in utero matris. He suffered in the flesh. His Deity, although it took on Him passible flesh, yet remained impassible, because immutable. The "unction" of the Holy Spirit was received by Christ as man and not as God. Inasmuch as He was the Eternal Son, there was no inequality to be redressed, no imperfection to be imparted. But seeing that there was taken up into His one personality the reasonable soul and flesh of man, not a human personality, but human nature, He could weep at the grave of Lazarus and die upon the Cross. Chapter 20 shews conclusively that Fulgentius must have read as the text of Heb. ii. 9, καὶ περὶ Θεοῦ rather than κατὰ Θεοῦ, as he lays repeated emphasis on the sine Deo. He bore in His cross the sins of others, He had none of His own. No corruption befell His body in the grave; nor did any punishment overtake His soul in Hades. Schroeckh (xviii. 112) speaks slightly of the argument, as simply proving that Fulgentius knew his own position. The author of the Vita assures us that Thrasimund secured the assistance of an Arian bishop Pinta to reply to these three books, and that Fulgentius rejoined. The existing work entitled Pro Fide Catholica adv. Pintam Episcopum Arianum, liber unus (Opp. Migne's ed. pp. 708-720) cannot be the work of Fulgentius; it possesses nothing of his style of address, makes no reference to Thrasimund or to Pinta, and consists of little more than rough invective, followed by a cento of passages of Scripture, which, however, are not taken from the Vulgate as generally used by Fulgentius, but from the old Latin (cf. Schroeckh). The actual reply of Fulgentius, which no longer exists, and his great personal popularity seem to have roused the indignation of the Arian party at Carthage, and to have led to what is called his second exile. This measure was adopted by the king, who directed his forcible seizure. In the dead of night Fulgentius was hurried on board a vessel bound for Sardinia. Contrary winds drove the vessel back to Carthage, where he received a sorrowing ovation on the part of the persecuted church. He is said on this occasion to have predicted the speedy close of the persecution. His biographer adds that he did not boast of any predictive powers, nor would he as a miracle-worker pray for the healing of the infirm, always urging that our prayer should be that the will of the Lord might be done. He discountenanced the idea of miracles, saying that without righteousness they were valueless, and might lead to everlasting condemnation. On reaching Calaris (Cagliari) in Sardinia, he was received by the exiles with great enthusiasm and reverence. Here he remained until the death of the king in 523, and displayed extraordinary energy in his literary, polemical, and monastic work. In conjunction, and with the assistance of Brunsius, the 'antistes' of the city, he built another monastery, where more than forty monks assembled, and carried out the rule of community of property, refusing to allow the possession or maintenance of any personal interests. The equity, benevolence, and self-abnegation of these coenobites are extolled in high terms, but the most interesting feature of his character is said to have been his sweetness and gentleness to the youngest and weakest. His cheerfulness, tenderness, and urbanity, were never disturbed until bound by his office and his vows to act with severity towards insubordination or sin. Symmachus, bishop of Rome, wrote a letter of congratulation to these valiant champions of Christ. (Anast. in Symmacho, Baron. ann. 504.) It was during this period that the majority of his extant letters were penned, for the most part in answer to difficult theological questions that were proposed to him, and it was then also that he revealed his strong sympathy with the opinions of Augustine on the doctrines of predestination, of grace, and of remission of sin, at a time when these were being called in question by the semi-Pelagians of Southern Gaul and North Africa. (Cf. Neander, General Church History, Clark's transl. vol. iv. 417 ff.; Shedd, History of Christian Doctrine, vol. ii. p. 104, ff.; Wiggers, Augustinismus und Pelagianismus, II. Theil, 369-393; Schroeckh, xviii.) The most extended of these dissertations, is Ad Monimum, libri tres. I. De duplici praedec- tinations Dei. II. Complectens tres quaestiones. III. De vera expositione illius dicti: et verbum erat apud Deum. Monimus was an intimate friend of Fulgentius, who had written numerous letters to him, which, until he was in his monastery at Calaris, he had never found time to answer. The main trouble on the mind of Monimus had been awakened by perusing Augustine de Perfectione Iustitiae Hominis, in which he thought that the great African Father had taught predestination to sin as well as to virtue. Fulgentius assured Monimus that God does not predestinate men to sin, but only to the punishment that they have merited by their sins, quoting Ezek. xviii. 30. "Sin," said he, "is not in Him, so sin is not from Him. That which is not His work cannot be His predestination." No constraint of the will is meant by predestination, but the disposition of Divine grace by which God pardons one, though He may punish another, gives grace to one who is unworthy of it, even if He find another worthy of His anger. Here he insists on the point, which had been disputed by Faustus of Rhegium, in the two books he had written on grace, viz., that the good-will, the new heart, the right spirit, are God's gift (Ezek. xxxvi. 26). God begins, conducts, completes, the whole activity of the good-will, prepares us in every good work to do His will. The beginning of our calling, the augmenta justificationis, and the rewards of glory are in God's praedestinatio (Rom. viii. 29). Those who are predestinated to glory are first predestinated to righteousness. He crowns in the saints that which He has gratuitously given, but He will condemn in the wicked that which He has not wrought in them. Pride, not God, is the beginning of all sin. Predestination is always of the good. All evil is from the perverseness of the human will. God foreknows those who are about to sin, but does not predestinate them to it. In this argument Fulgentius appears distinctly to controvert the doctrine of reprobation and to fall short of many passages in Augustine's writings. (Ep. 186, c. vii.; De Pecc. Merit. et Rem. lib. 2, c. xviii., quoted by Mozley, Augustinian Doctrine of Praedestination, pp. 139, 142; see note xix., and Hooker, Ecc. Pol. bk. v. appendix, Keble's edition, p. 730); but he quotes Augustine as in harmony with his own views, to the effect that predestination involves foreknowledge, but not foreknowledge predestination. He also appeals to Prosper, quoting from his Responsiones ad cap. Gall. The second book to Monimus is occupied with Arian questions as to the Trinity, and the Divinity of the Holy Spirit. The gifts of the Spirit may be increased or diminished in a human soul, but this implies nothing to the detriment of His stainless, exhaustless, and changeless effluence of bright beams. The rigidity of his ecclesiastical theory is here conspicuous. The charity, the sacrifices, the services of heretics are of no avail, since they are separated from the Catholic Church. Book iii. is occupied with a reply to the Arian interpretation of "apud Deum" in John i. 1; to their theory that if it had been said verbum est in Deo, we might have thence deduced the identity of the two natures, that apud implies separation and dissimilarity. His argumentum ad hominem is very ingenious, and is followed up by an exegetical argument, which is feeble, as to the identity of apud with in, but he says that both prepositions when applied to God necessitate modifications

During this period, he wrote the Liber ad Donatum de Fide Orthodoxa et Diversis Erroribus Haereticorum (Ep. viii. Migne), which is elsewhere described as a letter to the Carthaginians. His object was succinctly to characterise Sabellian, Arian, Macedonian, and Manichean heresy; he condemns Photinus, and the errors of Eutyches, and Nestorius by name, declaring that the true doctrine of the church was to assert the two natures, as against Eutyches, and to repudiate the two persons, against Nestorius. During his residence in Sardinia an important work was written, in the form of a letter to Euthymius, De Remissione Peccatorum (§ xiv. Ceillier, p. 527, Migne). The question was asked by Euthymius, a devout laic, whether remission of sins was possible after death. After a broad description of what remission of sin is, he declares the human conditions to be "faith," "good works" and "time," but it can only be secured in the Catholic Church, which has power to remit all sin except the sin against the Holy Ghost, a sin which he declares to be "final impenitence." There is not a hint of purgatory, but the utmost stress is laid upon the irreversible condition of the soul at death. Wiggers calls attention to the fact that in this treatise all merits are attributed by Fulgentius to Divine grace, l. c. p. 382.

The three books, De Veritate Praedestinationis et Gratia Dei (Migne, p. 604) are addressed to John and Venerius, to whom other letters were also sent during the second exile (Ep. xv. Ceillier, § x.) on the doctrines of Faustus of Rhegium (de Riez, Riji, sometimes Galliarum). The celebrated books of Faustus, one of the earliest and most celebrated of the semi-Pelagians, were sent to Constantinople, and their covert Pelagianism, under the guise of Catholic doctrine, had produced at the commencement of the sixth century great impression. John, archimandrite, and Venerius, a deacon, sent these books to Fulgentius for his opinion. Similar requests were presented by other ecclesiastics in Constantinople to Hormisdas, bishop of Rome. Hormisdas took a moderate view of the opinions of Faustus, saying that he was not a father or authority of the church, that the matters were open questions, and yet that he himself agreed with tractates of Augustine addressed to Hilary and Prosper. This reply was so unsatisfactory to the Constantinopolitan monks, that the letter was sent to Fulgentius, which issued in the works before us. (Neander, iv. 418-19.) John and Venerius also had sent their own views of predestination to the exiled bishops. What these views were can be gathered only from the reply of the African bishops, also written by Fulgentius, and signed by twelve other bishops.

Fulgentius, in the letter to John and Venerius, lays down, in opposition to Faustus, that grace can neither be known nor appreciated until it is given; that so long as man is without it, he resists it by word or deed. Faustus had spoken of an imperishable grain of good in every man which is nourished by grace. Free-will is this spark of heavenly fire, not obliterated by the fall. Fulgentius urged that there may be free-will, but not free-will to that which is good. John and Venerius seemed to have urged that the difference between Esau and Jacob depended on the fact that Esau was condemned before his birth, because of his future evil deeds. Fulgentius, with more logical consistency, maintains that Esau perished in his original sin; Jacob was saved by gratuitous favour. Divine grace and human will co-operate, but Divine grace always precedes the human aspiration after it. God works in us to will and do; free-will nullatenus efficitur nisi divinitus adjuvetur. The question of creationism versus traducianism is left as doubtful, as it was by Augustine, but Fulgentius maintains that if "creationism" be true, still every child at the creation of its soul receives the taint of original sin by its contact with the body. In the three books, De Veritate Prædestinationis, the purely gratuitous doctrine of absolute predestination is argued from the assumed fact that some infants are baptized, and therefore saved, while a child of heathen or even Christian parents, not being baptized, is condemned to eternal fire! Aeternis et ignibus deputatus. In the Epistola to Pater the deacon he goes even further, and asserts that unborn children, sempiterno supplicio puniendos. Cf. Wiggers, l. c. 378. The case of unbaptized adults differs only by their punishment being not only of their original but actual sin. Book ii. is a repetition and enforcement of his doctrine of free-will existent, but not capable of good. The question then arises, but is never answered, whether it is free? He pours contempt on the idea that the mere dignity or office of emperor or bishop, or the like, can be all that is meant by "a vessel of mercy," he says it may be the reverse, and in a wonderful passage shews the greatness of their responsibilities. (Book iii.) Since predestination is to righteousness, it is no excuse for carelessness. If predestinated, we do undoubtedly and necessarily pray, watch, and practise good works, and bring forth the fruits of the Spirit. While Fulgentius was in Sardinia, he conducted an extensive private correspondence. In his letter ad Gallam, he assured the widow Galla that virginity was a higher grade of moral being than marriage, but he encouraged her to hope that by maintaining her widowhood she might rise almost as high in the kingdom of God as a virgin can. In two letters, ad Proban, virginity for the body and humility for the soul were set forth as the two great graces, and fasting and prayer commended. He introduces the Augustinian doctrine that holy servitude is the true freedom. In a letter ad Theodorum, he appeared very much alive to the advantage of the conversion of the great and influential. In a letter ad Venantium he urged that conversion consists of "the hope of pardon and the acts of penitence, and such a hope of pardon as leads to penitence." Judas failed from being destitute of hope, while many perish now from being too confident of Divine mercy, and thus fail from never performing a true penitence. There was an extensive correspondence on matters relating to chastity, the conjugal debt and the like, which simply accord with the current teaching of the monastery. These efforts of his pen have been preserved.

In the year 523 Thrasimund died, having before his death called on his successor, Hilderic, to swear that on his accession he would carry out to the full the policy already inaugurated against the professors of the Homoionian (Catholic) Faith. Hilderic, with his more orthodox sympathies, had not acquired an adequate sense of the prime virtue of truth, for he considered that his oath would not be violated, if, before his accession, and before Thrasimund's breath was out of his body, he should prepare the way for the return of the Catholic bishops, and the election of new ones in the churches still vacant. On the death of Thrasimund, the bishops were received at Carthage with transports of joy, and none of them with greater enthusiasm than was Fulgentius, who was honoured with extraordinary demonstrations of welcome. Triumphal arches, lamps, torches, banners, accompanied his entire journey to his humble bishopric. On arriving at Ruspe, he yielded in the monastery entire deference to Felix, took the position of the humblest neophyte, and made no suggestion except that of more vigorous work for the cleric, more frequent fasting for the monks. In the year 524 a council was held at Juncensis (Caillier, Vie de S. F. xi. 9, and Hist. des Conciles, xi. 828, gallicizes the name "Junque;" some MSS. of the Vita read "Vinesensis," we cannot identify the place), the object of which would seem to have been the enforcement of a more rigid attention to the canons. At this council, Fulgentius was called to preside. His precedence was disputed by a bishop who was called Quodvultdeus, but it was confirmed by his brethren. After the council, Fulgentius besought out of charity that his brethren would transfer this nominal precedence to his rival, thus heaping coals of fire on the head of an antagonist. The power of Fulgentius over the heart and conscience must have been very great. Even the primate of Carthage, Boniface, sought his presence at the dedication of a new church, and wept tears of joy under his powerful discourse. It was during this period of his life that Fulgentius wrote his great work against Fabianus, fragments only of which remain. Even the fragments are more abundant than many of his finished works. They discuss a variety of interesting problems bearing on the Divinity of the Holy Spirit and on other elements of Trinitarian doctrine. The Sermones, which remain, to attest the power of Fulgentius, are of very different character, and, from his flowing eloquence and antithetic style and tender sensibility, may easily be credited with the power recorded of them. The most noteworthy libri which remain to be noticed are those which were addressed to Scarilas and to Ferrandus the deacon; and one which discussed the Sermo Fastidiosi—the work of an Arian who seems to have roused the placid spirit of Fulgentius into unusual storm; and there may be added the Libellus de Trinitate ad Felicem Notarium. The first of these was occasioned by a letter from Scarilas to Fulgentius (preserved in Migne, Epist. x. p. 377), which brought from Fulgentius a reply—a liber: De Incarnatione Filii Dei et de vilium animalium Auctore. Scarilas had been troubled by the puzzle as to whether the whole Trinity had not been incarnate in Christ, and whether God could have been the author of carnivorous, predatory, and venomous beasts. Fulgentius powerfully discriminates between the Son and the Trinity, and clearly involves himself in the double procession of the Holy Spirit. He claims the Father to have created by the Son everything, every fly and scorpion and tiger. Men are only wounded by the poison and malice of these creatures by reason of their sins. The mightiest beings are submitted to man. There is no evil in nature. In addition, he draws weighty distinctions between the sins of the just and the wicked.

Ferrandus [FULGENTIUS FERRANDUS] the deacon wrote a most abject and obsequious letter to Fulgentius, asking for advice (Ep. xi. Migne) on the puzzling question whether he might count upon the salvation of an Ethiopian, who had come up to the church, as a catechumen eagerly desiring baptism. He had been instructed and prepared for the ordinance, but was taken too ill to respond to the questions put to him at the moment of baptism. He passed into a state of unconsciousness and died. Since he received the sacrament in this unconscious state, is he saved? If the question be answered in the affirmative, Fulgentius was further asked to say whether he would justify the baptism of a catechumen, known to be dead at the time of the ceremonial, and would he do so with a similar hope? Ferrandus argued his first case with great ingenuity, basing it on the practice of infant baptism, and he concluded his inquiry by seeking from Fulgentius advice as to the absolute necessity to salvation of communion in the Eucharist after baptism, supposing death to have intervened. The answers of Fulgentius to Ferrandus reveal, with much vividness, the character of the man, his sacramental doctrine, and the blending with his ecclesiastical ideas some powerful elements of common sense. His reply starts with the thesis that faith is the indispensable condition of salvation, baptism or no baptism. Unbaptized heretics will be condemned, and heretics and enemies of the church will not be saved by their baptism. The Ethiopian gave credible evidence of faith, and was baptized, both conditions being indispensable to salvation. He is therefore saved. But he reprobates baptism of the really dead, on the ground that baptism removes the stain and curse of original sin. The seat of this sin is the soul. If the soul is severed from the body, baptism is worthless. He decides that the benefits of the Eucharist are contained in baptism, and hence, he says, for many centuries past, infants are not fed with the Eucharist after their baptism. Ferrandus also beset Fulgentius with five other questions, to which he replied in Ep. xiii. with much ingenuity.

An interesting correspondence appears to have passed between Fastidiosus, an Arian priest, and several of the friends of Fulgentius and himself, on some of the principal questions at issue in the Arian controversy. The Sermo of Fastidiosus is given in Migne, p. 375. The main point of it is that the Son is factus, creatus, fundatus, that the Homoousians, who assert that the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit are inseparable, must admit also that the whole Trinity took flesh, etc. He argued his points with some acuteness and bombast, and when Victor asked for Fulgentius's judgment on the Sermo, Fulgentius replied with unusual acrimony of language and personal denunciation of the character of the apostate priest. His great point is that Father, Son, and Holy Spirit are meant whenever the word "God" is used. The One God fills all space and time, and the elements of the Trinity cannot be divided. The Wisdom, Love, and Power of God cannot be separated. As born of God, the Christ is equal to the Father, as sharing in humanity and born of a human mother, he is less than the Father is, natum et factum. He maintained the eternal generation of the Son, but also the co-operation of the undivided Trinity in the creation of the humanity of the Christ. He declared that the charge of Ferrandus against the Homoousians is only compatible with the Sabellian hypothesis, which probably Ferrandus would at once have endorsed, but Fulgentius argued that the personality of the Son is that around which humanity, not transfused or changed, is taken up. The sufferings and all the other incidents of the Incarnation were not endured substantialiter, but personaliter. The Divine nature of the Only-begotten God remained impassible while the flesh was crucified and buried. The passion was Christ's quid his whole person, but quid nature, it was the experience of his flesh only. His soul and body were separated at death. His soul went into Hades, His body to the grave, but His Divine nature at that very moment filled all space and time, together with the Father and the Holy Spirit.

Many of the same arguments are repeated by Fulgentius in the Letter Addressed to the Monks of Scythia, who accepted all the decisions of Chalcedon, who anathematized Pelagius, Julian, and even Faustus, and asked for further light. These four monks were, Peter the deacon, John, a monk, Leontius, a monk, and another John, a reader. The reply of Fulgentius and fifteen other bishops consists of sixty-seven chapters. The points of chief interest are that Fulgentius denied that the Virgin was conceived immaculate, and also that when speaking of the eternal generation of the Son, he used the audacious expression, ex utero Patrie. In this work he laid the strongest emphasis on the Monergistic hypothesis of regeneration, and he weakened the universalism of numerous expressions of God's love by declaring that "all" does not mean "all men," but "all kinds of men." The reconciliation of all things to Himself, necessitates a limitation of the all, or else lands one in the admission of the ultimate reconciliation of the devil and his angels. Fulgentius made a belief in predestination to be necessary to salvation. Unless a man believes it, he cannot belong to the elect.

In the work addressed to Felix, a notary, he reiterated his view of the doctrine of the Trinity, and added a dissertation on angels and men antedating a later speculation found in Anselm, that the human race was created to fill up the places of the fallen angels.

While Fulgentius was thus pursuing his literary work with such remarkable industry, he retired from his monastery at Ruspe to another on the neighbouring island of Circina, and redoubled his self-mortifications. Here his health gave way. When told that it was absolutely necessary, to prolong his life, for him to have the comfort of a bath, he obstinately refused it, preferring not to break his rule. He died in January, 533, in the sixty-fifth year of his age and the twenty-fifth of his episcopate, and Felicianus was elected as his successor on the day of his death.

A few other works have been attributed to him: De Fide seu de Regula Veras Fidei ad Petrum Diaconum, which resembles in style and matter his other writings. Wiggers has discussed this treatise at length, shewing the identity of his views with those of Augustine on the original condition of man, the nature of sin, and necessity of grace. Hincmar and Ratramnus quote two passages from a work of his, entitled Quaestiones, when they were discussing the procession of the Holy Spirit, but they cannot be identified (Migne, p. 834). St. Isidore quotes from an account of an interview with Thrasimund, which must have been lost. Cardinal Mai, in the Nova Bibliotheca, published a sermon attributed to him found with his name in a MS. in the Vatican. Eighty brief Sermones, also given in Migne, pp. 856-952, are of various authenticity and value. The earliest edition of his works published at Basle, 1556; again in 1566 and 1587; other editions at Antwerp in 1574; at Cologne, 1618; at Lyons, 1633. They were included in the Bibliothèque des Pères, 1617, Paris. The Liber de Fide is inserted in the sixth volume of Augustine's works. The most complete edition was issued in Paris, 1684, by St. Desprez. Of the arrangement followed in this edition, Ceillier has taken advantage. The whole of his works, with many of the letters to which he replied, are contained in Migne, Patr. tom. lxx.; Schroeckh, Kirchengeschichte, xvii. xviii. 108 ff. For the fragment of another work by Fulgentius see FABIANUS (5). [H. R. R.]

FULGENTIUS (4) FERRANDUS, a disciple and companion of Fulgentius of Ruspe (3); sharing his exile to Sardinia when the Catholic bishops were removed from their sees during the persecution by the Arian kings of the Vandals. Ferrandus received the hospitalities and spiritual consolations of St. Saturninus at Cagliari, and on the death of Thrasimund, A.D. 523, returned to Carthage, where he became deacon of the church. In all probability, he was the author of the Vita Fulgentii prefixed to the works of the latter, and dedicated to Felicianus. (Hofmann, Lex. s. n.; Herzog, Encycl. art. by Wagenmann; Petrus Pithaeus, in preface Lectori, prefixed to Breviatio Canonum Ferrandi, Eccl. Canonum, p. 303. Wiggers, Augustinismus und Pelagianismus, ii. Theil, p. 370.)

Two letters of Ferrandus to Fulgentius are extant (Migne, Patrol. lxx. pp. 378-435), with the lengthy and careful replies of the latter. [FULGENTIUS (3).] The former of these letters asked for advice on the question, whether the baptism of a dying, unconscious catechumen was lawful; and if so, whether the baptism of a corpse was also justified. The second letter concerned the most intricate questions:—1. Of the Separability of the Persons of the Trinity, since the Trinity itself is inseparable in will, nature, and work. (Wiggers, l. c. p. 373.) 2. Whether the Divinity of the Christ suffered on the Cross, or whether the Divine Person suffered only in the flesh. The fifth question concerned the double gift of the cup to the Apostles, as mentioned in St. Luke's gospel. Ferrandus was not only an interrogator, but was often appealed to for his own theological judgment. Among his extant letters may be enumerated those to Anatolius, deacon of the church in Rome; to the Comes Reginus, and to Severus Scholasticus. (Baronius, ann. 529, 9.) In his collected writings (Bibliotheca Patrum, Chiffletius, 1649) some other treatises are preserved, such as one entitled, De Duabus in Christo naturis, and an Epistola Anatolio de quaestione an aliquis ex Trinitate passus est. Baronius (ann. 583, 18) refers this letter to an early period in his career. He charges it with prolixity. It is interesting to see how closely Ferrandus here follows the lead of Fulgentius, by declaring that though one person of the Trinity suffered, it was only in carne. The Comes Reginus, in the first place, asked Fulgentius, and after his death he asked Ferrandus for special instruction on the legitimacy or otherwise of military service, which led to the completion of the fragment of Fulgentius, and to the composition of an ethical discourse, De septem regulis innocentiae, charged with practical zeal and piety. The following are the seven rules:—I. Gratiae Dei adiutorium tibi necessarium per singulos actus crede. II. Vita tua speculum sit ubi milites tui videant quid agere debent. III. Non praesae appetas, sed prodesse. IV. Dilige rempublicam sicut te ipsum. V. Humanis divina praeponere. VI. Noli esse multum justus. VII. Memento te esse Christianum. Ferrandus also edited and completed another work which Fulgentius at his death left incomplete. One on the later Eutychian doctrine of the incorruptibility of the Body of Christ from and after His birth (aphthartocetism). Ferrandus was impelled to both these efforts by the Comes Reginus, who had previously asked Fulgentius himself to solve these philosophical and ethical problems for him. Ferrandus is also the author of a Breviatio canonum ecclesiasticorum. (Codex Canonum, F. Pithaeus, and Miscellanea Ecclesiastica, Petrus Pithaeus, p. 303 ff.) A collection and digest of 282 canons of the earliest councils, Nicaea, Laodicea, Sardica, Constantinople, Carthage, &c. chiefly appertaining to the election, ordination, and character of bishops, presbyters, and deacons, as well as a variety of details concerning the feasts of the church, the duties of clerics, virgins, catechumens, &c. From the mention of certain canons and councils by Ferrandus, it is argued that it must have been compiled during the reign of Anastasius, who died in 518. He appears to have had access to a knowledge of the Greek councils through a translation and digest of such canons as had been previously in use in Spain. The mention of later synods and writings has led others to believe that the Breviatio was compiled at or about A.D. 547. [CANON-LAW, DIET. CHRISTIAN ANTIQUITIES.] Ferrandus took a not unimportant part in the violent discussions produced by the edict of Justinian I., which goes by the name of Capitula Trias (περί τριῶν κεφαλῶν), in which that emperor who was ambitious of securing for himself a place among great orthodox and successful theologians, had endeavoured to conciliate and win the Monophysite leaders over to the orthodox and Catholic church by pronouncing a condemnation on certain passages from the writings of Theodoret, Theodore of Mopsuestia, and Ibas of Edessa, which the venerated council of Chalcedon had approved and endorsed. Justinian was moved to take this course by way of reconciling those Monophysites who felt themselves condemned by the apparent Nestorianism of these capitula, and he believed he could save his own orthodoxy by at the same time "extending the anathema to those who should draw any inference from this document to the prejudice of the council of Chalcedon" (Neander, General Ch. Hist. iv. 269). The tergiversation and vacillation of the Roman bishop, Vigilius, under the threats of Justinian, and under the loud condemnation of the North African church, are among the worst features of the character of that unprincipled pontiff. [CAPITULA TRIA; JUSTINIANUS I.; VIGILIUS.] Vigilius was not a theologian, and he summoned to his aid the powerful pen of Ferrandus to deliver theological judgment on the controversy. Ferrandus was backed by the vehemently orthodox and Dyophysite spirit of the North African church, and in a letter (546) to Anatolius and Pelagius, two deacons of the Roman church, who had been instructed by Vigilius to communicate with him, declared himself against the reception of the edict of Justinian. The following sentences from the close of Epist. vi. Ad Pelagium et Anatolium pro tribus capitulis adversus Acephalos, will reveal the three reasons on which he founded his objections:—1. "Ut concilii Chalcedonensis, vel similibus nulla retractatio placeat, sed quae semel statuta sunt, intemerata servantur." 2. "Ut pro mortuis fratribus nulla generentur inter vivos scandala." 3. "Ut nullus libro suo per subscriptiones plurimorum dare velit auctoritatem, quam solis canonicis libris ecclesia catholica detulit." (Gieseler, Ecc. Hist. vol. ii. p. 101; Neander, vol. iv. 272.) He thus shewed that the opinion of a formidable body in the Western church placed the decisions of oecumenical councils above the reach of criticism, at the hand of Roman or Constantinopolitan imperialism. The judicatum of Vigilius and his 70 bishops, and any bastard document that might be concocted by an individual, and sustained by subscriptiones plurimorum at the instance of an excited partisan like Justinian, thus came under his condemnation. This letter of Ferrandus, with the similar views of Facundus of Hermiane, and the vigorous action of the churches of North Africa and Illyria, who refused communion with Vigilius—the latter formally excommunicating him by a synodal decree—ultimately induced the Roman Pontiff to take his stand for a while on the side of "the calumniated three chapters," and pointed out the supposed necessity for the fifth oecumenical council, the third council of Constantinople, held 553. Ferrandus died before the assembly of this council, certainly before A.D. 551 (Gieseler), in 550. (Gams, Series Episcoporum Ecc. Cath. 1873, Ratisbonae.) The first edition of his works was edited by Achill. Tatius, 1518. The most complete by Chiffletius, Dijon, 1649. The two letters to Fulgentius of Ruspe are to be found in Sirmond's and Migne's editions of Fulgentii Opp. Cardinal Mai has preserved another controversial document aimed at Arians. (Nov. Collect. t. iii.) [H. R. R.]

FULGENTIUS (5), bishop of Bagai, in Numidia, exiled by Hunneric A.D. 484. In the

Notitia he is called Episcopus Vagadennia, whence some infer that the name of his see was Vaga. (Victor. Vit. Notitia, 57 in Migne, Patr. Lat. lviii.; Morcelli, Africa Christ. i. 98.) [L. D.]

FULGENTIUS (6), ST., bishop of Astigi (Ecija) in the first quarter of the 7th century. He was the brother of Leander, Florentina, and Isidore, and is mentioned in connexion with all three. His name occurs five times in contemporary or quasi-contemporary documents, ic.—

(1) In the last chapter of Leander's Libellus ad Florentinam (Holstenius, ed. Brockie, Cod. Reg. i. 405), where his name is mentioned in a passage which has perplexed many critics. In the first part of the chapter Leander exhorts Florentina to hold fast her profession, and not to think of going back to her native country ad "genitale solum . . . ubi si te Dens habitare voluisset non te inde ejiceret." Their mother, Leander declares, had often said to him that even if she could go back she would not, "ut etiam si diu viveret patriam illam non reviseret." "Thou therefore, sister Florentina, beware of what our mother feared, and the evil from which she who had experienced it fled, do thou prudently avoid." "Alas!" he continues, "unhappy me! I grieve because I have sent thither our common brother Fulgentius, and I dread the dangers he may encounter there with a never-ceasing fear. He will be safer, however, if thou, in absence and security will pray for him." This passage, which Florez professed himself unable to understand (Esp. Supr. x. 88), and which puzzled the clear head of Nicolas Antonio (Bibl. Vet. lib. 2, cap. 1, 3), is connected with the general question of the native place, parentage, and early history of this famous family, a question we propose to touch upon under the head of its most illustrious member, ISIDORE of Seville. It will be sufficient to remark in this place that the danger incurred by Fulgentius in returning to his native place at the bidding of Leander—possibly on some family business—was not, according to the common explanation of older writers, a spiritual danger to his faith from contact with Arianism, but is to be explained in all probability by the very plausible hypothesis that the family came originally from territory which after A.D. 554 fell into the hands of the Byzantine troops, rashly summoned into the country by the pretender Athanagild, and the last remnants of which were not recovered by the Goths till about the year 624 (Isidore, Hist. Goth. ann. 554; Dahn, Könige der Germanen, v. 124). Leander, therefore, is speaking of the physical risks run by one who ventures into an enemy's country, though no doubt the elder brother, Reccared's all-powerful minister and adviser [LEANDER], would have known how, in some measure at least, to protect the younger in the fulfilment of his task whatever it may have been. At any rate, Fulgentius returned safely, was made bishop of Astigi (Ecija) in the province of Seville, probably by the influence of Leander, and if so before the year 600 (in which Leander died), and is next met with—

(2) In connexion with the doubtful Decretum Gundemari, 610 [GUNTHER], when his signature as Episcopus Astigitanae Sedis appears, together with that of his brother and metropolitan Isidore, Leander's successor.

5) Among the bishops of the second council of Seville, held in 619, which was a synod of the race of Baetica, and at which Isidore presided as metropolitan.

6) In Braulio's life of Isidore, where among list of Isidore's works we find Ad Germanum a Fulgentium Episcopum Astigitanum Officium scribere docet, and lastly—

7) In Isidore's own preface to the De Eccl. addressed to "domino meo et Dei servo Fulgentio episcopo." Fulgentius had asked him, Isidore, for a short account of the origin of the church offices. "Itaque ut nesci libellum de origine officiorum misi."

8) An account of the supposed translation of the bodies of Fulgentius and Florentina to a safe place in the mountains of Guadalupe, near Salamanca in the 8th century, of the invention of the bones under Alfonso XI. (circa A.D. 1100) and of a transference of a part of the bones to Cartagena in 1592 by order of Philip II., see Esp. Sagr. x. 105. In the same work (p. 90) Florez exposes the confusion with Fulgentius of Ruspe, which began with the story of Tui in the 13th century, and led later to the elevation of Fulgentius to the honour of the church on the strength of works attributed by his namesake. The pseudo-chronicles have been very busy with Fulgentius. For example of their work see the Acta by Roa, in Tamayo de Salazar, Martyr. Hisp. i. 155.

9) Bollandist life, adapted from that by Quintana, shews many traces of their influence. Act. SS. Jan. i. 971; Esp. Sagr. x. 89; Aguirre-Uribe, iii. 324, 355.) [M. A. W.]

FULIBURS, the name given to the third son of Bath. (Mon. Angl. i. 256.) [S.]

FULLANUS (1) (FULLARIUS), bishop of Exeter, perhaps c. 400. There is a tradition that he suffered martyrdom in Germany with Ursula and her nuns, but his very existence is doubtful. (Ughelli, Ital. Sac. i. 844; Capletti, Chiese d'Ital. xv. 497.) [R. S. G.]

FULLANUS (2) (FAELAN, FOILLANUS), a brother of St. Fursey, to whom he committed a monastery at Cnobhaeresburg in East Anglia, where he determined to become an anchorite. (H. E. iii. 19.) After the death of Fursey he is said to have gone with his brother Ultan to Brabant, and to have founded the monastery of Fosse, in the diocese of Cambrai, leaving this monastery in the care of Ultan; he went to Fosse, where he lived for some time under the rule of St. Gertrude. Whilst on his way to visit his brother at Fosse, he was killed in a forest of Soignies by an assassin, about the year 656, and was buried at Fosse, where under the name of Foillanus he was commemorated on June 31. (Mabillon, Acta SS. O. S. B. saec. ii. 25.) Capgrave (fol. 149) gives a life of Foillanus, in which this story is preserved with additions and expansions. Foillanus is there called bishop and confessor, and is described as enjoying pontifical honours, but no explanation of the term is given. It is also said that before setting out on his last journey he gave exact directions for his burial; his speech before his death is given at length, and we are told that his body, and those of his companions, were hidden in the wood. Gertrude, wondering at his long absence, sent to Ultanus to inquire about him; Ultanus replied that he had had a vision of a snow-white dove ascending to heaven. After three days' fast Gertrude set out to seek the bodies, which she discovered by a miraculous sign seventy-eight days after the murder, Jan. 16. Grimoald, the mayor of the palace, and Dido, bishop of Poitiers, were at the funeral. Other lives of Foillanus are mentioned by Sir T. D. Hardy in the Cat. Mat. i. 254. [S.]

FULRADUS (1) (FOLRADUS, FULREDUS), 14th abbat of St. Denys at Paris, principal chaplain to Pippin and Charles the Great, and archpresbyter of France. He was the son of wealthy parents in Alsace, named Riculfus and Ermengarda. He was already abbat in A.D. 750, and for many years afterwards was entrusted by kings and popes with missions of the highest confidence and importance. In A.D. 751 he and Burchard, bishop of Würzburg, went on that embassy from the Franks to pope Zachary which drew from the latter the well-known message, "That it were better that he who had the power should have the name," and which resulted in the deposition of the shadowy Merovingian kings by papal authority, and the election and coronation of Pippin at Soissons. A little later, St. Boniface of Mainz sought his aid. The letter still remains in which Boniface, appealing to his proved friendship, begs him to use his influence with Pippin for his scattered missionaries on the frontiers of paganism, and the little monastery school he has founded, that when his own supervision shall be withdrawn by the death which he feels approaching, they may not be scattered and abandoned to destruction (Patr. Lat. lxxxix. 779). In 754 another mission took Fulradus to Italy. Pippin in a victorious campaign had imposed terms of submission upon Astolfus king of the Lombards, and Fulradus was now deputed to escort pope Stephen back to the holy see with a retinue of Franks. But scarcely had the king crossed the Alps on his return, when Astolfus repudiated his engagements and marched on Rome. Fulradus was the messenger whom Stephen selected to bear the letter summoning Pippin and his Franks to the rescue in the name of St. Peter; and at the prosperous close of the second campaign it was he who was commissioned to restore the usurped cities to their allegiance to Rome, which he accomplished by offering the keys of twenty-two towns with Pippin's deed of gift at the shrine of St. Peter. The pope was, not unnaturally, well disposed to the abbat and his monastery, more especially as much of his exile had been spent there. It was there in fact that he saw, in his illness, the vision in which, as he relates, St. Peter, accompanied by St. Denys himself, had promised him a happy restoration to the holy see (Patr. Lat. lxxxix. 1022). Accordingly in 757 Stephen granted to Fulradus's abbey the almost unique privilege of having a special bishop, elected by the abbat and monks and consecrated by the bishops of the country, to govern their monastery and the dependent foundations of Fulradus, which were under the protection of the holy see (Patr. Lat. lxxxix. 1015). This concession was confirmed by pope Adrian in 786, after Fulradus's death

(xcvi. 1211; cf. Fleury, Hist. Eccles. lib. xlv. tom. ix. pp. 504-5, for the functions of these bishops). Several other bulls in his favour are extant. By one the pope gave him a hospital and house at Rome (Patr. lxxxix. 1018). By another he permitted him the privilege of wearing a certain shoe used by Italian abbats when he officiated at the mass (ibid. lxxxix. 1017); and by another he conferred the right upon six deacons of St. Denys of wearing the dalmatic, the use of which seems to have been a privilege of the Roman clergy (ibid. lxxxix. 1018). Nor were the kings more backward, as is testified by the great number of charters of Pippin, Carloman and Charles the Great, alluded to in the Gallia Christiana (vii. 843) many of which are to be found in Migne, Patr. Lat. tom. lxxxix. and xcvi. and among the Justificatives in Félibien's Histoire de l'Abbaye royale de St. Denys. Fulradus's name is also introduced into the fabulous vision of Eucherius of Orleans respecting Charles Martel in hell. He and Boniface were the supposed witnesses to whom Eucherius shewed the empty tomb, the issuing dragon and the marks of fire (see the epistle to Louis, grandson of Charles the Great, from the bishops at the council of Kiersy in Bouquet, iii. 659, and Enhardi Fuld, Annales, Pertz, i. 345). In 777 Fulradus published his will (Acta SS. Ord. S. Bened. saec. iii. pt. 2, p. 341, Paris, 1668-1701), but did not die till 784. He was buried at St. Denys, but was afterwards translated to the monastery of Leberaw, in Alsace, his own gift to St. Denys. Alcuin wrote an epitaph on him, which still remains (ibid. p. 339). For the life of Fulradus consult, in addition to the above-mentioned references, the Annales in Pertz, Monumenta Germ. Hist. tom. i.; Bouquet, tom. iii.; the Eulogium Historicum S. Fulradi in the Acta SS. Ord. S. Bened. saec. iii. pt. ii. p. 334 seqq. Paris, 1668-1701; Gallia Christiana, vii. 343; Mabill. Annales, tom. ii.; Ceillier, Hist. des Auteurs sacrés, xii. 34, 51, 113, 114; and Félibien, Hist. de l'Abbaye royale de St. Denys, Paris, 1706. [S. A. B.]

FULRADUS (S), abbat of the monasterium Altaichense in Bavaria (St. Maurice at Nieder Altaich on the Bogen Bach, an affluent of the Danube). The emperor Charles the Great addressed him a letter published by Bernard Pez and also by Migne, Patr. Lat. xcvi. 935. The abbat is directed to appear by the 20th of June at Starasfurt with a band, armed and equipped, to join in a campaign against the Saxons. The letter contains minute directions as to the weapons and tools to be provided and his conduct on the march. [S. A. B.]

FUNDANIUS (FUNDANUS), rhetorician of Carthage, shortly before the time of St. Augustine of Hippo. He accidentally became blind in one eye, and the fact of his having had two sons after this occurrence, one seeing with only one eye, and the other with two, is used by St. Augustine as an illustration against the tenets of the Pelagian Julian; the one had by nature what the father had by accident, and the other had more than the father himself at the time had to transmit. (S. Augustin. contra Jul. Pel. c. 6, ap. Migne, Patr. Lat. xlv. 832; Ceillier, Auteurs sacrés, ix. 508.) [J. G.]

FUNDANUS (1) MINUCIUS, procurator of Asia in the reign of Hadrian. He received the imperial instructions applied for by his predecessor Gracianus as to how Christians were to be dealt with (Justin. Mart. Apol. i. § 69; Euseb. H. E. iv. 9). [HADRIANUS.] The result of this rescript would seem to be that a Christian was not to be tried on the vague charge of his being a Christian, but only for some definite breach of the law. For any such breach no plea of his Christian calling and responsibility would of course be admitted, and so Christianity would remain still punishable, but only in overt act. Compare the case of FAUSTINUS (22). [C. H.]

FUNDANUS (2), bishop of Abitina, in the proconsular province of Africa, who, previous to A.D. 303, surrendered the sacred books to the heathen magistrates. The Acts of the martyrs of Abitina narrate a miraculous shower during fine weather, which prevented the ignition of the books which Fundanus had surrendered. (Baluz. Misc. Hist. i. 14; Morcelli, Africa Christ. i. 63; Ceillier, Aut. sacr. iii. 21.) [L. D.]

FURADHRAN (FURITHRAN, FURODRIN, FURODHRAN, FURUDHRAN), June 18, abbat of Lann-leire, son of Moenan or Maonan, of the race of Colla Dachrioch. Archdall (Mon. Hib. 722) identifies Lannleire with a place now called Lynn, in the barony of Delvin, co. Westmeath, and O'Donovan (Four Mast. i. 342 n. v) with the old church of Lynn, on the east side of Lough Ennell, in the barony of Fartullagh, in the same county, but Dean Reeves places it at Dunloer, co. Louth. (Colgan, Acta SS. 713, c. 4, and Tr. Thom. 377 n. 68; Book of Obits, C. C. Dublin, lxiv., lxx.; Joyce, Irish Names of Places, 3rd ed. 311.) [J. G.]

FURIA, a Roman lady, a friend of St. Jerome, and known to us through his works, especially through a letter (Ep. 54, ed. Vall.) which he wrote to her (De virginitate salvanda). She was of the race of Camillus. Her father was of patrician and consular rank, and she was possessed of a vast fortune. Her mother, Tatiana, imbued her in early life with ascetic views, but she seems to have hesitated between these and the ordinary life of the world. She married a son of Probus, who had held the consulate, and her brother was the husband of Blesilla, the daughter of Paula and sister of Eustochium. Her husband died early, leaving her with a family of young sons; her mother also was dead, and her father old and infirm. at the time that Jerome wrote to her (A.D. 394). The year before she had projected a splendid but undesirable second marriage, and her friends at Bethlehem were cast down at hearing of her luxurious life and of the worldly society which she frequented. But she determined to cast all this aside and to live as a widow, and wrote to Jerome, with whom she had probably been acquainted ten years before at Rome, for counsel as to the regulation of her life. His reply is a pendant to his famous letter to Eustochium (Ep. xxii. ed. Vall. De virginitate). His description of the evils of a second marriage, of the dangers of young widows who were known to be likely to marry again, of the flattery of nurses and slaves, of the subserviency of the clergy, are amongst his most vivid pictures of Roman society. He gives Furia a scheme of an ascetic and charitable life and commends her to the pastoral care of Exsuperius, who was then living at Rome, but was afterwards bishop of Toulouse. [W. H. F.]

FURSEUS (I), abbat of Lagny and patron of Peronne, Jan. 16. Belonging to the next generation after Columbanus, and following in the same track of missionary enterprise from the shores of Britain, St. Fursey has left an indelible mark upon the church of France, and upon the speculative conceptions of popular religion of later ages. His visions gave a distinct impulse to the developing and fixing of the mediaeval belief with regard to the condition of the departed, and have afforded, at least in part, the basis of probably the most sublime and best-known poetical production of the later middle age, Dante's La Divina Commedia. With those of Drycthelm (Bede, Eccl. Hist. v. 12) they form a well-defined landmark in the evolution of Christian teaching, as shewing how theological speculation was taking shape in the seventh century, from the few and mysterious unveilings of inspiration to the full-grown eschatological systems prevalent at the time of the Reformation. They are important as indicating the under current of theological and dogmatic thought, which was shaping the doctrine and discipline of the church in the following centuries, and thus have a value and significance far beyond their own individual merits.

For the life of St. Fursey there is abundant material, shewing the hold he has taken upon the Christian imagination. The primary authority is Bede (Eccl. Hist. iii. 19), who professedly quoted from a "libellus vitae ejus," probably written about A.D. 670 or 675, or at least soon after the death of St. Fursey. This is supposed to be the tract edited by Surius (De Prob. Sanct. Vit. i. 258-263), and given, with the addition of miracles, by the Bollandists, Colgan, and Mabillon, but collated with other MSS. Many foreign writers have treated of St. Fursey, of whom O'Hanlon (Irish Saints, i. 224) gives a list. The Bollandists (Acta SS. Jan. 16, tom. ii. 35) give two lives. Hardy (Des. Cat. i. pt. i. 239-246, pt. ii. 794, 795) presents all the MS. authorities, with notices of the several lives. The Benedictines (in Hist. Lit. de la France, t. iii. 613-615) have given a very useful résumé of his life and the foreign authorities.

St. Fursey was of noble birth, his father being Fintan, son of Finlog, a regulus in South Munster, and his mother Gelges, daughter of Adh Finn, a prince in Connaught. The year and place of his birth are uncertain, but his education seems to have been at the monastery of Inchiquin, on Lough Corrib, under Meldan. His first foundation was at Rathmat, now probably Killursa, on the east side of the lough, and there he formed a school or religious retreat, and it may be his church which now stands in ruins at Killursa. He then went to Munster to deepen religion among his own relations, and it is then, about the year 627, that the visions or ecstatic dreams are said to have been given him during a period of extreme sickness. They evidently are the workings of a mind of peculiar spiritual sensitiveness, the imagination dwelling upon the current form of theological thought and moulding it into the clear outline of a divine inspiration. They, no doubt, owe something to the methodizing of the scribe and the spiritual application of the homilist; yet, after all, they present a wonderful picture of early Christian teaching. Bede seems to give a brief summary, or rather only one scene. Desmay, in his Life of Fursey (Paris, 1607), devotes three chapters to describe the falling into the ecstatic state, the visions of heaven and of the torments in Gehenna, while the old life carries him first through Gehenna with all its torments and Satanic blasphemies, to the bright abodes of the blessed, where he meets St. Beon or Beodan and his old master, St. Meldan. Unlike the vision of Drycthelm, the fires do not seem to be in any sense purgatorial, but, like it, the whole tale was used for a homiletic purpose, guarding against and suggesting remedies for special sins, and proposing charity as the surest path to eternal blessedness.

After preaching in Ireland for some time (ten or twelve years seem too long), St. Fursey left Ireland, and was kindly received by king Sigebert of the East Angles, with whose consent he built his cell in the castle of Cnobheresburg, now Burghcastle in Suffolk. Smith assigns this to the year 638 (Mon. Hist. Brit. i. 190, n. 1). At Cnobheresburg he lived as an anchorite, his monastery being assigned to the charge of the two priests Gobban and Dicul. But when Penda king of the Mercians, the scourge of the country and the church, brought calamity around the retreat of the saint, he sought refuge in Gaul with his brothers Faelan [FULLANUS] and Ultan, and receiving land from Erchinoald, mayor under Clovis II., built the monastery of Lagny, "Latiniacum coenobium," near the Marne, six leagues from Paris. The date of this is much disputed: Smith accepts Mabillon's, Baronius's and Fleury's date of A.D. 644, but others think this too early, and Colgan prefers A.D. 648 or 649. In Desmay's life there is a long account of Fursey's progress to Rome, his reception there by pope Martin I. (A.D. 649-55) and his return through the kingdom of Austrasia, his honourable reception by king Sigebert, and his miracles, but this part is very doubtful, and may be traced to his connexion with Sigebert of the East Angles. At the court of Clovis he was very favourably received through the influence of Erchinoald. The fame of Lagny spread over the sea to Ireland, attracting others from its shores. Erchinoald continued to be St. Fursey's liberal patron to the last, and near his residence at Peronne two religious houses were built; Baldechildis or Baltide the queen was also very favourable to him. But before his death St. Fursey wished to revisit some of the churches he had founded, and leaving Emilian or Eloquius in charge of Lagny, got as far north as Macerics or Mazeroëlles, where on his first arrival in France he had secured the friendship of duke Haymo. Here he was taken ill and died. His body was brought to Peronne and buried in the new church upon Mont Cignes; four years after it was translated by Eligius bishop of Noyon and Autbertus bishop of Cambrai into a chapel built for it on the east side of the altar of the same church, and the place became a favourite resort of pilgrims from all parts of Gaul and Britain. The date of his death is uncertain, authorities varying from A.D. 630 to A.D. 660; he died probably about the year 650. His chief feast is Jan. 16, but he is also commemorated on Feb. 6, 9, 25, March 4, July 14, Sept. 17, 28, Dec. 26. At the first-named day he has a place in all the kalendars, and shews a wide extent of popular favour, but Dempster's ascription to him of De Vita Monastica, lib. i., is not to be accepted; Harris (Ware, Ir. Writ. i. c. 4) attributes to him a prophecy, and in Trin. Coll. Library, Dublin (MS. H. i. 11, Nos. 6-7), some poems and a litany, said to have been composed by him, are preserved.

FUSCA, Feb. 13, virgin and martyr at Ravenna under the emperor Decius, A.D. 250. She suffered with her nurse Maura, and by command of the president Quinctianus. (Mart. Rom. ed. Baron.; Petrus de Nat. Catal. SS. lib. iii. c. 119.)

FUSCIANUS (1), the praefectus urbi who condemned CALLISTUS to be scourged and sent to the mines of Sardinia (Hippol. Ref. Haer. ix. 12, p. 287). Tertullian (Ad Nat. i. 16) tells a story of a remarkable case tried before the same prefect. Capitolinus (Pert. 4) contrasts the severity of Fuscianus as a magistrate with the mildness of Pertinax, his successor. It is possible that the same influence which obtained the release of the Christian prisoners in Sardinia obtained also the disgrace of the magistrate who had condemned them; and if Marcia had any share in the appointment of Pertinax it is the more intelligible why she and her advisers should have turned to him on the death of Commodus. The date of the trial of Callistus is limited in one direction by the consideration that in the interval of about seven years between the death of Perennis and that of Commodus, Pertinax filled successively the offices of consular legate of Britain, superintendent of the Imperial charitable foundations, proconsul of Africa and city prefect, so that it seems improbable that his tenure of the last office could have been longer than a couple of years. Hence we conclude that Fuscianus did not go out of office earlier than A.D. 190 or 191. Bunsen infers from his having had his second consulship in 188 that his appointment to the office of city prefect must have been later; but the opposite inference is more probable. A first consulship no doubt must have preceded the appointment, but a second consulship was a special honour, rather more likely to have followed it; for there seems reason to think that it was then usual to give it to the city prefect on the earliest opportunity, if he had not had it already. For many years before and after Fuscianus every one whom we know to have been city prefect, appears also as having a second consulship at what may well have been the same time. Victorinus who was prefect (perhaps immediately) before Fuscianus had his second consulship in 183, Pertinax, his successor, in 192. The next prefect, Sulpicianus, entering on office immediately after Jan. 1, could not be one of the ordinary consuls for 193, but he was one of the consules suffecti. We are therefore disposed to date the entrance of Fuscianus on office A.D. 187; and if we date the trial of Callistus 189, and his return 191, it will agree well enough with the statement of Hippolytus that Callistus was not long enough away to permit the delinquencies ascribed to him to be forgotten. Fuscianus appears to have held office again under Severus, A.D. 197. (Cod. Just. v. 54, 1.)

Clinton, following Panvinus, describes this prefect as C. Allius Fuscianus, and these names, in fact, are found in three inscriptions (Gruter, 126: 786, 10; 1077), though not with any intimation that the bearer held office. Two of these inscriptions belong to the years 140 and 186 respectively; the last would correspond to the date of the present Fuscianus; the other might be supposed to refer to his father, also a Caius. But we think that there is better reason for supposing the prefect to have been the Seius Fuscianus whom Capitolinus names together with Victorinus as having been friends and fellow students of Marcus Aurelius. Victorinus died as prefect some time after 185; therefore the chronology offers no difficulty to his having been succeeded by Fuscianus, who may have been a younger man. And Dion Cassius states (lxxix. 4) that Fuscianus the prefect had a grandson named Seius Carus, who was put to death in the reign of Elagabalus. It must be owned however that historians do not give so favourable a view of the administration of Commodus, as would be indicated by his bestowing the most important magistracy successively on men of high character—his father's trusted friends; and that Dion in particular might have been expected (lxxii. 4) to have named Fuscianus as an exception when he speaks of Commodus having put to death his father's friends.

FUSCOLUS, Usuard. Mart., Hieron. Mart.,

Feb. 2), bishop and martyr at Orleans. [FLOSCULUS.] [C. H.]

FUSCUS, bishop of Capua. [FESTUS (8).]

FUSCUS, abbat of the monastery of St. Erasmus, St. Maximus, and St. Juliana, at Naples. Gregory the Great, A.D. 600, commends him to Fortunatus bishop of Naples and writes on his behalf to Romanus and Fantinus, "defensores." (Greg. Magn. Epist. lib. x. indict. iii. ep. 12-14. Migne, lxxvii. 1075, 1076.)

[A. H. D. A.]

FUSCUS, bishop of Thyatira in the province of Lydia, one of the sixty-eight bishops who signed the protest against opening the Council of Ephesus, A.D. 431, before the arrival of John of Antioch, in which subscription he is called probably by an error of the transcribers, bishop of Lydia (Baluz. Concil. p. 698; Synodicon, cap. 7.) Like many others, he joined the council when it was actually opened. (Mansi, iv. 1224; Le Quien, Orions Christ. 1. 878.) [L. D.]

FUTURUS (?) [PRIVATUS LAMBAESITANUS.] [E. W. B.]

FYLACRIUS (HILARIUS), bishop of Novaria (Novara) c. A.D. 552-568. (Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Italia, xiv. 447.) [R. S. G.]

FYNCANA, Irish saint. [FINCAN.]

FYNDOCHA (FINDOCHA, FRUDOCHA), virgin, commemorated Oct. 13 in company with Fintana, is usually believed to have been one of the nine daughters of DONALD, in the glen of Ogilvie, belonging to the 8th century. But Dempster (Hist. Eccl. Gent. Scot. i. 276), who ascribes to her pen De Vita Contemplativa Commentariolus, lib. i., places her in the sixth. Instead of our finding Fincana or Fintana associated with Fyndocha, the latter is often found with Otha, and hence Fyndocha is identified with OTHA, called also MAZOTA. She is also called by some Frudocha. Echt, Aberdeenshire, has Fyndocha for patron (Brev. Aberd. Prop. SS. p. est. f. 126); a chapel of St. Fyndocha was on the island of Inchald, and Inishail, in Lorne, was dedicated to her. (C. Innes, Orig. Par. Scot. ii. 130; Bp. Forbes, Kal. Scott. Saints, 352 et al.; Bollandists, Acta SS. Aug. 24, tom. iv. 399, giving her among their pretermisi, and Oct. 13, tom. vi. 222-3, treating of her in a long note.) [J. G.]

FYNTANUS. [FINTAN.]

G

GABHRAN, son of Dubhthach. [EUHEL.]

GABHRIN, GABRIN. [GAIBHREN.]

GABINIANUS, or GAVINIANUS, a Christian, concerning whose conversion Augustine wrote to Alypius. (Aug. Ep. 227.)

[H. W. P.]

GABINIUS (1) (GABINUS)—May 30. Martyr, with Crispulus, under Hadrian, at Turres (Torres) in Sardinia. His relics were transferred to the Vatican by pop. Gregory III. (Mart. Rom.

Vet., Hieron., Adon., Usuard., Notk.; Ferrarius Cat. SS.; Till. Mém. ii. 230, 587, v. 143.)

[G. T. S.]

GABINIUS (2) (GAVINIUS)—Oct. 25. Martyr at Torres in Sardinia in the Diocletian persecution. A priest Protus and a deacon Januarius, having been arrested and placed under his care, succeeded in converting him; whereupon he was baptized. He then allowed his prisoners to escape, for which he was executed. Hearing of his death, they gave themselves up, and were also put to death. The cathedral of Torre was dedicated under the name of St. Gabinius, May 4, 517. Tillemont considers the Gabinius of May 30 and that of Oct. 25 the same person. (Mart. Hieron.; Till. Mém. ii. 230, v. 143; Ferrarius, Cat. SS.) [G. T. S.]

GABINIUS (3)—Feb. 19. A presbyter, who was brother of Caius bishop of Rome, and father of a virgin and martyr named Susanna, about whom a number of romantic fables will be found in the Bollandist upon this day (Acta SS. Feb. iii. 61). Tillemont fixes upon 295 as date of her death and 296 as that of her father's. (Mart. Rom. Vet., Adon., Usuard., Notk.; Boll. Acta SS. Feb. iii. 128; Till. Mém. iv. 571, 572.) [G. T. S.]

GABINIUS (4) (GAVINUS) of Huesca (Osca) signs the acts of the conversion council of 589. Antedius a deacon subscribes for him at the second council of Saragossa, 592 (Mansi, x. 472; Tejada y Ramiro, ii. 253, 690). [M. A. W.]

GABINIUS (5) (GABINUS), bishop of Arcavica from about A.D. 686 to about 693, signing the acts of the fifteenth and sixteenth councils of Toledo (Mansi, xii. 21, 84). He is the last bishop of Arcavica under the Gothic rule. (Aguirre-Catalani, iv. 315, 333; Esp. Sagr. vii. 7.) [M. A. W.]

GABINUS, a Donatist who returned to the communion of the church, but without undergoing re-baptism, an omission which Gaudentius professed to blame greatly, but which was defended by St. Augustine, who also denied the insinuation of Gaudentius, that the change had been brought about by compulsion. (Aug. c. Gaud. i. 11, 12; 12, 13; 32, 43.) [GAUDENTIUS (7).] [H. W. P.]

GABRIEL (1), in the Gnostic systems. In the system of JUSTINUS the name of one of the paternal angels (Hippol. v. 26, p. 151). In an Ophite system the name of one of the seven demons (Orig. Adv. Cels. vi. 30). St. Luke's account of Gabriel's connexion with the Annunciation is recognised by MARCUS (Iren. i. 15, p. 77).

In Pistis Sophia (p. 12) it is Jesus Himself who takes the form of Gabriel (described as ἄγγελος αἰώνων), and is supposed by the Archons of the Aeons to be Gabriel. In this form He introduces into the womb of Mary certain heavenly powers, which are to constitute the Saviour's body and soul. In like manner Elizabeth had received an inferior heavenly power as well as the soul of Elias to animate John the Baptist; and the mothers of the twelve apostles each receive a still lower heavenly power which takes the place of the soul, that otherwise would have come from the place of the Archons; so that when the apostles are born no such soul is found in them. This is what is meant by our Lord's words, "Ye are not of this world, even as I am not of this world." [G. S.]

GABRIEL (2), presbyter, abbat of St. Stephen's, near Jerusalem. His memoir by the Bollandists (Acta SS. 26 Jan. ii. 731-2), is extracted from their Vita S. Euthymii by Cyril of Scythopolis (20 Jan. ii. 302-328). He was a eunuch, and with his elder brothers, Cosmas and Chrysippus, men of Syria, but educated in Capadocia, presented themselves to Euthymius, and continued with him in his laura till called from it by the empress Eudocia, wife of Theodosius II., about A.D. 458, who had them made priests and presented them with monasteries. Gabriel became abbat of St. Stephen's in the beginning of 460, and died there about 490, in the 80th year of his age. [J. G.]

GABRIEL (3), bishop of Seville, in the episcopal catalogue of Seville preserved in the Codex Emilianensis. (Esp. Sagr. iii. App. xxii.) His place in the catalogues suits the end of the 7th century, and he seems to have succeeded Faustinus who was transferred from Braga to Seville in 693. (Esp. Sagr. ix. 228.) [M. A. W.]

GACHILOSOINDA, queen. [GALSUINTHA.]

GADINUS, bishop of Lyons. [GODWINUS.]

GADISCALDUS, bishop of Huesca. The abbat Andebertus represents him at the 13th council of Toledo A.D. 683. (Aguirre-Catalani, v. 28.) [M. A. W.]

GAEIDHEAL (GOIDIL, Ann. Ul. A.D. 775), abbat of Clonard, co. Meath, died A.D. 776. (Four Mast. A.D. 771.) [J. G.]

GAFFE, abbess of Gloucester. [EVA (2).]

GAFFO, Welsh saint. [CAFFO.]

GAIANAS, GAIANITAE. [GAIANUS (6).]

GAIANUS, bishop of Jerusalem. [CAIUS (8).]

GAIANUS (1)—June 23. Martyr under Maximin at Ancyra, with his uncle Eustochius, who had converted him. [EUSTOCHIUS (1).] Others of the same name are commemorated on April 10, June 15, and Aug. 31 (this last at Ancyra also), in Acta SS. Boll., about whom, however, nothing of importance is on record. [G. T. S.]

GAIANUS (2), Donatist bishop of Tiguala, or Ticalta, in Byzacena, present at the council of Cabarsussis, A.D. 393. (Aug. En. in Ps. 36, 20.) [H. W. P.]

GAIANUS (3) (CAIANUS), bishop of Medaba in Palaestina Tertia; he, together with his two brothers, Andrew and Stephen, natives of Melitene, were among the earliest members of the laura of Euthymius (Cyrill. Scythop. Vit. S. Euthym. § 41). They were relatives of Synodius, who had been the tutor of Euthymius when a boy (ibid. § 54). Having been sent by Euthymius with letters to Antipater, bishop of Bostra, to obtain the release of Terebon, who was unjustly detained by another Arab sheikh, Antipater was so much delighted with him that he refused to allow him to return, and ordained him bishop of Medeba (ibid. § 97). He subscribed to the council of Chalcedon, 451, by his metropolitan Constantinus. (Mansi, vii. 167 c; Le Quien, Or. Christ. iii. 771.) [E. V.]

GAIANUS (4), bishop of Naisus (Nissa), on the Morava, mentioned by Marcellinus in year 516. He died in exile at Constantinople. (Marcellin. Comit. Chron. in Patr. Lat. li. 939; Le Quien, Or. Christ. ii. 314.) [J. de S.]

GAIANUS (5), a presbyter of Ancyra, who was legate of his metropolitan Elpidius at the council of Constantinople A.D. 536. (Mansi, viii. 937 c; Le Quien, Oricns Christ. i. 466.) [T. W. D.]

GAIANUS (6) (GAIANAS, GAINAS), monophysite patriarch of Alexandria, chosen by the party of the Incorruptibilists, or Phantasiastae, whilst the party of the Corruptibilists, or Phthartolatras, put forward Theodosius (A.D. 537). It was the custom at Alexandria that the patriarch elect should keep vigil by the body of his predecessor, placing the right hand of the corpse upon his head, and after the funeral, in which he himself took part, receive the pall of St. Mark from his neck. Whilst Theodosius, who had been consecrated, was performing this rite, the rabble of the opposing faction broke in and drove him from the city. But Gaianus having held the see for only three hundred days was banished by order of the empress Theodora, first to Carthage and afterwards to Sardinia. The rest of his life is unknown. From this Gaianus the sect of Incorruptibilists at Alexandria received the name of "Gaianites." (See Liberatus, Breviarium, xx.; L'Art de vérifier les Dates, iii. 475.) [J. W. S.]

GAIBALDUS, GAIBALT, bishop of Ratibon. [GARIBALDUS (3).]

GAIBHREN, GAIBHREIN (GABRIN, GABHRIN), commemorated June 24, identified by O'Clery (Mart. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, 179) with Gabhrin or Gabrenus, a fellow-student of Mochus of Balla (Life of Mochus, cap. 2, in Boll. Acta SS. Jan. i. 48). [J. G.]

GAIDOALDUS succeeded Euin as duke of Trent c. 595. After some discord with the Lombard king Agilulf, the cause of which is unknown, he was peaceably received by him, c. 602. Paulus Diaconus calls him "vir bonus ac fide catholicus" (iv. 10, 27). [A. H. D. A.]

GAIDUALDUS, duke of Brescia, father of Ranigunda the second wife of Romoald duke of Benevento (707-733). (Paulus Diaconus, vi. 182.) [A. H. D. A.]

GAIDULFUS, Lombard duke of Bergamo. He rebelled, c. 592, against the Lombard king Agilulf, who made peace with him and received hostages. He rebelled again, and took refuge on an island in the lake of Como. Agilulf pursued him, seized his treasures, and carried them to Pavia. On rebelling a third time he was killed. (Origo Gentis Langob. 6; Paulus Diaconus, iv. 3, 13.) [A. H. D. A.]

GAIDUS, duke of Vicenza, who according to Andreas Bergomas, together with Rotcausus duke of Friuli, after the defeat of Desiderius king of the Lombards in 774, attacked and defeated the Franks at Livenza, and afterwards submitted to Charles the Great. (And. Berg. Hist. in Monum. Rerum Ital. et Langob. 1878, p. 224; Patr. Lat. cli. 1271.) [A. H. D. A.]

GAILA (1), daughter of Gisulf duke of Friuli, and sister of Grimoald afterwards king of the Lombards. (Paulus Diaconus, iv. 37.) [A. H. D. A.]

GAILA (2) (GEILA), brother of Suinthila Gothic king of Spain (621-631). At the time of the insurrection which deprived Suinthila of the throne Gaila deserted his cause for that of Sisinanth. Within the next two years, however, he seems to have added intrigue against the new king to his desertion of the old, and in 633 the fourth council of Toledo pronounced sentences of confiscation and exclusion from communion against both Suinthila and Gaila. The wives and children of the brothers are with them excluded "a societate gentis atque consortio nostro." (Tejada y Ramiro, Coll. de Can. de la Igl. Esp. ii. 314; Dahn, Könige der Germanen, v. 188.) [M. A. W.]

GAILBALDUS. [GARIBALDUS (3).]

GAILESUINDA, queen. [GALSUINTHA.]

GAIMDIBHLA (GAINDIBAIL), abbat of Aran, in Galway Bay, died A.D. 760. (Four Mist. A.D. 755; Colgan, Acta SS. 715, c. 7, calling him Goimdibla.) [J. G.]

GAINAS, a Goth who had taken service in the Roman armies, first mentioned as being appointed one of the commanders of the barbarian allies by Theodosius at the commencement of his campaign against Eugenius, A.D. 394. He was sent the following year by Stilicho in command of the reinforcements despatched by him to Arcadius. The latter, attended by his court, went, at the suggestion of Gainas, to meet them before the gates of Constantinople. After the army had saluted the emperor, the soldiers, at a signal given by Gainas, flung themselves upon the obnoxious minister Rufinus, the enemy of Stilicho, and murdered him before the emperor's eyes. Gainas was indignant that most of the fruits of this conspiracy should be reaped by the eunuch Eutropius, and plotted his downfall. [EUTROPIUS.] Meanwhile Gainas threw off the mask, joined his countryman Tribigild at Thyatira, and marched on Chalcedon. For his demands for the surrender of the ministers of Arcadius, their preservation by the entreaties of Chrysostom, and the firmness with which the latter repelled the demand of Gainas that a church should be granted to the Arians within the walls of Constantinople, see CHRYSOSTOM, p. 524, and the authorities there cited. A peace was patched up between Arcadius and Gainas; the latter was appointed master-general of the armies, both horse and foot, and entered Constantinople with his Gothic followers. The inhabitants, especially the money-changers, were alarmed by the crowds of barbarian warriors who filled the streets, feared every moment that a general pillage might begin. Gainas himself, who had left the city after directing the barbarians who remained behind to await the signal of his return, was repulsed in a premature attack on the walls. He was declared a public enemy, and the Goths in the town, who had taken refuge in the church granted for their use [CHRYSOSTOM, p. 523] were attacked and massacred, and the church was burnt. Gainas retreated to the Chersonese and endeavoured to cross the Hellespont; but his rafts were sunk by the Roman fleet, and Gainas, after losing a great part of his troops, was obliged to relinquish the attempt, Dec. 23, A.D. 400. (Chronicon Paschale, i. 567, ed. Dindorf.) He then marched into the interior of Thrace, but the passage was barred by Uldes king of the Huns at the head of his forces. Gainas made a gallant attempt to cut his way through, but was defeated and slain. His head was brought to Constantinople, Jan. 3, A.D. 401. (Chronicon Paschale, above cited.) For a further account of Gainas, see ARCADIUS, in Dictionary of Greek and Roman Biography, and Gibbon, c. 32. (Zosimus, iv. 57, 58, v. 17-22.) [F. D.]

GAINAS, patriarch of Alexandria. [GAIANUS (6).]

GAINDIBAIL, abbat. [GAIMDIBHLA.]

GAIRINUS (GÉRIN, GUÉRIN), ST., martyr, brother of Leodegarius (St. Léger). He took part with his brother in his contest with Ebroin, and with him was accused of having been concerned in the murder of Childeric II. Though the charge was not proved, he was fastened to a stake and stoned to death, 678. There is extant a consolatory letter to their mother Sigrada at Soissons by St. Léger. (Migne, Patr. Lat. xcvi. 373.) He was commemorated Aug. 25 and Oct. 2. (Roll. Acta SS. Oct. 1, 355; Mabill. Acta SS. Ord. S. Bened. ii. 690.) [S. A. B.]

GAIRO (GAIRONUS, GAYROINUS), abbat of Flavigny in Burgundy, and 31st bishop of Autun, between Moderennus and Hiddo. In the Chronicon of Hugo abbat of Flavigny, Gayroinus episcopus is said to have succeeded Widradus in the abbacy in 663. Later, against the year 755, is placed the death of Gayroinus episcopus, and the ordination of Manasses as abbat in his place, and this statement is repeated in the series of the abbats of Flavigny at the end of the Chronicon (Migne, Patr. Lat. cli. 136, 159, 399). The first of these dates is plainly a mistake, and Le Cointe conjectures in its place the year 747 (Ann. Ecol. Franc. an. 747, n. xxxii. tom. v. p. 180). The identity of the bishop and abbat rests only upon conjecture. (Gall. Christ. iv. 358, 456.) [S. A. B.]

GAIROVALDUS. [GARIVALDUS.]

GAIUS (Basil. Menol. i. 166, Nov. 4), one of the 70. [CAIUS (4).] [C. H.]

GAIUS, bishop of Rome. [CAIUS (3).]

GAIUS (L'Art de vérifier. iii. 36), bishop of Jerusalem. [CAIUS (8).] [C. H.]

GAIUS (1) of Didda (an otherwise unknown place, probably near Carthage), a presbyter who, with his deacon, communicated some lapsed persons without ecclesiastical sanction, and was excommunicated by the Carthaginian clergy with advice of bishops then in Carthage, and with Cyprian's assent. (Cyp. Ep. 34.) [E. W. B.]

GAIUS (Ruin. Acta Sinc. 455), judge at Augsburg. [CAIUS (17).] [C. H.]

GAIUS (2)—Oct. 21. Martyr at Nicomedia with Dasius and Zoticus. Having publicly overthrown the offerings presented on the altars to the gods, they were martyred by drowning, probably in the Diocletian persecution, which raged with special violence at Nicomedia. (Bas. Menol.) [G. T. S.]

GAIUS (Augustin. Ep. 19, al. 84, al. 82. [CAIUS (22).] [C. H.]

GAIUS (3), the name of two bishops, viz. of Adsinvada in Mauretania Caesariensis, and of Uca in proconsular Africa, banished by Hunneric, A.D. 484. (Victor Vit. Notit. 55; Morcelli, Afr. Christ. i. 70, 348.) [R. S. G.]

GAIUS (4), bishop of Tacape in Byzacena, delegate of his province to the council of Carthage A.D. 525. (Morcelli, Afr. Christ. i. 293.) [R. S. G.]

GALACTEON—Nov. 5. Martyr at Emesa with Episteme his wife. (Bas. Menol.; Cal. Byzant.) [G. T. S.]

GALACTION (GALATIUS), bishop of Melos, present at the second Nicene council, A.D. 787. (Mansi, xiii. 372; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 945.) [L. D.]

GALACTORIUS, bishop of Beneharnum or Benarnum, now probably Lescar in Béarn. His signature is found to the canons of the council of Agatha or Agde in A.D. 506 (Mansi, Concilia, viii. 337). He is said to have fought at the head of the Bearnese against the Arian Visigoths, by whom he was defeated and made prisoner. On his refusing to abjure the Catholic faith he was cruelly put to death. This cannot have happened later than A.D. 507, as Clovis passed the winter of that year at Bordeaux, after defeating and slaying Alaric king of the Visigoths. He was commemorated on July 27. (Boll. AA. SS. July vi. 434; Du Saussay, Mart. Gall. 1151; Gall. Christ. i. 1285.) [F. D.]

GALANUS, bishop of Emporias (Ampurias) from 592 onwards. He appears first as archipresbyter representing bishop Fructuosus at the third council of Toledo in 589 (Mansi, ix. 1002 c). He was present as bishop of Emporias at the second council of Saragossa, 592, and at the council of Barcelona, 599. (Mansi, x. 472 b, 484 a; Aguirre-Catalani, iii. 238, 342; Esp. Sagr. xlii. 270.) [M. A. W.]

GALATA—April 19. Martyr in Armenia with Hermogenes, Gaius, Aristonicus, Rufus, and Expeditus. (Mart. Rom. Vet., Hieron., Adon., Usuard., Wandalbert.) [G. T. S.]

GALATIUS, a man who was said to have been desired by Felix of Aptunga to deliver up the sacred books to the agents of persecution. [FELIX (26).] [H. W. P.]

GALBALDUS. [GARIBALDUS (3).]

GALCONUS, 27th bishop of Solis, between Macharius and Gobaldus or Caroboldus, probably in the first half of the 8th century. (Gall. Christ. ix. 339.) [S. A. B.]

GALDUS, bishop of Evreux. [GALDO (2).]

GALENUS, CLAUDIUS, physician, born A.D. 130 at Pergamus, flourished chiefly at Rome under the Antonines, and died in 200 or 201. For a full account of him see Dictionary of Greek and Roman Biography. He belongs to church history only as the author of a few incidental words referring to Christianity that occur in his voluminous writings. Thus in his De Pulsuum Differentiis (lib. iii. cap. 3, sub fin. in Opp. tom. viii. p. 657, ed. Kühn) he writes: "It is easier to convince the disciples of Moses and Christ than physicians and philosophers who are addicted to particular sects." In the same treatise (lib. ii. cap. 4, p. 579) he condemns the method of Archigenes, who requires his dicta to be received absolutely and without demonstration, "as though we were come to the school of Moses and of Christ." In the De Rerum Affectuum Dignotione (Kühn, t. xix.) there are more references to Christianity, but that treatise is spurious. An Arabic writer has preserved a fragment of Galen's lost work, De Republica Platonis, which is to the following effect:—"We know that the people called Christians have founded a religion in parables and miracles. In moral training we see them in nowise inferior to philosophers; they practise celibacy, as do many of their women; in diet they are abstemious, in fastings and prayers assiduous; they injure no one. In the practice of virtue they surpass philosophers; in probity, in continence, in the genuine performance of miracles (verā miraculorum patratiōne—does he mean the Scripture miracles, on which their religion was based?) they infinitely excel them" (Casiri, Biblioth. Arabico-Hispana, vol. i. p. 253). For apologetic remarks on Galen's testimony see Lardner's Credibility (Works, vol. vii. p. 300, ed. 1838). [C. H.]

GALERIUS, emperor. (GAIVS GALERIUS VALERIUS MAXIMIANUS is the full name on his coinage: he is called MAXIMUS in some Acts of Martyrs, that having apparently been his name until Diocletian changed it; see Lact. Mort. 18; the appellation of ARMENTARIUS is but a nickname taken from his original occupation.) He was a native of New Dacia, on the south side of the Danube. His mother Romula had fled thither for refuge from the predatory Carpi, who pillaged her own country on the other side of the stream. In later times he asserted that his father was none other than the god Mars, who seduced his mother under the form of a dragon (Lact. Mort. 9; Aur. Vict. Epit. xl. 17). As a youth he was employed as a neatherd on his native plains, but soon joined the army, and learned war under the stern tuition of Aurelian and Probus.

Without education, and without virtues, he raised himself by his undoubted military gifts, until he was actually selected (in conjunction with Constantius), by Diocletian, to fill the office of Caesar of the East in Diocletian's famous scheme for the reorganization of the empire, A.D. 292. His connexion with Diocletian was thens by a marriage with Valeria, the daughter of Diocletian. There were dread of the marriage, which was anything but happy, but the gentle Valeria adopted for her husband's bastard son Candidian.

[ETIAN.] Galerius had indeed none of the qualities of a ruler, nor any appreciation of his father-in-law's policy, but his authority with the emperor made him a useful coadjutor. Five years after his call to the Caesarship (A.D. 297), he went out to conduct the chief war of the reign of Diocletian, the last which ever gave the emperor a triumph, against Narses king of Armenia.

The first campaign proved unsuccessful through the deficiency of numbers, and Diocletian was so exasperated that he forced the young Galerius to walk a mile on foot behind the emperor in the sight of the army (Amm. Marc. vi. 10). This humiliation goaded Galerius to more exertions, and in a second campaign he routed Narses, and forced him to purchase peace at the cost of five provinces near the mouth of the Tigris.

Little more is recorded of Galerius until the year 303, which brings him prominently in connection with the church. He had conceived a dislike for the Christians, not based, like that of his father or Valerian, on political suspicion, nor, like that of Marcus or Julian, on philosophical disapproval, but originating (so far as we can see) wholly in his fanatical superstition and his repugnance to Christian morality. His mother, Empress Maximiana, appears to have exercised great influence over him, and was a noted votress of the Phrygian goddess and plied her son continually with entreaties to demolish Christianity. Her authority was supported by that of the magician and soothsayer, Theotecnus (Cedr. vol. i. p. 47, 48), who had also acquired an ascendancy over Galerius. The winter of 302-3 was spent by Galerius at Nicomedia, where he used every means to compel the reluctant Diocletian to annul the legislation of Gallienus, to break the forty years' amity between the empire and the church, to crush the religion which Diocletian had conspicuously favoured. His urgency was so great and so formidable (Diocletian being debilitated with the approach of his great malady, and ready contemplating abdication), that step by step he gained his point, until Diocletian consented to proscribe the open profession of Christianity and to take all measures to suppress it of bloodshed (Lact. Mort. 11, "rem sine sanguine transigi"). The first edict of Diocletian, however, was not strong enough to content him. The demolition of buildings which diminished the power of the church, the prohibition of synaxis, the burning of the books of the Christian ritual, the civic, social, and every degradation of Christians, were slow means of abolishing the obnoxious religion. He was longed for more summary action to be taken, and that an assault should once more be made.

His one desire was to effect the removal of Diocletian's expressive clause, that "no blood should be shed in the transaction."

Shortly after the promulgation of the First Edict a fire broke out in the part of the palace where Diocletian lived. Lactantius, who was resident at Nicomedia, asserts without fear of contradiction that it was set alight by Galerius. His object was to persuade the Augustus that his trusty Christian chamberlains were conspiring against him; but on application of torture to the whole household, they were acquitted. A fortnight later the same act or accident was repeated, and this time Galerius (who, ostensibly to escape assassination, perhaps really to avoid discovery, took immediate departure) convinced Diocletian of the existence of a Christian plot. Thus convinced, the emperor signed his second edict, ordering the incarceration of the entire clergy, though even now there was to be no bloodshed, against which Diocletian set his face from first to last.

In Galerius's favour it must be said, that in his mode of putting these edicts into execution he shews occasional signs of an intention to adhere, though very loth, to the principles of Diocletian's legislation. It is true that his return into his own province in 304 is marked by a sudden crowd of martyrdoms where the edicts had before not even been published: but his conduct in the case of St. ROMANUS shews that, when directly appealed to, he felt bound to forbid the capital punishment of even obstreperous Christians (Eus. Mart. Pal. ii.).

The time was coming, however, when Galerius was to have more liberty of action. In 304, probably during a total collapse of Diocletian's health, the so-called Fourth Edict was issued by Maximian, no doubt in conjunction with Galerius, making death the penalty of Christianity. Diocletian began to recover in March 305. For years past he had intended to abdicate on the 1st of May in that year. But now, for some reason, he refused to do so, not improbably on account of the commotion which he found had been caused in the empire by the Fourth Edict. Galerius, who had long looked covetously upon the diadem promised him against that date, would brook no more delay, and with much violence compelled the enfeebled Augustus to retire, leaving himself nominally second to Constantius in the government. The death of that prince in July, 306, left Galerius supreme. It was the beginning of the downfall of Diocletian's system. Galerius was driving the empire wild with his taxations, which were imposed upon the city of Rome itself. Usurpation followed usurpation. The emperor Severus, who was sent to put down MAXENTIUS, was taken prisoner, and Galerius, who followed with a large army to rescue him, learned that Severus was dead, and at the same time found himself deserted by his troops, and compelled to beat a hasty retreat. In 307, Nov. 11, he effected a meeting at Carnuntum (near Presburg) between Diocletian, Maximian, and himself, at which (probably in spite of his father-in-law's advice) Galerius appointed LICINIUS to be Augustus, though he had never been a Caesar.

These troubles had not diverted the attention of Galerius from persecution, which was going on at too great a pace to last. In the year 308, March 31, the emperor issued, in conjunction with his nephew Maximin, a bloody edict against the Manichaeans (*Cod. Greg. ed. Hänel, lib. xiv. p. 44). The question cannot be discussed here, but the writer of this notice believes that he has proved this to be the true date of the Manichaean edict in his essay on The Persecution of Diocletian, p. 279. The same year did indeed see an order to substitute mutilation for death in cases of Christianity; as Eusebius says (Mart. Pal. ix.), "The conflagration subsided, as if quenched with the streams of sacred blood." But the relaxation was only for a few months. In the autumn of 308 a new edict of persecution was issued, which began a perfect reign of terror, not to be concluded till two full years had elapsed. These two years were the most prolific of bloodshed of any in the whole history of Roman persecutions; and the vast majority of persons who in the East (for the persecution in the West had ceased with the accession of Constantine, and usurpation of Maxentius) are celebrated as "martyrs under Diocletian" really suffered between 308 and 311. This part of the persecution bears marks, however, rather of the genius of Maximin Daza than of Galerius.

Towards the close of the year 310 Galerius was seized with an incurable malady, which seems to have been partially caused by his vicious life. This gradually developed into the frightful disease vulgarly known as being "eaten of worms." The fact rests not only on the authority of the church historians (Eus. H. E. viii. xvi. 3 foll.; Lact. Mort. 33), but also upon that of the pagan Aurelius Victor (Epit. xl. 4) and the precious fragment known as Anonymus Valesii. Galerius had all his life been a slave of superstition; and now, face to face with death, and so awful a death, he thought (apparently) that a compromise might be effected with the God of the Christians, whom he undoubtedly recognised as an active and hostile power. From his dying bed was issued his famous edict of toleration, bearing the signatures also of Constantine and of Licinius, which virtually put an end to the "Persecution of Diocletian." This most extraordinary document (which may be read in full in Eus. H. E. viii. 17, and also in Lact. Mort. 34) begins with an assertion that the emperors in their desire for conservative reform, had taken steps to reduce "to a good disposition the Christians who had abandoned the persuasion (sectam) of their own fathers." The origin of the persecution is ascribed to the fact that the Christians had wilfully departed from the "institutions of the ancients which had peradventure been first set on foot by their own forefathers," and had formed schismatical assemblies on their own private judgment. Primitive Christianity is here meant by the phrase instituta veterum, and the edicts had had no object but to bring the Christians back to it. But the only effect of the edicts, Galerius continues, was to bring many into trouble; in spite of them, the Christians would "neither display due reverence to the gods nor pay heed to the God of the Christians;" and seeing this, Galerius was determined, mercifully under certain unspecified conditions, which were conveyed privately to the magistrates, to allow Christianity once more and to permit the building of churches. Finally, in return for this indulgence, the Christians are told to pray to their God for the recovery of Galerius.

Thus did the dying persecutor try sarcastically to dupe the church into believing him a kind reformer, and the church's God into remitting his temporal punishment. But it was of no avail. "The Unknown God to whom he had at last betaken himself, gave no answer to his insolent and tardy invocation" (De Broglie, i. 207). The edict was posted at Nicomedia on April 30, and on the 5th or 13th of May, 311, it was announced that Galerius was dead.

GALESUINTHA, queen. [GALESUINTHA.]

GALINDO, supposed to be the original Spanish name of Prudentius bishop of Troyes, before he changed it on coming to live for his education in France. It is given to him in the Annales Bertiniani, A.D. 861, which seems to be the only authority. (Migne, Patr. Lat. cxv. 965; Ceillier, xii. 493.)

[J. G.]

GALINUS (SALVINUS), 42nd bishop of Auch, succeeding Revelius and followed by Eliseus about the close of the 8th century. (Gall. Christ. i. 977.)

[S. A. B.]

GALLA (1), ST., May 8, one of many martyrs commemorated with St. Acacius or Agatius, a Roman soldier at Byzantium about 308. (Mart. Hieron.; Boll. Acta SS. 8 Mai. ii. 291, 762.)

[A. B. C. D.]

GALLA (2), first wife of Flavius Julius Constantius, half-brother of Constantine I. Amianus (Hist. xiv. 11, § 27) tells us that she was the sister of the consulars Rufinus and Cerealis. She had two sons and one daughter by Julius Constantius. The name of the eldest son is unknown, but Julian tells us that he was put to death by the emperor Constantius II. (ad Ath. 270 D). The second son, born in 325, was Flavius Julius Gallus Caesar. The daughter, whose name is not recorded, was the first wife of the emperor Constantius II. (Julian, ad Ath. 272 D; cf. Euseb. de Vit. Const. iv. 49; De Cange, Fam. Aug. 37.)

[M. F. A.]

GALLA (3), a lady in Spain in the later part of the 4th century, connected with AGAPE in the diffusion of the Zoroastrian ideas of which Priscillian was the champion. Jerome speaks of her as the type of those women who in the next generation busied themselves in the spread of Pelagianism. (Jerome, Ep. cxxxiii. 4, ed. Vall.)

[W. H. F.]

GALLA (4), the daughter of Valentinian I. by his second wife Justina. In 385 according to the Chron. Pasch., 386 according to Marcellinus, she became the second wife of the emperor Theodosius I., and by him she was the mother of Galla Placidia (Zosim. Hist. iv. 43; Chr. Pasch.). She died in child-birth, A.D. 394 (Zosim. iv. 57). Galla, like her mother, was an Arian (Philostorg, H. E. x. 7).

[T. W. D.]

GALLA (5) PLACIDIA, daughter of Theodosius I. by his second wife Galla. On the death of her father, A.D. 395, she and her half-brother Honorius were left under the care of Stilicho and his wife Serena, the latter being the daughter of Galla's paternal uncle Honorius (Olympiod. ap. Phot. Biblioth. lxxx.). In 408 Serena was unjustly accused of being in correspondence with Alaric, who was then besieging Rome, and Placidia is said to have been a party to the cruel sentence which was passed upon her (Zosimus, Hist. v. 38). Two years afterwards the city was captured and Placidia taken prisoner. Notwithstanding that great exertions were made to procure her release, especially by Constantius, her second husband [CONSTANTIUS III et B. Biog.] who was already high in imperial service, she was still detained in captivity, though treated by her captors with great respect (Olympiod. u. s.; Zosim. vi. 1). In January, A.D. 414, she was married to Ataulphus, who had in the meanwhile succeeded his uncle Alaric. The marriage, which was celebrated with great splendour, took place, according to Olympiodorus (u. s.) and Idatius (s. a.), at Narbona in Gaul. By Ataulphus she had a son, who was named Theodosius after his grandfather. He died in his infancy, and was buried near Barcelona. Soon after this her husband was fatally wounded by one of his soldiers, and on his death-bed charged his wife to send Placidia to Honorius. She did not return to Italy, however, until A.D. 416, when she was brought to Ravenna by Euphathius, an officer, who had been sent to Gaul to assist her. She now took up her abode with Honorius, and acquired great influence over him. In January A.D. 417 she was married to Constantius, but greatly against her will. By him she had two children, Valentinian and Honoria (Olympiod. u. s.).

Her influence over her second husband was betrayed in his active persecution of the Arians (Prosp. Chron. s. a. 418). In February, A.D. 421, Honorius admitted Constantius to a share of the empire. The persecution of the Arians was then renewed with great vigour. On November 11, 421, Constantius died. Placidia again took up her abode with Honorius at Ravenna, but a scandal arising from the suspicious relations in which they stood to each other, and mutual affection being replaced by bitter enmity, which occasioned serious disturbances in the empire, she and her children were sent to Theodosius II. at Constantinople (Olympiod. u. s.). After her disgrace she was greatly befriended by Boniface, who was already count of Africa (Procop. Bell. Vandal. i. 4). On the death of Honorius in August, 423, Boniface refused to pledge Joannes in Africa, which he held for himself and her son (Prosp. Chron. s. a. 424). Constantius at once declared himself in favour of Joannes and sent him and his mother with a fleet to depose Joannes. Having been defeated, Joannes was brought captive to Placidia at Constantinople, and immediately put to death (Olympiod. Idatius. Chron. s. a. 425; Philostorg. H. E. 10). Valentinian being but a child, the authority of Placidia was now supreme, and among her first acts was the issue of three edicts in rapid succession for the banishment of all "Manichaeans, Arians, and schismatics, and every sect opposed to the Catholic faith" (Cod. Theod. XVI. v. 62, ib. 63, Aug. 4; ib. 64, Aug. 6, A.D. 425, and another restoring to the clergy all the privileges of which they had been deprived by Joannes (Cod. Theod. XVI. v. 8, A.D. 425). The schismatics whom she chiefly had in view were the adherents of Pope Eulalius, who were still numerous in Rome. These edicts were soon followed by another of severity, directed against apostates (Cod. Theod. XVI. vii. 8, April 7, A.D. 426).

At last, Actius, whom she had long forgiven for betraying Joannes, and who was now greatly in her favour, persuaded Placidia that her husband Boniface, to whom she was under such heavy obligations, was meditating revolt. He at the same time, by letter, persuaded Boniface that Placidia was resolved upon his ruin. His double treachery was but too successful. Boniface, in despair, appealed for help to the Vandals, who gladly responded to his appeal, and Africa was overrun by their forces. Some of his many friends at Rome, who refused to believe that one who had hitherto borne so high a character could be guilty of the treason with which he had been charged, procured Darius [DARIUS, Vol. I. 789 a] to be sent to Africa to inquire into the facts. On his arrival Boniface shewed him the letters which he had received from Actius, and Darius reported accordingly to Placidia. She at once explained the whole matter to her friend, and urged him to do his best to repair the injury which the empire had sustained. But it was too late, the Vandals were masters of the country, and Africa was lost (Procop. u. s.; Augustin. Ep. 220; Gibbon, c. xxxiii.). In 435 Germanus bishop of Auxerre visited Ravenna, where he was taken ill and died. Placidia was lavish in her attentions to him on his death-bed, and afterwards caused his body to be carried into Gaul with great honour (Constant. Vit. Germ. ii. 21, 24).

In the education of her children Honoria and Valentinian she was most unhappy (Procop. u. s.). Both of them disgraced themselves by the grossest misconduct. Her administration of the empire was equally unfortunate. On this account especially Cassiodorus institutes a contrast between her and Amalasuntha, the mother of Athalaric, and greatly to her disadvantage. (Variar. lib. xi. ep. 1 in Migne, lxi. 825.)

In 449 Placidia was at Rome with Valentinian. The legates of Leo had just returned from the robber council of Ephesus. Leo was greatly distressed at what had taken place in that assembly, and bitterly bewailed its proceedings to Placidia, who immediately wrote to Theodosius and his sister Pulcheria, intreating their interference in defence of the faith of their ancestors, and their influence to procure the restoration of Flavian, the deposed bishop of Constantinople. The reply of Theodosius was by no means complimentary. He briefly refers his aunt to what he had written to Leo, simply saying that "Flavian, who is said to be the chief cause of this strife," had been canonically deposed, and concludes with telling her that "he had never thought of anything contrary to the faith," as "some said he had" (Conc. Chalced. pt. i. Ep. 26, 28, 30; Labbe, iv. 5^o. 55, 58). Placidia died at Rome soon afterwards, and was buried at Ravenna (Idatius, Chr. s. a.; Gibbon, u. s.). She is said to have erected the palace which bore her name at Constantinople, and to have done so during the lifetime of her father (Chron. Pasch. s. a. 385). [T. W. D.]

GALLA (6), ST., wife of Eucherius bishop of Lyons (434–450). The legend is that Eucherius, on being converted to a religious life, had himself walled up in a cave on his own estate on the banks of the Durand and spent his time in prayer, that he was taken thence by force and made bishop of Lyons, and that his wife Galla installed herself in the cave, her daughters Tullia and Consortia ministering to her there as she had done to Eucherius. The story of Galla, Tullia, and Consortia, has been supposed to belong to another bishop Eucherius, the name of whose see is not known. (Baillet, Vies des Saints, Nov. 16; Boll. Acta SS. St. Tullia, 5 Oct. iii. 39; St. Consortia, 22 Jun. iv. 248.) [A. B. C. D.]

GALLA (7), ST., confessor, May 31, honoured in the church of St. Venerand at Clermont in Auvergne. St. Gregory of Tours mentions her tomb, between the church of St. Venerand and that of St. Illidius (Greg. Tur. de Glor. Confess. cc. 35, 36). She is mentioned in Molanus's Anctaria to Usuard, as honoured with St. Alexander. [A. B. C. D.]

GALLA (8), ST., martyr at Corinth with Calistus, Carisius, Leonides, and several others, tortured and drowned in the sea. The martyrdom is recorded in most of the old Martyrologies, April 16, but the names are not all given in each. Galla is named in Jerome and Notker; Rabanus calls her Calla. Ado, Usuard, and the modern Roman Martyrology give "Callistus, Carisius, and seven others." [A. B. C. D.]

GALLA (9), ST. The only saint of the name who is in the modern Roman Martyrology (Oct. 5). St. Gregory in his Dialogues (lib. iv. cap. 13. Migne, lxxvii.) says that she was the daughter of Symmachus, consul and patrician at Rome, in the time of the Goths. She became a widow very young, in less than a year after her marriage. She then took the veil in the monastery of St. Peter, where she lived many years. According to the life of another Symmachus (Migne, xviii. 142), Symmachus the father of Galla was put to death in 521. Fulgentius bishop of Ruspe (ob. 539), wrote a letter De Statu Viduarum (ep. 2) to a Roman widow named Galla, supposed to be this saint. (Migne, lxx. 311; Boll. Acta SS. 5 Oct. iii. 150.) [A. B. C. D.]

GALLA (10), ST., a recluse in the 5th or 6th century at Valence where she is said to have lived to a great age in extraordinary asceticism and miraculous works. The Bollandists give her Vita from an anonymous MS. found in a famous old book of saints whose festivals fall between Dec. 25 and Feb. 16, the property of Queen Christina of Sweden. (Boll. Acta SS. 1 Feb. i. 939.) [A. B. C. D.]

GALLA (11), a Roman widow in the time of Gregory the Great. [EUMORPHIUS.]

GALLANUS, Irish saint. [GRELLAN (1).]

GALLBRAN UA LINGAIN, scribe of Clonmacnoise, King's County, died A.D. 768. (Four Mast.) [J. G.]

GALLENIA, martyr. [GALONICA.]

GALLGO or GALLGOV, ST., a saint to whom Llanallgo in Anglesey is dedicated, and who may have lived in the 6th century; the festival day is Nov. 27. (R. Rees, Welsh Saints, 230.) [C. W. B.]

GALLIANUS, bishop, subscribed the third council of Arles, A.D. 461. (Isid. Mercat. in Patr. Lat. cxxx. 382.) [C. H.]

GALLICANUS (1), Roman duke and consul, martyr in Egypt, A.D. 362. The Bollandists (Acta SS. 25 Jun. v. 35-39) have a notice De

S. Gallicano, etc. consisting of a commentarius praeuius, and his Acta, which are not very trustworthy. According to the legend, he was consul under Constantine, and a distinguished commander against the Persians, but by the time of the accession of Julian was living quietly at Ostia; when Julian's anti-Christian decrees came out, he went to Egypt and was with the confessors in the desert; he suffered death in the last year of Julian (A.D. 363). In A.D. 317 Gallicanus and Septimius Bassus were consuls; in A.D. 330 Gallicanus and Symmachus (Clinton, Fasti Rom. i. 370, 384.) [J. G.]

GALLICANUS (2), ST., seventh bishop of Embrun, succeeding Catulinus and followed by St. Palladius (circ. A.D. 524-555). He was represented at the fourth council of Arles by Emeterius (A.D. 524), was present at that of Capentras in 527, perhaps at the second of Orange in 529, though his name is not found in the subscriptions, at the third of Vaison in the same year, and at the fourth of Orleans in 541, and was represented by Probus at the fifth of Orleans in 549 (Manri, viii. 627, 708, 718, 728; ix. 120, 137). He is said to have consecrated the church of the Spanish martyrs, Vincent, Orontius, and Victor, built by Palladius at Embrun. In the life of St. Palladius (Boll. Acta SS. Jun. iv. 96) he is spoken of as preceding St. Palladius, while in the Breviary of Embrun he appears as his successor. This discrepancy has been eluded in the lists of the Embrun bishops by the supposition of two bishops of the name, one preceding and the other following St. Palladius, and this arrangement has been followed in the Gallia Christiana (iii. 1060-1) but with an expression of doubt. Following Le Cointe (Ann. Eccl. Franc. an. 536, n. xvii. tom. i. 457) we have recognised only one. Those who believe in two assign the first four of the above-mentioned councils to Gallicanus I. and the other two to Gallicanus II. [S. A. B.]

GALLICINUS, ST. (GALLITIANUS), sixth bishop of Bordeaux, between St. Amandus and Cyprianus in the latter half of the 5th century. He is mentioned in an ode contained in a letter of Sidonius Apollinaris (lib. viii. epist. 11, Migne, Patr. Lat. lviii. 605). From a letter of the same author, in which he laments the ravages of the Goths in Aquitania, who had slain, amongst others, the bishop of Bordeaux, it has been inferred that he suffered martyrdom in the persecution of Euric king of the Visigoths, about A.D. 475 (lib. vii. Epist. 6, Migne, Patr. Lat. lviii. 571; Gall. Christ. ii. 790.) [S. A. B.]

GALLIENUS, P. LICINIUS, emperor. He was the son of the emperor Valerian, and was appointed by the senate coadjutor to his father very shortly after Valerian's accession, in August 253. In 260, his father's miserable captivity in Persia freed him from an irksome moral constraint and left him politically irresponsible. Some notion of his character may be formed from the words with which he received the melancholy news. Parodying the philosopher who said "I was aware that I had begotten a mortal," he replied, "I was aware that my father was mortal." (Poll. Gall. 17.) Gallienus was a man of marked ability, accomplished and versatile, an orator and a pretty poet, drawn to the mystic Platonism of Plotinus, to whom he was disposed to offer a territory in Italy to be governed on Utopian principles. (Porphyr. Vit. Plot. c. 12.) Yet his character was entirely without moral earnestness. In his cleverness and folly he more nearly resembled Nero than any other prince between the two. He made no attempt to govern. Certainly no man ever had more excuse for neglecting duty on the plea of difficulty. The number of generals who claimed and exercised independent power has been stretched to thirty, fancifully called "the Thirty Tyrants." Gallienus made but feeble and desultory attempts to put any of them down, turning into wretched jests each new humiliation, and taking refuge in sensuality from the hopeless task of state reorganization.

Such a view of his character and of the political situation is necessary to the understanding of the one great act which brings him into church history. On his father's fall, he found himself confronted by the church against which Valerian had declared deadly warfare. He was legally bound to put every clergyman to death wherever found, and to deal in almost as summary a fashion with all other Christians. [VALERIAN.] Gallienus had had three years' experience of the difficulty and wearisomeness of this task. There was no prospect of its coming to an end. The object, too, was not very apparently useful. The "Thirty Tyrants" were foes formidable enough to attract what little attention could be spared from pleasure. Accordingly, in 261, he issued an edict (προϋπάντα, i.e. a document publicly displayed and proclaimed, not an ἐντολή or private instruction to the magistrates) by which Christianity was for the first time put on a clearly legal footing as a regular religio licita. This edict of Gallienus is the most marked epoch in the history of the church's relation to the state, since the rescript of Trajan to Pliny which had made Christianity distinctly a religio illicita. The words in which Eusebius describes the edict (the text of which is lost) imply no more than that actual persecution was stopped (ἀνέσσει τὸν κατ' ἡμῶν διωγμὸν, Eus. Hist. Eccl. vii. 13), which might have been the case without a legal recognition of Christianity; it might merely have implied the cessation of bloodshed; but Eusebius has preserved a copy of the encyclical rescript which the emperor addressed to the Christian bishops of the Egyptian province, which bears a most remarkable testimony to the position which the church had won. "The emperor Caesar P. Licinius Gallienus . . . to Dionysius, Pinna, Demetrius, and the other bishops." The words "the bishops" have a perfectly recognised meaning for the pagan government: it needs no more paraphrase than "the pro-consuls" would have needed. The purport of the rescript is to inform the bishops that orders have been issued to the pagan officials to evacuate the consecrated places (οἱ τόποι οἱ θρησκευσιμοί); the bishops have but to produce their copies of the rescript, which will serve them as a warrant against all interference in reoccupying (ὅστε μηδένα ὑμῶν ἐνοχλεῖν). Thus formally universally, and deliberately was done, what ALEXANDER SEVERUS had but done in an isolated case and in a freak of generosity, i.e. the right of the Corpus Christianorum to hold property was fully recognised. If Christianity had not been explicitly made a religio licita, this would have been impossible. The great proof, however, of the footing gained by the church through Gallienus's edict lies in the action of his successor AURELIAN in the matter of Paul of Samosata. Though Aurelian's bigoted sun-worship and hatred of the church were well known, and his death alone prevented a great rupture, the Catholics were so secure of their legal position as actually to appeal to the emperor in person to decide their dispute; and Aurelian, as the law then stood, not only recognised the right of the church to hold property, but also to decide internal disputes (though they concerned property) according to her own methods.

The most elaborate account of the secular history of Gallienus will be found in Bernhardt's Geschichte Roms von Valerian bis zu Diocletians Tode, part i. (Berlin, 1867). [A. J. M.]

GALLIENUS, a Roman duumvir of Aptunga, at the time of the inquiry about Felix, bishop of that place. (Mon. Vet. Don. p. 160, ed. Oberthür.) [FELIX (26).] [H. W. P.]

GALLIENUS, a friend of St. Jerome, who was with him at Constantinople in the year 382. He probably died early, as we do not hear of him afterwards. He was, however, at the time in close intimacy with Jerome, who made him with Vincentius (q. v.) the confidant of his views as to the text of Scripture, and dedicated to these two friends his first great work, the translation and continuation of the Chronicle of Eusebius. Jerome speaks of Gallienus as "pars animae meae." (Jerome, Pref. to bk. ii. of Chron. vol. viii. 224, ed. Vall. Migne, Pat. Lat. xvii. 33.) [W. H. F.]

GALLINICUS, patriarch of Constantinople. [GALLINICUS (2).]

GALLINICUS (GALLINICUS) appears among the Eutychians, who, claiming to be archimandrites, appealed to the emperor Marcian for a general council in A.D. 451 (Labbe, iv. 524): but the orthodox archimandrites in the council of Chalcedon would not recognise his claim to the title (Labbe, iv. 521 A). His name appears only in the Latin text, where he is described as "inhabiting a 'memoria' with ten persons under him." [Cf. ELPIDIUS (31).] [C. G.]

GALLIONUS, a Maximianist bishop mentioned as being absent from the council of Cabarsussia, A.D. 393. (Aug. En. in Ps. 36, 20; Mon. Vet. Don. p. 258, ed. Oberthür.) [H. W. P.]

GALLITIANUS of Bordeaux. [GALLICINUS.]

GALLIUS (GALLUS), thirteenth bishop of Arretium (Arezzo), c. A.D. 447. He succeeded Eusebius II., and was succeeded by Benedictus. He is said, even while bishop, to have led the life of a hermit in the neighbouring marshes and mountains, only shewing himself to his people when absolutely necessary. (Ughelli, Ital. Sac. i. 456; Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Ital. xviii. 71.) [R. S. G.]

GALLOMAGNUS, twelfth bishop of Troyes, succeeding Ambrosius and followed by Agrecius, was present at the fourth council of Paris (A.D.

573), and signed the letter addressed by it to king Sigebert. He also subscribed the first council of Mâcon (A.D. 581 or 582). He is said to have obtained the relics of St. Nicetius of Lyons, which were placed in the church called after him, formerly dedicated to St. Maurus. (Mansi, ix. 867, 869, 936; Gall. Christ. xii. 487.) [S. A. B.]

GALLONIANUS, bishop of Utica, in proconsular Africa, present at the two synods at Carthage, A.D. 419. (Mansi, iv. 433, 438; Morcelli, Afr. Christ. i. 362.) [R. S. G.]

GALLONISTUS (GALLINOSTIUS, GALLIONISTUS, CALLONISTUS), bishop of Adria, present at the Lateran synod on Monothelism under pope Martin in 649. (Hefele, § 307; Mansi, x. 867.) For the connexion of the see with Rovigo, vid. Ugh. Ital. Sac. ii. 597; Speronius de Alvarottis, Adriens. Episc. 32. [A. H. D. A.]

GALLUS (1) CAESAR, son of Julius Constantius (youngest brother of Constantine the Great) and his first wife Galla, born A.D. 325, appointed Caesar by Constantius 350, executed by his orders 354.

1. Authorities. 2. Life. 3. Character and Relation to the Church.

1. The authorities for his life are generally those referred to for that of his half-brother JULIAN. The most important is Ammianus Marcellinus (q. v.) whose fourteenth book (the first now extant) is chiefly concerned with Gallus. The Arian church historian Philostorgius also records a good many facts about him which are not found in other Christian writers. The facts of his life are given at length in Tillemont, Emp. vol. iv. under Constantius, arts. 22, 30–34, and Julian, 1, 2.

2. The life of Gallus may be divided into two periods: (1) as a young man; (2) as Caesar.

(1) As a young man, A.D. 325–350.—Julius Constantius, the patrician, the youngest and most remarkable of the sons of Constantius Chlorus and Minervina, married as his first wife Galla, a sister of Rufinus and Cerealis, two men of rank, who had filled the offices of consul and praetorian prefect with reputation (Amm. xiv. 11, 27). She bore him two sons, the eldest whose name is unknown to us (Jul. ad S. P. Q. Athen. p. 270 D, ed. Spanheim), and the subject of this article, who presumably received his name from his mother. He was born at Massa Veternensis near Siena in Tuscany (Amm. xiv. 11, 27). Galla could not long have survived the birth of her younger son, since we find Julius married a second time to Basilina (q. v.) five or six years later. At the death of Constantine the Great in 337, Gallus was twelve and Julian about seven years old.

In the general massacre of the younger branches of the imperial family which then took place, the two young brothers were alone preserved—Gallus being ill of a sickness which seemed likely to be mortal, and Julian being an infant [SONS OF CONSTANTINE, p. 651].

The preservation of Julian is ascribed by Gregory of Nazianzus to the exertions of Mark bishop of Arethusa, amongst others (Or. 4, 91), and that of both brothers to the clemency of Constantius, who shielded them from the reviled soldiery (ib. 21). Yet neither of them could feel much gratitude to their preserver, who permitted, if he did not command, the slaughter of their father and elder brother, their uncle and six cousins (Jul. Ep. ad S. P. Q. Athen. p. 270 D). Gallus was at first banished from Constantinople (perhaps to Tralles; see Hertlein's note, ib. p. 271 B), and attended the professors of the schools of Ephesus (Socrates, H. E. iii. 1; cf. Rode, Gesch. der Reaction Julians, p. 27, note 32, Jena, 1877), and was thus separated from his brother, who seems to have remained in the capital. It was not until several years had passed that they were reunited, being then sent to a place called "Macelli Fundus" in Cappadocia by the command of Constantius. Their six years' residence in this retirement was adorned with the state and luxury becoming their rank, but was felt, by Julian at least, to be little better than an imprisonment, inasmuch as they were encircled by slaves, and were debarred from intercourse with the outside world. (Jul. ad Athen. p. 271; Amm. xv. 2, 7, gives the name. His words in xiv. 1, 1, "ex squalore imo miseriarum in aetatis adultae primitiis ad principale culmen insperato saltu proventus," seem a mere exaggeration; cf. Greg. Naz. Or. 4, 22; Sozomen, H. E. v. 2.) Both of them were brought up as Christians, and entered with apparent zeal into the externals of the Christian life. They were even enrolled as readers in the ranks of the clergy, and rivalled one another in building chapels over the relics of martyrs. In one case, that of the martyr Mamas, it was noticed that the work of Gallus succeeded, while that of Julian was continually falling down (Gregory and Sozomen, ut supra). It is not improbable that this circumstance was regarded as ominous, even at this moment, by some of those whose business it was to keep a close watch upon the young princes. It was probably from this retirement that Gallus was called directly to the court to receive the unexpected dignity of Caesar which the childless Constantius determined to bestow upon him. (Jul. ad Ath. p. 271 D, ἐντεῦθεν . . . εἰς τὴν αὐλὴν καθ'ἑρχομαι, and εὐθύς, p. 272 A. Sozomen, l. c., introduces a sojourn of Gallus in Ionia at this point, but apparently from misunderstanding Socrates, iii. 1.) Gallus was now twenty-five years of age, of a tall, handsome, well-knit person, with soft, light hair, and a small beard. He had, however, a brusque and harsh temper, which contrasted unfavourably with the gentler manners of his brother, and which was destined to display itself to his disadvantage in his later years (Amm. xiv. 11, 28; Jul. ad Ath. p. 271 D).

(2) Gallus as Caesar, 350–354.—The reason which led Constantius to appoint a colleague was no doubt the difficulty of the sole government of the empire to which he succeeded on the death of his brother Constans in 350. In the West he was distracted by the very formidable usurpation of Magnentius in Gaul and the less dangerous rising of Vetranio in Illyria, while in the East the Persians were a perpetual source of alarm. He determined therefore to give the command of the Eastern empire to his cousin, in order to turn all his energies against Magnentius. Vetranio had not been a determined antagonist, professing himself throughout friendly to Constantius, and acting, as is said by writers, under the authorization of his Constantina, widow of the king Hanni- (Philostorgius, H. E. iii. 22; Chron. p. 539, ed. Bonn.; cp. Jul. Orat. 1, p. 26 c). After the abdication of Vetricius that the appointment of Gallus took place. Various precautions were taken to ensure his fidelity. He made a solemn oath upon the Gospels not to undertake anything against the rights of his nephew, who similarly pledged himself to Gallus. He received at the same time the strong-minded and unfeminine Constantina as his wife, and Julianus, the count of the East, as his general. (Amm. xiv. 11. 1; Philostorgius, iv. 1, refers to the oath between Constantius and Gallus; cp. Passch. p. 540; Zonaras, xiii. 8.)

Gallus perhaps used his new power to obtain liberation of his brother's seclusion—at any rate Julian was released and permitted to pursue his studies which attracted him at Constantinople. Gallus then set out for the East, and passing through Bithynia saw Julian for the last time. (Libani, Epitaphius in Julianum, i. p. 527, ed. Reiske.)

The records of his short reign at Antioch come to us chiefly from Ammianus (lib. xiv.), who was a native of that place, and evidently not interested in its concerns. They are not entirely unfavourable to him. His policy of the frontier against the Persians indeed to have been not unsuccessful (Zos. i. 28; Philostorgius, iii. 28, speaks strongly in point), but his internal policy was disastrous. He was harsh and impolitic, partly from his cold temper and inexperience of the world, partly owing to the influence of his wife, who is described as miserably avaricious and, in fact, a very fury. The details of his government need not be given here. At last, at a moment of graver moment occurred which could not be passed over. A famine took place in the year 354, and Gallus in his unreasoning way ordered prices to be at once reduced. The people resisted, and Gallus threw them into prison, and would have executed them but for the intervention of Honoratus, the count of the East.

A few days after, the people assembled at his windows to demand an importation of wheat. Gallus pointed out Theophilus, the bishop of Syria, as able to stop the scarcity if he would. The people, taking the hint, a short time after tore him in pieces as he was entering the city (Amm. xiv. 7). Constantius, hearing of these disturbances, secretly undermined the power of Gallus by withdrawing troops from him. On the death of Thalassius, prefect of the East, who had been a spy upon his actions, the emperor sent Domitianus to succeed him, with instructions to send his cousin to Italy. Domitianus, however, of low birth, was too rough for such a delicate task, and treated the young Caesar with cruelty. Gallus arrested him, upon which the senator Montius protested with some freedom of speech. Gallus complained bitterly of this act before his guards, who seized Montius and Domitianus, and dragged them through the streets till they were dead, and then threw their bodies into the river. (Amm. xiv. 7. Philostorgius, iii. 28, gives a slightly different account; Sozomen, i. 34.)

meditated by him were conveyed to Constantius. The emperor, with his usual craft, sent him an affectionate letter and desired his presence, as he wished to consult him on urgent public business (Amm. xiv. 11. 1). At the same time he pressed his sister Constantina to visit him. Constantina, though suspicious, preceded her husband in hopes of interceding for him, but died suddenly upon the road in Bithynia (ibid. 11. 6). Gallus was thus deprived of his greatest support and perhaps also of his wisest counsellor, and was gradually lured onwards, care being taken by the emissaries of Constantius to prevent any intercourse between him and the troops upon his road. At last, when he had arrived at Petovio in Noricum, he was seized by the count Barbatio, deprived of his imperial insignia, and conveyed, with many protestations that his life was not in danger, to Flanion in Dalmatia, where he was closely guarded. The all-powerful eunuch Eusebius was then sent to interrogate him upon the death of Domitianus and his other crimes. Gallus did not deny them, but threw the blame upon his wife. This excuse was not favourably received, and Constantius issued an order for his execution, which took place towards the close of the year 354. (Ibid. 11. 11–23. For the malign influence of Eusebius, cp. Jul. ad Ath. p. 272 D.) Some say that Constantius repented and recalled his order, but Eusebius prevented the messengers from arriving in time to save him, and was afterwards in consequence put to death by Julian (Philostorg. iv. 1).

3. Character and Relation to the Church.—All authorities (including Julian) agree that Gallus was harsh and truculent in temper. Yet he had some popular qualities, and with a little more prudence might have easily made himself a formidable rival to Constantius. He loved the games of the circus, which were the delight of the people of Antioch, and revived the bloody spectacles of gladiators, which had been forbidden since the days of Constantine (vetita certamina, Amm. xiv. 7, 3; cp. Jul. Misopogon, p. 40 A, and the article on CONSTANTINE, p. 637).

In another direction, too, Gallus appears to have been supported by a considerable popular feeling, viz. in his translation of the body of the martyr Babylas, bishop of Antioch, to Daphne, the delicious sanctuary of Apollo in the suburb of the city. Here he built a chapel to the saint opposite the heathen temple, and did something to purge the place of its incontinence and superstition. (Sozomen, H. E. v. 19. Cp. S. Chrys. Contra Julianum et Gentiles, 12. Libanius, περὶ τῶν ἀγγρεσιῶν, t. ii. p. 556 ed. Reiske, in an oration addressed to Theodosius the Great, seems to refer to the suppression of the Maiuma by Gallus.)

His instruction had been Arian under the direction of Constantius, and he seems to have been influenced not a little by the Anomoean Aetius. This notorious man had been sent to him with a request that he should be put to death as a heretic. Gallus spared him on the intercession of Leontius, bishop of Antioch, and became very friendly with him. According to Philostorgius, who reports these facts, he made him his religious instructor, and attempted by his means to recall Julian to the faith, when he heard that he was wavering (Philost. H. E. iii. 27). It was doubtless this Arian connexion that made the Arian historian favourable to Gallus.

There is no reason indeed to doubt that the young Caesar was a zealous Christian after a sort, and that he was distressed by his brother's danger of apostasy. A letter expressing this anxiety, and the relief he felt at the report brought by Aetius, is extant, and is generally printed at the end of Julian's Epistles. Petavius and others consider it spurious, inasmuch as the writer says, "the report has reached me that you are deserting your first religion, which you received from your forefathers" (ἐκ προγόνων). As their grandfather Constantius Chlorus was not a Christian, this phrase has been thought to indicate a forger's hand (see the note in Heyler, Jul. Epistolae, p. 545). Tillemont, however, does not see sufficient reason to reject the letter (Emp. 4, p. 492); and Julian's maternal ancestors had perhaps long been Christians. On the other hand, such a letter, if written, would hardly have been preserved by Julian, while it is just the kind of thing for a forger to invent. I incline, therefore, on the whole, to think it spurious. Whatever may have been the case with this letter, Julian tells us that they corresponded rarely and about few things (ad Athen. p. 273 A), and they do not seem to have seen each other after the meeting at Nicomedia, which followed Gallus's appointment (Socr. H. E. iii. 1, p. 169). Julian (we are told by Libanius) sent his brother good advice; and if he had followed it, he might have retained both his life and the throne (Libanius ad Julianum Consulem, t. i. p. 376, Reiske).

On the relations of Gallus with Libanius, see Sievers, Leben des Libanius, pp. 62 foll. Liban. περὶ τῆς αὐτοῦ τυγχῆς, tom. 1, p. 65 foll. Tillemont (Julian, art. 36) seems to represent Gallus as more favourable to Libanius than was really the case (cp. Liban. Epist. 394 A). [J. W.]

GALLUS (2), the name under which Sulpicius Severus relates in his dialogues the portion of the life of St. Martin omitted in the biography. (Sulp. Sev. Dial. i. init. Opp. Vindob. 1866, p. 152 in Pat. Lat. xx. 183.) [R. T. S.]

GALLUS (3), bishop of Tica, in Byzacene, present at Carth. Conf. A.D. 411, though this was denied by Petilianus. (Mon. Vet. Don. p. 121.) [H. W. P.]

GALLUS, bishop of Arretium. [GALLIUS.]

GALLUS (4), a priest of the diocese of Troyes, who having left his wife and fled to Auvergne, was induced by a letter of St. Lupus to come back. (Sid. Apoll. vi. Ep. 9.) [R. T. S.]

GALLUS (5)—Feb. 22. Consul and martyr at Antioch. He cannot be identified, the name occurring very frequently in the consular fasti of the first three centuries. Syria was a consular province. (Mart. Hier.; Acta SS. Boll. Feb. iii. 288.) [G. T. S.]

GALLUS (6), an early bishop of Aosta, succeeding St. Jocundus. According to an epitaph in the monastery of St. Ursus, given in the Gallia Christiana, he was consecrated Oct. 15, 528, and died Oct. 5, 546. He was followed by Litifredus. Although included by some in the number of saints, he has no appointed day (Gall. Christ. xii. 508; Gams, Series Episc. 828). [S. A. B.]

GALLUS (7), a monk reproached by St. Nilus for writing almost daily to his relatives and cherishing earthly affections. (Nilus, App. lib. ii. ep. 66. Patr. Gr. lxxix. 230.) [I. G. S.]

GALLUS (8), fourth bishop of Valence, between St. Apollinaris and Maximus II. He was present at the fifth council of Orleans, 549. (Gall. Christ. xvi. 294; Mansi, ix. 136.)

GALLUS (9) I, ST., sixteenth bishop of Clermont, succeeding St. Quintianus. His father Georgius was a senator, his mother Leocadia is said to have been descended from Vettius Epagathus the martyr of Lyons, A.D. 177. He was uncle to Gregory of Tours, who has left a short account of his life. From his earliest years he evinced piety and devotion, and when his father would have married him to a senator's daughter he fled to the monastery of Cournon, about two leagues from Clermont, and begged for the tonsure. The abbat refused to receive him without his father's consent, which was at length obtained, though not without difficulty, as he was the first-born of the house. He especially excelled in the wonderful sweetness of his voice, which led the bishop, St. Quintian, when he heard it, to take him away from the monastery to Clermont. His fame coming to king Theoderic, who had collected at Treves many clergy of that diocese, he was instantly summoned to the court, where he soon rose high in favour with both king and queen.

St. Quintian of Clermont and Aprunculus of Treves died about the same time (circ. A.D. 527). The latter diocese desired Gallus for its bishop, but he had begged that of Clermont from the king, who gave it to him, in spite of a deputation from the clergy, who had elected another, and sought the royal sanction with rich presents. Gregory observes here that now was beginning the evil custom of kings selling bishoprics and clergy buying them. St. Gallus used to say that his cost him only the trines which he gave the cook who prepared the feast made by Theoderic in honour of his elevation. As bishop he subscribed the council of Orleans (533) by the hand of Laurentius a priest; he was present at that of Clermont (535); he was represented by Optenardus at the third of Orleans (538), and was present in person at the fourth (541) and fifth (549). Gregory relates several anecdotes and miracles of him. To his intercession was ascribed the comparative immunity of Clermont from a plague (lues inguinaria), which seems to have devastated a great part of France, and is several times alluded to by Gregory. By way of thanksgiving for the deliverance of his diocese, he instituted Rogations in the middle of Lent, in which there was a procession with singing of psalms to the tomb of St. Julian the martyr.

On his death-bed he summoned his flock around him, and partook of the sacrament with them, and after reading parts of the Scripture and blessing the bystanders, he died in the sixty-fifth year of his age. His episcopate lasted twenty-seven years, though Venantius Fortunatus, in his epitaph on him, "forte metri legibus coarctatus," as a commentator suggests, gives the number as twenty-six. Amid lamentations, in which even the Jews took part, he was buried in the church of St. Laurentius at the time of the Rogations he had established. He was succeeded in the see by Cautinus. His day of commemoration was July 1. (Greg. Tur. Vitae Patrum, cap. 6; Hist. Fr. iv. 5, 6, 7, 13; De Glor. Mart. cap. 51; De Pass. S. Juliani, cap. 23; Venant. Fort. Miscell. iv. 4. Migne, Patr. Lat. lxxxviii. 154; Mansi, viii. 839, 863, ix. 21, 121.)

GALLUS (10) II, ST., Nov. 1, twenty-third bishop of Clermont, between St. Caesarius and Proculus. The authors of the Gallia Christiana (ii. 244) quote from a life of St. Amabilis to the effect that Gallus, archdeacon of St. Avols (the twentieth bishop of Clermont), built a shrine in honour of St. Amabilis, into which he translated his remains on the 1st of April, 649. He was consecrated bishop in 650, and was commemorated Nov. 1. There is extant a letter from a Gallus to Desiderius bishop of Cahors (Migne, Patr. Lat. lxxxvii. 265), which Ussher in his Discourse of the Religion anciently professed by the Irish and British (cap. vii.) attributes to St. Gall the founder of the Swiss monastery, but which was undoubtedly written by St. Gallus of Clermont (cf. Lanigan, Ecccl. Hist. of Ireland, cap. xvi. vol. ii. p. 439; Ceillier, xi. 737).

GALLUS (11), abbat, the apostle of Switzerland, commemorated Oct. 16, or according to Usuard and Ado on Feb. 20. The earliest allusions to the life of St. Gall are found in the works of Jonas, the monk and biographer of St. Columbanus, in the Vita S. Deicoli, published by Colgan and the Bollandists [DEICOLUS], and also in the supposititious Vita S. Magni (or Magnoald), given by Canisius (Leet. Ant. i. 655 sq.) and Messingham (Flor. Ins. Sanct. 296 sq.). One primary authority is the Vita S. Galli, compiled by Walafid Strabo, abbat of Reichenau (A.D. 842-49), and published by Surius (Vitae Sanct. Oct. 16, tom. iv. 252 sq., Colon. 1617), by Goldastus (Rev. Aleman. i. pt. ii. 223 sq., ed. 1606), by Mabillon (Acta SS. O. S. B. ii. 215 sq. from the two preceding, with observations and notes), by Messingham (Flor. Ins. Sanct. 255 sq.), and by Migne (Patr. Lat. cxiii. 975 sq., from Mabillon). Another Vita S. Galli hactenus inedita, ex MS. St. Gall. 553, is published by Pertz (Mon. Germ. Hist. ii. 1 sq.) with Ermenricus the monk of Reichenau's notes on St. Gall, and Gozbert the deacon's continuation of the Miracles of St. Gall, the Prologus Vitae Metricae S. Galli ex cod. Sangall. 587 papyraceo; Tentamen Vitae S. Galli adornandae in prosa et metro; Cantilena de S. Gallo; and Genealogia S. Galli (Pertz, ib. ii. 31 sq.). This Vita S. Galli is supposed to have been the life written by Wetin, or Guetin, who was the master of Walafid Strabo, and whose narrative Walafid tacitly followed (Hist. Lit. de la France, iv. 479). The text is given by the Bollandists (Acta SS. 16 Oct. vii. p. ii. 856-909) with a commentarius praevius. (Hardy, Cat. i. pt. i. 230-234, pt. ii. 795; Proc. Roy. Ir. Acad. vii. 374. See also for illustration, Greit, Der H. Gallus; Rettberg, Observationes ad Vitam S. Galli; Hefele, Die Einführung des Christenthums in Südwest-Deutschland; Haid, Licht d. Evang. Jesu Christi in und durch Gallus, Apost. d. Schweizer; Wartmann, Urkundenbuch der Abtei Sanct Gallen.)

Though appropriated by Dempster and Camerarius as an Albanic Scot, he undoubtedly was of Irish birth, and his original name was Cellach, Calech, or Caillech. He is said to have belonged to the sept of the Hy-Cennsealach, and been related to St. Brigida of Kildare. He was uterine and probably a younger brother of St. Deicolus (Jan. 18), abbat of Lure, but beyond his having been of noble descent, and son of Cethernach, son of Oncu, his mother being a queen of Hungary (Ussher, Brit. Ecccl. Ant. iv. 431), we have no further particulars of his lineage. Trained at Bangor, in the famous school of St. Comgall, and carefully instructed in grammar, poetry, and the sacred writings, he accompanied Columbanus into Gaul, A.D. 585, followed him in his exile from Luxeuil, went with him along the Rhine into Switzerland, and, apparently from his aptness at learning the languages, proved a most useful assistant in preaching the Gospel to the Suevi, Helvetii, and neighbouring tribes. [COLUMBANUS (1).] When Columbanus in the year 612 left Switzerland to escape the persecution of the Burgundian court, and crossed the Rhaetian Alps to Bobbio, Gallus was detained at Bregenz by a fever, and we need not imagine, with Walafid, that any unworthy reason could be imputed by Columbanus to his companion for remaining behind. So soon as he could, after the departure of his master, Gallus returned to his friend the priest Willimar, at Arbona on the south shore of the Lake of Constance, and seems soon to have made up his mind to devote his remaining years to the conversion of the wild tribes who inhabited this eastern frontier of Austrasia. Finding a suitable place on the banks of the Steinaha or Steinach, he built his cell and oratory in the midst of a thick forest. Twelve others accompanied him. His collection of rude huts determined the site of the famous town and monastery of St. Gall. Three years after, Columbanus died at Bobbio, and bequeathed to his old associate his abbatial staff as the latest token of peace and goodwill. With that zeal which had urged him to destroy the heathen images at Bregenz, and made him, according to the legend, an invincible foe to the demons of the lake and of the mountain (Pertz, ii. 5), who retired in silence before him, Gallus laboured for the conversion of the heathen, and soon acquired such a fame for wisdom and holiness that, when the see of Constance became vacant in A.D. 616, the episcopate was urgently pressed upon him; and again, in A.D. 625, when his old companion abbat Eustace died at Luxeuil, he was earnestly invited to return and take the oversight of his former home. But with firmness and courtesy he declined both the proffered dignities, and for the bishopric of Constance was allowed to nominate his own deacon John, as the more suitable person, being a native of the place. The sermon he preached at John's consecration is still extant in the Latin in which it was probably pronounced; it is given by Canisius (Leet. Ant. i. 785 sq. ed. Basn.), and Messingham (Flor. Ins. Sanct. 415 sq., Paris, 1624). It is a wonderful specimen of Irish erudition, simple yet full of vigour, learned and devout, giving an abstract of the history of God's dealings from the creation, of the fall and redemption, of the mission of the apostles and the calling of the Gentiles, and ending with a powerful appeal to Christian faith and life, which gives us a pretty distinct idea of the state of the corrupt and barbarous society he was seeking to leaven. But beyond these few incidents we know little of his abbacy and work among the Alemanni and Swabians. In extreme old age he was induced at the pressing request of the priest Willimar to revisit Arbona, but catching a fever there, under which he suffered fourteen days, he died Oct. 16, 645 or 646, at the age of 95, but some would propose an earlier date. He was buried at Arbona.

The sermon—which has received a variety of titles, as An Abridgement of the Holy Scriptures, An Abridgement of Christian Doctrine, A Discourse as to the Way of Governing the Church—seems to be the only really genuine literary remains of St. Gall, but Dempster (Hist. Eccl. Gent. Scot. i. 299–301) attributes to him many other works. Tanner (Bibl. 307) adds Epistola ad Desiderium from Ussher (Sylloge, Wks. iv. 430), but Lanigan follows Basnage and the writer in Hist. Lit. de la France in thinking the Epistles given by Canisius and Ussher were the work of Gallus the Younger, bishop of Clermont. (Camerarius, de Scot. Fort. 180, and Kal. Oct. 16; Leslaeus, de Reb. Gest. Scot. i. iv. 146, 147; Cave, Script. Eccl. Hist. Lit. 452.)

The oratory of St. Gall gave rise to one of the most celebrated monasteries of the middle ages, and its library to this day stands unrivalled in the wealth and variety of its ancient manuscripts. (For an account of the school of St. Gall and its cultivation of the fine arts, see Hist. Lit. de la France, iv. 243–246.) [J. G.]

GALNUTIUS, saint. [WINWALLUS.]

GALONICA, ST. (GELONICA, GALLERIA), the companion of St. Aquilina. They were at first employed to draw St. CHRISTOPHER from the faith, but being converted suffered martyrdom. There is some obscurity as to whether the so-called Mozarabic breviary hymn does not represent them as soldiers (Liturg. Mozar., Migne, ii. 1167, contrasted with i. 795 n., 799 n.) instead of women, as in the later Western authorities. The name of Aquilina's companion has other variations, 'Niceta' (Baronius, Surius, 12th-cent. Passionale), and 'Nicaea,' or 'Nicaea' (Walter of Spiers, Legenda Aurea, etc.). They are commemorated in the Roman martyrology July 24. Mr. Baring-Gould mentions also Calinice as an alias for Aquilina. [Chr. W.]

GALSUINTHA (GACHILOSOINDA, GALSONTA, GELESUINTHA, GALESWINTHE, GAILESUINDA, CHILSUINTA, GAUSUENDA), wife of Chilperic I. king of the Franks; daughter of Athanagild king of the Visigoths of Spain and Goisuinta. In 567 Sigebert, one of Chilperic's brothers, married Brunichilde the younger sister of Galsuinta. Chilperic was stirred to emulation, and the same year sent an embassy to ask for the elder. His envoys were instructed to give assurances that, if his request were granted, he would put away the women with whom he had been living. Athanagild consented, and the bride elect was escorted in a triumphal progress through France, and received by Chilperic with great honour at Rouen. Before her marriage she abjured the Arian heresy in which she had been brought up, and was baptized into the Catholic communion. For a short time the king loved her much, for, as Gregory explains, she had brought much treasure. But very soon he forgot the promise which he had made to her father, to relinquish his other women, and Fredegund resumed her influence. Slighted by her husband and insulted by his mistress, Galsuinta, weary of vain remonstrances, offered to give up her dowry if only she were sent back to Spain. Chilperic dissembled, and sought to soothe her with reassuring words, but, at Fredegund's instigation, secretly instructed a slave to strangle her in her bed. After a few days' feigned mourning, the king married Fredegund. Galsuinta's sanctity was said to have been attested by a miracle at her tomb. Chilperic could not conceal his guilt from his brothers, who, urged on by Sigebert, undertook to avenge her death by depriving him of his kingdom. The quarrel was not finally composed till, by the treaty of Andelot, twenty years later, the five towns of Aquitaine, Limoges, Cahors, Bordeaux, Béarn and Bigorre, which formed Galsuinta's Morgengabe, were made over to Brunichilde (Greg. Tur. ix. 20). The chief authorities for Galsuinta's life are Greg. Tur. Hist. Franc. iv. 28; Epitomata, lx.; Aimoin, iii. 5, Migne, Patr. Lat. cxxxix. 695; and the poem written in her honour by Venantius Fortunatus (vi. 7, in Migne, Patr. Lat. lxxxviii. 215–226). As to the last, however, though graphic in its details, it is not quite apparent how far the author has drawn on his own imagination. For modern accounts of this marriage see Löbell, Greg. von Tours, p. 314, seqq., Dreux du Radier, Mémoires, &c. des Rois de France, i. 223–9 and the somewhat highly-coloured story of Augustus Thierry (Récits des Temps Mérovingiens, i.). GAMALIEL (1) I., also called GAMALIEL THE ELDER, RABBAN GAMALIEL, or simply GAMALIEL, son of the patriarch Simon I., grandson of Hillel I., of the royal family of David. He succeeded to the presidency of the Sanhedrin, A.D. 30, in the reign of Agrippa I., and was one of the most distinguished doctors of the law at the beginning of the apostolic age. The fact that Gamaliel succeeded to the patriarchate about the same time that Christ came forward as the Messiah, that he propounded the law when Jesus preached the gospel, that he was the teacher of the apostle Paul, whose character he greatly moulded, and that it was before him in council that the apostle Peter was brought, makes any information which we may obtain about the teachings of this remarkable rabbi of the utmost importance to the student of ecclesiastical history and antiquity. His great maxim was to search the Scriptures to ascertain their true import, and faithfully to pay to the Lord's sanctuary what belongs to the Lord. Hence he urged on his disciples to put themselves under approved teachers of the word of God, so as to learn rightly to divide the word of truth, to shun every species of doubt which leads to transgression, and not to pay the dues prescribed in the divine law according to conjecture. "Secure for thyself a teacher, keep thyself from doubting, and do not pay thy tithes conjecturally too often" (Aboth, i. 16). How this maxim operated on the Great Apostle of the les may be seen from a comparison of Rom. 13; 1 Tim. ii. 8; 2 Tim. ii. 15. What distinguishes him most are the benign statutes he promulgated to protect the helpless, to relieve the condition of the oppressed, and to give part relief to all needy irrespective of creed or nationality, thus seeking to exalt the Mosaic law by setting forth the humane lessons which it teaches, as will be seen from the following enactments.

The Mosaic laws about the sabbath, which state that "no man must go out of his place on the seventh day," and "that no manner of work be done in it" (Exod. xvi. 29, xx. 10 with Num. xvi. 21, 22; Neh. x. 32, xiii. 15-19), understood to involve abstention from the use of arms on this sacred day. Hence the valiant Jewish soldiers allowed themselves to be massacred by the enemy rather than violate the sabbath (1 Maccab. i. 32, &c.; 2 Maccab. vi. Josephus, Antiq. XII. vi. 2; War, II. xvi. Though the law was afterwards interpreted leniently, viz. that it was only offensive which was prohibited, and that it did not forbid defensive action (1 Maccab. xi. 34, 43, &c.; Josephus, Antiq. XIII. i. 3, XIV. vi. 2; War, II. 4), still it was held that it forbids the soldiers to return home and carry their weapons on the sabbath if at the termination of the war they are more than a sabbath day's journey from their homes. Now it was Gamaliel who interpreted the law still more liberally, and decided that all persons called out to resist the invasions or to render help at inundations, fires, or at the falling down of houses, or child-birth, might walk 2000 yards, that is 6 Roman miles, or sabbath-day's journey (מסורת שבת = תחום שבת), as it is called in the New Testament (Acts i. 12), in any case (Erubin, 45; Rosh Ha-Shana, 23). It is this canon which gave rise to the beautiful השבת מסורה בידכם ולא אתם מסורים לה, the Sabbath is delivered into your hands, you into its hands (Yoma, 85 b), alluded to by our Saviour (Mark ii. 27).

The rather uncertain grounds on which Mosaic law permits divorce (Deut. xxiv. 1-4) exposed women in the time of Christ to great distress on the part of unprincipled husbands who gave rise to social disorders. A husband who sent a bill of divorce to his wife by a messenger could revoke it in any court of justice, causing the greatest inconvenience to the woman and her children, inasmuch as she could not be sure whether she was free or not. Gamaliel ordained that the husband could only annul it in the presence of the same messenger who carried it (Gittin, 32).

II. At the time of Christ and in the apostolic age many of the Jews had duplicate names, Hebrew and Greek. The practice of only signing one name in legal documents exposed the man to the mercy of an unprincipled husband, inasmuch as he could insist on the instrument being invalid. Gamaliel, by decreeing that the name "and every other name which describes the person" should be added to the signature (Gittin, 34), protected the helpless woman.

IV. According to the ancient law it required two witnesses to attest the death of a person in order to declare a married woman legally a widow. This caused the greatest inconvenience, inasmuch as it was not always possible to produce two witnesses. Gamaliel ordained that upon the mouth of one witness shall the thing be established (Yebamoth, 116).

V. According to a custom already alluded to in the Book of Tobit (vii. 5), every Jew had to make a settlement on his wife on day of marriage (כתובה). Unscrupulous children not unfrequently deprived their widowed mother of this settlement by declaring that she had compounded for it in the lifetime of their father. Gamaliel enacted that her declaration to the effect that she had not relinquished the portion due to her is to be taken as binding (Gittin, 34). It is this special legislation for the protection of widows, which throws light on his disciple's advice on the same subject (1 Tim. v. 1-16).

VI. He ordained that the poor heathen should have the same right as the poor Jews to gather the gleanings after the harvest, that equal provision should be made for both, that the sick heathen should be attended to, that the last honours should be paid to their dead, and that non-Israelite mourners should be comforted in towns which are inhabited by both Jews and Gentiles (Gittin, 59-61, &c.; Jerusalem Gittin, v.). This lesson to care for the poor of all nations, without distinction of creed, which Gamaliel inculcated on his disciples, illustrates the remark of the Apostle to the Galatians, vi. 10.

VII. The authority which he, as president of the Sanhedrin, exercised over the Jewish communities out of Palestine, and which may be seen from his edicts still extant, not only shews the ecclesiastical organization at the time of Christ and the apostles, but throws light upon an incident in the life of St. Paul recorded in the New Testament. On one occasion when he was on a journey in Syria, the Sanhedrin at Jerusalem had to declare the year intercalary, but they did it subject to his approval, and when Gamaliel returned he said, "I am satisfied therewith, and the year was intercalary" (Mishna Eduyoth, vii. 7; Sanhedrin, ii. 6). As both the form and the language of these decrees are of the utmost importance to the student of Christian antiquities, and the history of the apostolic age, we give a translation of one of them, subjoining the original in the foot-note.* "To our brethren the exiles in Babylon, the exiles in Media, the exiles in Greece, and to all other exiles of Israel, peace be multiplied to you. We make known to you that the lambs of this year are still tender, the pigeons are not yet fledged, and the spring is altogether late. It hath therefore pleased me and my colleagues to lengthen the present year by thirty days." (Comp. Jerusalem Sanhedrin, i. 2.) This document explains the fact mentioned in Acts ix. 1, 2; xxii. 5, that letters from the Sanhedrin in Jerusalem authorising a certain thing were binding upon the Jewish communities far and wide, and that which was therein set forth was strictly obeyed. It moreover shews that the language of the Jews at that time, both in Palestine and elsewhere, was Aramaic.

VIII. An incident in the life of R. Gamaliel, related in different parts of the Talmud, is an important contribution to the history of the Septuagint. We are told that when he was once sitting on the Temple mount, the Greek version of Job was for the first time shewn to him. He, however, so strongly disapproved of this book being popularised that he ordered the builders who were working at the temple to immure the copy in the wall (Jerusalem Sabbath, xvii. 1; Tosephta Sabbath, xiv. p. 128, ed. Zuckermann; Babylon Sabbath, 115 a; Sopherim, v. 15). It will thus be seen that at the time of Agrippa I. the Greek translation of Job was unknown in Palestine, and that when a single copy was brought either from Egypt or Syria to R. Gamaliel, he at once had it concealed (ἀποκρύψεν) for had other copies of it been in circulation at that time, the concealing of this single copy would have been useless (comp. Graetz, Monatschrift, xxvi. 83-91; Ginsburg, Commentary on Sopherim, v. 15).

IX. So great was the esteem in which he was held by the nation at large, that he was the first patriarch or president of the Sanhedrin, who was honoured with the title rabban (רַבָּן), the master, the teacher, which is the Aramaic form of the Hebrew rab (רַב), used in Babylon, and with suffix Rabbi (רַבִּי) used in Palestine, (Tosephta Eduyoth). Rabban (רַבָּן = 'Paßßov) however, is the highest title of the three forms, and is rendered still more venerable by the pronominal suffix, first person, viz. rabboni (רַבִּי = 'Paßßov) my master, or rabboni, as it is pronounced in Aramaic. It was the desire of blind Bartimeus and of Mary Magdalene to shew the greatest veneration for Christ, which made them call Him by the most distinguished title recently bestowed upon the highest and most honoured person of the whole Jewish nation (Mark x. 51; John xx. 16). Though it is difficult adequately to render this title in English; yet it will be seen that of the two passages in which it occurs in the New Testament, the first (Mark x. 51) fails to give the force in the authorised version, whilst the second (John xx. 16) conveys a feeble idea of the original, since it makes it equivalent to Rabbi (רַבִּי 'Paßßi), which occurs fifteen times in the New Testament (Matt. xxiii. 7, 8; xxvi. 25, 49; Mark ix. 5; xi. 21; xiv. 45; John i. 33, 39; iii. 2, 26; iv. 31; vi. 25; ix. 2; xi. 8), and is translated by the same expression master eight times (Matt. xxvi. 25, 49; Mark ix. 5; xi. 21; xiv. 45; John iv. 31; ix. 2; xi. 8), though it is lower in degree than rabboni.

X. His absolute faith in the ultimate victory of Divine truth, his great liberality of sentiments, and his prudence and humane conduct in the treatment of those who conscientiously differed from him in matters of religion are attested by the record in the New Testament of the wise counsel which he gave about the treatment of the Apostles (Acts v. 34-40). That he composed or sanctioned the well-known prayer against Christian heretics, as is asserted by Conybeare and Howson (Life and Epistles of St. Paul, i. 70, London, 1862), is utterly at variance with his tolerant and humane nature, and with the description given of him in the New Testament. This erroneous notion has arisen from a confusion of Gamaliel I. with his grandson Gamaliel II. More charitable, but equally erroneous, is the ancient tradition contained in the Clementine Recognitions (i. 65, 66), that he was a secret believer in Christ, and that he only remained among the Jews by the advice of the Apostles. He died in office as president of the Sanhedrin and patriarch of the Jewish nation. How he was honoured in life and revered in death may be gathered from the epitaph to which the whole nation gave expression: "With the death of Gamaliel I. the reverence for the Divine law ceased, and the observance of purity and abstinence departed" (Mishna Sota, ix. 15); comp. Frankel, Darko Ha-Mishna, 57-59, Leipzig, 1859; Weiss, Dör Dör Védörshon, i. 188, &c., Vienna, 1871.) [C. D. G.]

GAMALIEL (2) II., also called Gamaliel the younger, Gamaliel of Zabne, son of the patriarch Simon II. and grandson of Gamaliel I. He was born about A.D. 50, and became president of the Sanhedrin about A.D. 117. Though educated during the most troublous days of the Jewish nation in Palestine, when his brethren, in consequence of the destruction of the Temple and the sufferings inflicted upon them by their conquerors, hated everything Greek and Roman, Gamaliel cultivated Greek literature and art, and studied apocryphal writings and the Greek versions of the Old Testament, which his own grandfather, R. Gamaliel I., condemned to be concealed [GAMALIEL I.]. His father, Simon, who was president during the insurrection against the Romans, headed the party of moderate zealots in the defence of Jerusalem, and when the holy city was captured, the president of the Sanhedrin was executed for his patriotism. Gamaliel, his son, who was then too young to succeed his father to the distinguished hereditary office, betook himself to Zabne or Zamnia, a town on the coast of the Mediterranean, nearly midway between Joppa and the ancient Philistine city Ashdod. Here his father had left him a large estate, where he kept up a princely establishment, which was open to the learned of both Jews and Gentiles. Here, too, R. Jochanan b. Zaccai, by permission of the Roman authorities, removed the seat of the Sanhedrin after the destruction of Jerusalem, and temporarily became the president of this august assembly after the execution of the patriarch Simon. As soon as R. Gamaliel could conveniently become its head, R. Jochanan gave way to the rightful heir of the house of Hillel, and Gamaliel II. was duly installed. His reign as spiritual head over the Jews was most difficult. Not only was Jerusalem trodden down under the foot of the Gentiles, and the wounds of the surviving nation were designedly kept open and bleeding by the cruel conquerors, but the people thus goaded by bitter persecution gave themselves up to despair, thinking that God had finally cast them away from being a nation. Hence some resolved to abstain from marriage so as not to beget children, some voluntarily submitted to the greatest privations so as to bring about the destruction nation, whilst some, losing all faith in the God of Abraham for his people, made common cause with the Romans. These renegades were appointed as judges and preservers, and were to try their own brethren for treason.

Gamaliel became the tools in the hands of the persecutors and meanly aided by treachery the imposed destruction of the nobler and more patriotic portion of the nation. In the midst of disintegrating and destructive forces, Gamaliel commenced his patriarchate. His policy was in the promise that "the seed of Israel shall never cease as a nation," never wavered. He allied the remnant of believers around him, and with never-failing zeal endeavoured to keep in the people a consciousness of their mission. But the very remnant who were willing to receive from the mouth of the patriarch and his colleagues words of comfort derived from the promises declared by God's prophets were exposed to a far more powerful agency, which shook them to the very foundation. Infant Christianity had put forth apostolic efforts to gain the suffering Jews the kingdom of heaven, pointing out to them the only and heavy-laden source of peace and rest, and won over to its ranks many of the pious and most learned children of Abraham. Gamaliel had, therefore, to devise means so as to defend his brethren against this threefold agency, which, though antagonistic in its nature, combined to break up the Jewish community. To this the patriarch had the aid of some of the most distinguished doctors of the law, who were members of the Sanhedrin at Zabne in the time of the apostles. Of these colleagues may be mentioned R. Abba, his brother, R. Eliezer, Hyrcanus, his brother-in-law [ELIEZER], R. Eliezer b. Hyrcanus, C. Chananya, R. Zadok with his son R. Zadok, R. Torphon, R. Samuel the less, who is sometimes erroneously identified with the apostle Paul, R. Dosa b. Hyrcanus, R. Eliezer b. Hyrcanus, R. Akiba, R. Simon Haphekuli, R. Akabia, and others.

His first aim was to re-examine and harmonize the canonical decisions and traditional explanations of the Scriptures which had developed themselves in the different schools of Shammai and Hillel, and which had hitherto been transmitted orally. The destruction of Jerusalem, the execution by the Romans of some of the most distinguished doctors, the dispersion of others into different countries, and the conversion of others again to Christianity, threatened to bring about the loss of important traditions, and to produce diversity of opinion and practice.

Gamaliel therefore had all these decisions brought before the Sanhedrin at Zabne by their different representatives. These were discussed publicly, and Gamaliel ruled that the decision of the majority must be final, and henceforth become alterably the uniform practice, and that disobedience on the part of the minority is to be visited with the penalty of excommunication. Vigorously did he carry out his rule that he communicated his own brother-in-law, the celebrated R. Eliezer b. Hyrcanus, for refusing to yield to the majority. [ELIEZER B. HYRCANUS]

Another important point undertaken by Gamaliel II. was to determine the time and order of the daily prayer. As the Temple which was the central place of national worship, was now destroyed, and as the sacrifices ceased, he ordered that every Israelite is bound to pray three times a day, morning, afternoon and evening: the morning prayer to take the place of the morning sacrifice, the afternoon or Mincha prayer to take the place of the evening sacrifice, and the evening prayer to represent the steaming of the fat of the evening sacrifice. He appointed R. Simon Haphekuli, one of the members of the Sanhedrin to arrange the eighteen benedictions for the daily liturgy so as to include a prayer for the rebuilding of Jerusalem, and asked R. Samuel the less, another member of the Sanhedrin, to adapt the old collect against heretics, entitled Birchath Ha-Minim (ברכת המינים), to the present circumstances so as to include therein the new sect of Christians which had recently sprung up in the Jewish community (Berachode, 28 b). It will thus be seen that with the exception of the collect for the speedy restoration of the holy city, and the verbal alteration in the collect against the heretics, these eighteen benedictions are of pre-Christian date. They formed part of the Temple and synagogue service prior to and at the advent of Christ. As there can therefore be no doubt that our Saviour and the apostles joined in these prayers when they resorted to the temple and the synagogue, we subjoin them in their re-arranged form according to the order of Gamaliel II. 1. (ברוך). Blessed art thou, O Lord our God, the God of our fathers Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, great, omnipotent, fearful, and most high God, who bountifully shewest mercy, who art the possessor of all things, who rememberest the pious deeds of our fathers, and sendest the redeemer to their children's children, for his mercy's sake in love. O our king, defender, saviour and shield! Blessed art thou, O Lord, the shield of Abraham. 2. (אתה נכור). Thou art powerful, O Lord, world without end; thou bringest the dead to life in great compassion, thou holdest up the falling, healest the sick, loosest the chained, and shewest thy faithfulness to those that sleep in the dust. Who is like unto thee, Lord of might, and who resembles thee?—a sovereign killing and bringing to life again, and causing salvation to flourish—and thou art sure to raise the dead. Blessed art thou, O Lord, who raisest the dead! 3. (אתה קדוש). Thou art holy, and thy name is holy, and the holy ones praise thee every day continually. Blessed art thou, O Lord, the holy God! 4. (אתה חכם). Thou mercifully bestowest knowledge upon men and teachest the mortal prudence. Mercifully bestow upon us, from thyself, knowledge, wisdom, and understanding. Blessed art thou, O Lord, who mercifully bestowest knowledge! 5. (השיבנו). Our Father, lead us back to thy law; bring us very near, O our king, to thy service, and cause us to return in sincere penitence into thy presence! Blessed art thou, O Lord, who delightest in repentance! 6. (סלח). Our father, forgive us, for we have sinned; our King, pardon us, for we have transgressed; for thou art forgiving and pardoning. Blessed art thou, O Lord, merciful and plenteous in forgiveness! 7. (פאד). Look at our misery, contend our cause, and deliver us speedily, for thy name's sake, for thou art a mighty deliverer. Blessed art thou, O Lord, the deliverer of Israel! 8. (נְשִׂינָה). Heal us, O Lord, and we shall be healed, save us and we shall be saved, for thou art our boast; grant us a perfect cure for all our wounds, for thou O Lord, O Lord, our king, art a faithful and merciful physician: Blessed art thou, O Lord, who healest the sick of thy people Israel! 9. (בְּרוּךְ עֲלֵינוּ). Bless to us, O Lord our God, for good this year and all its kinds of produce; send thy blessing upon the face of the earth, satisfy us with thy goodness, and bless this year as the years bygone. Blessed art thou, O Lord, who blessest the seasons! 10. (תְּקֵעַ). Cause the great trumpet to proclaim our liberty, raise the standard for the gathering of our captives, and bring us together from the four corners of the earth. Blessed art thou, O Lord, who gatherest together the dispersed of Israel! 11. (הַשִּׁבְהָה). Reinstate our judges as of old, and our councillors as of yore, remove from us sorrow and sighing and do thou alone, O Lord, reign over us in mercy and love, and judge us in righteousness and justice. Blessed art thou O Lord the King, who lovest righteousness and justice! 12. (וְלֹא מַלְשִׁינִים). Let the apostates have no hope, and let those who perpetrate wickedness speedily perish; let them all be suddenly cut off, let the proud speedily be uprooted, broken, crushed, and humbled speedily in our days. Blessed art thou, O Lord, who breakest down the enemy and humblest the proud! 13. (עַל הַצְדִּיקִים). On the righteous, on the pious, on the elders of thy people, the house of Israel, on the remnant of the scribes, on the pious proselytes, and on us bestow, O Lord our God, thy mercy; give ample reward to all who trust in thy name in sincerity, make our portion with them for ever, and let us not be ashamed, for we trust in thee! Blessed art thou, O Lord, the support and refuge of the righteous! 14 a. (יֵל יְרוּשָׁלַיִם). To Jerusalem, thy city, in mercy return, and dwell in it according to thy promise; make it speedily in our day an everlasting building, and soon establish therein the throne of David. Blessed art thou, O Lord, who buildest Jerusalem! 14 b. (וְאֵת צִמְחָה). The branch of David thy servant speedily cause to flourish, and exalt his horn with thy help, for we look to thy help all day. Blessed art thou, O Lord, who causest to flourish the horn of David! 15. (שִׁמְעֵנוּ קוֹלֵנוּ). Hear our voice, O Lord our God, have pity and compassion on us, and receive with mercy and acceptance our prayers, for thou art a God hearing prayer and supplications. Our king, do not send us empty away from thy presence, for thou hearest the prayers of thy people Israel in mercy! Blessed art thou, O Lord, who hearest prayer! 16. (רָצוּהָ). Be favourable, O Lord our God, to thy people Israel, and to their prayer; restore the worship to thy sanctuary, receive lovingly the burnt sacrifice of Israel and their prayer, and let the service of Israel thy people be always well-pleasing to thee. May our eyes see thee return to Zion in love. Blessed art thou, O Lord, who restorest thy Shechinah to Zion! 17. (מִוְדִּים). We thankfully confess before thee that thou art the Lord our God, and the God of our fathers, world without end, and that thou art the shepherd of our life and the rock of our salvation from generation to generation; we render thanks unto thee and celebrate thy praises. Blessed art thou, O Lord, whose name is goodness and whom it becomes to praise! 18.

(שִׁמְעֵנוּ שְׁלוֹם). Bestow peace, happiness, blessing, grace, mercy, and compassion upon us and upon the whole of Israel thy people. Our father, bless us all unitedly with the light of thy countenance, for in the light of thy countenance didst thou give to us, O Lord our God, the law of life, loving kindness, justice, blessing, compassion, life, and peace. May it please thee to bless thy people Israel at all times and in every moment with peace. Blessed art thou, O Lord, who blessest thy people Israel with peace!

As scruples were entertained whether the ancient number of eighteen should be increased, the new prayer for the restoration of Jerusalem (14 a) ordered by R. Gamaliel was combined with the old prayer for the kingdom of David (14 b). This, however, gave rise to another question whether it was right to merge the two benedictions. Hence they were separated, and the present number of nineteen, which is justified by an appeal to Ps. xxix., where the name of God occurs nineteen times (Berachoth, 28 b). The dates of Benedictions 1-3 and 16-18 are lost in remote antiquity; Benedictions 4-13, 14 b, 15, 16, were compiled during the Maccabean struggle and the Roman ascendancy in Palestine, whilst 14 a was the new addition. Three of these benedictions were pronounced by the priests upon the people every morning in the hall of the square in the Temple court; the high priest recited Benedictions 16 and 17 in the Temple on the great day of Atonement (Yoma, 68 b), whilst the four-and-twenty representatives of the people recited all of them in the Temple every day (Sabbath, 24 b). Hence the great importance which Gamaliel attached to the making of these benedictions, which constituted an essential part of the sacerdotal Temple service, the central point of the daily prayer. For the same reason he fixed the service for the Passover eve in the place of the Paschal sacrifice, and himself compiled several pieces contained in the ritual for that evening (Berachoth, 37; Tosefta Berachoth iv.). He exerted himself to the utmost to do away with pernicious customs which weighed heavily upon the people, but which they had not the courage to discard. Thus it was an ancient custom among the Jews to bury their dead with great pomp. The heavy expense which this entailed upon families with small means often crippled their resources for life. Fear of this heavy burden not unfrequently led many to leave their dead unburied. Gamaliel forbade this extravagance, and ordered his family to bury him in simple white linen (Moed Katon, 27; Kethuboth, 8 a; Tosefta Nidda, ix.), and this mode of burial is followed by the Jews to the present day. He travelled through the length and breadth of Syria to become personally acquainted with the condition of the people in the different towns and villages. He investigated their institutions, visited their synagogues and schools, delivering public addresses, giving decisions, and organizing places for education. It was on these journeys that he came in frequent contact with the apostolic fathers and the early Christians. Like many other indefatigable spiritual heads, he could brook no contradiction. Difference of opinion on the part of his colleagues he treated as insubordination, and visited with severe punishment, totally ignoring the age or position of the doctor who dared to differ from him. He did not tolerate an expression of disapprobation on the part of a member of the Sanhedrin on any of his decisions, and arbitrarily excluded the public from attending the discussions at the Sanhedrin, though it was contrary to ancient custom to carry on the debates with closed doors. This fomented secret discontent with his conduct, which soon manifested itself openly, and led to his temporary deposition from the patriarchate. The immediate occasion of the open rupture between him and the Sanhedrin was as follows. A disciple came before R. Joshua, the vice-president (רִבִּי יוֹשֻׁעַ) with the question, "Whether the recital of evening prayer was a duty or a voluntary act?" to which he replied that it is voluntary. It so happened that the disciple asked R. Gamaliel the same question, and that he declared it to be a duty. When the disciple told him that R. Joshua had decided it otherwise, the president asked him to come with the question before the Sanhedrin. In the presence of this august assembly the patriarch declared evening prayer a duty, and asked if there were any dissentients. After some silence R. Joshua, as vice-president, stepped forward, in accordance with the custom on these occasions, and replied in the name of the assembly that there was no difference of opinion to record. R. Gamaliel at once said, "I was told that you decided differently; stand up that witness may testify against thee;" this being the form of accusation. Though R. Joshua candidly said that he differed from the decision, R. Gamaliel let him stand, and continued his discourse. Such indignity heaped upon the distinguished and beloved vice-president was felt as an insult to the whole Sanhedrin. Great murmurs of disapprobation were at once heard. The exclamation, "Who has not already felt your harshness?" rose from all sides. The members converted themselves into a tribunal, and forthwith deposed the president. So popular was the act of deposition that the attendance at the college was at once increased by about 300 disciples. But out of respect for the feelings of the deposed patriarch, the Sanhedrin would not choose his opponent, R. Joshua, though he was the fittest man for the position. As the renowned R. Eliezer b. Hyrcanus, R. Gamaliel's brother-in-law, was undergoing the penalty of excommunication [ELIEZER B. HYRCANOS], and as the learned R. Akiba was a parvenu, the choice fell on R. Eliezer b. Azariah, who, though only about sixteen years of age, was of the ancient priestly family dating back to Ezra, was very learned and exceedingly wealthy, thus being able to impart dignity and grandeur to his office, which were regarded as essential.

What is of great importance to the student of ecclesiastical history and Christian antiquities in the deposition of R. Gamaliel, is the fact that the canon of the Hebrew Scriptures was settled under the new presidency. Immediately after his elevation to the patriarchate R. Eliezer, at the instigation of R. Joshua, undertook a revision of the decisions which had been carried in so high-handed a manner by R. Gamaliel. Up to this time the members of the Sanhedrin themselves, in whom was vested the power to fix the canon, disputed the canonicity of certain portions of the Hebrew Scriptures. Thus the School of Shammai excluded Ecclesiastes and the Song of Songs from the list of Holy Writ, declaring that they proceeded from Solomon's uninspired wisdom. It was the Sanhedrin at Zabne, under the presidency of Eleazar b. Azariah, which decided that these books are inspired, and that they form part of the canon, and it was the zeal of R. Akiba, in the discussion on this occasion, which decided that "the Song of Songs is the most holy of all holy scriptures," or, in other words, is to be explained allegorically (Yedeim, iii. 5, with Ednyoth, v. 37). Hence the Chaldee paraphrase of this book.

From a domineering president, R. Gamaliel became a tractable and submissive member of the Sanhedrin. His haughty and unyielding spirit was broken, and he learned to co-operate with his colleagues, and to respect the opinions of his opponents. He now endeavoured to seek reconciliation with those whom he had offended. To this end he visited R. Joshua, whom he had mostly sinned against. When he entered R. Joshua's house, he found to his utter amazement that this distinguished and greatly beloved doctor of the law was engaged in making needles. "Have you to get your livelihood in this way?" exclaimed the wealthy ex-president. This gave R. Joshua the desired opportunity for expostulating with him about his indifference to the manner in which some of the members of the Sanhedrin had to get a living. "It is bad, indeed, that you have only now got to know this. Woe to the age whose guide you are, you know not the cares of the sages and what trouble they have to earn a subsistence" (Berachoth, 29; Jerusalem Berachoth, iv.). R. Gamaliel meekly listened to the merited rebuke, and then sincerely asked R. Joshua's pardon. He not only willingly forgave him, but henceforth endeavoured to have him reinstated as patriarch. About this there was no difficulty, for as soon as R. Eleazar heard that a reconciliation had taken place between them he, accompanied by the members of the Sanhedrin, went to R. Gamaliel's house the following morning to pay him the homage due to the president. R. Eleazar's voluntary resignation, however, was not accepted; it was so arranged that they should both have the dignity, R. Gamaliel alternately presiding over the Sanhedrin a fortnight, and R. Eleazar a week. The lesson which Gamaliel thus learned he never forgot. Henceforth he was most affable and forbearing. He cultivated friendship with all classes of people, with the learned of all nations, with Christians and the different religious orders which sprang up at the end of the 1st and the beginning of the 2nd century of the Christian era. Of his intercourse with heathen philosophers we have an interesting account in the following anecdote, which shews how much the Gentiles of that period read the Septuagint, and with what weapons they attacked its contents. A Gentile sage remarked to him, "Your law says, 'God is a jealous God.' Why, then, does he manifest his jealousy against idolaters and not against the idols?" To this

R. Gamaliel replied in a parable. "A king hath a son that delighteth to call his dog by the name of his own royal father. Now with whom will the king be angry, with the dog or with his son?" Then saith the heathen philosopher, "Why doth not God destroy these idols if they are such worthless things?" Saith R. Gamaliel, "If the heathen only worshipped useless things God might do it, but they worship the sun, the moon, the water, &c., and shall God destroy the world because of fools?" (Aboda Zara, 54 a-55 a). Of his intercourse with Christians we may adduce the following account. A Christian believing that "life and immortality are brought to light in the Gospel" (2 Tim. i. 10), extolled the doctrines of the New Testament by asking R. Gamaliel, "How do you know (without the New Testament) that the dead will rise again?" To this Gamaliel replied, "From the words, 'the land which the Lord swore unto your fathers to give THEM' (Deut. xi. 21), but as the fathers were dead the promise must have premised a resurrection when alone the land could be given to these fathers" (Sanhedrin, 90 b). This shews the force of the interpretation given by Christ of Matt. xxii. 32, and the inference he deduced therefrom. This liberal intercourse made him one of the most popular presidents of the Sanhedrin. Ripe in years, full of honours, and beloved by all, Gamaliel died about A.D. 117. At his funeral Onkelos, the celebrated translator of the Pentateuch into Chaldee, who was one of his disciples, paid him royal honours by burning costly garments and furniture to the value of seventy Tyrian minae = 21*l.*, declaring that "R. Gamaliel was worth more than a hundred kings from whom the world hath nothing" (Tosephta Sabbath, viii. p. 119, ed. Zuckermann; Aboda Zara, 11 a). R. Eleazar, his co-president, and R. Joshua, his former antagonist, ordered general mourning, to which the whole nation readily responded. R. Gamaliel left two sons, named Simon and Abba, and a daughter. The daughter he married to his brother, R. Abba. At the marriage he gave her the significant paternal blessing, which strikingly illustrates the patriarch's character, "May you never be compelled to seek your parental roof again" (Yebamoth, 15 a). His son Simon succeeded him in the presidency under the title of Simon III. (comp. Rappaport, Kerem Chemod). [C. D. G.]

GAMALIEL (3), patriarch of the Jews in the reign of Theodosius II., from whom he received the title of honorary prefect. He seems to have abused his power by arbitrary and illegal conduct, and we have extant a law of Theodosius of the year 415, by which he is deposed. (Cod. Theod. vi. 22.) Three of the charges against him are that he had ventured to act as judge in cases where Christians were concerned, that he had tried to force circumcision upon Christians, and that he had kept Christian slaves. It is probable that this is the same Gamaliel whom St. Jerome mentions (Ep. 57, § 3) as an enemy of the consular Hesychius. He appears to have been the last of the Jewish patriarchs, since in 429 the office is represented as extinct (Cod. Theod. vi. 29), and it is reasonable to connect this with the fact of his flagrant abuse of power. [M. F. A.]

GAMALINUS, bishop of Perrha, in the province of Commagene, during the reign of the emperor Anastasius, whilst Severus was patriarch of Antioch, whose heretical opinions Gamalinus adopted, c. A.D. 512. Assemani (Bibl. Orient. i. 409 n.) narrates from Syriac authorities his uniting with Paul bishop of Edessa in the expulsion of certain pseudo-monks who pretended to partake neither of bread, nor wine, nor water, yet made frequent meals on the consecrated elements. (Le Quien, O. C. ii. 944.) [L. D.]

GAMALIUS, Donatist bishop, present at the council of Bagaia, or Vagaia, A.D. 394, at which he probably presided. (Aug. c. Cresc. iii. 53, 59; iv. 10; Tillemont, 67, vol. v. p. 166.) [H. W. P.]

GAMELBERTUS (GAMULBERTUS, AMALBERTUS, AMELBERTUS), parish priest in the village of Fagetum or Michelsbuch in Lower Bavaria. The Bollandists (Acta SS. 27 Jan. ii. 783 sq.) represent him as flourishing at the time of Charlemagne's final repression of Tassilo duke of Bavaria, A.D. 788. According to an anonymous Vita which they give, he was born of noble parents at Michelsbuch, at the confluence of the Isar and the Danube. He preferred study and retirement, to which, after promotion to the priesthood and a visit to Rome, he devoted himself. He was a man of only moderate learning, but devoted to his pastoral duties. Forsaking the family mansion, he built himself a cell adjoining the parish church, wherein he might practise his nightly devotions without restraint. In the lenten fast he secluded himself absolutely, allowing no one to visit him, and never going out except to celebrate mass, which he did daily, concealed however from the laity by a veil suspended before the sanctuary, while a deacon delivered the sacrament to the communicants. During the same season he heard confessions and gave absolution through a window in his cell, but was never seen. [J. G.]

GANDERICUS (CANDERICUS, GAUDERICUS, GAUDRICUS), thirty-fifth bishop of Lyons, succeeding Theodoricus, or Tetricus, and followed by Viventius. A few scattered facts of his life have reached us. In A.D. 642 he subscribed the charter granted by Audobert, archbishop of Paris, to Babolenus, for the monastery of St. Maur des Fossés (Fossatense), near Paris. He also ordained St. Baldomer (St. Garmier, or Galmé) to be sub-deacon (Boll. Acta SS. Feb. iii. 684) and he presided over, and subscribed the third council of Châlons, circ. A.D. 644 (Mansi, x. 1193; Mabill. Annales, an. 642, n. xii. xiii. tom. i. p. 383; Gall. Christ. iv. 42). [S. A. B.]

GANDO, 15th bishop of Strasburg, between Aldus and Uto I., according to Gall. Chr. v. 780. Wimpfeling (Cat. Episc. Argent. p. 16) places him 19th between Gundualdus and Uto I., and finds him described as a man "clari ingenii." From his position in the list he may have lived early in the 7th century. [C. H.]

GANGOLFUS, martyr. [GENGULPHUS.]

GANGRICUS of Treves. [GUNDERIC (2).]

GANGULPHUS. After Boso, who was bishop of Constance about A.D. 642, the history of the see of Constance is lost in obscurity till the time of Audoinus, who lived about A.D. 736. A catalogue of the 14th century gives as the bishops of Constance during this interval, Ophardus, Pictavius, Severus, Joannes II., and Buffo or Buso. This list is adopted in Gallia Christiana, v. 894, and by Manlius (in Pistorius, Rerum Germanicarum Scriptores, iii. 702). Another list, however, in Mangold's Chronicle, written in A.D. 1548, fills up the interval with Gangolfus, Fidelis, and Theobaldus. This is followed by Gams, Series Ep. 271, who spells the name Gangulphus, and von Müllinen, Helvetia Sacra, 8. Gelpke (Kirchengeschichte der Schweiz, ii. 282) prefers the former list. [F. D.]

GARALT, abbat. [GERALDUS.]

GARBHAN (GARBAN, GARUAN, GARVAN). (1) In the Life of St. Barry Garbhan son of Finnbarr is named among his pupils at Lough Irce. Colgan (Acta SS. 750, 751) places his feast on March 26, and thus identifies him with Garbhan abbat of Achadh. Harris and Archdall follow Colgan and attach Garbhan to Dungarvan, on Dungarvan Bay, as its founder, though Lanigan seems nearer the mark in saying that the "fort of Garvan" in all likelihood "owes its name not to a monk but to a chieftain." He flourished in the middle of the 7th century, if he was a pupil of St. Barry. [BARRY.] (Lanigan, Eccl. Hist. Ir. ii. 318, 319; Mart. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, 87.)

(2) Garbhan, priest of Kinsaley, a parish near Swords, co. Dublin, commemorated on July 9. His father was Lugaidh, and his mother Cainer, who was mother also of St. Mochua or Cronan (Aug. 8) of Clondalkin, and other saints. He was a disciple of St. Coemgen (June 3) of Glendaloch, and seems to have had considerable influence with that holy man. (Mart. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, 191, 213; Lanigan, Eccl. Hist. Ir. ii. 44, 49; Forbes, Kal. Scott. Saints, 18.)

(3) Garuanus, son of Aengus, was one of the bishops said to have been present at a council called in Ireland in the time of St. Forannan and St. Columba for meeting the public necessities and allaying quarrels. He was a descendant of Conall Crimthann, son of Niall of the Nine Hostages, and, if a contemporary of these holy men, he flourished about the middle of the 6th century. (Colgan, Acta SS. 336, c. 5, and Tr. Thaum. 463, c. 53.) [J. G.]

GARCI, son of Cewydd ab Caw, a Welsh saint of the 6th century, said to have had a church in Glamorganshire dedicated to him. (Rees, Welsh Saints, 258.) [J. G.]

GARDINGUS, bishop of Tuy, one of the Arian bishops who embraced Catholicism at the famous third council of Toledo, A.D. 589. The signature of the Catholic bishop of Tuy, Neuphila, appears in the same council. Gardingus was probably made bishop of Tuy by Leovigild, to the exclusion of the Catholic bishop, after the final annexation of the kingdom of the Suevi, A.D. 585. (Aguirre-Catalani, iii. 238; Esp. Sa/r. xxii. 30.) [ANILA.] [M. A. W.]

GARGILIUS (1), Numidian bishop, addressed Cyp. 70. (Ep. Syn. Carth. sub Cyp. de Bap. Haer. 1.) [Compare with the name "Gargilius," Africanus" on a Numidian cippus, Soc. Arch. Const. 1860, p. 165; also p. 169, and Gargilia on another Numidian cippus, vol. 1858, p. 150, and Thermae Gargiliana, "famous in ecclesiastical history of Carthage" (Dict. Geog. p. 551).] [E. W. B.]

GARGILIUS (2), another Numidian bishop addressed Cyp. 70. (Ep. Syn. Carth. sub Cyp. de Bap. Haer. 1.) [E. W. B.]

GARIARIUS (GARIACUS), about twenty-second bishop of Angers, between Godobertus and Boso, perhaps about the middle of the 7th century. (Gall. Christ. xiv. 551.) [S. A. B.]

GARIBALDUS (1), son of Grimoald king of the Lombards, by the sister of king Godebert, whom he had ejected. Garibald, while a boy, was left at his father's death, A.D. 672, as king of the Lombards, but in three months he was turned out by Perthari, brother, and formerly joint ruler with Godebert. (Paulus Diaconus, v. 33, and Catalogus Regum Langob. in Monum. Rerum Italicarum et Langob. 1878, pp. 155, 508.) [A. H. D. A.]

GARIBALDUS (2) (GAREBALDUS), twenty-second bishop of Toul, succeeding Dodo and followed by Godo, is said to have been the son of Wulfoaldus, a count. In 706 he was witness to a charter of Pippin and Plectrudis in favour of the monastery of Epternach, in the diocese of Treves (Migne, Patr. Lat. lxxxix. 540). In 709 he subscribed a charter of his father, for the foundation of the monastery of St. Michael, near Verdun (Migne, Patr. Lat. lxxxviii. 1258). He added many new possessions to his church, and is said to have died about A.D. 735 (Gall. Christ. xiii. 965). [S. A. B.]

GARIBALDUS (3), GARIOBALDUS, GARIOVALDUS (GAEBALDUS, GAIABALDUS, GAIBALDUS, GAIBALT, GAUBALDUS, GOIBALCH, GOIBALDUS, GOWIBOLT, HERBALDUS), bishop of Ratisbon. St. Boniface, on his return from his third journey to Rome in A.D. 739, was invited by Odilo duke of Bavaria to visit that country. There he made many converts, and finding that Vivilo, who had been consecrated by the pope, was the only bishop in Bavaria, he, with the duke's approval, divided Bavaria into four sees, Salzburg, Frising, Ratisbon, and Passau. The last was assigned to Vivilo, and to the others St. Boniface appointed Joannes, Erembercht, and Garibaldus. The authority for this account is a letter of pope Gregory III. to St. Boniface, dated Oct. 29, in the twenty-third year of the emperor Leo (A.D. 740), in Migne, Patr. Lat. lxxxix. 584, in which he approves of St. Boniface's arrangements, mentioning that the latter had informed him "dum episcopos non habebant in provincia, nisi unum nomine Vivilo." Pagi, however, in his notes on Baronius, xii. 739 II., 756 VIII., on the authority of certain verses of an anonymous writer, who lived in the next century, argues that one Wicpertus was bishop of Ratisbon, and that till his death in A.D. 756 Garibaldus was only his coadjutor. However, the authority of the above quoted passage seems preferable. There was also a Wicpertus, bishop of Augsburg, whose life is given in the Boll. Acta SS. April. ii. 547, who lived about this time, and it seems probable either that he had exercised some episcopal authority at Ratisbon before St. Boniface's arrival, though not properly bishop of that place, or that the author of the verses confused Augsburg with Ratisbon. Garibaldus is said to have found the relics of St. Emmeran, and to have removed them to a new and splendid tomb. According to Rader (Bavaria Sancta, ii. 68) his episcopate lasted either thirteen or twenty-two years. He is commemorated Jan. 8. (Boll. Acta SS. Jan. i. 546, and the Lives of St. Boniface, by Willibald and Othlo, in Migne, Patr. Lat. lxxxix. 623, 648.) [F. D.]

GARIPALD, duke of Turin, sent by Godebert (joint king of the Lombards with his brother, Perthari, in 661) to obtain help against his brother from Grimoald duke of Benevento. Garipald intrigued with Grimoald, who killed Godepert with his own hand. The story is so told as to throw all the blame of treachery on Garipald. (Paulus Diac. iv. 51; Pabst, Forschungen s. d. G. ii. 458.) Garipald was shortly afterwards murdered by a member of the house of Godepert. [A. H. D. A.]

GARISIGIUS (CHARISIGIUS, CARIGISILUS), twenty-eighth bishop of Tours, succeeding Latinus, and followed by Chrothbertus I. (circ. A.D. 650). The catalogues assign two years for the duration of his episcopate. (Gall. Christ. xiv. 28.) [S. A. B.]

GARIVALDUS (GAIROVALDUS), twenty-eighth bishop of Clermont in the latter half of the 7th century, succeeding Felix. According to one of the lives of St. Praejectus (Prix), upon the death of Felix the greater part of the clergy or people desired to have St. Prix for their bishop, but Garivaldus, who was archdeacon of the city, usurped the see. He survived his intrusion only forty days, and was succeeded by St. Prix (Boll. Acta SS. Jan. ii. 634; Gall. Christ. ii. 245.) [S. A. B.]

GARMON, Welsh form of GERMANUS of Auxerre (Rees, Welsh Saints, 121). [J. G.]

GARNIMIA Irish saint. (Boll. Acta SS. 22 Feb. iii. 280.) [GURNIN.] [J. G.]

GARINUS (GAROYNUS, GARRINUS, GARINUS, BAROINUS), eighth bishop of Strasburg, between Magnus and Landbertus, apparently about the middle of the 6th century, in the list of the Sammarthani. (Gall. Christ. v. 780.) Wimpfeling places him in the middle of the 8th century, as 12th bishop, between Aldus and Landbertus (Wimph. Catal. Episc. Argent. p. 15). [C. H.]

GARTNAIDH, GARNAIT, GARTNAICH, GARTNAIT, GARTNAITH, GARTNART, GARTNAY (GARTINAICH), son of Domelch or Domnach, succeeded Brude, the friend of St. Columba, on the Pictish throne, in the year 584, and seems to have belonged to the southern Picts in Scotland, as his residence was not at Inverness but at Abernethy on the Tay, where he built a monastic church dedicated to St. Bridget, and thus aided in the revival of the Christianity founded among the southern Picts by St. Ninian. According to Tigernach he died A.D. 599. (Skene, Celt. Scotl. i. 233, 235, 136, 137; Robertson, Scot. under her Early Kings, ii. 185, App. A; Reeves, St. Adamnan, 372. For this king and the many forms of his name, see Skene, Chron. Picts and Scots, 462, "Gartnart.") [J. G.]

GABUAN, GARVAN. [GARBHAN.]

GATIANUS, said by Gregory of Tours (Hist. Franc. 23 and 526) to have been sent by the see of Rome in the first year of Decius to Gaul, where he became first bishop of Tours. Persecution arising, he hid in caves with a few Christians, and celebrated in secret the "mysterium solemnitate diei dominici." His death is placed in the Roman Martyrology at Dec. 20, 301. (Gall. Chr. xv. 4.) [R. T. S.]

GATIANUS, martyr. [GRATIANUS (2).]

GATSA-KELEB, the name of a monster, half a man and half a dog, who is said to have assisted SS. Andrew and Bartholomew in their preaching the gospel in Parthia. [ABDIA.] (The Conflicts of the Holy Apostles, p. 91, translated from the Ethiopic by S. C. Malan.) [G. T. S.]

GAUBALDUS of Ratisbon. [GARIBALDUS (3).]

GAUCIOBERTUS, bishop. [GAUBERTUS.]

GAUDELENUS (GAUDIOLANUS), bishop of Lerida, A.D. 653. The deacon Suttericus represents him at the eighth Council of Toledo (653). (Mansi, x. 1223; Aguirre-Catalani, iii. 448; Esp. Sagr. xvi. 107.) [M. A. W.]

GAUDENCIUS, bishop of Astigi. All our information about him is derived from a letter addressed by the bishops who attended the first council of Seville, A.D. 590, to his successor Pegasius. This letter was in reply to one the latter had sent them by his deacons, containing a list of the slaves belonging to the church of Astigi, of whom some had been manumitted by his predecessor Gaudencius, and others given by him to his relations. The letter of the bishops states that they had consulted the canons to see if such a manumission or gift was valid, and had found that if a bishop had given his private property to anyone but the church (his sons and descendants only excepted), the gift was void. (Compare canons 7 and 33 of the Council of Agatho, in Mansi, viii. 325-330.) Therefore, if the church of Astigi was not in possession of the property of Gaudencius, the slaves he had manumitted were not legally free. However, if his property was sufficient to indemnify the church for the value of the slaves, they were to remain free. If, on the contrary, he had not made compensation to the church, the bishops, being more inclined to humanity than severity, decided that those who had been so manumitted should remain free in other respects, but should be so far subject to the rights of the church that they could not leave their property to any but their sons, who in turn were to be subject to the like condition, and if any of the class died without leaving issue qualified to succeed him, the church was to become entitled to his property. As to the other slaves, whom the said bishop had transferred to his relations, they were to be restored to the church, unless he had paid the full price out of his own means. Though the address of this letter does not mention the name of Pegasus, we know that it was Astigi, as in the second part of the letter the words occur, "Hanc formam non solum vestra, hoc est Astigitana, servabit ecclesia." Servandus too, as deacon of Pegasus, bishop of Astigi, subscribes the acts of the third council of Toledo, A.D. 589. (Ep. Sagr. x. 85; Tejada y Ramiro, ii. 663; Gams, Kirchengeschichte, ii. part ii. 19.)

GAUDENTIA—Aug. 30. A virgin martyr at Rome with three others. (Mart. Hieron., Usuard.) [G. T. S.]

GAUDENTIANUS, bishop of Volterra, probably in the time of Cunibert, 688–700. (Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Italia, xviii. 215.)

[A. H. D. A.]

GAUDENTIUS (1), bishop of Pisa, one of the judicial committee appointed to examine the case of Caecilianus at Rome, A.D. 313. (Opt. i. 13; Ughelli, Ital. Sacr. iii. 351.) [H. W. P.]

GAUDENTIUS (2), bishop of Nalssus (Nissa) in Moesia Superior, deposed by the Arians. He was present at the council of Sardica in A.D. 347. (Mansi, iii. 39, 42; Le Quien, Or. Christ. ii. 314.)

[J. de S.]

GAUDENTIUS (3), bishop of Turris Tamallensis, or Turretamallia, a town of Byzacene, between Tacapae and Leptis Magna (Telemin), Ant. Itin. 74, 3. Another reading gives Tysdrus as the place of his see. He was present at the council of Carthage concerning Donatism, A.D. 413 or 419. (Morcelli, Africa Christ. i. 339, Bras, Concil. i. 111.) [H. W. P.]

GAUDENTIUS (4), bishop of Ariminum (Rimini), c. A.D. 346–360. When the Arians, under the patronage of Constantius, held a council at Rimini, A.D. 359, Gaudentius appears to have retired from his diocese for a time, but to have speedily returned, and opposed the Arians so vigorously, declaring the decrees of the council null, that his enemies in their anger would and beat him to death. (Acta SS. Oct. 14; Ughelli, Ital. Sac. ii. 410; Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Ital. ii. 372.) [R. S. G.]

GAUDENTIUS (5), ninth bishop of Arretium (Arezzo). He succeeded Eusebius c. A.D. 381. He was put to death as a martyr in the following year by the prefect Marcellianus, a bitter persecutor of Christianity, and was succeeded by Decentius. Ughelli accounts for the martyrdom taking place under a Christian emperor by the circumstance that Valentinian at the commencement of his reign appointed pagan prefects. (Acta Mart. Jun. 19; Boll. Acta SS. Jun. iii. 113; Ughelli, Ital. Sac. i. 456; Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Ital. xviii. 69.) [R. S. G.]

GAUDENTIUS (6), the name of three Carthaginian Donatist bishops, viz. of Nigizubis or Nigazubis, Zerta, and Tigisis; the first two present at the Carthaginian conference A.D. 411, the third prevented by illness. (Mon. Vet. Don. 187, 202, 209.) [H. W. P.]

GAUDENTIUS (7), Donatist bishop of Tamogada, Tamogada, or Tamugadi, a town of Mauretania, about fourteen Roman miles north-east of Lambesa (Temugadi) (Ant. Itin. 34, 2), one of the seven managers on the Donatist side in Carth. Conf. A.D. 411, but appearing to have taken no very active part in the proceedings. (Mon. Vet. Don. pp. 288, 408, ed. Oberthür.)

The principal occasion on which his name has become notorious is his controversy with St. Augustine, A.D. c. 420. When Dulcitius [DULCITIUS] had sent him a letter of a pacific nature respecting the course to be pursued by the imperial government towards the Donatists, Gaudentius replied in two successive letters, one shorter, the other more at length. These letters Dulcitius placed in the hands of Augustine, who replied to them in the two books entitled contra Gaudentium (Aug. Opp. vol. ix. 707–751, ed. Migne), and which may be regarded virtually as representing the closing struggle of the Donatist controversy (Vol. I. p. 895).

In the first book Augustine criticizes the complimentary form of address used by Gaudentius towards Dulcitius, as inconsistent with the severe principles of his sect, defends the language of Dulcitius, but disclaims any responsibility on the part of the church for language used by a layman and a soldier. Gaudentius had said that he studiously discouraged any hindrance being offered to those who wished to quit the Donatist communion and return to the church, for, says he, "we who have learned that no one ought to be forced into religious belief, cannot retain against their will those who wish to leave us." To this Augustine replies that if Gaudentius thinks it right to promote return, he should do so openly, but if wrong, it is disingenuous and cruel in him and his party to sanction it.

The second letter of Gaudentius is longer, and so also, consequently, the reply of Augustine to it. Its arguments may be exhibited briefly, though not in their precise order, as follows:—

I. Holy Scripture forbids equally the innocent to be punished, or the guilty to be spared (Ex. xxiii. 7). Gabinus [GABINUS], and those turncoats who have renounced Donatism, ought either before their departure not to have been treated as guilty persons, or after it not to be received by the Catholics as innocent.

II. God gave man free will, but persecution abolishes this; how can the conduct of the persecutor be thought to agree with the will of God?

III. The church is founded, not on the laws of sovereigns, but on the preaching of prophets.

IV. Scripture in general, our Lord and His apostles, foretell persecution as the lot of the righteous; therefore righteousness is on the side not of the persecutors, but of the persecuted. (Matt. v. 11, 12; John xv. 2, 3; 2 Tim. iii. 12; Rev. vi. 9, 11; Wisdom v. 1–6.)

V. The good shepherd dies for his flock, and ought, therefore, not to avoid persecution, but to perish at his post. On this ground to follow the example of Razis in committing suicide, who is praised in his deed by Scripture, is justifiable and praiseworthy. (2 Macc. xiv. 27–46.)

VI. The case of Emeritus, who was falsely reported to have become a Catholic, was grossly misrepresented. [EMERITUS.]

To these arguments St. Augustine replies:—

I. The imperial government does not wish to kill, but to correct, and only in extreme cases to banish those who hinder others from exercising their free choice in returning to the church. In matters of cruelty the Donatists go beyond the government, for they threaten to commit suicide, while Dulcitius and the government wish to save them from their own violence. In this respect they are really wishing to suffer not for Christ's sake but for their own, and thus they are not martyrs, but only deceitful heretics. The example of Razia is related only, not commended by the author of the Book of Maccabees, and after all, the authority of this book is not to be placed on a level with that of the other books of Scripture. Moreover, even our Lord commanded His apostles to take flight during persecution, as St. Paul in fact did when he was in danger at Damascus (Matt. x. 23; Acts ix. 23, 25). If our Lord's promise concerning the limits of flight in such cases (Matt. x. 23) cannot fail, but the Donatists exclude themselves from its operation, how can they be truly said to belong to Christ? It is not all who suffer, but those who suffer for righteousness' sake who are righteous.

II. But, in truth, what right have the Donatists to complain of persecution (a) whose forefathers persecuted Caecilianus with the utmost bitterness; (b) whose partisans, especially the Circumcellions, have used all manner of violence towards Catholics; (c) whose predecessors had no scruple in enjoying immunity during the time of Julian, while the Catholics were suffering persecution, a contrast which destroys the assumption on the part of the Donatists of persecution as a mark of exclusive godliness; (d) again, what becomes of their consistency when the story is told of Secundus, bishop of Tigisis, who fled to avoid the violence of Purpurius at the Donatist council of Cirta, A.D. 305, and who must himself have been guilty of "tradition," for otherwise how could he have escaped in the persecution under Diocletian? (e) Lastly, let Gaudentius remember the flagrant instances of violent conduct on the part of his own predecessor, Optatus of Thamugada.

III. But it is almost equivalent to persecution to behold, as Catholics and well-disposed persons are obliged to do, the perversity and obstinacy of men who are bent on destroying both themselves and others.

IV. As to compulsion, (a) our Lord in His Parable (Luke xiv. 23) desired his servants to "compel" men to enter His kingdom. (b) It was by state authority that the people of Nineveh were brought to repentance.

V. As to state interference, (a) kings have been guardians of the church, and God gives in charge to them to correct disobedience. (b) If error is not to be corrected, how can human punishment be justified? The primæval law of punishment was one of death, but in truth the emperor wishes to spare life.

VI. What can be more inconsistent than the conduct of the Donatists towards the Maximianist Felicianus, whom they first denounced and persecuted, and afterwards received without inquiry, sanctioning all his acts done during secession?

VII. The case of Emeritus was no doubt misrepresented, but the Donatist cause gains no advantage from the true statement of it. When he appeared, as he did of his own accord, he neither offered argument on behalf of himself and his party, nor replied to any urged against them by Augustine, but simply remained silent. He can thus claim no credit for being a faithful confessor assailed by persecution.

VIII. Gaudentius regards Gabinus, and those who have returned to the church, as idolaters, for they have, he says, adopted its worship under compulsion. Is the church of God a mere human creation, or have not these people acted as they have done deliberately, because they have recognised its divine mission, and like sensible men have become weary of a system destitute of divine foundation?

IX. Gaudentius takes credit for not hindering such persons from returning, but on his own principles, is he not sanctioning idolatry by doing so?

Finally, Augustine invites Gaudentius to a friendly conference on the disputed points.

The second Book, c. Gaudentium, is a reply by Augustine to another letter, in which Gaudentius quotes the authority of St. Cyprian to shew the catholicity of his party. To this Augustine replies that his authority does not shelter them; why did they leave the church? Because they could not endure the presence of "tares" among the "wheat." But in order to set themselves on the right ground in this point, it is necessary for them to explain the "world" of the parable as the world outside of the church, in which alone they said that "tares" were to be found. Further, that the "bad fish" of another parable were in their view supposed to be unknown to the fishermen, and therefore not to be included in the church. On this principle, says Augustine, many would perish eternally on account of sins committed by persons unknown to them. Does Gaudentius remember the mistake made by Emeritus at the conference, when he denied the reading of Matt. iii. 12, "floor," "aream," i.e. that by the "floor" was meant the church, but, being corrected by his colleagues, maintained that by "chaff" was meant concealed offenders who could not injure the good (Mon. Vet. Don. p. 564, ed. Oberthür). But this opinion does not agree with that of Gaudentius, who holds that the good are injured by the neighbourhood of the evil. If this last opinion be the true one, what hope can there be for the Donatists themselves, who separated themselves from known evils, but who must have perished through existence of unknown? But, in truth, the doctrine of Cyprian is against both Emeritus and Gaudentius. He taught that Christians ought not to withdraw from the church on account of the existence in it of "tares." But, say the Donatists, "tares" are only to be found in the world, not in the church, our Lord on the contrary says that tares and wheat are to grow together till the harvest, and that He will not come till the gospel has been preached to all nations. There must, therefore, be many nations among whom no wheat has been sown, and from whom therefore it cannot have perished. As to baptism, the Donatists blame the Catholics for not re-baptizing heretics, but on their principles how could Felicianus baptize duly, who was condemned by the council of Bagaia, even more severely than Caecilianus had been at an earlier period, yet he was permitted to return to the Donatist community without question. But besides this, when Cyprian wished to re-baptize heretics, Stephen, bishop of Rome, refused to do as yet both remained in the church. But if the church suffered no injury by the conduct of Stephen, how can the Donatists be safe? The mistake made by Cyprian in this matter does not condemn him altogether any more than the rebuke administered by St. Paul condemns St. Peter altogether, and Cyprian himself used charitable language towards returned Novatianist heretics. Though the church does not repudiate Donatist baptism, the Donatists cannot be acquitted of perverseness and obstinacy. The phrase used by Gaudentius towards Dulcitius, "religio tua," is inconsistent with his professed opinions. If Dulcitius possesses "religion," the emperor also must possess it, yet Gaudentius thinks he has no concern with any affairs except such as are merely secular. Finally, Augustine exhorts Gaudentius to think better of the matter, and to return to the church, or, if he has any further remark to make, that he will confine himself to the points really at issue, which Augustine says he is willing to discuss with him.

In this controversy it is easy to see that as regards authority, precedent and consistency of behaviour, the advantage was entirely on the side of St. Augustine. Nothing could be more unreasonable than the teaching, nothing more inconsistent than the conduct of the Donatists. Ultra-liberals, as regards state interference and religious compulsion, they not only sanctioned acts of persecution on the part of their own adherents, but they availed themselves of state protection when it lay within their reach. Ultra-precisians, as regarded the integrity of religious rites, and the purity of religious communities, they nevertheless sanctioned acts done during secession by lapsed but subsequently restored ministers. On these points Augustine is undoubtedly triumphant, but on that of persecution his argument must be pronounced defective. When he tries to shew that the measures of the imperial government towards the Donatists are corrective only, and not destructive, he forgets, or at least omits, to explain the real difference between these two methods, viz. that it is one consisting in degree only, and not in kind, and that though the extreme case of privation of life is of course far removed from that of personal banishment, yet they are both essentially acts of constraint, and therefore of persecution. The force of state influence was now distinctly on the side of the church, and in great measure within its control, and thus not only was it easier for an advocate of the predominant party to handle the argument supplied by that influence, but also to expose the inconsistencies of his opponents, both in general and under similar circumstances. The Donatist cause already languishing, though not altogether extinguished, fell into decay from this time, a result to which the treatises of St. Augustine against Gaudentius may be said to have materially contributed. [H. W. P.]

GAUDENTIUS (8), first bishop of Novaria (Novara), elected A.D. 397, and died A.D. 417. He is said to have been peculiarly zealous in rooting out all remains of paganism. He was succeeded by Agabius or Agapitus. (Boll. Acta SS. 22 Jan. ii. 417; Ughelli, Ital. Sac. iv. 943; Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Ital. xiv. 437.)

[R. S. G.]

GAUDENTIUS (9), the bearer, together with Quodvultdeus, of a letter from Severus to St. Augustine. (Aug. Ep. 110.) [H. W. P.]

GAUDENTIUS (10), a Roman to whom St. Jerome wrote in the year 413 on the education of his daughter Pacatula. The child had been born at the time of the sack of Rome by Alaric (410), and the father had consecrated her to the state of virginity. He wrote to Jerome, then at Bethlehem, begging him to write a letter of precepts of piety and asceticism for his child. Jerome replied in a letter to the father, which he hoped Pacatula might read in after years. The letter shews how piety and asceticism were in those days impressed on the minds of the young, and also proves how the miseries consequent on the inroads of the barbarians made Christians abandon the world. (Jerome, Ep. 128, ed. Vall.) [W. H. F.]

GAUDENTIUS (11) appears among the Eutychians, who, claiming to be archimandrites, appealed to the emperor Marcian, in A.D. 451, for a general council (Labbe, iv. 524). The orthodox archimandrites at the council of Chalcedon refused to recognise his claim to be an archimandrite, and described him as a μεμωρηνος (cf. ELPIDIUS) with five others under him (Labbe, iv. 522 A). [C. G.]

GAUDENTIUS (12), bishop of Antium, present at the council held at Rome by Hilarius, A.D. 465. (Mansi, vii. 967; Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Ital. i. 684.) [R. S. G.]

GAUDENTIUS (13), bishop of Albenga (A. bengha), present at the council at Rome under Hilarius, A.D. 465. (Mansi, vii. 965; Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Italia, xiii. 532.) [R. S. G.]

GAUDENTIUS (14), supposed to be the first bishop of Scyllacium (Squillace). He was present at the council at Rome under Hilarius, 465. (Mansi, vii. 965; Ughelli, Ital. Sac. ix. 588; Feudalius, Antistitum Scyllacen. Series, p. 14.) [R. S. G.]

GAUDENTIUS (15), bishop of Verona, probably c. 465, in which year he is said to have been present at the council at Rome, but his date is uncertain. (Acta SS. 12 Feb. ii. 602; Ugh. Ital. Sac. v. 576; Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Ital. x. 747; Biancolini, Vescovi di Verona, pt. ii. p. 2; Mansi, vii. 968.) [R. S. G.]

GAUDENTIUS (16), bishop of Aufinium in the Abruzzi, complained of to Simplicius bishop of Rome, A.D. 475, by some of the neighbouring bishops, as having conferred orders improperly, and misappropriated the property of his church. He was consequently deprived of the power of ordaining, condemned to make good his defalcations, and allowed for the future but a very slight control over the revenues of his diocese. (Jaffé, Regesta Pont. Roman. p. 49; Ceillier, Auteurs sac. x. 402.) [R. S. G.]

GAUDENTIUS (17), bishop of Putea in Numidia, banished by Hunneric, 484. (Victor Vit. Notit. 56; Morcelli, Afr. Christ. i. 259.) [R. S. G.]

GAUDENTIUS (18), the name of two bishops, viz. of Salerno and of Tadinum (Gualdo-Tadino in Umbria), present at the first synod under pope Symmachus, March 499. (Hefele, § 220; Mansi, viii. 235.) [A. H. D. A.]

GAUDENTIUS (19), bishop of Nola, who received letters from Gregory the Great, providing for and giving directions about the church at Capua (Lib. v. indict. xiii. Ep. 13 and 33 in Migne, lxxvii. 731, 759.) [A. H. D. A.]

GAUDENTIUS (20), 9th bishop of Constance, succeeding Martin, and followed, after an interval of three years, by Joannes I. His death is mentioned in the life of St. Gall by Walafrid (cap. xiv. Migne, Patr. Lat. cxiv. 990). It took place probably in 616 or the following year. (Lanigan, Eccl. Hist. of Ireland, cap. xvi. s. ii. n.; Gall. Christ. v. 893.) [S. A. B.]

GAUDENTIUS (21), bishop of Atinum (Atino), said to have been appointed by Honorius of Rome subsequently to A.D. 625, and to have held his see for fifteen years. (Ughelli, Ital. Sac. vi. 540.) [R. S. G.]

GAUDENTIUS (22), bishop of Tergeste (Trieste), signing the second epistle of pope Agatho which was sent in 680 to the third council of Constantinople. (Mansi, xi. 311.) [A. H. D. A.]

GAUDENTIUS (23), bishop of Valeria from a little before 675 till after 693, during, that is to say, part of Wamba's reign, the whole of Ervig's and the greater part of Egica's. He appears as junior bishop at C. Tol. xi. (675) and subscribes the acts of the fourteenth, fifteenth, and sixteenth councils (A.D. 684, 688, and 693), being represented at the thirteenth by his vicar Vincent. (Aguirre-Catalani, iv. 247, 287, 304, 313, 333; Esp. Sagr. viii. 205.) [M. A. W.]

GAUDENTIUS (24), bishop of Bologna, c. 730. (Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Italia, iii. 471; Ughelli, Ital. Sacr. ii. 11.) [A. H. D. A.]

GAUDENTIUS (25), bishop of Perugia, at the Roman synod under Zacharias in 743 concerning monastic discipline, etc. (Mansi, xi. 367; Hefele, § 364.) [A. H. D. A.]

GAUDENTIUS (26), vicar of the prefect of the seven provinces of Gaul, friend of Sidonius Apollinaris. From two letters of the latter, one addressed to Gaudentius himself, we learn that he had risen to his position without the advantage of high birth. (Sidon. Apoll. Epistolae, lib. i. ep. 3 and 4. Migne, Patr. Lat. lviii. 450, 451.) [S. A. B.]

GAUDENTIUS (27), an abbat to whom Dionysius Exiguus addressed his history of the finding of the head of John the Baptist, about 550. (Patr. Lat. lxvii. 417.) [S. A. B.]

GAUDERICUS of Lyons. [GANDERICUS.]

GAUDERICUS of Treves. [GUNDERIC (2).]

GAUDESTEUS (GODESTEUS, GUDESTHEUS), bishop of Orense from before A.D. 646, till about 650, present at the seventh council of Toledo, A.D. 646. (Aguirre-Catalani, iii. 423; Esp. Sagr. xvii. 44.) [M. A. W.]

GAUDINUS, ST., twenty-fifth bishop of Soissons, following St. Adolbertus, and succeeded by Macharius. In the Gallican martyrology (Feb. 11) it is stated that having publicly rebuked some citizens for their usury, he was secretly seized, dragged to the Vicus Herinus, and there cast into an open well, where he perished (Boll. Acta SS. Feb. ii. 553). In 693 a Gaudinus is said to have subscribed the placitum of king Clovis at Valence, but whether of Soissons or Lyons is not certain. (Gall. Chr. ix. 339.) [S. A. B.]

GAUDIOLANUS. [GAUDELENUS.]

GAUDIOSA, the queen of the famous Pelayo, the first king of Asturias (Seb. Sal. cap. 11; apud Esp. Sagr. xiii.). She was buried with her husband in the church of St. Eulalia of Velamio, between Cangas and Covadonga, but the remains of both, according to Morales (Coronica, lib. 13, cap. 6), were transferred by Alfonso X. to the church of our Lady of Covadonga, where the tomb of Pelayo is still shewn. (Florez, Reynas de España, i. 33.) [M. A. W.]

GAUDIOSUS (1), bishop of Abitina, in proconsular Africa, said to have been banished by Genseric c. A.D. 440, and to have died in exile at Naples A.D. 452. (Morcelli, Afr. Christ. i. 64.) Baronius mentions some legendary circumstances collected at Naples concerning him. (Rom. Mart. Oct. 28, notes; A. E. ann. 416, xx.) See also Ruinart, Comment. on Victor Vit. cap. ix. sec. 5, p. 255, in Pat. Lat. lviii. 405.) [R. S. G.]

GAUDIOSUS (2), bishop of Pappianum, in proconsular Africa, was at the council of Carthage, A.D. 525. (Hardouin, Concil. ii. 1082 c; Morcelli, Afr. Christ. i. 253.) [R. S. G.]

GAUDIOSUS (3), ST., a saint of Tarazona, in Arragon, the city of which he was bishop. According to Acta given by J. T. Salazar (Mart. Hisp. vi. 59) he was the son of Guntha, a man of high rank at the court of Theodoric, while the latter governed Spain during the minority of Amalaric (i. e. before A.D. 526, the year of Theodoric's death), and was a pupil of St. Victorian. The Acta then relate that he went to Constantinople, where he married a Syrian lady, and that he was appointed by the emperor Maurice, who reigned from A.D. 582 to A.D. 602, praetorian; prefect of Africa and they identify him with the Gaudiosus, the magister militum, to whom St. Gregory the Great wrote in A.D. 590 (S. Gregorii Epist. i. 76 in Migne, Patr. Lat. lxxvii. 530). Gaudiosus afterwards returned to Spain, and was appointed by king Gundemar, who reigned from A.D. 610 to A.D. 612, bishop of Tarazona, as successor to Stephanus, who signs the canons of the third council of Toledo in A.D. 589. The Acta represent that the Arians were then so powerful in Spain that no one, however brave, ventured to acknowledge himself a Catholic; but that Gaudiosus was not deterred thereby, nor by the contemporary executions by the Arians of Boethius and Symmachus (which really happened about A.D. 520-524), from preaching the orthodox faith, and that he wrote many letters to St. Isidore of Seville, and to Maximus and Braulio of Saragossa, to encourage them to resist Arianism. Finally, these Acta place his death in A.D. 530. From the above account of the Acta it will be seen how untrustworthy they are, and it may be added that the statement that Gundemar appointed Gaudiosus as successor to Stephanus is erroneous, as Florivius, in A.D. 610, subscribes the decree of Gundemar as bishop of Tarazona (Tejada y Ramiro, ii. 483); and further, that Arianism in Spain was never formidable after the third council of Toledo in A.D. 589. From the mention of St. Victorian, who died in A.D. 561 in his eightieth year, Gaudiosus apparently flourished in the first half of the 6th century, and this agrees with the Chronicle of Maximus (in Migne, Patr. Lat. lxxx. 625), which places him about A.D. 533. Gams (Ser. Episc. 78) also places him about A.D. 530. He gave many gifts of lands and farms to the monastery of St. Martin, of which St. Victorian was abbat. He died on Nov. 3, on which day he is commemorated. His body is preserved in the monastery of St. Victorian, in the diocese of Lerida. (Boll. AA. SS. Jan. i. 741; Esp. Sagr. xlvii. 230.) [F. D.]

GAUDIOSUS (4), bishop of Eugubium (Gubbio), who received a letter from Gregory the Great, ordering him to provide for the destitute church of Tadinum (Gualdo-Tadino in Umbria), and to send him a priest to be consecrated as its bishop. (Greg. Magn. Epist. lib. ix. indict. ii. ep. 87; Migne, lxxvii. 1016.) [A. H. D. A.]

GAUDIOSUS (5), a poor man of Rome, who complained to pope Gregory the Great soon after his accession (9th indict. i.e. A.D. 590) that the agents of the church claimed his sons as bondsmen, and were violently enforcing the demand. Gaudiosus had proved to Gregory by satisfactory evidence that his wife Siricia, once a slave, had been bestowed as a gift by a lady Ecia on a lady Morena, and that this last had emancipated her by letter. Gregory writes to the subdeacon Anthemius to see justice done. If there were no documents with the church to invalidate those of Gaudiosus, the man was not to be molested; for it was intolerable that, when people bestowed liberties at their own cost, the church, which was the natural guardian of those liberties, should revoke them. (Greg. Mag. Epp. lib. i. ep. 55, in Migne, Patr. Lat. lxxvii. 516.) [C. H.]

GAUDIOSUS (6), bishop of Naples, c. 637-644. (Gesta Episcoporum Neapolitanorum, part i. 27; Scriptores Rerum Italicarum Langob. 1878, p. 415.) [A. H. D. A.]

GAUDIOSUS (7), bishop of Salernum (Salerno), probably before A.D. 646. He is said to have been of the family of the Dukes of Naples. His successor was Luminosus. (Ughelli, Ital. Sac. vii. 488.) [R. S. G.]

GAUDIOSUS (8), the name of two bishops, viz. of Rieti and of Capua, present at the Lateran synod under pope Martin in 649, which condemned the Monothelite heresy. (Mansi, x. 866; Hefele, § 307.) [A. H. D. A.]

GAUDIOSUS (9), bishop of Signia (Segni), present at the Roman synod, held under pope Agatho in Oct. 679, concerning Wilfrid and the affairs of England. (Hefele, § 290; Mansi, xi. 179.) He also signed the second letter of pope Agatho, which was sent in 680, after a synod in

Rome, to the third council of Constantinople (Hefele, § 314; Mansi, xi. 310). [A. H. D. A.]

GAUDIOSUS (10), bishop of Puteoli, who signed the second epistle of pope Agatho, which was sent in 680, after a synod in Rome, to the third council of Constantinople. (Mansi, xi. 299; Hefele, § 314.) [A. H. D. A.]

GAUDIOSUS (11), bishop of Brescia, 690. (Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Italia, xi. 566; Ughelli, Ital. Sac. iv. 531; Mart. Rom. Mart. 7; Boll. Acta SS. 7 Mart. i. 648.) [A. H. D. A.]

GAUDIOSUS (12), bishop of Roselle (in Etruria, Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Italia, xvii. 640). He gave testimony before Guntheram, notary and missus of king Luitprand, 715, in the controversy between the bishops of Siena and Arezzo. (Troya, Cod. Dipl. iii. 202; Muratori, Antiq. Med. Aev. vi. 377.) [A. H. D. A.]

GAUDIOSUS (13), bishop of Sutri, at the Roman synod of 743. (Mansi, xii. 367; Hefele, § 364.) Others call this bishop Gratosus II. (Ugh. Ital. Sac. i. 1274; Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Italia, vi. 225, 267); the synodal subscriptions having both "Gaudeosus Sudrio" and "Hirtioso Sutrinus," and the latter being reckoned a corruption of Gratosus. [A. H. D. A.]

GAUDIOSUS (14), possibly bishop of Bieda (Blera), south of Viterbo, present at the Roman synod of 743. But the signature is uncertain. (Mansi, xii. 367.) [A. H. D. A.]

GAUDIOSUS (15), bishop of Messina, at the second council of Nicaea in 787. (Mansi, xiii. 723, 732.) [A. H. D. A.]

GAUDO (1), twenty-fourth bishop of Orleans, succeeding Audo and followed by Sigobertus (circ. A.D. 668). (Gall. Christ. viii. 1416; Gams, Series Episc. 593.) [S. A. B.]

GAUDO, bishop of Strasburg. [GANDO.]

GAUDO (2) (GAUD, GILDUS, WALDUS), ST., second bishop of Evreux, succeeding St. Laurinus, after an interval caused by the devastations of the barbarians, and followed by Maurusio. He is said to have been consecrated by Germanus archbishop of Rouen, and, after administering the diocese for forty years, to have resigned the bishopric and retired to a desert spot in Neustria, where he died in 491. His body is said to have been found at the village of St. Pair, near Granville, in 1131. He was commemorated Jan. 31. (Gall. Christ. xi. 566; Hist. des Evêques d'Evreux par Chassant et Sauvage, 5-6; Boll. Acta SS. Jan. ii. 1110.) [S. A. B.]

GAUDRIOUS of Lyons. [GANDERICUS.]

GAUFRIDUS. [GUNTFRIDUS.]

GAUGERICUS of Treves. [GUNDERIC (2).]

GAUGERICUS (GÉRY), fourth bishop of Cambray, succeeding St. Veuulfus and followed by St. Berthoaldus (circ. 580-619), was born at Yvoy in Luxembourg, and was ordained priest by St. Magnericus of Treves. He was nominated to the see by Childeric II., and consecrated by Egidius of Rheims. He devoted himself to the extirpation of the remnants of idolatry and the settlement of the discipline of the church. He built a monastery close to the city, calling it after St. Medardus, though it afterwards bore his own name, and there he was buried. He was commemorated Aug. 11. The monastery in after times was pulled down to make room for a citadel built by Charles V. (Mart. Usuard.; Boll. Acta SS. Aug. ii. 664; Gall. Christ. iii. 4.)

[S. A. B.]

GAULIENUS—May 31. Martyr in Spain with Germanus and Silvanus under Dacian the president in the Diocletian persecution. (Mart. Hieron., Usuard., Notk.)

[G. T. S.]

GAUSBERTUS of Angers. [GODOBERTUS.]

GAUSBERTUS (1) (GODEBERTUS, GAUCIOBERTUS), twenty-seventh bishop of Chartres, succeeding St. Malardus and followed by Deodatus. His signature is found to three charters between about 658 and 666. (Migne, Patr. Lat. lxxxviii. 1170, 1181, 1186; Gall. Christ. viii. 1101.)

[S. A. B.]

GAUSBERTUS (2) (GUOZBERTUS), thirtieth bishop of Poitiers, succeeding St. Maximinus, and followed by Godo, about the middle of the 8th century. He is named in a charter of king Louis the Pious, not Pippin as stated in the Gallia Christiana, for the monastery of Nobiliacum (Noaillé) as one of the benefactors. (Gall. Christ. ii. 1155, instr 346; Gams, Series Episc. 601.)

GAUSOLINUS of Metz. [GOSSELINUS.]

GAUSUALDUS, bishop of Como, c. 741, (Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Italia, xi. 319; Ughelli, Ital. Sacr. v. 263.)

[A. H. D. A.]

GAUTCERIUS, twenty-fifth bishop of Troyes, succeeding Aldobertus and followed by Arduinus, about the beginning of the 8th century. He is mentioned in an ancient MS. catalogue of Auxerre (Gall. Christ. xii. 489).

[S. A. B.]

GAUTUS, bishop of Neelon in Arabia. The situation of this town is obscure, the only mention of it being in the record of the sixth session of the council of Chalcedon, A.D. 451, where Constantinus, bishop of Bostra, and metropolitan, signed on behalf of certain of his bishops, including Gautus of Neelon. It has been conjectured that the name may be an erroneous spelling of Eleale or Alon. (Le Quien, Or. Christ. ii. 867; Mansi, vii. 137.)

[J. de S.]

GAUZIOLENUS (GOSCELINUS), seventeenth bishop of Le Mans. After the death of his predecessor, Herlemundus I., the see was vacant several years, until count Rothgar forced a son of his own, described as "inlitteratus et indoctus," upon the unwilling clergy. The metropolitan of Tours refused to consecrate, but the archbishop of Rouen, bribed, as it was said, performed the rite. In 743 he obtained from king Childeric III. a charter of confirmation of privileges for the estate of Arduinum, and another for the monastery of Anisola, both given in Migne, Patr. Lat. lxxxviii. 1147, 1150. Gauziolenus was soon afterwards dethroned by Pippin, and succeeded by Herlemundus II. (Gesta Pontificum Cenom.; Mabillon, Vet. Analect. 285-287; Gall. Christ. xiv. 354.)

[S. A. B.]

GAVIDIUS (1). Sulpicius Severus (Chron., lib. ii. 41) records that he had frequently heard Gavidius, whom he calls episcopum nostrum, telling how the Gallic bishops had refused the imperial maintenance at the council of Ariminum while three British bishops were obliged by poverty to accept it: a fact which Gavidius thought derogatory to the Britons, while Sulpicius Severus thought it much to their credit. This Gavidius may have been the fifth bishop of Périgueux, since Sulpicius speaks of him as a bishop of his own province, and there is no other diocese there to which he can be easily assigned. (Gall. Christ. ii. 1448.)

GAVIDIUS. The name occurs among the subscriptions to the council of Ariminum, 359. His see is not given, but it was probably Narbonne. (Gall. Christ. vi. 6.)

GAVIENUS, forty-second bishop of Tours, succeeding Ostaldus, and followed by Erlingus. His name does not appear in the old catalogues, and the only authority for his existence is the mention of him as one of those present at the Lateran Council, A.D. 769. (Mansi, xii. 715; Gall. Christ. xiv. 33.)

GEBAUDUS or GEBAVULTUS. [GIBULDUS.]

GEBMUND, the eighth bishop of Rochester (M. H. B. 616). He was appointed by Theodore archbishop of Canterbury to succeed Cuichelm, who had deserted his see (Bede, H. E. iv. 12), soon after the year 676, probably about 678. The length of his episcopate is uncertain; and it has been argued that the date 693, to which his death is referred by the Anglo-Saxon Chronicle (M. H. B. 323), is the probable date, inasmuch as if he had survived archbishop Theodore, Berhtwald, the succeeding archbishop, need not have gone abroad for consecration (Smith, note on Bede, H. E. v. 8; Wharton, Ang. Sac. i. 330). On the other hand, there is a charter of Oshere, the under king of the Hwicci, stated by both Berhtwald and Gebmund, and which, though scarcely to be referred to a later date than 693, would prove that Gebmund was alive after Berhtwald's consecration (Kemble, C. D. 36). But a more conclusive proof is supplied by the fact that Gebmund (Gybmund) took part in the legislation of king Wihtred, at the witenagemot of Berghamstede (Bersted near Maidstone) in the fifth year of that king. As Wihtred's sole reign began in 690 or 691, and as 696 is called the fifth year of it in a Rochester charter attested by Gebmund (K. C. D. 39), it is probable that Gebmund lived at least until 696. We may then infer that the Canterbury MS. of the Chronicle, on which only the date 693 depends, owes the date to a misunderstanding of Bede's words as to the consecration of Tobias the next bishop by Berhtwald. GEDALIUS, bishop of Hospitia in Numidia, banished by Hunneric, A.D. 484. (Victor Vit. Isid. 57; Morcelli, Afr. Christ. i. 188.)

[R. S. G.]

GEDEON, ST., thirty-seventh bishop of Besançon, succeeding Hervaeus and followed by Remonius, about the close of the 8th century. There is extant a royal diploma given by a king Charles, to compose a quarrel that had arisen between Gedeon and Rigbertus abbat of St. Oyan (Eugendi) in the Jura, as to the possession of a cell in which St. Lupicinus was buried. Upon the report of Docto abbat of Luxeuil and Count Adelard, who had been commissioned to investigate the matter, the property was adjudged to the abbat. It has been doubted whether the author was Charles the Great, in which case the date of the instrument is A.D. 803, or Charles the Bald, in which case it would be A.D. 862. Mabillon, after first assigning it to the former date, finally decided for the latter (Annot. an. 790, n. i. tom. ii. 294), and the authors of the Gallia Christiana (iv. instr. 3) put it with that date, but their successors (xv. 19) adduce reasons for adopting the earlier year, and it seems that the position of Gedeon in the indices of the Besançon church supports their contention. Mention, moreover, is made of him in a charter of Lothair, given in 869 as one of the predecessors of Arduinus, the archbishop then sitting (Gall. Christ. xv. instr. 4). The earlier position is assigned to him in the Series Episcoporum of Gams (p. 514). [S. A. B.]

GEGHIA, of Inis Geghe, is mentioned in Vita A. Foranensis among those who came to salute St. Columba when he visited Ireland, but seems to be otherwise unknown. (Colg. Acta SS. 337, s. 7, 340, n. 27, and Tr. Thaum. 463, c. 55.)

[J. G.]

GEGOBERGA, ST. (SEGOBERGA, CAECILIA, CLARA), second abbess of the double monastery of Habend, afterwards Remiremont or Romberg, founded cir. A.D. 620 by St. Amatus and St. Romaric on the top of the hill of Habend in the Vosges, near the Moselle, but rebuilt after its destruction by Huns, by the emperor Louis III. in the 10th century, at the foot of the mountain on the other side of the river, giving birth to the town of Remiremont. She succeeded St. Mactefiede the first abbess, perhaps A.D. 626, and she was still abbess in 653, when the life of St. Romaric the second abbat and her contemporary was addressed to her. Her successor, St. Tecta or Gertrude, was presiding in 670 (Mabillon, Acta SS. O. S. B. saec. ii. 670, ed. 1669). This is all that can be gathered from the contemporary lives. Tradition adds that she was the daughter of St. Romaric, and that he built his nunnery for her and her sister Adzaitrude, that she changed her name from Gegoberga to Caecilia on becoming a nun, and that she was called Clara after her death on account of the many cures performed at her tomb, particularly of blindness and diseases of the eye (Sollerius in Boll. Acta SS. 12 Aug. ii. 732). Saussaye (Mart. Gallic. p. 1221) and other later writers say that she was blind. [A. B. C. D.]

GEILA, brother of Suinthila. [GAILA (2).]

GEINTEN (GEMTHENNUS, GENTENNUS), priest of Tirguaire, commemorated Sept. 2 (Mart. Doneg.); identified by Colgan (Tr. Thaum. 143, c. 102, 180, n. 149, 267 A) with Gemthennus of Each-aineach, who is mentioned by St. Evinus as a disciple of St. Patrick and teacher in Magh-Luirg, Connaught. [J. G.]

GELASIA, a virgin eminent for her piety, praised by Palladius for never letting the sun go down upon her wrath either against her domestics or any other person. (Pallad. Hist. Lausi. c. 146, p. 1048.) [E. V.]

GELASINUS, martyr at Heliopolis in Phoenicia, A.D. 297. He was acting as "secundus mimus" (Horat. lib. i. ep. 18) in a theatre full of people. Proceeding to mock the most solemn Christian rites, his fellow actors flung him into a bath and baptized him. Coming forth clad in white, Gelasinus said, no longer, however, in mockery, "I am a Christian, for I have seen in the bath an awful and majestic spectacle, and for Christ's sake I am ready to die." The people thereupon took and stoned him, the magistrate terminating his sufferings by beheading him. Theodoret in Ser. 8 de Martyribus refers to such sudden conversions of actors as having occurred more than once. [GENESIUS.] Chron. Paschal. sub ann. 269, i.e. A.D. 297. He was commemorated by the Greeks on Feb. 27. (Boll. Acta SS. Feb. iii. 675.)

GELASIUS, Sept. 29. [GENESIUS (10).]

GELASIUS (1) I., bishop of Rome after Felix III. (or II.) from March 492 to November 496, during about four years and a half. At the time of his accession the schism between the Western and Eastern churches, which had begun under his predecessor, had lasted more than seven years. Its occasion had been the excommunication by pope Felix of Acacius, the patriarch of Constantinople, for supporting and communicating with Peter Mongus, the once monophysite patriarch of Alexandria, who had, however, satisfied Acacius by subscribing the Henoticon, and afterwards the Nicene creed. There had been other grounds of complaint against Acacius, notably his disregard of the authority of the Roman see; but the above had been the original cause of quarrel. (See FELIX III., ACACIUS.)

Acacius being now dead, the subject of dispute was reduced to the retention of his name in the diptychs of the Eastern church. Felix had demanded its erasure as a condition of intercommunion with his successors. But they had refused to comply. The patriarch of Constantinople was now Euphemius, the emperor was Anastasius. On his accession Gelasius wrote a respectful letter of salutation to the emperor, as appears from an allusion to it in an extant letter from Gelasius to one Faustus, of which hereafter. It appears also from this same letter that the emperor did not reply. To Euphemius the patriarch the new pope did not write, as was usual, to inform him of his accession. Euphemius, however, wrote twice to Gelasius, the second letter being sent, when no notice had been taken of the first, by a deacon called Sinclitius, to Rome. These facts, and the purport of what Euphemius wrote, are gathered from the extant letter which Gelasius now wrote in reply. Euphemius had complained, it seems, of having received no communication from the new pope; he had expressed a strong desire of reconciliation between the churches, and a hope that Gelasius, whom he complimented as "not needing to be taught," and as "intending all things necessary for the unity of the ecclesiastical body," would through condescension and a spirit of charity be able to restore concord. He had reminded him of the condescension of Christ. He had insisted that Acacius himself had been no heretic, and that before he communicated with Peter Mongus the latter had been purged of heresy. He had asked by what synodical authority Acacius had ever been condemned. He had further alleged that the people of Constantinople would never allow his name to be erased, but had suggested that the pope might send an embassy to Constantinople to treat with them on the subject. Gelasius, in his reply, couched in a tone of imperious humility, utterly refuses any compromise. He speaks of the custom of the bishops of the apostolic see notifying their elevation to inferior bishops as a condescension rather than an obligation, and one certainly not due to such as chose to cast in their lot with heretics. He treats with contempt the plea of the determined attitude of the people of Constantinople. The shepherd ought, he says, to lead the flock, not the flock control the shepherd. The idea of himself sending to treat with them was out of the question, as if they would listen to him, towards whom they shewed themselves but ill-disposed, when their own bishop confessed his inability to influence them. As to the original cause of dispute, Chalcedon had condemned the heresy held by Peter Mongus, and by implication him; he had not been absolved, and Acacius had communicated with him. Acacius had therefore been rightly excommunicated, and those who retained his name in their diptychs were associated in his condemnation. But the main gist of the letter is to assert in no measured terms the supremacy of the see of Rome, and the necessity of submitting to it. "We shall come," he concludes, "brother Euphemius, without doubt we shall come to that tremendous tribunal of Christ, with those standing round by whom the faith has been defended. There it will be proved whether the glorious confession of St. Peter has left anything short for the salvation of those who were given him to rule, or whether there has been rebellious and pernicious obstinacy in those who were unwilling to obey him."

The next year (493) Theodoric, the new Ostrogothic king of Italy, having sent an embassy, headed by two Romans, Faustus and Irenaeus, to Constantinople, Gelasius took the opportunity of writing a long letter to the Eastern bishops. Its main drift was to justify the excommunication of Acacius by asserting that he had exceeded his powers in absolving Peter Mongus without the authority of the Roman see, and that for his own condemnation by pope Felix there had been no need (as was alleged to be the case) of the convention of a new synod. He complains also in the same letter of the expulsion of certain Catholic bishops in the East from their sees. Faustus, one of the ambassadors of Theodoric through whom this letter had been sent, replied in behalf of the Eastern bishops. Gelasius answered him in the letter addressed to him, to which allusion has been made. It is a long justification of his position with regard to Acacius, and of the supreme authority claimed by him for the Roman see. In reply to the assertion that what had been done by Rome was contrary to the canons of the church, he deigns in some parts of his letter to rest his case on canonical authority, saying (as before) that the council of Chalcedon had virtually condemned Acacius, and adding that in excluding him from communion the bishop of Rome had only done what any other bishop might have done; also that the canons of the church (referring doubtless to those of Sardica, which were quoted by the popes as Nicene) gave supreme jurisdiction to the see of Rome. But in other parts he plainly asserts the supremacy of the apostolic see over the whole church as due to the original commission of Christ to St. Peter, and as having always existed prior to, and independent of, all synods and canons. He speaks of "the apostolical judgment, which both the voice of Christ and the tradition of the elders and the authority of canons had supported, that it should itself always determine questions throughout the church." With regard to the possibility of Acacius being absolved now, having died excommunicate, he says that Christ Himself, who raised the dead, is never said to have absolved those who died in error, and that even to St. Peter it was on earth only that the power of binding and loosing had been given, not beyond the grave. An address in such a tone was not calculated to conciliate. The result was that the name of Gelasius himself was now removed from the diptychs of the Constantinopolitan church.

After the return of Faustus and Irenaeus to Rome, Gelasius wrote a long letter to the emperor, in which his position with regard to the question of Acacius is again justified, and the supremacy of Rome, resting on canons as well as original prerogative, is again insisted on, while the emperor is exhorted to use his temporal power to control his people in spiritual as well mundane matters. This letter is noteworthy in containing a distinct expression of the view taken by Gelasius of the relations to each other of the ecclesiastical and civil jurisdictions. Each regards as separate and supreme in its own sphere. As in secular things priests are bound to obey princes, so in spiritual things all the faithful, including princes, ought to submit their hearts to priests; and, if to priests generally, much more to the prelate of that see which even supreme Divinity has willed should be over all priests, and to which the subsequent act of the general church has perpetually awarded such pre-eminence. Gelasius also wrote on the same subjects to the bishops of various provinces, including those of East Illyricum and Thracia. In his address to the last he enlarges on its being the function of the Roman see, not only to carry out the decisions of synods, but even to give to such decisions their whole authority. Nay, the purpose of synods is spoken of as being simply to express the assent of the church at large to what the pope had already decreed, and what was therefore already binding. Thus he says had been the case in the instance of the council of Chalcedon. Further, instances are alleged of popes having on their own mere authority reversed the decisions of synods, absolved those whom synods had condemned, and condemned those whom synods had absolved. The cases of Athanasius and Chrysostom are cited as examples of the exercise of such power. Lastly, any claim of Constantinople (contemptuously spoken of as in the diocese of Heraclea) to be exempt from the judgment of "the first see" is put aside as absurd, since "the power of a secular kingdom is one thing, the distribution of ecclesiastical dignities another."

In the year 495 Gelasius convened a synod of sixty-six bishops at Rome for the purpose of absolving and restoring to his see Misenus of Canus, one of the bishops sent by pope Felix to Constantinople in the affair of Acacius, who had been then won over, and in consequence excommunicated. Before receiving absolution this schismatic was required to make a declaration before the synod that he "condemned, anathematized, abhorred, and for ever execrated Dioscorus, Asellus, Peter Mongus, Peter Fullo, Acacius, and all their successors, accomplices, abettors, and all who communicated with them."

The death of Gelasius in the November of the following year (496) prevented any further steps under his auspices with respect to the great schism, which the attitude assumed by him had certainly not tended to heal.

In addition to his extant letters on the subject, some of which have been quoted, there is a curious treatise of his called Tomus de anathematismo circulo. It refers in the first place to those canons of the council of Chalcedon, giving independent authority to the see of Constantinople, of which pope Leo had disapproved, setting forth that the fact of this council having done something wrongly did not impair the validity of what it had rightly done, and that the approval of the see of Rome was the sole test of what was right. It passes next to the subject alluded to in its title, the circumstance of pope Felix, in his condemnation of Acacius, having bound him with an irrevocable anathema. This, it is argued, could not be taken to imply that the same power that had imposed the anathema could not have removed it on the repentance of the person so bound; for that Arians and other heretics who had undoubtedly been involved in the unpardonable sin against the Holy Ghost had in fact, on their repentance, been reconciled to the church. The irrevocability, then, of the sentence against Acacius had referred to his heresy if persisted in, not to his person, had he renounced his heresy. But it was true the sentence had become utterly irrevocable now, since Acacius had died impenitent. The intention of the argument seems to be both to explain away the apparent limitation of the absolving power of Rome which the terms of the sentence by Felix had implied, and also to justify the now perpetual and irrevocable exclusion of the name of Acacius from the diptychs of the church. The tract contains further statements and arguments as to Rome alone having been competent to reconcile Peter Mongus or to absolve Acacius, and in reference to the idea of the emperor having had power in the latter case without the leave of Rome, the same distinction between the spheres of the ecclesiastical and civil jurisdictions is drawn that was set forth (as above shewn) in the letter to the emperor. In this instance Melchizedek is referred to as having in old times been both priest and king; the devil, it is said, in imitation of him, had induced the emperors to assume the supreme pontificate; but since Christianity had revealed the truth to the world, the union of the two powers had ceased to be lawful: Christ, in consideration of human frailty, had now for ever separated them, leaving the emperors dependent on the pontiffs for their everlasting salvation, the pontiffs on the emperors for the administration of all temporal affairs. Milman (Lat. Christianity) remarks on the contrast between the interpretation of the type of Melchizedek and that given in the 13th century by pope Innocent IV., who takes Melchizedek as prefiguring the union in the pope of the sacerdotal and royal powers.

There are two other works attributed to Gelasius in which views are expressed not easily reconciled with those since endorsed by his successors. One of these is a tract, the authenticity of which has not been questioned, against the Manicheans at Rome, in which the practice, adopted by that sect, of communion in one kind is strongly condemned. His words are, "We find that some, taking only the portion of the sacred body, abstain from the cup of the sacred blood. Let these (since I know not by what superstition they are actuated) either receive the entire sacraments or be debarred from them altogether; because a division of one and the same mystery cannot take place without great sacrilege." Baronius evades the obviously general application of these concluding words by saying that they refer only to the Manicheans, who, in order to avoid suspicion of heresy, communicated with Catholics, but, in accordance with their own principles, in one kind only. Hence, he argues, the condemnation is of their doing so with this intent, not of the thing itself; and thus that the expression "without great sacrilege" means "without taint of suspicion of most wicked heresy." And this interpretation he says is germane to the sense of the passage.

It can hardly be said to be so to that of the language used.

The other passage above referred to occurs in a treatise, de duabus Naturis, against the Eutychians and Nestorians. Arguing against the Eutychian position that the union of the human and divine natures in Christ implies the absorption of the human into the divine, the writer adduces the Eucharist as the image, similitude, and representation of the same mystery, the point being that as, after consecration, the natural substance of the bread and wine remains unchanged, so the human nature of Christ remained unchanged notwithstanding its union with divinity. His words are: "The sacraments of the body and blood of Christ which we take are a divine thing, inasmuch as through them we are made partakers of the divine nature; and yet the substance or nature of bread and wine ceases not to be. And certainly an image and similitude of the body and blood of Christ are celebrated in the act of the mysteries. It is then plainly enough shewn to us that the same thing is to be thought of in our Lord Christ Himself that we profess, celebrate, and take in His image; and as they (i.e. the elements) by the operation of the Holy Spirit pass into this substance, namely a divine one, yet remain in the propriety of their own nature, so is that principal mystery itself, the essence and virtue of which they represent to us." This language, both in its own import and in regard to its relevancy to the argument against Eutychianism, seeming inconsistent with the doctrine of Transubstantiation, Baronius meets the difficulty, first by disputing the authorship of the treatise in which it occurs, and secondly by explaining it away. On the first of these heads it is argued that the Liber Pontificalis speaks of Gelasius having written five books against Nestorius and Eutyches, and that Gennadius (Script. Eccles. c. 94) describes his work on this subject as "Grande et praeclarum volumen," whereas the treatise in which the words above quoted occur is a short one, in one book only, and therefore wrongly identified with the work by Gelasius; that the treatise in question quotes many Greek authorities, but only two Latin ones, viz. Ambrose and Damasus, which was unlikely to have been the case had the pope been its author; and that it praises the writings of Eusebius of Caesarea, an author whom the pope Gelasius, in one of the documents attributed to him, rejects. Hence Baronius, followed by Bellarmine and others, attributes the probable authorship of the treatise before us, not to the pope Gelasius, but to another Gelasius, of Cyzicus, in the same age. The last of these arguments is worthless, inasmuch as the Decretum de libris recipiendis, alluded to as rejecting Eusebius, is now generally concluded on good grounds to be later than the time of Gelasius. Nor is the untrustworthy authority of the Liber Pontif. of much weight, or the expression of Gennadius, "grande et praeclarum," inconsistent with the considerable treatise in question being the work intended, found as it is in all old manuscripts among the writings assigned to pope Gelasius, and referred to as his, and even distinctly quoted, by St. Fulgentius, his contemporary (St. Fulgentius Ep. ad Ferrandum, c. xix.). Dupin on such grounds strongly maintains the pope's authorship against Baronius, and alleges further the internal evidence of style (Dupin, Nouvelle Biblioth. second part of 5th century).

But Baronius, as has been said, endeavours also to explain the language of the treatise, by whomever written, to be consistent with transubstantiation. The drift of his explanation is that in every similitude there is some dissimilarity, that in a work of this kind the exact and proper meaning of words need not be pressed as long as the general sense intended can be gathered, and that in this case the writer, in speaking of the substance of the elements of the Eucharist, really meant their accidents. It may be remarked that if, on the one hand, the authoritatively enunciated views of Gelasius on the relations between civil and ecclesiastical authority, on communion in one kind, and on transubstantiation, are inconsistent with those subsequently endorsed by Rome, yet, on the other hand, few, if any, of his successors have gone beyond him in their claims of supreme and universal authority belonging by divine institution to the Roman see.

Many letters of Gelasius, with fragments of others, are given in the standard collections, of which five have been referred to and quoted, viz. those to Euphemius, to the Eastern bishops, to Faustus, to the emperor Anastasius, and to the bishops of Dardania. Among his other works there is a treatise addressed to Andromachus, a senator, against the celebration of the heathen feast of Lupercalia. It appears that the people were for reviving this feast, which the pope had suppressed, under the idea that certain maladies then prevalent were due to its discontinuance. It has been supposed that the feast of Candlemas, kept on the same day, was substituted for the heathen celebration. Other treatises of his have been already described. There is also one against Pelagianism. A Decretum de libris recipiendis, fixing the canonical books of Scripture, distinguishing between ancient ecclesiastical writers to be received or rejected, and containing a strong assertion of the supremacy of the Roman see, appears to have been erroneously attributed to a Roman synod under him. It bears signs of a later date, having been first assigned to Gelasius by Hincmar of Rheims in the 7th century. The most memorable of the works attributed to him is the Gelasian Sacramentary, which was that in use till Gregory the Great revised and abbreviated it. [See art. SACRAMENTARY in Dict. Chr. Antiq.] A Sacramentary in several books found in the queen of Sweden's library, and published by Thomastius in 1680, is supposed to be the Gelasian one. Gelasius has been canonized, his day being the 18th of November.

The main authorities for his life, besides the Liber Pontificalis are the letters of himself and his contemporaries, and his other extant writings.

GELASIUS (2), archbishop of Salamis, the metropolis of the island of Cyprus, one of the Nicene fathers, A.D. 325 (Mansi, ii. 696). Athanasius (Apol. contra Arian. 50, in Migne, P. G. xxv. 133) mentions a Cyprian bishop Gerasius as subscribing to the decree of the Sardican council, 347. Gerasius might have been identified as Gelasius, but for the fact of the name occurring in the third place instead of the first. In the life of Epiphanius his successor Gelasius is said to have attained the glory of a confessor along with

Pappus bishop of Cytria in the same island. Boll. Acta SS. Mai. iii. 39 f; Le Quien, O. C. 1844.) [L. D.]

GELASIUS (3), third bishop of Arretium (Arezzo), c. A.D. 366. His predecessor was Damasus, his successor was Domitianus or Domitianus. Gelasius is said to have baptized the whole household of Andreas, a nobleman of Arretium, numbering fifty-three persons, who were afterwards martyred. Gelasius himself was probably a martyr. (Ughelli, Ital. Sac. i. 456; Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Ital. xviii. 68.) [R. S. G.]

GELASIUS (4) I, bishop of Caesarea in Palestine, c. 367–395, “distinguished by the purity of his doctrine and the sanctity of his life.” (Theodoret. H. E. v. 8.) He was the son of the sister of St. Cyril of Jerusalem, by whom he was appointed bishop of the metropolitan see of Caesarea, c. A.D. 367. (Epiphan. Haer. lxxiii. 7.) During the reign of Valens Caesarea was occupied by an intruding Arian bishop, Euzoius, who hindered Gelasius from exercising his episcopal function. On the death of Valens and the accession of Theodosius in A.D. 379, Euzoius was expelled and Gelasius resumed the quiet possession of his see which he held till c. 394. He was dead in A.D. 395, when Porphyrius, bishop of Gaza, was consecrated by his successor John. He attended the general council of Constantinople A.D. 381, when he took part in the election of Nectarius. (Theod. H. E. v. 8; Labbe, Concil. ii. 955.) He was again at Constantinople in A.D. 354, when he assisted at the consecration of the church of St. Peter and St. Paul, erected by Rufinus in the suburb of the city, and took part in the council held Sept. 24, to decide the dispute between Bagadius and Appianus, who each claimed the bishopric of Caesarea. (Labbe, Concil. ii. 1152.) Jerome speaks with commendation of his literary powers, stating that he was “reported to have written brilliantly, but to have concealed his writings.” (De Vir. Ill. i. 140.) Photius mentions two works by Gelasius, (1) a continuation of the Ecclesiastical History of Eusebius, undertaken at the request of his uncle Cyril, which, in defiance of chronology, he describes as a Greek translation of Rufinus’s history; and (2) a treatise against the Anomoeans, which he praises as being much superior in style to the history. (Phot. Cod. 89, p. 209; Cod. 102, p. 276.) His writings are lost, with the exception of one or two fragments. Theodoret quotes a passage from a sermon on the Epiphany (Eranistes, dial. i. p. 46; dial. iii. p. 251, ed. Schultze, 1772), and Leontius of Byzantium gives two passages from his exposition of the creed (Antiquitates). (In Nest. et Eutych. lib. i. p. 978.) Gelasius is said to have been the first to insert the name of his great predecessor Eusebius on the diptychs. (Fabr. Bibl. Graec. lib. v. c. 24; Le Quien, Or. Chr. iii. 561.) [E. V.]

GELASIUS (5) II, bishop of Caesarea in Palestine, placed by Le Quien next after Irenaeus, who held the see in A.D. 453. He was the author of two books Against the Anomoeans, spoken of with much commendation by Photius, who states that in learning, diction, and argumentative power he far excelled the other two writers on ecclesiastical history of the same name. Photius highly praises the earnestness and conciseness of his style, the elegance of his language, and the force of his arguments, but condemns his pedantic abuse of logical terms such as a mere tiro would adopt, and the faultiness of his arrangement. This work is identified, but probably erroneously, by Cave and Baronius (ac. ann. 496) with the author of the work De Duabus Naturis, ascribed with greater reason to pope Gelasius A.D. 492–496. (Photius, Cod. 88, 89, 102; Fabr. Bibl. Graec. lib. v. c. 24; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. iii. 567.) [E. V.]

GELASIUS (6), third bishop of Poitiers. Nothing is recorded of him save that he was buried in the church of St. Hilary at Poitiers. (Boll. Acta SS. 26 Aug. v. 817; Gall. Christ. ii. 1142.) [R. T. S.]

GELASIUS (7), bishop of Ipsus in Phrygia Salutaris. Theophylactus, a priest, acted as his representative at the seventh general (second Nicene) council, A.D. 787. (Mansi, xiii. 148; Le Quien, O. C. i. 841.) [L. D.]

GELASIUS (8)—Dec. 23. (Martyr in Crete with nine others in the Decian persecution.) [EVARESTUS.] (Bas. Menol.) [G. T. S.]

GELASIUS, martyr. [GELASINUS.]

GELASIUS (9), a person whom Eustathius of Sebaste fell in with in Cilicia, and to whom he delivered a statement of his faith, which Basil asserts none but Arius, or one holding kindred sentiments, could have confessed. (Basil, Epist. 130 [196], 224 [345].) [E. V.]

GELASIUS (10), ST., a youth of Placentia (Piacenza), cir. 400, commemorated on Feb. 4. The liturgic offices of the church of that city record that he was of noble and Christian parents, and remarkable for piety from his earliest years. It is said that on one occasion he was privileged to behold angels in converse with his brother Opilius, while the latter was praying in his chamber, on which occasion he heard a voice saying, “Suffer little children to come unto Me.” (Boll. Acta SS. 4 Feb. iii. 465.) [C. H.]

GELASIUS (11), a friend of Sidonius Apollinaris. He complains that his name has not been associated with any poetical effusion of Sidonius; he must have something which he may often repeat; he deems Sidonius’s page, when he indulges the sportive vein, too much stocked with hendecasyllabics; so begging that the chattering trochee may be dropped, he would have the verses to run in trimeter iambics. Sidonius has long discontinued this measure, but will not disappoint his friend. The result is a sketch in fifty-five lines of trimeter iambics respecting the classic poets, their various metres and graces. (Sidon. Apoll. Epp. ix. 15, Patr. Lat. lviii. 655.) In the succeeding letter he refers to Gelasius as “virum sat benignissimum.” [C. H.]

GELASIUS (12), martyr, commemorated on Feb. 4 at Rome in the Forum Sempronii, with Aquilinus, Geminus, Magnus, Donatus. (Usuard, Mart.) [C. H.]

GELASIUS (13) of Cyzicus, in the second half of the 5th century author of a work on the

nistory of the council of Nicaea, entitled by Photius, Πρακτικὴν τῆς πρώτης Συνόδου ἐν τρισὶ τόμοις, The Acts of the First Council in three books; though, as Photius remarks, the work deserves the name of a History as much as of Acts, οὐ μᾶλλον πρακτικὴν ἢ ιστορικὴν (Phot. Cod. 15). Our only knowledge of the author is derived from his own statements concerning himself. Photius acknowledges his inability to determine who he was, though he thinks it possible that he may have been bishop of Caesarea, a different person, however, from the other bishops of the same name, viz. Cyril's nephew, and the writer of the work against the Anomoeans. Le Quien also places him among the bishops of Caesarea, but with considerable doubt. If he did occupy that see he must have died before A.D. 484, when Timotheus was the bishop (Le Quien, Or. Christ. iii. 568). But the idea is almost certainly erroneous, and has arisen from the title affixed by some blundering scribe mentioned by Photius, ascribing the work to a bishop of Caesarea. We learn from Gelasius's own words that he was the son of a presbyter of Cyzicus, and that, while he was still residing in his father's house, he fell in with an old parchment volume which had belonged to Dalmatius, bishop of Cyzicus, and had got into his father's hands, containing a full account of the proceedings of the council of Nicaea (τὰ πεπραγμένα πάντα). This document not supplying all the information he desired, Gelasius entered upon an examination of the works of other writers dealing with the same subject, from which he filled up the gaps. He mentions the work of an ancient writer named John, a presbyter otherwise unknown, as well as those of Eusebius of Caesarea, and Rufinus, whom he calls a Roman presbyter, who were both eye-witnesses of the transactions, and many others. If this Rufinus is to be identified with Rufinus Tyrannius, the ecclesiastical historian, Gelasius has been guilty of the grave historical blunder of making him present at a council held twenty years before he was born. It is not, however, absolutely certain that some other person of the same name may not have been intended. From these and other sources Gelasius compiled his history of the Nicene council. It is sometimes taken for granted by those who only know the work by report that it contains a complete collection of the synodal acts of the council. There is, however, no evidence of the existence of such a collection, or of anyone having seen or used it. Athanasius had none such to refer to (cf. Athanas. de Decret. Syn. Nic. l. 2), and certainly we do not possess it in Gelasius (cf. Hefele, Hist. of Councils, Engl. tr. 263, 264). From the work itself we learn that the place of its composition was Bithynia, and that the thorough knowledge of the proceedings of this council and its decrees had been of great use to Gelasius in confuting the Eutychians in that province during the ascendancy they gained under the usurper Basiliscus, 475-477, when they were appealing to the decisions of the Nicene fathers as favouring their views. This led him to the completion and publication of his historical collections, by which alone he is known to us. If this work had answered in any respect to its pretensions it would have been of immense value. But either the original document must have been most untrustworthy, belonging rather to the domain of fiction than fact, or Gelasius himself must have so overlaid it with the inventions of his own imagination, that as an historical authority it is almost worthless. The prolix disputations and lengthy orations, of which it is full, as Cave has justly remarked, are evidently the writer's own composition. Dupin's verdict is still more severe. He calls Gelasius "a sorry compiler, who gathered all he met with relating to his subject, both bad and good, without examining whether it was true or false." His work is little more than a compilation from the ecclesiastical histories of Eusebius, Socrates, Sozomen, and Theodoret, to which he has added little but what is very doubtful or manifestly untrue. "There is neither order in his narrative, nor exactness in his observations, nor elegance in his language, nor judgment in his selection of facts, nor good sense in his judgments." As instances of his untrustworthiness we may mention that he states that the council was summoned by pope Sylvester, and that Hosius of Cordova presided as his delegate, and devotes many chapters (lib. ii. c. 11-24) to disputations on the Divinity of the Holy Spirit, which had not at the time become subject of controversy at all. Natalis Alexander also condemns the work as being "levissimi ponderis," except when confirmed by other authorities, and says of it "scatet erroribus" (Ecccl. Hist. saec. iv. dissert. 13). The style, according to Photius, is characterized by poverty and meanness. The work is divided into three books, τρεῖς συντάγματα. The first book, which deals with civil history, contains the life of Constantine until his victory over Licinius, in eleven chapters. The second book, in thirty-six chapters, comprehends the history of the council, embellished with imaginary speeches, and discussions between the bishops and heathen philosophers that can never have taken place. His statement that Arius took these philosophers with him to help him in his disputations with the orthodox party wants all probability (Gelas. ii. 12). The prolix narrative of the debates between Phaedo, a heathen philosopher holding Arian opinions, and the most learned members of the council, Eustathius, Hosius, Eusebius, &c. is stamped by Valesius (Annot. in Socr. H. E. i. 8), as decidedly supposititious. The acquaintance with theology and familiarity with the Holy Scriptures, shewn in Phaedo's arguments, exceeds all probability. De Broglie is probably correct in regarding these discussions as specimens of Christian declamations, written as literary exercises, but not with any deliberate intention to deceive, but accepted as authority by the uncritical compiler (L'Eglise et l'Empire, ii. 23). It is important to notice that he gives the twenty Nicene canons exactly in the same order, and of the same tenour, that we find elsewhere (Gelas. ii. cc. 30, 31). He also appends nine constitutions of a purely dogmatical character. But those are pronounced by Hefele, (Hist. of Councils, Engl. tr. vol. i. p. 372) to be "most certainly spurious." "None of the ancient writers are acquainted with them; no one among the moderns has endeavoured to defend their historical value; most do not even mention them; and those who do quote them content themselves with denying their genuineness." The third book, as we have it, gives only three letters or edicts of the emperor Constantine.

Arius and the Arians; (2) To the Church media; (3) To Theodotus. Originally, we learn from Photius, it carried on the history to the death of Constantine and his baptism, which ended it, which is stated to have been performed by an orthodox presbyter, who is anonymous.

It is supposed that the last book has been altered of set purpose to destroy the evidence of the story of the emperor having been baptized by pope Sylvester at Rome. The first edition of this work which was printed was the first book, which was included by Alphonsus in his History of the Nicene Council. The work was published with a Latin translation made by Robert Balfour, a Scotchman, Paris,

It has been included in all the collections of councils from those of Sirmondus, 1508, to Minus, 1518. It is to be found in the second edition of Labbe's collection (col. 103-286) as well as in those of Harduin and Mansi. (Photius, Th. Codd. 15, 88, 89; Fabric. Biblioth. lib. v. c. 24; lib. vi. c. 4; Cave, Hist. 454; Dupin, iv. 187; Le Quien, Or. Christ. 8.) [E. V.]

GELASIUS (14) (BACCHUS JUNIOR), monk and martyr; commemorated on Dec. 17. He fled to Palestine, in the reign of Irene and then Constantine VI. (780-797), and was of Arian descent, but his father had apostatized to the Saracens and brought up his seven sons to the religion of Mahomet. After his father's death, Gelasius sought the laura of St. Saba, where he resided as a recluse under the name Bacchus. The abbat, fearing punishment from the Saracens for having baptized Gelasius, seized him, and Gelasius, returning home, executed five of his brothers, but the sixth, who refused baptism, denounced him to Ameras, and he was decapitated. (Basil. Menol. ii. 38.) [C. H.]

GELASIUS (15), a monk who forsook his monastery. A letter is preserved addressed to him by St. Theodorus Studita, in which the latter exhorts him to return without losing any of his property. This letter was probably written by Theodorus in his first or second banishment, and is either in A.D. 797-8 or in A.D. 799-811. (Theodori Studitae Epist. i. 9, in Migne, Patr. Lat. c. xcix. 937; Ceillier, Histoire des Aut. sacr. 408.) [F. D.]

ELESUINTHA. [GALSUINTHA.]

ELIANUS, bishop of Repera in Mauretania Caesariensis, banished by Huneric, 484. (Victor. Notit. 59, Patr. Lat. lviii. 274 b; Morcelli, Christ. i. 261.) [R. S. G.]

ELIMER, the last king of the Vandals in Africa, ca. 530-534, as usually dated, though Clinton places the commencement of his reign in June 533 (F. R. i. 734). He was the son of Gelarid, grandson of Genton, great-grandson of Genseric. At the close of the reign of Hilderic he headed the malcontents, seized that king and his brother Amalaric and exterminated the party which supported them. The emperor Justinian, who was a friend of Hilderic, sent Belisarius with an army to avenge him, and this general reduced the Vandal dominion in Africa, Sicily, Sardinia, and the Italian coasts. According to the chronology (F. R. i. 756, 758) Belisarius was victorious in Dec. 533, and after three months, when winter was over, that is in March 534, Gelimer surrendered to the imperial commander Pharas. He was sent a prisoner, first to Carthage and afterwards to Constantinople. His reign had lasted two years and nine months (Clinton, F. R. Epit. 221). Gelimer, on being introduced to Belisarius at Carthage, broke into unrestrained laughter, a behaviour which was variously interpreted. The bystanders imputed it to the unhinging of his mind through the calamities he had sustained; but his friends repudiated the imputation and maintained that he was but expressing a humorous sense of the instability of earthly affairs, contrasting his former prosperity with his present humiliation. Others have seen in Gelimer's laugh the laugh of Democritus, as though all the grandeur of human fortune deserved no better than ridicule. His bearing afterwards at Constantinople seems to favour one of the latter interpretations. After graciously accepting the triumph of his conqueror, he was led into the hippodrome where Justinian sat enthroned amid a vast concourse of the people. Gelimer neither uttered a groan nor shed a tear, but kept uttering Solomon's sentence, "Vanitas vanitatum et omnia vanitas." Arrived at the foot of the throne, he was divested of his purple robes, and obliged to bow his head to the ground in obeisance to the emperor. No further sufferings were inflicted on him, and he was allowed to retire on an estate provided for him in Galatia. He would have been honoured with the title of patrician had he not persistently refused to abandon the Arian heresy, which he had inherited from his predecessors (Procop. Bell. Vand. lib. i. c. 9). Thus ended the Vandalic power in Africa, which had endured (according to Clinton) ninety-five years since the first entry of the Vandals into Africa, 429, and one hundred and five years since the conquest of Carthage by Genseric in 439. All that time the Catholic church in Africa had been oppressed by Arian domination, but utter downfall of the Vandals now restored its supremacy. [C. H.]

GELIONIUS (GILDERINUS, GEBDERINUS), said to have been twelfth bishop of Chalon-sur-Saône, succeeding Wadelinus, or, according to Gams, Antestis, and followed by St. Gratus, about A.D. 641. (Gall. Christ. iv. 671.) [S. A. B.]

GELONICA, martyr. [GALONICA.]

GEMARA. [TALMUD.]

GEMELLUS (1)—Dec. 10. A native of Paphlagonia and martyr under Julian. Having heard that the emperor was at Ancyra in Galatia, he went and upbraided him for his apostasy. For this, Julian is said to have tortured and finally crucified him in the city of Edessa. (Bas. Menol.) [G. T. S.]

GEMELLUS (2) (GEMELIUS), the Donatist bishop of Tanaboca, Tamboea, or Tambaja, in Byzacene, at the Donatist council of Cabarsussis, A.D. 393. (Aug. En. in Ps. xxxvi. 20; Mon. Vet. Don. p. 257, ed. Oberthür.) [H. W. P.]

GEMELLUS (3), a layman of distinction residing at Constantinople, a catechumen of Chrysostom's, whose cause he espoused very warmly regardless of the trouble he thus brought upon himself. (Chrysost. Epist. 132.) He was still unbaptized when Chrysostom was expelled, and he was anxious to receive the sacrament at the hands of his revered teacher. Chrysostom, however, exhorted him not to defer his admission into the church till his return, delighted as he should have been to baptize him, but to receive the rite at the hands of some of his friends and adherents. The intelligence of this would cause him the sincerest pleasure (ibid.). Gemellus having been raised to some important official position in Constantinople, Chrysostom wrote him a very warm congratulatory letter expressing his satisfaction, not so much on his accession to dignity as on the opportunity it afforded him of exercising his power for the good of others, in which he was sure he would not be wanting. (Epist. 124.) Not having received any reply, Chrysostom wrote again in a tone of disappointment, assuring him, however, that he was convinced that his silence did not proceed from pride of station or from any failure of affection towards him. (Epist. 79.) Chrysostom's letters to Gemellus indicate a very high estimate of Gemellus's character and qualifications, as well as that anxious solicitude for his welfare which could only be satisfied by frequent intelligence. In one letter he expresses an eager desire to know whether his health has derived any benefit from the warm baths he was proposing to visit. (Epist. 194.) [E. V.]

GEMELLUS (4), subdeacon and founder of the church of St. Agnes at Ravenna, and also "rector" of Sicily, in the time of Exuperantius bishop of Ravenna. (Agnellus, Liber Pontif. Ravenn. pt. iii. p. 254, ed. 1708, pt. i. cap. 1 in Patr. Lat. cvi. 525.) [C. H.]

GEMELLUS (5), bishop of Stratonicia, in the ecclesiastical province of Lydia, present at the council of Chalcedon, A.D. 451, and subsequently signed the synodal letter of his province to the emperor Leo concerning the death of St. Proterius and the faith of Chalcedon, A.D. 458. (Mansi, vii. 153, 573; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 893.) [L. D.]

GEMELLUS (6), bishop of Miletopolis, on the Rhyndacus, in the ecclesiastical province of the Hellespont. Diogenes of Cyzicus subscribed his name in his absence to the confession of faith which was read before the emperor Marcian, at the sixth session of the council of Chalcedon, A.D. 451. (Mansi, vii. 164; Le Quien, O. C. i. 779.) [L. D.]

GEMELLUS (7), 7th bishop of Vaison, succeeding Ethilius and followed by Alethius, was present at the council of Epaon in A.D. 517. (Mansi, viii. 564; Gall. Christ. i. 922.) [S. A. B.]

GEMINIANUS of Antioch. [GEMINUS (1).]

GEMINIANUS (1)—Sept. 16 (Usuard.), Sept. 17 (Bae. M.n.). Martyr at Rome under Diocletian and Maximian, with Lucia a widow. Her son Eutropius, being an idolater, accused her, now aged 75 years, before the judges Apofrasius and Megasius, who delivered her to death. Geminianus was converted by her patience under torture, and suffered with her. (Mart. Rom. Vet., Adon., Usuard.) [LUCIA.] [G. T. S.]

GEMINIANUS (2), bishop of Mutina (Modena) from before A.D. 390 to c. 398, about which year he was succeeded by Theodulus. His predecessor had been Theodorus. He was present at the council of Milan under St. Ambrose, A.D. 390. (Mansi, iii. 690; Ambr. Epp. class. i. ep. 48. Patr. Lat. xvi. 1129; Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Ital. xv. 225.) Sillingard (Catal. Episc. Mutin. 5) makes him succeed Antonius in 363 and succeeded by Theodorus in 397. [R. S. G.]

GEMINIANUS (3), an Italian bishop, legate with Domitianus of pope Leo the Great, A.D. 458, to Leo I. emperor of the East, who had written to Leo of Rome, requesting that a synod might be called to confirm the decrees of the council of Chalcedon. (Leo Mag. Ep. 164, cap. i. init. in Patr. Lat. li. p. 1148; Jaffé, Regest. Pontif. 47.) Mutina is thought to have been his see (Boll. Acta SS. 31 Jan. ii. 1096; Ugh. Ital. Sac. ii. 82); but he is not included in Sillingard's Catal. Episc. Mutinens. 1606.) [R. S. G.]

GEMINIANUS (4), bishop of Lucca, c. 546. (Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Italia, xv. 497; Ughelli, Ital. Sac. i. 794.) [A. H. D. A.]

GEMINIANUS (5), c. 568, bishop of Trieste, of doubtful authenticity. (Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Italia, viii. 680.) [A. H. D. A.]

GEMINIANUS (6), bishop of Volterra, at the Lateran synod under pope Martin in 649. (Mansi, x. 866; Hefele, § 307.) [A. H. D. A.]

GEMINIANUS (7), bishop of Reggio (in Emilia), signing a doubtful donation by Astolph, c. 752, in favour of the abbey of Nonantula (Troja, Cod. Dipl. iv. 430). He consecrated the abbey, c. 753, according to the author of the Life of Anselm abbat of Nonantula, in Monum. Rerum Ital. et Langob. p. 566. [A. H. D. A.]

GEMINIANUS (8), bishop of Modena, signing a doubtful donation by Astolph, c. 752, in favour of the abbey of Nonantula (Troja, Cod. Dipl. iv. 430). [A. H. D. A.]

GEMINIUS (1) FAUSTINUS, presbyter of Furni, A.D. 249 [GEMINIUS VICTOR], probably the same as GEMINIUS, bishop at fourth council under Cyprian, A.D. 254 (Ep. 67; De Basilide et Martialis) [BASILIDES] and GEMINIUS, bishop of Furni at the council of Sept. A.D. 256, De Bapt. sub Cyp. 3 (Sentt. Episcoporum. 59). [E. W. B.]

GEMINIUS (2) VICTOR, a resident at Furni (Tingitana), named in his will Geminus Faustinus, a presbyter, as 'Tutor,' contrary to a Carthaginian canon (forma) earlier than Cyprian's episcopate. In support of the canon Cyprian interferes (Ep. 1), desiring that no oblation may be made in the church "pro dormitione Victoria," and no "deprecatio" be attended in his name. The date appears to belong to the time before the Decian persecution, in which Cyprian complains (De Lapsis) of the secular tendencies of the clergy; and this would accordingly be one of the earliest exercises of discipline by him (perhaps A.D. 249). In his letter he brings out the Levitic character which he considers to exempt the clergy from such office. Faustinus could have by law no choice but to serve as

'tutor;' hence the sole remedy was against the memory of Victor. [E. W. B.]

GEMINIUS (3), Donatist bishop of Clupea, or Clypea, an important seaport town on the east coast of proconsular Africa, deriving its name from clypeus, a shield (Kalibia). (Shaw, p. 89; Dict. of Geog. i. 242.) He was present at Carth. Conf. A.D. 411. (Mon. Vet. Don. 133.)

[H. W. P.]

GEMINUS (1) (GEMINIANUS), presbyter of Antioch. Jerome in his Chronicle (where one reading is Germanus) places him under the year 230, mentioning him with Hippolytus and Beryllus of Bostra, "clari scriptores." In his Vir. Ill. likewise Jerome puts him in the time of the emperor Alexander, when Zebennus was bishop of Antioch, 231, and Heraclas was ordained bishop of Alexandria, 233, stating that he composed "a few monuments of his genius." Of these works nothing further is now known. (Hieron. Vir. Illust. cap. 64; Cave, i. 123.)

[C. H.]

GEMINUS (2)—Jan. 4. Martyr in Africa with Aquilinus, Eugenius, Martianus, Quintus, Theodotus, Triphonis. (Mart. Adon., Usuard.)

[G. T. S.]

GEMINUS (3)—Feb. 4. Martyr at Rome with Aquilinus, Gelasius, Magnus and Donatus. (Mart. Usuard.)

[G. T. S.]

GEMINUS (4), confessor in Italy. According to the legend (Boll. Acta SS. 9 Oct. iv. 1039-42) he was by birth a Syrian; his parents Militianus and Bellias were noble; he was brought up as a Christian, though his parents were idolaters, but subsequently converted. After his father's death he found it necessary to seek shelter in Italy, where he landed on the coast of Umbria, and proceeded to Spoleum and Casuentum. Thence he removed to Ferentum, and near to it or at Camerinum he died A.D. 815. The Bollandists say he had dedications near Casuentum and Ferentum, at Civitella, on mount Agnasia beside Nocera, and near the city of Horta, all in Umbria or Etruria.

[J. G.]

GEMMANUS (GERMANUS). While St. Columba was a deacon, he is said to have been under the tuition of a Christian bard named Gemmanus, or, as otherwise called, Germanus, who lived in Leinster, probably in the plain of Meath, near to Clonard. Colgan seeks to identify him with Gorman (Oct. 25), of Cill-Gorman, in the east of Leinster, but the name in all likelihood is Gemmanus, and only assumes the form of Germanus from the desire of different writers to make it conform to a more familiar type. In the incident related regarding him and St. Columba in the life of the latter by St. Adamnan, St. Gemman was an old man, but we know nothing further of his life or the date of his death, except that he brought his poems and offered them to St. Finnian (Dec. 12) of Clonard, in whose praise he is said to have written a hymn while St. Finnian lived. Lanigan is inclined to think that he was a foreigner, but this idea is based on the name being Germanus. (Colgan, Tr. Thaum. 356, c. 25, 383, n. 25, 395, c. 40, 450, n. 42, and Acta SS. 395, c. 23; Reeves, St. Adamnan, lxxii. 137; Skene, Celt. Scot. ii. 53; Lanigan, Eccl. Hist. Ir. ii. c. 11, § 8; Todd, St. Patrick, 140; Ware, Ir. Writ. i. c. 2.)

CHRIST. BIOGR.—VOL. II.

GEMMARDUS, eighteenth bishop of Saint-Paul de Trois-Châteaux, following Salitonius and succeeded by Ingilbertus, perhaps towards the close of the 7th century. (Gall. Christ. i. 708.)

[S. A. B.]

GEMMULUS, a deacon, afterwards an archdeacon, at Rome. Two letters are preserved from him to St. Boniface, of which the priest Deneardus was the bearer. St. Boniface had sent the latter to Rome with letters to the pope, and also to Gemmulus after the synod of Soissons (A.D. 744), in which he gave an account of what had occurred at the synod, and also of the heretics Aldebert and Clement. In the first of these letters Gemmulus tells him of the condemnation of these heretics and their followers by a council at Rome. He also mentions he had, to the best of his power, taken care of the nuns entrusted by St. Boniface to his charge, and acknowledges the receipt of a present of a silver cup and a sindon or cloth for receiving the bread offered at the Eucharist, which St. Boniface had sent him with his blessing, and sends in return a present of four ounces of cinnamon, two pounds of pepper, and a pound of cozumbar or cotzumbar, which from the second letter appears to have been a remarkably fragrant kind of incense. In the second letter he excuses himself for not having sent him the epistles of St. Gregory he had asked for, on the ground that he had been ill of gout, as Deneardus could bear witness, but promises if he recovers to perform St. Boniface's wishes. We have also a letter from St. Boniface to him, written apparently near the end of the archbishop's life; he addresses Gemmulus or "Jammulus" as archdeacon, and tenderly regrets their separation from one another. (Bonif. epp. 58, 59, 86 in Monum. Mogunt. ed. Jaffé, 154, 156, 253.)

[F. D.]

GEMTHENNUS, disciple of St. Patrick. (Colgan, Tr. Thaum. 143, 183, 267.)

[GEINTEN.]

GENBERHT (Kemble, C. D. 113), archbishop. [JAENBERT.]

[C. H.]

GENEBAUDUS I. (GENEBALDUS, GENNOBAUDUS), ST., first bishop of Laon, established in the see by St. Remigius bishop of Rheims, the metropolitan, to whose history by Flodoard we are indebted for almost all the knowledge we have of him. The Acta ascribed to Hincmar of Rheims (Boll. Sept. ii. 538) add nothing to Flodoard's account. He was of noble birth, and learned in both sacred and profane literature. Before his ordination he separated from his wife, a niece of St. Remigius. But the separation proved more than he could bear, and after a period of secret intercourse with her he threw himself at the feet of St. Remigius, and tearing off his stole confessed his sin. The saint ordained a penance. A dimly lighted cell and oratory were built against the church of St. Julian, and the door was locked and sealed by St. Remigius. There he passed seven years, his metropolitan presiding over the diocese with his own. On the assurance of an angel that his sin was forgiven, he emerged from his prison with the consent of Remigius. He was succeeded by his son Latro (Flodoard, Hist. Eccl. Rem. i. xv.) He was represented at the 5th council of Orleans, A.D. 549, by Medulfus his archdeacon (Mansi, ix. 138). His episcopate apparently extended over the first half of the 6th century. (Gall. Christ. ix. 508; Boll. Acta SS. Sept. ii. 537.) [S. A. B.]

GENEBAUDUS II., seventeenth bishop of Laon, succeeding Madelanus and followed by Wanilo I. He is one of the bishops addressed in the twelfth letter of pope Zachary, written probably A.D. 748 (Migne, Patr. Lat. lxxxix. 948). In 762 he subscribed two charters of king Pippin for the foundation and endowment of the monastery of Prüm (Migne, Patr. Lat. xcvi. 1537, 1541), and in the same year, or in 765, he signed the Placitum Attiniacense (Bar. Pagius, an. 762, n. iv.; Mansi, xii. 661). The date of his death is not known. (Gall. Christ. ix. 512.) [S. A. B.]

GENEBERN or GENEBRARD, martyr, friend of St. Dimpna. [GEREBERN.]

GENEBRARDUS, bishop of Landa (Lodi). He lived between A.D. 345 and 378. His predecessor was St. Dionysius, his successor St. Bassianus. Ughelli believes that he was bishop of Laudunum (Laon). (Ughelli, Ital. Sac. iv. 893; Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Ital. xii. 285.)

[R. S. G.]

GENERALIS—Sept. 14. Martyr with St. Cyprianus, Crescentianus, Victor, and Rosula. (Mart. Rom. Vet.; Mart. Adon., Usuard.; Ruinart. Acta Sincera, p. 193; Till. Mém. iv. 45.) [CYPRIANUS.] [G. T. S.]

GENEREUS, a baker at Iona in the time of St. Columba, mentioned in the life of that saint by Adamnan. He has had a minor kind of importance thrown upon him through the controversial use made of the various readings in the text regarding his occupation. In the edition of St. Adamnan by Colgan and the Bollandists he is called a "painter" (pictor), and O'Donnel evidently borrows the same from his copy of St. Adamnan; but the true reading, as adopted by Canisius, Messingham, and Dr. Reeves, is "pistor" and "opus pistorum," so that Genereus is not to be classed among the cultivators of ancient Irish art, but among the lower members of the Columban household. He is called by St. Adamnan "a certain religious brother," and a "Saxon," and apparently was in favour with St. Columba. (Lanigan, Eccl. Hist. Ir. ii. 174, n. 178; Reeves, St. Adamnan, 208, 209; O'Hanlon, Irish Saints, i. 436.) [J. G.]

GENEROSA (1), a Christian woman at Rome. [FAUSTINUS (25).]

GENEROSA (2)—July 17. Martyr at Scillita in Africa. [FELIX (212).] [G. T. S.]

GENEROSUS (1), a Christian gentleman of Constantia (Cirta), to whom a Donatist presbyter wrote, at the command, he said, of an angel, to recommend the claims of Donatism. To this letter St. Augustine, in conjunction with Alypius and Fortunatus, replied [FORTUNATUS], shewing that these claims were groundless, and that the succession of bishops at Rome, notwithstanding the intrusion of a Donatist [FELIX (45)], was unbroken, whereas Donatism was a novelty. To separate, therefore, from the Catholic church was to separate from the Christianity of the whole world. Besides this, some of the Donatist bishops, as Silvanus, had themselves been guilty of "tradition," the crime which they imputed so fiercely to the Catholics, whereas the repeated inquiries into the case of Caecilianus had only served to establish his innocence of it. But the main principle of the Donatists, that the evil must be separated from the good in this world was itself false, and they themselves were not consistent in their application of it when they readmitted Felicianus of Musti into their community. The writer of the letter to Generosus, when he speaks of an angel, ought to remember that Satan sometimes assumes the form of an angel of light, or else, if he saw no angel, he has laid himself open to the charge of falsehood. These circumstances are given under A.D. 400 by Tillemont (Mem. xiii. 328, art. 126) and Ceillier (Aut. sacr. ix. 83); by Baronius (A. E. ann. 398, xxxii.) under 398.

This letter must have been written between A.D. 398 and 400, during the pontificate of Anastasius, who is mentioned in it as holding the see of Rome. It seems not impossible that by the term "angel" the writer of the letter to Generosus may have meant to denote Petilian, the able and busy Donatist bishop of Cirta, with whose knowledge, if not at his suggestion, it was probably written, and who was no doubt anxious to gain over to his side a layman of high standing like Generosus. Morcelli, followed by Gams, considers Generosus to have preceded Profuturus as bishop of Cirta. But this is unlikely, for (1) he is nowhere distinctly called bishop in the letter on which Morcelli relies for proof; (2) in the superscription to that letter the names given are those of Alypius, Augustine, and Fortunatus, and in his reply to the letters of Petilian, Augustine speaks of Fortunatus as being at that time bishop of Cirta. This reply was written about A.D. 400, i.e. about the same time as the letter to Generosus. We conclude therefore that Generosus was not at that time, nor at any other, a bishop, but only a Christian layman of high character and position. (Morcelli, Afric. Christ. i. 142; Gams, Ser. Episc. p. 465; Aug. 1 Petil. i. 1; Retract. ii. 25; de Unic. Bapt. xvi. 29; Ep. 53; Tillemont, 126, 127, vol. xiii. pp. 328, 333; Ceillier, ix. 390.)

Generosus appears afterwards to have become consular of Numidia, in which capacity Augustine wrote to him in the case of Faventius. [FAVENTIUS (1).] (Aug. Ep. 116.) Gams (Ser. Episc. 465) in recording a Generosus bishop of Cirta "ante 400" has probably in view, erroneously, the subject of this article. [H. W. P.]

GENEROSUS (2) (GENEROUX), confessor and abbat of the monastery of Ausio, Enixio, Enesio, Enestio, Enexio or Hensio, supposed to be that of St. Iouin de Marnes, in the diocese of Poitiers. The Bollandists (Acta SS. 10 Jul. iii. [47] 46), devote to him a short article, mostly extracts from the Acts of St. Paternus, bishop of Avranches (given in full, ib. 16 Apr. ii. 423 sq.), and from Mabillon. He is said to have taken the monastic habit under abbat Launegisilus at the monastery of Ausio, where he afterwards became abbat, and is still venerated on July 10; he is also venerated in the priory church of St.

Generoux, a league from the forementioned monastery. He belongs to the 6th century.

[J. G.]

GENEROSUS (8), bishop of the combined sees of Nomentum (La Mentana) and Curium (both since merged in the see of Sabina), c. 601. (Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Italia, i. 598 a.)

[A. H. D. A.]

GENESIUS (1)—Aug. 25. A comedian at Rome and martyr A.D. 285. He was converted while mocking Christian baptism. [GELASINUS.] He was tortured for the faith, during which he cried, "There is no king but Christ, for whom I will be killed a thousand times, as you cannot take him out of my mouth nor tear him from my heart." A church at Rome was dedicated in his honour from ancient times, which was restored and beautified by Gregory III. A.D. 741 (Anastasius Bibliothec. iv. 199). Baronius fixes the date of his martyrdom at 303, and Tillemont (Mém. iv. 695) at 285 or 286. (Mart. Rom. Vet., Hieron., Adon., Usuard.; Kal. Front.; Ruinart, Acta Sincera; Surii Vitae SS.; Ceill. ii. 467.)

[G. T. S.]

GENESIUS (2)—Aug. 25. A notary at Arles, and martyr A.D. 303. Originally a soldier, he then became registrar of the local court, where he was one day called upon, in the course of duty, to read one of the edicts of persecution issued by Diocletian and Maximian. Though only a catechumen, he refused to do so, but resigned his appointment and fled. Ardently longing to receive baptism, he returned to Arles, where he prayed the bishop to administer it to him. For some reason, whether through stress of persecution or some defect in preparation, the bishop deferred it for the present, assuring him, however, that, if called upon to die for Christ, "in thus shedding his blood, he should receive the perfection of the grace of baptism." He was soon after arrested, whereupon, as St. Paulinus of Nola in his account says, "by the inspiration of the Holy Spirit," he flung himself into the Rhone, wherein he received baptism, the river having become for him a second Jordan. The officers followed him to the other bank and there beheaded him without any formal trial. Ado, speaking of his death, says that "he received the crown of martyrdom, being baptized with his own blood." (Mart. Rom. Vet., Adon., Usuard.; Prudent. Hymn. 4, Peristephan.; Greg. Turon., de Glor. Mart. cap. 68, 69; Ven. Fortunat. Misc. l. viii. c. 6; Euseb. Emes. Hom. 50, by some attributed to Hilary of Arles; concerning history of Genesius by St. Paulinus of Nola, see Hist. Lit. de la France, t. ii.; Till. Mém. v. 569.) On the point of martyrdom taking the place of baptism, compare the learned dissertation of Dodwell (Diss. Cyprian. xiii.).

[G. T. S.]

GENESIUS (3), bishop of Brixellum (Brescello). His date is uncertain, but he was anterior to Cyprianus, who was bishop c. 451. (Cappelletti, Le Chiese d'Ital. xv. 443.)

[R. S. G.]

GENESIUS (4), 5th bishop of Sisteron, between Avolus and Pologronius or Polychronius. He subscribed the fourth council of Paris (A.D. 573), and the letter addressed by the assembled bishops to king Sigebert. (Mansi, ix. 868, 869; Gall. Christ. i. 476.)

[S. A. B.]

GENESIUS (5), second bishop of Montpellier, between Boetius and Gumildus. At the third council of Toledo (A.D. 589), he represented his predecessor, while still an archdeacon. In A.D. 597 he was present as bishop at another council of Toledo, and at the fourth of Toledo in A.D. 633, he was represented by his archdeacon Stephanus or Sthephanus. (Mansi, ix. 1002; x. 473, 643; Gall. Christ. vi. 732.)

[S. A. B.]

GENESIUS (6), ST., 25th bishop of Clermont in Auvergne between Proculus and Gyroindus (A.D. 656–662). He is said to have been born of a family of senatorial rank belonging to Clermont. While archdeacon of the city he undertook the training of Praejectus (St. Prix), who was one of his successors in the bishopric. Nominated to the see upon the death of Proculus, he would only accept it after a general fast of three days had borne witness to the sincerity of the choice. In the fifth year of office, wearied of its pomps and dreading its temptations, he secretly withdrew, and set out for Rome in the garb of a pilgrim. His flock thrown into confusion by his disappearance, and ignorant whether he was alive or dead, sent a deputation to Rome to ask counsel. There their bishop was found, and with difficulty was persuaded to return. He died in the following year, after founding the nunnery of Chantoin. He was buried in the church which he had built and dedicated to St. Symphorian, but which afterwards took his name. He also erected on his own land the monastery of Manlieu or Grandlieu (Magniloscense), and appointed Evodius director of it. His day of commemoration was June 3. (Vita S. Genesii, Vita S. Praejecti, Boll. Acta SS. Jun. i. 323, Jan. ii. 633; Gall. Christ. ii. 245.)

[S. A. B.]

GENESIUS (7), ST., thirty-eighth bishop of Lyons, succeeding St. Annemundus, and followed by Lantbertus. Before his elevation he was an abbat, according to Mabillon not of Fontenelle, as some had supposed, but attached to the palace and camp of the king. (See the note to the Vita S. Ansberti, Mabill. Acta SS. Ord. S. Bened. ii. 1053, Paris, 1668–1701.) He was, at all events, assiduous at court, and filled the post of chief almoner to St. Bathildis, the wife of Clovis. (Vita S. Bathildis, Mabill. ut supra, ii. 778–79.) The year of his consecration is not certain, but from a passage in the Life of St. Bertila (Mabill. ut supra, saec. iii. pt. 1, p. 24), where Genesius, described as magnus Sacerdos dominus, terms which seem to imply episcopal rank, was deputed by queen Bathildis to introduce Bertila and her attendant nuns into the newly built religious house of Kala (Chelles), we may infer that it was before 659, previously to which date the monastery was completed. In 662 or 663 he subscribed the charter of Bertefredus of Amiens, for the monastery of Corbie (Migne, Patr. Lat. lxxxviii. 1181). A little later he incurred the resentment of Ebroin, the mayor of the palace, by assisting St. Leger, and an armed band was sent to Lyons to expel him. But the archbishop collected a force and successfully defended the city. (Vita S. Leodegarii, Mabill. ut supra, saec. ii. 686, 682.) In 666 he subscribed the charter of St. Drausius, bishop of Soissons, for the nunnery of the Blessed Virgin, (Migne, Patr. Lat. lxxxviii. 1188.) The date of his death cannot be fixed with certainty, but he was still alive in 677 or 678, as is proved by a diploma of Theodoric III. (Migne, Patr. Lat. lxxxvii. 1327), in which he is mentioned as one of the judges of Chramlinus. Mabillon believes that he died in the latter of these two years. (See the note to the Vita S. Ansberti, ut supra.) Nov. 1 is given for the day of his death, and is the day of his commemoration in the diocese of Lyons. St. Bathildis on her death-bed thought she saw her "faithful friend" in a choir of angels waiting to receive her soul. (Vita S. Ansberti, xiv., Mabill. ut supra, ii. 782.) He was buried in the monastery of Kala. (Gall. Christ. iv. 47.) [S. A. B.]

GENESIUS (8), bishop of Anastasiopolis, in Galatia Prima. He took part in the council of Constantinople, A.D. 680. (Mansi, ii. 220 a, 333 e, 628 c; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 486.) [T. W. D.]

GENESIUS (9), count of Clermont in Auvergne. He is reckoned among the beatified, and the Bollandists (Acta SS. 5 Jun. i. 504) devote to him a "Synopsis de cultu, setate, actis, e Scriptoribus Arvernais," and print the "Officium, ex Breviario Capituli Camaleriensis;" but his personal acts are unknown beyond the legend in the office, which abounds with the miraculous. According to this, his father was Andustrius and his mother Tranquilla. From youth his sanctity was attested by miracles, of which specimens are recorded. He built and liberally endowed five churches or religious houses in his castle of Camaleria, and was the special friend of St. Bonitus bishop of Clermont and of St. Meneleus abbat of the monastery of Menat near Clermont. He died on June 5, and was buried at Combronia, or Combronde, the Bollandists say, before A.D. 740. [J. G.]

GENESIUS (10) (or perhaps GELASIUS), Sept. 29, martyr at Perinthus, with bishop Eutyches or Euty chius and two others. (Wright's Syrian Mart. in Journ. Sac. Lit. 1866, 430.) [G. T. S.]

GENETHLIUS (1), bishop of Carthage, between Restitutus and Aurelius, from A.D. 374 to 391, according to Morcelli, who calls him Geneclius. He presided over the synod of Carthage which sat in 386, 387, or 390 (Mansi, iii. 687; Hefele, Councils, bk. iii. § 106, p. 390), and passed thirteen canons, which are extant, the first declaring the orthodox doctrine of the Trinity, while the others treat of discipline (vid. Hefele). Augustine says his memory was greatly revered by the Donatists on account of his conciliatory disposition, which would not allow the law against them to be put in force. (August. ep. 44, § 12; Morcelli, Afr. Christ. ii. 280.) [C. H.]

GENETHLIUS (2), presbyter, a friend and correspondent of Basil, to whom he wrote a long letter exposing the treacheries of Eustathius of Sebaste, and the artifices by which he endeavoured to bring Basil's orthodoxy into discredit. (Basil, Epist. 224 [345].) [E. V.]

GENETHLIUS (3), bishop of Argos at the synod held at Constantinople by Flavian, A.D. 448, when Eutyches was condemned. (Mansi, vi. 752; Le Quien, O. C. ii. 183.) [L. D.]

GENETHLIUS (4), bishop of Cratia (Flavio-polis), in the ecclesiastical province of Honorias. He signed the definition of faith at the council of Chalcedon, by Eulogius a presbyter, 451. (Mansi, vii. 149; Le Quien, Or. Chr. i. 577.)

GENETHLIUS (5), bishop of Dorylaeum, in Phrygia Salutaris. He subscribed the canons of the fifth general council, A.D. 553. (Mansi, ix. 393; Le Quien, O. C. i. 838.) [L. D.]

GENETIVUS or GENETIUS, bishop of Tuy from about A.D. 670 to about 682. He subscribes the acts of C. Braga III., A.D. 675, as senior suffragan, immediately after the metropolitan LEODEGISIUS. (Aguirre-Catalani, iv. 262; Esp. Sagr. xxii. 32.) [ANILA.]

[M. A. W.]

GENEVEUS (GENEVAEUS), ST., 6th bishop of Dol in Brittany, succeeding Tigerinomalus, or, according to some, St. Budocus, and followed by Restoaldus, perhaps in the early part of the 7th century. He is said to have died July 29, on which day he is commemorated, though the Bollandists admit him into their Acta with some doubt. (Acta SS. Jul. vii. 83; Gall. Chr. xiv. 1041.) [S. A. B.]

GENEVIEVE. [GENOVEFA.]

GENGBERHT (Kemble, Cod. Dipl. No. 116), archbishop. [JAENBERT.] [C. H.]

GENGULPHUS, ST. (GANGOLFUS, GENGOUL), martyr, commemorated on May 11. He was a native of Varennes in Burgundy, where he was murdered, A.D. 760, at the instigation of his wife, by her paramour, for which reason he seems to have been elevated to the rank of martyrdom. He appears to have been a man of a rich and noble family. One of his ancestors, a certain Gengulphus, had been constituted "defensor" and "advocatus" of the neighbouring monastery of Besua by a letter of Clothaire king of the Franks dated Aug. 17, 666 (Chron. Bex. in D'Acher. Spicileg. ii. 403, ed. 1723). [G. T. S.]

GENIALIS (1), named in the diptychs of the church of Cavaillon as first bishop of that see. His date is fixed by the fact that his name appears in the recently discovered acts of the council of Nismes in 394. (Hefele, Concil. Gesch. § 110; Gall. Christ. i. 940.) [R. T. S.]

GENIALIS (2), condemned with Jovinianus as sharing his heresy by pope Siricius, and by St. Ambrose and other bishops assembled at Milan A.D. 390 (Amb. Opp. iii. 1044). [J. LL D.]

GENISTAE. Justin Martyr (Trypho, 80), speaking of Jewish sects, mentions as two of them, the Genistae and MERISTAE. This notice was for a long time overlooked by writers on heresies, though they generally enumerate pre-Christian sects, and Philaster in particular takes pains to lengthen his list of Jewish heresies. It is just possible that the writer of the Apostolic Constitutions (vi. 6) had the passage of Justin in his mind, and identified the Genistae with the Ebionites, whose notions were heretical concerning the birth of Christ; and the Meristae with the Essenes, who separated themselves from the rest of the people. But for a clear recognition of the passage we have to come down to Isidore of Seville (Orig. viii. 5), who explains that the Genistae were those who boasted of the pure race of Abraham, untainted by mixture of Babylonish blood, and the Meristae those who separated the Scriptures, denying the divine inspiration of certain prophecies. This is obviously mere guess-work, but no subsequent conjectures can be pronounced to be clearly more fortunate. We do not get as much help as might be expected from a comparison with Hegesippus (Euseb. H. E. iv. 23), who speaks of the seven sects of the Jews; and Justin, without calling attention to the number, enumerates exactly seven. Common to both lists are the Sadducees, Pharisees, Galileans, and Baptists or Hemerobaptists; while against the Hellenians, Genistae, and Meristae of Justin, we have to set the Samaritans, Masbotheans, and Essenes of Hegesippus. There is an enumeration of Jewish sects in the Clementine Recognitions (i. 54), but no trace there of reference to the passage in Justin. It is possible that the Genistae of Justin may be the same as the people whom Theodoret calls Kenotai and Clem. Alex. Katavotai; but if so, we lose the explanation CAINITES for the last word without gaining any light on the meaning of the first. [G. S.]

GENIUS, bishop of Auch. [EONIUS.]

GENIUS (HYGINUS)—May 3, martyr at Lactora (Lectoure), an episcopal city in Aquitaine. He was famous as a Christian teacher, and is said to have converted thirty soldiers who were sent to arrest him during the Diocletian persecution. They, failing to execute their orders, were all put to death. He died in a cave, where he had sought refuge. His acts are very legendary. (Ferrarius, Cat. SS.; Actu SS. Gall. Mai. i. 384–386. His life is to be found in Labbe, Nov. Biblioth. MSS. lib. in Coll. Her. Aquis. p. 564, Paris, 1657.) [G. T. S.]

GENNADIUS (1), bishop of Esbus (Heshbon) in Moab, present at the council of Nicaea, A.D. 325. (Mansi, ii. 694; Le Quien, Or. Christ. ii. 863.) [J. de S.]

GENNADIUS (2), bishop of Membresa or Membrassa, a town of proconsular Africa, 350 miles from Carthage, 35 from Musti (Medjez el Bab). (Ant. Itin. 45, 3; Procop. Bell. Vand. ii. 15.) He was present at Carth. Conf. A.D. 411. (Mon. Vet. Don. 133.) [H. W. P.]

GENNADIUS (3), a physician of Carthage, who had also practised at Rome, a friend both of Irenaeus and St. Augustine. In one of Augustine's letters to Evodius, Gennadius is mentioned as having at one time doubted the reality of life after death. His doubts were removed by a vision which convinced him that the power of mental and spiritual sight is independent of the body. (Aug. Ep. 159.) [H. W. P.]

GENNADIUS (4), presbyter and archimandrite, addressed by Cyril of Alexandria. Gennadius had broken off communion with Proclus the patriarch of Constantinople, being scandalized at his liberality in consenting to communicate with Juvenal of Jerusalem. Cyril commends Gennadius for his zeal, and expresses strong disapprobation of Juvenal; but at the same time he justifies Proclus under the circumstances, and says that he should himself have acted in the same way. (Cyril. Alex. ep. 56 al. 48, in Pat. Gr. lxxvii. 319; Tillem. Mém. xv. 203.)

[C. H.]

GENNADIUS (5), bishop of Hermopolis Magna in the Thebaïd, present at the Ephesine Latrocinium, A.D. 449. (Mansi, vi. 927; Le Quien, Or. Christ. ii. 595.) [J. de S.]

GENNADIUS (6), bishop of Teos, present at the Latrocinium Ephesinum, A.D. 449 (Mansi, vi. 932). But he also, though absent, assented to the council of Chalcedon in 451, and his name was subscribed by the order of Stephen, metropolitan bishop of Ephesus. (Mansi, vii. 168; Le Quien, O. C. i. 728.) [L. D.]

GENNADIUS (7), a praefectus Augustalis in the Eastern empire, A.D. 396, in which year there was addressed to him a constitution of the emperor Arcadius, dated from the Eutycheum, his official residence in Alexandria (Cod. Theod. XIV. xxvii. 1 n. Gothofred). Gennadius was still Augustalis when the Libyans invaded the Pentapolis (Synesius, Catastasis in Migne, Patrol. Gr. lxxvi. 1565). At some date he also filled the office of praefectus of Achaia (Claudian. Ep. 5). Synesius, bishop of Ptolemais, the metropolis of the Pentapolis, c. A.D. 407–415, tells that he was a Syrian, and speaks of him in terms of great praise. (Ep. 73, in Migne, u. s. 1439.) [T. W. D.]

GENNADIUS (8), the name of two Phrygian bishops, viz. of Mosyna and of Acmonaea, present at the council of Chalcedon, A.D. 451. (Mansi, vii. 156; Le Quien, O. C. i. 817, 823.) [L. D.]

GENNADIUS (9), bishop of Gnosus in Crete, was present at the council of Chalcedon, 451 (Mansi, vii. 161), and subscribed the synodical epistle of the Cretan bishops to the emperor Leo, A.D. 458. (Le Quien, Or. Christ. ii. 267.) [J. de S.]

GENNADIUS (10), 21st bishop of Constantinople, 458–471, between Anatolius and Acacius. His first public appearance was in an attack on Cyril, in two works, about 431 or 432, Against the Anathemas of Cyril, and Two books to Parthenius. In the latter he exclaims, "How many times have I heard blasphemies from Cyril of Egypt? Woe to the scourge of Alexandria!" "Can we sufficiently deplore the corruptions of which he has been and is the author? There are no blasphemies which he does not vomit against the holy fathers, against the apostles, against Jesus Christ Himself. He destroys the humanity which the Word took of us and for us; he makes that nature suffer which is incapable of suffering." In spite of these hearty censures, it seems probable that in 433 Gennadius was one of those who became reconciled with Cyril, and he may have been the presbyter and abbat who in 434 received Cyril's approbation for making a difficulty about communicating with Proclus. [GENNADIUS (4).]

At any rate, in 458, he was a presbyter at Constantinople, and designated by Leo to fill the see. The emperor was determined to find a man of spotless reputation, on whom no suspicion had ever breathed, of holy life and conspicuous learning, and such was Gennadius. It was not a unanimous election; for Arian influences were at work, and Acacius, who was destined to occupy the chair thirteen years later, already received some votes. From the beginning of his episcopate Gennadius gave the orthodox satisfactory proofs of zeal for the catholic faith and the maintenance of discipline. All the time of his tenure of his great office, an office greater than ever since the policy of his predecessor, occur measures for the good of the body ecclesiastical, in which the emperor is associated with the patriarch, and which the patriarch no doubt planned. His discretion was before long tested. Timothy Aelurus, chased from the see of Alexandria by order of the emperor, had obtained, through the canvassing of certain enemies of orthodoxy, leave to come to Constantinople, intending, by a pretence of Catholicism, to re-establish himself on his throne. Gennadius thought it best to consult the experience of the greatest of contemporary ecclesiastical statesmen, Leo bishop of Rome. Leo replied on June 17, 460, urging him to do his utmost to prevent the bad effects to be expected from the voyage of Timothy, and to labour for the immediate consecration of an orthodox prelate for Alexandria. The plan succeeded as Leo desired; Timothy Aelurus was banished to the Chersonese, and Timothy Solofaciolus was chosen to Alexandria in his stead. An appointment which Gennadius made about this time, that of Marcian, who had been a Novatian but had come over to the orthodox church, to the important and influential post of chancellor of the goods of the church of Constantinople, shewed at once his liberality, his penetration, and his desire for order. The two Egyptian solitaries who described Gennadius to Moschus, as mentioned below, communicated a story which is also told by Theodorus Lector. The church of St. Eleutherius at Constantinople was served by a reader named Carisius. He led a disorderly life and Gennadius gave him a severe reprimand. It was useless. According to the rules of the church, the patriarch had him flogged. The flogging was also ineffectual. The patriarch sent one of his officers to the church of St. Eleutherus to beg that holy martyr either to correct the evil servant of his church or to take him from the world. Next day, says the story, Carisius was found dead, to the terror of the whole town. Theodorus also relates how a painter, who had the presumption to depict the Saviour under the form of Jupiter and had his hand withered, was healed by the prayers of Gennadius.

It is related in the life of Daniel the Stylite, that Gennadius ordained that saint presbyter at the request of the emperor Leo, standing at the foot of the Pharos and performing the ceremonies there, because Daniel, who knew what was intended, did not wish his bishop to mount his retreat. "I should have come before," said the prelate, according to that account, "if I had not been prevented by business." You would never have come at all," replied the enthusiast brusquely, "unless you had been sent." The buying and selling of holy orders was one of the crying scandals of the age. Measures had been taken against simony by the Council of Chalcedon. In 459 or 460, Gennadius, finding that the evil practice had not at all abated, held a council at Constantinople to consider it. An encyclical was issued, adding anathema to the former sentence. The synodal was sent to the bishop of Rome, and to the metropolitans of the East, with a request that it should be published in their provinces and strictly carried out.

In 459 Martyrius had been raised to the see of Antioch, but was driven out by Peter the Fuller, who, by the help of the emperor's son-in-law Zeno, seized his place. Gennadius, by his entreaties with the emperor, obtained the restoration of the extruded patriarch. Peter the Fuller a second time seized the archbishopric. The patriarch of the East again appealed to the emperor, and Julian was made orthodox successor to Martyrius.

Towards the end of his life Gennadius is said to have been praying one night before an altar, when suddenly he saw a spectre of a demon. The demon declared that he yielded during the life of Gennadius, but that after his death he would cause many ills to the church, and would reduce it to his obedience. This story may have arisen from Gennadius foreseeing that Acacius would succeed him, and from the alarm which he must constantly have felt at the disorders of the church, with which even his high courage and resolution could hardly cope. Gennadius prayed to God to avert such a disaster; but the anxiety which he felt hastened his end. He died in 471, about August 25. That is his day in the Greek calendar.

Gennadius stands out as an able and successful administrator, about whom no historian has had anything to speak but praise, if we except the criticism which was naturally aroused by the violent attack which he made in his younger days against Cyril of Alexandria, an attack which the unmeasured language of Cyril may be held to excuse. His character was shortly sketched to John Moschus. About 9 miles from Alexandria Moschus on his travels came to a place called Salama, where two aged cenobites told him they had been presbyters at Constantinople, and described our patriarch. He was extremely gentle in disposition and manner, of remarkable personal cleanliness and neatness, most temperate in all his habits. Another account is given by Gennadius the presbyter, who flourished at Marseilles about twenty years after the death of the patriarch. He says he was eloquent and witty of tongue, of sharp and keen intelligence, and so skilled in sacred literature that he dictated a whole commentary on Daniel word for word from memory. In his later days he never would ordain any one to the ministry who could not repeat the whole psalter by heart.

Besides the treatises already mentioned, Gennadius is known to have written a commentary on Daniel and many other parts of the Old Testament, and on all the epistles of St. Paul. He also composed a great number of homilies. Of these only a few fragments remain, preserved by Facundus Hermianensis in his Pro tribus capitulis, by Philippus Solitarius, and by Nicophorus the Monk. An additional fragment was discovered by Cardinal Mai. The principal of these are on Genesis, Exodus, the Psalms, the Romans, the 1st and 2nd Corinthians, the Galatians, and the Hebrews. They are interesting specimens of the exegesis of the 5th century.

That on the Romans is the most important, and consists of a series of explanatory remarks on selected texts. He does not at all grasp the great central doctrine of the epistle, but shews thought and spiritual life. (Gennadius, CP. Patr., Patr. Graec. lxxxv. p. 1611, &c.; Bolland. AA. SS. GENNADIUS (11) MASSILIENSIS, presbyter of Marseilles.

Authorities.—His statement regarding himself, at the close of his treatise De Viris Illustribus, together with the inferences deduced from this, and his only remaining extant work, the short Epistola de Fide mea, which is more commonly known by the title Libellus de Ecclesiasticis Dogmatibus. (Concerning editions, see below.)

Life.—The existence of Gennadius must have been wholly comprised within the 5th century of the Christian era, inasmuch as he died in A.D. 496. Of the date of his birth and of his ordination to the priesthood we are ignorant. But in the De Viris Illustribus we learn from himself, through the notice above-mentioned, that he was a presbyter of Marseilles, that in addition to the above-named tractates he wrote a work in eight books against all heresies, another in six books against Nestorius, and tracts on the Mil-lennium and the Apocalypse (de Mille Annis et de Apocalypsi Beati Joannis). The epistle he sent to pope Gelasius (epistolam de fide mea misi ad beatum Gelasium, urbis Romae episcopum). This is Gelasius the first, whose tenure of the Roman see lasted only four years, namely, from A.D. 493 to 496.

Writings.—It is unfortunate that our estimate of one of the two extant works of Gennadius is rendered difficult by some doubts concerning the correctness of our present copies. If we accept the De Viris Illustribus as it is commonly published, then the brief notices concerning St. Augustine, St. Prosper, and Faustus the Breton [PROSPER, FAUSTUS REIENSIS], warrant us in naming Gennadius of Marseilles with the semi-Pelagians [SEMI-PELAGIANS], inasmuch as he accuses Augustine and Prosper, and praises Faustus. Moreover, the short account of St. Jerome at the commencement of the book, a very laudatory one, seems inconsistent with the hostile reference to Jerome contained under the article Jerome in the same catalogue.

The most obnoxious passages of a semi-Pelagian character are said to be altogether omitted in the two oldest MSS. now extant, those of Lucca and Verona, and in a MS. preserved at Corbie in France. Thoma's art. "Gennadius" in the Dictionary of Greek and Roman Biog. compared with Mabillon Patr. Analecta, ed. Paris, 1723.) This is no doubt an important fact. But it must be borne in mind that it is not certain that these MSS.

were in reality the earliest, and that it is by no means impossible that a copyist, especially in Italy, might omit them as unsuited to the theological atmosphere of his own age and country. The existence of a semi-Pelagian school in the southern Gaul of the fifth and sixth centuries—a school embracing among its more or less pronounced adherents many justly honoured names—is a plain matter of unquestioned history, and it is highly probable that Gennadius belonged to it. To the present writer the passages in question do not look like forgeries; they cohere with the context; and Mabillon (l. c.), though leaving the question open for further investigation, does not venture to condemn them.

The account of Jerome given by Gennadius stands on a different footing. The absence of any such notice would not be remarkable, because the De Viris Illustribus (otherwise Catalogus Scriptor. Eccles.) of Jerome, of which the work of Gennadius is at once an imitation and a continuation, ends with a notice of Jerome given by himself. Besides the divergence from the art. "Rufinus" already noticed, the style seems more rhetorical, and the tone more enthusiastic than is common with Gennadius. If it be accepted as a genuine notice by Gennadius, we may add to his list of extant works a longer biography of St. Jerome, occupying nearly three folio pages, and given by Mabillon (l. c.), who seems to incline towards accepting it. The tones of the longer and the shorter notices are concordant, and both contain the singular expression italicized in the following extract from the shorter one. "Ad Bethleem oppidum juvenis [Hieronymus, sc.] advenit, ubi prudens animal ad praesepe Domini se obtulit permansurum." But the name of Jerome is so completely what an Italian poet has termed that such an addition as the prefix of the short notice is a probable one, and the genuineness of the longer life must seemingly stand or fall with it. On such evidence as lies before him the present writer would reject them both.

Nome d'immensa invidia

Taking then the De Viris Illustribus in its most commonly accepted form (which agrees with the above decisions), it may be remarked, that it was probably published about A.D. 495, and that it contains, in some ten folio pages, a century of short biographies of ecclesiastics between A.D. 392 and 495. Although lacking the lively touches, so frequent in the similar work of his great predecessor, the catalogue of Gennadius exhibits a real sense of proportion. The greater men stand out in its pages, and it conveys much real and valuable information. With due allowance for the bias referred to, it may be regarded as a trustworthy compilation, for which our gratitude is due.

The other treatise, variously entitled, as has been remarked, Epistola de Fide mea, or de Ecclesiasticis Dogmatibus Liber, begins with a profession of faith in those articles contained in the three creeds retained in the Prayer Book of the English Church, interwoven with the names of those who are considered by the writer (with occasionally questionable accuracy) to have impugned this or that article of belief. A few lines will illustrate this feature. "Nihil creatum aut serviens in Trinitate credendum, ut vult Dionysius, fons Arii; nihil inaequale, ut Eunomius; nihil inaequale gratiae, ut vult Aetius: nihil anterius posteriusve aut minus, ut Arius; nihil extraneum aut officiale alteri, ut Macedonius (cap. 4)." Gennadius considers (as later writers, e.g. Aquinas) that all men, even those alive at the second Advent, will have to die (7). But this conviction, though derived from a widespread patristic tradition (maximā Patrum turbā tradente) is, he admits, rejected by others equally catholic and learned. Of the theories concerning the soul of man subsequently known respectively as the creatianist and the traducianist views, he espouses the creatianist side. He will not allow the existence of the spirit as a third element in man besides the body and the soul, but looks upon it as only another name for the soul (19). Heretical baptism is not to be repeated, unless where it has been administered by heretics, who would have declined to employ the invocation of the Holy Trinity (52). He recommends weekly reception of the Eucharist by all who are not under the burden of mortal sin. Such as are should have recourse to public penitence. He will not deny that private penance may suffice; but even here outward manifestation, such as change of dress, is desirable. Daily reception of holy communion he will neither praise nor blame (53).

Evil was invented by Satan (57). Though celibacy be rated above matrimony, to condemn marriage is Manichaean (67). A Christian who has been twice married should not be ordained (72). Churches should be called after the martyrs, and the relics of martyrs honoured (73). He does not believe that any but the baptized attain eternal life; not even catechumens, unless they suffer martyrdom (74). Penitence thoroughly avails to Christians even at their latest breath (80). The Creator alone knows our secret thoughts. Satan can learn them only by our motions and manifestations (81). Marvels may be wrought in the Lord's name even by bad men (84). Men can become holy without such marks (85).

The assertion of the freedom of man's will is strongly asserted in this short treatise. But the commencement of all goodness is assigned to divine grace. The language of Gennadius is here not quite Augustinian; but neither is it Pelagian, or the work would not have been so long included among those of St. Augustine.

Editions.—The two treatises of Gennadius are easy of access; the De Viris Illustribus is given in most good editions of the works of St. Jerome (as e.g. Vallarsi's, the Benedictine, or that of Victorius, Paris, 1579); and the Liber de Ecclesiasticis Dogmatibus is to be found in the Appendix to tom. viii. of the Benedictine edition of St. Augustine (p. 75). The former treatise has also been published in company with the similar catalogues by Isidore of Seville and Honorius, as well as Jerome's, by Suffridus, 8vo. Coloniae, 1530; with notes by Miraeus, Antwerpiae, 1639, and with notes by Miraeus and E. S. Cyprianus, 4to. Helmstadii, 1700, and by Fabricius, Bibliotheca Ecclesiast. Hamb. 1718.

The date of the publication of the De Viris Illustribus is, as has been said, about A.D. 495. The De Eccles. Dogmatibus is evidently, from Gennadius's own statement, an earlier work. This limits it to a period between A.D. 492–494, as otherwise it could not have been sent to pope Gelasius. [J. G. C.]

GENNADIUS (12), bishop of Hermopolis Parva (Damanhur) in Egypt. He was the last of the orthodox bishops, and was related to Timotheus of Alexandria (Liberatus, Breviarium, cap. xvii. in Patrol. Lat. lxxviii. 1022). The same writer mentions that Gennadius was sent by Timotheus to the emperor Zeno, c. A.D. 480, and remained some time at Constantinople. (Ibid. cap. xvi.; Le Quien, Or. Christ. ii. 516.) [J. de S.]

GENNADIUS (18), bishop of Zenopolis, in Pamphylia, present at the fifth general council, 553 (Mansi, ix. 393). As there is another town of this name in Lycia, writers have supposed two bishops of the name of Gennadius. (Gams, Series Episc. 450, 451; Le Quien, Oriens Christ. i. 993, 1033.) [L. D.]

GENNADIUS (14), exarch of Africa, to whom Gregory the Great wrote about suppressing Donatist heretics who had again become troublesome in that country, A.D. 591. (Tillemont, 78, vi. p. 192; Mon. Vet. Don. pp. 610–615, ed Oberthür.) [H. W. P.]

GENNARDUS, third abbat of St. Germer de Flaix in the diocese of Beauvais [GEREMARIUS]. He was previously vice-dominus of the church of Rouen and was succeeded, perhaps in 716, by his kinsman St. Benignus abbat of Fontanelle. (Gall. Chr. ix. 789.) [C. H.]

GENOCUS, friend of St. Finnian of Clonard, and probably the same as Mogenog, bishop of Cill-dumha-gluinn. [MOGENOG.] (Colgan, Acta SS. 196 b, 394, c. 11, 398, n. 12.) [J. G.]

GENOVEFA (GENEVIEVE), patron saint of Paris and of France. The story of her life, as derived from the most ancient records, is as follows:—About the year 430 St. Germanus of Auxerre and St. Lupus of Troyes, being on their way to England to combat the Pelagian heresy, stayed one evening at Nanterre, then a village, about seven miles from Paris. The villagers assembled to see two prelates of such renown, and a little girl in the crowd attracted the notice of St. Germanus. Calling her to him, he asked the bystanders who she was, and learnt that her name was Genovefa, that she was seven years of age, and her parents' names were Severus and Gerontia. The parents were summoned at his desire, and in the spirit of prophecy he bade them rejoice in the sanctity of their daughter, for that she would be the means of saving many. Then addressing himself to the child, he dwelt on the high state of virginity, and engaged her to consecrate herself. The bishops then held a service in the church, and at nightfall bade Severus bring his daughter again at early dawn. Before departing St. Germanus reminded her of her promise, and giving her a brazen coin marked with the cross, bade her wear it as her only ornament, and leave gold and precious stones for the servants of the world. Henceforth miracles marked her out as the spouse of Christ. Her mother was struck blind for a thoughtless blow, and only healed by the girl's supernatural gifts.

Brought to the archbishop of Paris, generally supposed to have been Felix, to be formally consecrated as a virgin, he recognised her sanctity, and preferred her over the two older girls who accompanied her. In course of time her parents died, and Genovefa was taken by her grandmother to live in Paris. Here she fell ill, and lay three days in a trance, in which an angel led her to see the dwellings of the just, and the rewards prepared for those who love God. She received, too, the gift of declaring men's thoughts. These privileges displeased the various, and people were beginning to murmur against her, when St. Germanus arrived in Paris on a second journey to Britain. Of the people who came to meet him he asked tidings of St. Genovefa, and was met with the murmurs of her detractors. Disregarding their tales, he sought her dwelling, humbly saluted her and drew the people the floor of her chamber wet with her secret tears, and, before departing, commended her to their love. But a fresh source of persecution soon arose. The rumour of Attila's merciless and irresistible progress reached Paris, and the terrified citizens were fleeing with their families and goods. But Genovefa, prophesying that Paris would remain unharmed, and that those places they deemed safe would be ravaged, assembled the matrons and bade them seek deliverance by prayer and fasting rather than by flight. Then the Parisians rose against her as a false prophetess, and took counsel to kill her. But at this time there arrived in Paris an archdeacon bearing from St. Germanus the gift of some eulogiae or eucharistic leaves (vid. Dict. Ch. Antiq.) for Genovefa. He addressed the people, declaring the testimony of his bishop, and dissuaded them from their purpose. Nor did the Huns reach Paris, but were diverted through the efficacy of her prayers, as after ages believed (circ. 448).

The accounts we have of her do not enable a connected history to be given of her life. In fact, they are little besides a string of miracles. Meaux, Arcis-sur-Aube, Troyes, Orleans, Tours, the Seine, and, perhaps, Lyons, but probably Laon, besides Paris, all witnessed the usual commonplace miracles of the age. Childeric, the father of Clovis, having sentenced some prisoners to death, leaves Paris to escape her importunate entreaties for their release. The gates behind him by his order are locked, but fly open at the approach of Genovefa. The same thing happens to the doors of the baptistery of a church at Meaux when she and St. Cilinia, who had resolved to become a nun, were seeking sanctuary from the latter's disappointed lover. To her wonder-working powers, no less than to her zeal, was due the building at Paris of what was at its beginning a humble chapel (vilis aedicula, Gesta Dagoberti, i. 3; Bouquet, ii. 580) in honour of St. Denys and his companions, whom she held in especial reverence.

But her abstinence and self-inflicted privations are perhaps her greatest characteristic. From her fifteenth to her fiftieth year she ate but twice a week, and then only bread of barley or beans. Wine and strong drink were unknown to her. After her fiftieth year, by command of her bishops, she added a little fish and milk to her bread. Every Saturday night she kept a vigil in her church of St. Denys, and from the Feast of Epiphany till Easter she remained immured in her cell. Such was her fame that it came by means of travellers and merchants to Simeon Stylites, on his pillar in Syria, who sent his greetings to her, and asked for her prayers.

Before her death Clovis, of whose conversion a later legend has made her the joint author with Clotilda, began to build for her the church which later bore her name. Unfinished at his death, it was completed by Clotilda, and dedicated to St. Peter and St. Paul. Upon Genovefa's death (Jan. 3, A.D. 512) she was buried in it.

The chief authority for the history of St. Genovefa is an anonymous Life, the author of which asserts that he wrote eighteen years after her death, therefore, about A.D. 530. It was first published by Jean Ravisi, of Nevers, in his Des Femmes Illustres, Paris, 1521, and then by Surius, with corrections in the style (Jan. 3), again, by the Bollandists, in 1643, from better MSS., together with another life differing from the former only in unimportant particulars (Acta SS. Jan. 1, 138 seq.). There has been considerable divergence of opinion as to the authority to be attached to this life. The authors of the Hist. Litt. de la France (iii. 151) believe in its authenticity, and characterize the author as grave, judicious, full of piety and learned for his age. On the other hand, it has been asserted that there is no life of St. Geneviève worthy of credence (see Saintyves, Vie de Ste. Geneviève, p. 12, and cf. Valesiana, pp. 43-4, Paris, 1694). If we compare the life of St. Germanus of Auxerre by Constantius (c. 5, Boll. Acta SS. Jul. vii. 211) with that part of St. Genovefa's which relates to him, we can hardly doubt that they have a common source, or that one of them is taken from the other, with slight alterations. And that episode being subtracted, there is nothing in the remainder which might not well be the work of a later age. It seems clear that the history must be accepted with great doubt. There is no foundation for the belief that the life was written by Genesius, a priest, whose name occurs in the narrative. The life of St. Lupus (c. 2, Acta SS. Jul. vii. 74) has a mere allusion to the history of Genovefa. Innumerable lives of St. Genovefa have appeared in France in modern times, some of which are referred to below, but they are for the most part of a devotional character, and useless for critical or historical purposes.

A noticeable feature in the legend which has grown up round the name of St. Genovefa, and in which it differs from the original sources, is the prominence which it gives to the supposed humility of her birth and condition. The peasant girl of Nanterre, feeding her father's sheep, has been the favourite conception of her in sacred art, and the Clos and Parc de Ste. Geneviève are still pointed out near Paris as the scene of her occupation. This is remarkable, as beyond the fact that her parents dwelt in a village, there is no evidence of her birth being humble, but rather indications to the contrary (Valesiana ut sup.), and the practice of the Catholic church in the treatment of its heroines has certainly not erred in this direction. Nor does it appear that she has ever been considered in any special way the guardian saint of the poor.

The posthumous history of St. Genovefa was more eventful than her life. Though Bede's is the first Martyrology in which her name appears, her cult seems to have commenced in very early times (cf. Greg. Tur. de Glor. Conf. xci.), and to have extended from Paris through France generally. Hers was one of the shrines which St. Eligius enriched and adorned (Vita S. Eligii, i. 32, Migne, Patr. Lat. lxxxvii. 504), and her tomb became as celebrated for miracles as she herself had been when alive. In the 9th century her body had to be removed from its resting-place no less than three times to preserve it from the ruin which overtook the church and monastery at the hands of the Northmen. Twice it was carried to a distance from Paris (845 and 856), and the third time (885) within the city walls, where her coffin, carried in solemn procession to the point where the assault was fiercest, brought victory to the Parisians (Abbo, de Bello Parisiaco, lib. ii.; Migne, Patr. Lat. cxxxii. 744). The flight and restoration were on each occasion attended by numerous miracles (Boll. Acta SS. Jan. i. 149, seq.). It was not till 890 or 891 that she, St. Germanus and St. Maclovius were finally restored to their own churches. In 1130, though some place it earlier, occurred the famous miracle of the Ardents, commemorated Nov. 26 by order of pope Innocent II. Paris was devastated by a plague called the ignis sacer, against which all human remedies proved futile. At last the coffin of St. Genovefa was carried in solemn procession and elevated in her church. All who pressed near it were healed, except three, who were concluded from that circumstance to be unbelievers. Henceforth, the solemn carrying in procession of St. Genovefa was the favourite remedy for every public calamity, such as floods, famine, pestilence, or even unseasonable weather. In 1161 the coffin was solemnly opened in the presence of the archbishop of Sens and two other prelates, in consequence of a rumour that the body had been abstracted and sold by the new canons. It was found secure (Boll. Acta SS. Jan. 1, 152). In 1177 the abbey, which had never been completely restored since the ravages of the Northmen three centuries before, was entirely rebuilt by Stephen, the abbat of that time (Epist. 147, 148, 153; Migne, Patr. Lat. ccxi. 434, 435, 438). In 1242 the wooden coffin, in which the remains had hitherto been enclosed, was exchanged for one of gold, silver and precious stones. From 1650 to 1664 the precious relics had to be concealed on account of the civil wars. In 1757 was commenced the present church from the designs of Soufflot to commemorate the recovery of Louis XV. from illness thirteen years before. When the Revolution broke out the foundation was enormously important. It is said to have comprised seventy-seven abbeys and twenty-eight conventual priories. Its wealth was of course confiscated. On April 4, 1791, the Assembly decreed that the still unfinished church should henceforth receive the ashes of great men, and be called the Pantheon. The next day the body of Mirabeau was laid there, soon to be dispossessed in favour of Marat, who, in his turn a few years later, was ejected with ignominy. Meanwhile the rich coffin, which in 1792 was removed for safety to the church of St. Etienne du Mont, was broken up and sold, and the body of the saint, which was said to have been found incomplete, was burnt on the Place de Grève by public decree, Dec. 3, 1793. The church was afterwards restored by Napoleon I. to its name and cult. (Saintyves, Vie de Ste. Geneviève; Baillet, Vies des Saints, Jan. 3, tom. ii. 417; Belouet, Histoire et culte de Ste. Geneviève, Paris, 1866; Lefeuve, Hist. de Ste. Geneviève, c. xiii. Paris, 1842; Fleury, Hist. Eccles. lxxix. 22; lxxiv. 39; Du-laure, Hist. de Paris, i. 240-1.) [S. A. B.]

GENSERIC, king of the Vandals, the illegitimate son of Godigiselus, king of the Vandals, reigned for some time in Spain jointly with his legitimate brother Gunderic. [GUNDERIC.] On the death of the latter, A.D. 428, he succeeded to the undivided sovereignty. He is said to have been originally a Catholic, but early in life he embraced the Arian heresy.

Before the death of Gunderic, count Boniface, who through the intrigues of his rival Aetius had been forced to seek safety in revolt, had invited the Vandals to invade Africa. This invitation was readily accepted by Genseric, who assembled the Vandals with their families at the Straits of Gibraltar. On hearing, however, that Hermigarius, king of the Suevi, had ventured to enter the provinces he was abandoning, Genseric turned upon the invaders, drove them with their king into the Guadiana, and then in May, A.D. 429, according to Idatius (in A.D. 427 according to Prosper), crossed into Africa. His host numbered 50,000 warriors, and poured like a torrent over the fertile and defenceless provinces Carthage, Cirta, and Hippo Regius alone withstood the tide of invasion. The rage of the Vandals was especially directed against the churches, basilicas, cemeteries, and monasteries. Bishops and priests were tortured to compel them to disclose the treasures of their churches. Victor mentions two who were burnt alive, the venerable Papinian, one of his predecessors in the see of Vita, and Mansuetus, bishop of Urca. Neither age nor sex proved any protection against the violence of the barbarians. Hippo was besieged, but through the efforts of count Boniface, who had discovered the stratagem of Aetius, and had returned to his allegiance, supported by an army of allied Goths, the Vandals were obliged by famine, after a siege of fourteen months, to abandon the attempt. St. Augustine died in August, A.D. 430, in the third month of the siege. (Possidius, Life of St. Augustine in Migne, Patr. Lat. xxxii. 59.) Soon afterwards Boniface, who had received reinforcements from Rome and Constantinople under Aspar, the magister militum, ventured to give battle to the Vandals, but after a hotly contested engagement was defeated with great loss. He then abandoned Africa and returned to Italy. Genseric, however, who apprehended another expedition of the united forces of the Eastern and Western empires, was not unduly elated by his success, but concluded at Hippo, on February 10, A.D. 435, a peace with Valentinian, by which he undertook to pay a tribute for the territories he had conquered, and to leave unmolested those still held by Valentinian, and sent his son Hunneric as a hostage.

In A.D. 437, Genseric began to persecute the Catholic bishops in the ceded territories, of whom Possidius Novatus, and Severianus were the most illustrious, and not only took their churches from them, but banished them from their sees. At the same time, four Spaniards, Arcadius, Probus, Paschasius, and Eutychius, who were faithful servants of Genseric, but who refused at his command to embrace Arianism, were tortured and put to death. Paulillus, a younger brother of Paschasius and Eutychius, was cruelly scourged and reduced to slavery.

Genseric, after procuring the restoration of his capital, took Carthage by surprise, Oct. 19, A.D. 439. The bishops and noble laity were stripped of their possessions and offered the alternative of slavery or exile. Quodvultdeus, the bishop of Carthage, with a number of his clergy were compelled to embark in unseaworthy ships, in which, however, they reached Naples in safety. All the churches within the walls of Carthage were taken from the Catholics, and handed over to the Arians, and many of those outside, especially two dedicated to St. Cyprian, shared the same fate. It should, however, be recollected that the Arians in this were only meting out to the Catholics the treatment they received in towns where the latter party was the stronger. [CHRYSOSTOM, p. 524; AMBROSIUS, p. 95.] Genseric ordered the funeral processions of the Catholics to be conducted in silence, and sent the remaining portion of the clergy into exile. Some of the most distinguished of the clergy and laity of the provinces divided among the Vandals ventured to present themselves before the king with a petition to be allowed for the consolation of their people to live in peace under the dominion of the Vandals. He replied, "I have resolved to let none of your race and name escape. How then do you dare to make such a demand?" and he was with difficulty restrained by the entreaties of his attendants from drowning the petitioners in the adjoining sea. The Catholics, deprived of their churches, were obliged to celebrate the divine mysteries where and as best they could.

The year after the capture of Carthage, Genseric equipped a fleet, with which he ravaged Italy, and besieged Palermo. At the instigation of Maximus, the leader of the Arians in the island, he persecuted the Catholics there, some of whom suffered martyrdom at his hands. According to Prosper, he was recalled from Sicily by news of the arrival in Africa of count Sebastian, the son-in-law of count Boniface, but Maximus places his arrival ten years later. Sebastian, however, had come as a friend to take refuge at his court, but Genseric, who feared his renown as a statesman and general, at first tried to convert him to Arianism, that his refusal might supply a pretext for putting him to death. Sebastian evaded his demands by a dexterous reply, which Genseric was unable to answer, but some other excuse for his execution was shortly afterwards found.

In A.D. 441, Genseric was attacked by a great fleet and army sent by Theodosius under the command of Areobindas, Anaxillas, and Germanus, who, however, delayed in Sicily, and proved rather a burden to the island than a defence to Africa. They were recalled the next year to defend Thrace and Illyricum against an invasion of the Huns.

The same year a new peace was concluded by which Valentinian retained the three Mauritania and part of Numidia, and ceded the remaining part of his African dominions to Genseric, who divided the Zeugitane or proconsular province, in which Carthage was situated, among the Vandals and kept the other ceded lands in his own possession. The noblest and wealthiest of the natives were reduced to slavery, and handed over with all their property to the king's sons Hunneric and Genzo. While the Vandals, who were in possession of all the richest lands, were exempt from all imposts, the taxation on the inferior lands, which the former owners had been allowed to keep, was so crushing that the unfortunate natives were left totally destitute, and many of them suffered death for trying to evade the demands of the tax-gatherers by concealing their money. To guard against another invasion or a revolt of his subjects, Genseric dismantled all the towns except Carthage, to prevent the invaders or rebels from finding any fortified post they might use as a basis of operations. About this time Genseric discovered a plot among his nobles against himself, and tortured and executed many of them. Probably from alarm at this conspiracy, he began a new and severer persecution. The Catholics were allowed no place for prayer or the ministration of the sacraments. Every allusion in a sermon to Pharaoh, Nebuchadnezzar, or Holofernes was regarded as aimed at the king, and the preacher was forthwith punished with exile. Among the bishops banished at this time, Victor mentions Urbanus of Girba, Crescius, a metropolitan who presided over 120 bishops, Habetdeus of Teudela, Eustratius of Suffectum, two of the provinces of Tripoli, and Felix of Adrumetum. The last was banished for receiving a foreign monk. Genseric prohibited new bishops being consecrated to fill the places of those banished. In A.D. 454, however, he yielded to Valentinian's requests, so far as to allow Deogratias to be consecrated bishop of Carthage. The see had remained vacant since the banishment of Quodvultdeus fifteen years before. In A.D. 455, Genseric, at the invitation of Eudoxia, Valentinian's widow, sailed to Italy, and took Rome without a blow. At the intercession of Leo the Great, he abstained from torturing or massacring the inhabitants, and burning the city, but gave it up to a systematic plunder. For fourteen days and nights the work of pillage continued, the city was ransacked of all its remaining treasures, and Genseric then returned unmolested to Africa, laden with booty and carrying with him many thousand captives, among whom was the empress Eudoxia and her two daughters. The eldest became the wife of his son Hunneric; the youngest, with her mother, was eventually surrendered to the emperor Leo. The most remarkable objects among the spoils were the vessels of the temple and the gilt bronze tiles that formed the roof of the Capitol. The sufferings of the prisoners were alleviated by the charity of Deogratias. [DEOGRATIAS.]

After the death of Valentinian, the whole of Africa fell into the hands of Genseric, and also Sicily, Sardinia, Corsica, and the Balearic Islands. His fleets year after year sailed from Carthage in the early spring, and ravaged all the coasts of the Mediterranean. As he was leaving Carthage on one of these expeditions, the helmsman asked him whither he ordered him to steer. "Against those," he replied, "who have incurred the wrath of God." In these expeditions his object was not only to plunder, but to persecute. Spain, Italy, Dalmatia, Campania, Calabria, Apulia, Bruttium, Venetia, Lucania, Epirus, and the Peloponnese, all suffered from his ravages. The Vandals were not, however, always invincible. In A.D. 456, their fleet of sixty ships was defeated with great slaughter by count Ricimer, off Corsica according to Ilatius, but according to Sidonius (301 in Migne, Patr. Lat. lviii. 653) off Agrigentum. After the death of Deogratias, A.D. 457, Genseric did not allow any more bishops to be consecrated in the proconsular province, the peculiar domain of the Vandals, so that of the original number of 164 only three were left in Victor's time. One Proculus was sent to compel the bishops to give up all their books and the sacramental vessels. When this was refused, Proculus and his escort seized them by force, and made the very altar cloths into shirts for themselves. St. Valerian, bishop of Abbenza, was expelled from that town. No one was allowed to receive him into their house, or even to permit him to remain on their land, and he was long obliged to lie by the roadside in the open air. At Regia the Catholics had ventured at Easter to take possession of their church. The Arians, headed by a priest named Adduit, attacked the church, part of them forcing an entrance with drawn swords and part shooting arrows through the windows. The reader was killed by an arrow in the pulpit, and many of the congregation were slain on the altar-steps. Most of the survivors were afterwards executed by Genseric's orders. Genseric, by the advice of the Arian bishops, commanded all who held office about his court to embrace Arianism. According to Victor's account, when Armogast, one of the number, refused, he was tightly bound with cords, but they broke like a spider's web; and when he was hung head downwards by one foot, he seemed to sleep as peacefully as if he were in bed. His persecutors finding themselves unable to overcome his resolution, were about to kill him, but were dissuaded by an Arian priest, as he would then have been revered as a martyr. He was accordingly compelled to labour in the fields and afterwards to tend cattle near Carthage.

Meanwhile the Romans refused to give up Africa as lost without a further struggle. The emperor Majorian, of whom the romantic story is told that he visited Carthage in disguise to explore with his own eyes the resources of his enemy, in A.D. 460 assembled a fleet of 300 vessels at Carthage for the invasion of Africa. His plans were betrayed by domestic treason to the Vandals, who surprised and carried off the greater part of his ships. Genseric, however, alarmed at this attempt, concluded peace with Majorian.

In A.D. 468, Leo collected a mighty armament of 1113 ships, each containing 100 men (Cedrenus, 350, ed. Dindorf.), under the command of his brother-in-law Basiliscus. The campaign opened favourably. Marcellianus, who had acquired Dalmatia, and assumed the title of Patrician of the West, joined Leo against the common foe and drove the Vandals out of Sardinia. In the opposite direction, Heraclius recovered Tripoli. The main armament landed at the Hermaean promontory (Cape Bon), about forty miles from Carthage. Had Basiliscus attacked Carthage immediately, it would probably have fallen, but Genseric, by means, as it was generally believed, of a large bribe, induced him to grant a truce for five days. He used the interval to man all the ships he could, and the wind becoming favourable, attacked the Romans and sent fire-ships among their crowded vessels. Panic and confusion spread through the vast multitude, most of whom tried to fly, but a few fell fighting gallantly to the last. After this victory, Genseric recovered Sardinia and Tripoli, and ravaged the coasts of the Mediterranean more cruelly than before, till a peace was concluded between him and the emperor Zeno. Severus, the emperor's ambassador, when taking leave, requested Genseric, instead of giving him the gifts usually presented to an ambassador on his departure, to set his prisoners at liberty. The king replied he had no power over those who had fallen to the share of the other Vandals, but released to him those who had fallen to his own or his sons' lot, and allowed him to ransom as many of the others as he could. (Malchus de Legationibus, 3, ed. Dindorf.) At the same time Genseric, at Leo's entreaty, allowed the churches of Carthage to be reopened, and all the exiled bishops and clergy to return.

Soon afterwards he died, on Jan. 24, A.D. 477. He is said to have established as the law of succession in his family that the eldest male should succeed to the throne, so that the succession should not pass from father to son, but from brother to brother or uncle to nephew. This was, however, the usual rule of succession in early times. The Irish custom of Tanistry is an instance of it, and the best known example is furnished by the law of succession of the house of Othman.

According to the description of Jornandes (de Gothorum Origine, c. 33, in Cassiodorus, i. 412, in Migne, Patr. Lat. lxi. 1274), Genseric was of moderate stature, and was lame from a fall from his horse. He was a man of few words, and thus was better able to conceal the deep designs he had conceived. His passionate nature scorned luxury, and was greedy of empire. He was a master of all the arts by which nations could be won to his side, and quarrels might be excited and the seeds of mutual discord sown among his enemies. A terrible instance of his cruelty is related by Procopius (de Bello Vandilico, i. 22). Enraged by a repulse at Taenarus, he sailed for Zante, captured 500 nobles of the island, and in revenge cut them in pieces and flung their bodies into the Adriatic. In forming an estimate of Genseric's character, it must be remembered that all our information about him is derived from authors who hated and dreaded himself and his nation both as heretics and enemies. After every allowance has been made for Salvian's rhetoric (De Gubernatione Dei, vii. in Migne, Patr. Lat. liii.), it must be admitted that, according to his description of the morals of the Vandals and those of the dissolute Carthaginians, the barbarian heretics appear in a more favourable light than the civilized Catholics.

Genseric's name is variously spelt Gizericus, Gaisericus, Geisericus, and Zinzirichus. The sources for the above account are the Chronicles of Prosper and Ilatius (in Migne, Patr. Lat. li.)

Procopius de Bello Vandalico, i. 3-7; Isidorus, de Rebus Gothorum (Isid. Opp. vii. 130-133, in Migne, Patr. Lat. lxxxiii. 1076); and Victor Vitensis de Persecutione Vandalica, i. (in Migne, Patr. Lat. lviii.). GENTENNUS, priest of Terguair (Colgan, Ir. Thom. 180 n. 149). [GEINTEN.] [J. G.]

GENTIANUS, twenty-ninth bishop of Angers, succeeding Mauriolus and followed by St. Benedictus, about the close of the 8th century. (Gall. Christ. xiv. 552; Tresvaux, Hist. de l'Eglise et du Diocèse d'Angers, i. 80.) [S. A. B.]

GENTILIS, bishop of Cubda, in proconsular Africa, was present at the council of Carthage, A.D. 646. (Mansi, x. 939; Morcelli, Afr. Christ. i. 146.) [R. S. G.]

GENULFUS, is regarded as first bishop of Cahers. But the old lection which relates his preaching of the gospel in that part of the country, relates also that after three months he departed; and this fact seems hardly consistent with the belief that he was bishop. The Ballandist biographer supposes that he was consecrated bishop at Rome, and sent to establish himself in any place where he might be able to found a church. Probably he was but the first missionary. He may be the same with Gundulfus, who appears in the Roman martyrology at June 17 as sent by pope Sixtus II. in the time of Decius, and who came to the country of the Bituriges. He is hence described by Potthast as bishop of Bourges. His biography, with plentiful miracles interspersed, and an appendix of additional miracles by an anonymous Benedictine, is found in Boll. Jan. 17; Acta SS. ii. 82; Gall. Christ. i. 118. [R. T. S.]

GEORGIAN CHURCH, THE. [IBERIAN CHURCH.]

GEORGIUS (1), bishop of Salona (Spalato) in Dalmatia, between Joannes I. and Theodorus I. He is supposed to have suffered martyrdom in the persecution of Diocletian. (Farlati, Illyric. Sac. i. 647, et seq.) [J. de S.]

GEORGIUS (2), bishop of Prusa in Bithynia, one of the Nicene fathers, A.D. 325. (Mansi, ii. 66; Le Quien, O. C. i. 615.) [L. D.]

GEORGIUS (3), bishop of Laodicea ad mare in Syria Prima (335-347), a leading figure in the second rank in the Trinitarian controversies of the 4th century. At first an ardent admirer of the teaching of Arius, he subsequently joined the ranks of the semi-Arians, but seems ultimately, outstepping his original position, to have united with the Anomoeans, whose uncompromising opponent he had once been, and to have died professing their tenets (Newman, Arians, part ii. ch. iv. § 1, p. 275). George was a native of Alexandria. In early life he devoted himself to the study of philosophy, in which he gained considerable distinction (Philost. H. E. viii. 17). He was ordained presbyter by Alexander, bishop of Alexandria (ibid.

Euseb. Vit. Const. iii. 62). Having embraced the opinions of Arius he united himself to Eusebius of Nicomedia in his exertions to procure their recognition by the church. Having passed from Alexandria to Antioch, he endeavoured to act the part of a mediator between Arius and the Catholic body, writing at the same time to Alexander and the leading Arians, with the view of explaining away the differences that kept them asunder. In his letter to the latter he shewed how, by a sophistical evasion, based on 1 Cor. xi. 12 (τὰ δὲ πάντα ἐκ τοῦ Θεοῦ), the orthodox test word Θεὸν ἐκ Θεοῦ might be accepted by them (Socr. H. E. ii. 45; Athanas. de Synod. p. 887). Naturally, the attempt at reconciliation was a complete failure, while the result to himself was his deposition and excommunication by Alexander, both on the ground of false doctrine and also of the open and habitual irregularities of his life (Athanas. de Synod. p. 886; Apolog. ii. p. 728; De Fug. p. 718; Theod. H. E. ii. 9). Athanasius styles him "the most wicked of all the Arians," reprobated even by his own party for his grossly dissolute conduct (De Fug. 718). After his excommunication by the church at Alexandria, George endeavoured to obtain admission among the clergy of Antioch, but was steadily rejected by Eustathius (Athanas. Hist. Arian. p. 812). On this he retired to Arethusa, where he acted as presbyter; and on the expulsion of Eustathius he was welcomed back to Antioch by the dominant Arian faction. Eusebius of Caesarea having declined the see of Antioch, George was nominated as bishop in A.D. 332, together with Euphronius, on whom the choice ultimately fell, by the emperor Constantine, as "of most approved faith" (Euseb. Vit. Const. iii. 63). He was not long in attaining the episcopate, being appointed bishop of Laodicea on the death of the Arian Theodotus (Athanas. de Synod. p. 886; Or. i. p. 290; Soz. H. E. vi. 25). Athanasius states that his elevation to the episcopate was his own act (De Fug. 718). As bishop he was present and took a leading part in the successive synods summoned by the Arian faction against Athanasius. He was at the council of Tyre in 335 (Athanas. Apol. ii. p. 728), that of Jerusalem in the same year (Euseb. Vit. Const. iv. 43), and that of the dedication at Antioch in 341, at which Athanasius was deposed and Gregory appointed bishop of Alexandria (Soz. H. E. iii. 5). He is probably the George named by pope Liberius in his letter to the emperor Constantius (Hilar. Fragm. ii. 39-43; Tillemont, Mém. Ecclés. Eusèbe de Verceil, note 3). On the assembling of the council of Sardica in 347 fear kept him from joining his brother bishops, by whom he was, with many others, unanimously deposed, as having been previously condemned by Alexander, and as holding Arian opinions (Theod. H. E. iii. 9; Labbe, Concil. ii. 678; Athanas. Apolog. ii. p. 765; De Fug. p. 718). Of this deposition George took no heed, and in 358, on Eudoxius, the newly appointed bishop of Antioch, openly siding with Aetius and the Anomoeans, he wrote an earnest appeal to Macedonius of Constantinople, and the other bishops who were visiting Basil at Ancyra for the purpose of consecrating a newly-erected church, calling on them to lose no time in summoning a council to condemn the Anomoean heresy and eject Aetius, unless they desired that city to be lost to them altogether. His letter is given in full by Sozomen (H. E. iv. 13; Labbe, Concil. ii. 790). At Seleucia, in 359, when the semi-Arian party was split into two, George headed the more numerous faction opposed to that of Acacius and Eudoxius, whom, with their adherents, they deposed (Socr. H. E. ii. 40). If, as is probably the case, he is to be identified with the George named by Basil (Epist. 251 [72]) as siding with Eudoxius and Acacius in the persecution of the orthodox at Constantinople in 360, the difference was short-lived. One of the frivolous charges against Cyril of Jerusalem, on which he was deposed at this council, was his receiving George into communion after his deposition (Soz. H. E. iv. 25). During his episcopate George was brought into contact with the two Apollinarii (father and son), the younger of whom subsequently occupied the see of Laodicea, where they were both residing as teachers of rhetoric. Their intimacy with the heathen sophist Epiphanius of Petra had been the cause of their excommunication by George's predecessor Theodotus, which was continued or renewed by George himself. Another pretext for their excommunication was, according to Sozomen, that Apollinarius the younger had given a hospitable reception to Athanasius when passing through Laodicea, which had resulted in an intimate friendship. George's obstinate refusal to readmit Apollinarius to communion is unreasonably enough assigned by Socrates and Sozomen as the cause of his developing the heresy by which he has become celebrated (Socr. H. E. ii. 46; Soz. H. E. vi. 25). On the vacancy of the see of Antioch after the expulsion of Anianus, George was the chief instrument of the election of Meletius, believing him to entertain the same opinions with himself. He was speedily undeceived, for on his first entry into Antioch the emperor Constantius having desired the bishops who were present to deliver successive expositions of the crucial text—"The Lord possessed me in the beginning of His way, before His works of old" (Prov. viii. 22), after George himself had delivered an address of a strong Arian colour, and Acacius had cautiously steered a middle course between the Catholic faith and Arian heresy, Meletius startled his hearers by an unequivocal declaration of the truth as laid down at Nicaea. Indignant at being thus entrapped, George and his fellows lost no time in undoing their work by the deposition and expulsion of a bishop of such uncompromising orthodoxy (Theod. H. E. ii. 81; Philost. H. E. v. 1; Socr. H. E. ii. 44; Soz. H. E. iv. 28). George's literary activity does not appear to have been great. Gregory Nyssen mentions a letter of his relating to Arius (in Eunom. i. 28), and Socrates quotes a panegyric composed by him on the Arian Eusebius of Emesa, who was his intimate friend and resided with him at Laodicea after his expulsion from Emesa, and by whose intervention at Antioch he was restored to his see. (Socr. H. E. i. 24, ii. 9.) He was also the author of some treatises against heresy, especially that of the Manicheans. (Theod. Haer. Fab. i. 28; Photius, l. c. 85; Niceph. H. E. vi. 32.) [E. V.]

GEORGIUS (4), commonly called of Cappadocia (Athanasius, Epist. ad Episc. 7). Arian intruding bishop of Alexandria (356-361). He was born, according to Ammianus Marcellinus, at Epiphania in Cilicia (xxii. 11, 3), and, if so, must have been Cappadocian only by descent. Gregory Nazianzen describes him as not purely free-born (Orat. xxi. 16). His actual birthplace, "it was reported," was a fuller-shop (Ammian.). He began his career as a pork-contractor for the army, and, according to his Catholic adversaries, was detected in speculation, and fled. (Athan. Hist. Ari. 51, 76, comp. De Syn. 12; Greg. l. c.) He seems to have soon recovered position, and although Gregory describes him as "unlearned," he undoubtedly collected a library which Julian, no bad judge, describes as very large and ample, richly stored with philosophical, rhetorical, and historical authors of all kinds, and, not least, with various works of "Galilaean" or Christian theology (Epist. 9, 36). While Julian was in Cappadocia, George lent the future emperor several of his books to be transcribed, which were duly returned to him. This must have been between 345 and 351. He was not at the synod of Sirmium in 351 (Soc. ii. 29). In the February of 356, after Athanasius had retired from Alexandria, in consequence of the attack on his church, which all but ended in his seizure, he heard that George was to be intruded into his throne, as Gregory had been sixteen years previously. Rumour did George considerable injustice in one respect; it was reported to Athanasius that he was "not even a Christian, that he had no knowledge of the rudiments of Christianity, that he was addicted to idolatry." The coarse and tyrannous nature of the man was depicted in the words, "He has the temper of an executioner" (Ep. to Egypt. Bishops, 7). "Being ordained bishop," says Ammianus, "against his own and the public interest," he arrived in Alexandria, escorted by soldiers, during the Lent of 356 (De Fugâ, 6). The date given in the Festal Index prefixed to Athanasius's Festal Epistles, and in the Maffeiian Fragment or 'Chronicon Acephalum' appended to them, is February 24, 357; but it is altogether improbable that his installation should have been delayed for more than a year after the flight of Athanasius, and for eight months after the adherents of Gregory (meaning George), are said by the Fragmentist to have been put in possession of the churches on "Payni 21," or June 15, 356. George's installation was a signal for new inflictions on Alexandrian church-people. "After Easter week," says Athanasius, (De Fugâ, 6) "virgins were imprisoned, bishops led away in chains" (some 26 are named in Hist. Ari. 72). . . . "attacks were made on houses," &c.; and on the first Sunday evening after Pentecost a number of people who had met for prayer in a secluded place were cruelly maltreated by the commander, Sebastian, a "pitiless Manichean," for refusing to communicate with George.

The new intruding bishop—remembering the ordinary title of Alexandrian bishops, we might call him the new "anti-pope"—was a man of resolution and action (Soz. iii. 7). Gregory of Nazianzus, who disparages his abilities, admits that he was like a "hand" to the Arians, while he employed an eloquent prelate—probably Acacius—as a "tongue." He belonged to the Acacian section of the party; he was consequently obnoxious to the semi-Arians, who "deposed him" in the council of Seleucia. He even allowed the notorious adventurer Aetius, founder of the Anomoeans or ultra-Arians, to officiate as deacon at Alexandria, after having been ordained, as Athanasius tells us (De Syn. 23), by Leontius of Antioch, although he afterwards "compelled" the Arian bishops of Egypt to sign the decree of the Acacian synod of Constantinople of 360 against Aetius (Philostorgius, iii. 2). He induced Theodore, bishop of Oxyrrhynchus, first to submit to degradation from the ministry, and then to be re-ordained by him as an Arian bishop (Lab. Marcell. et Faustini, Symeon i. 135). He managed his own matters as well as to gain and keep the confidence of Constantius, who congratulated the Alexandrians on having abandoned such "grovelling teachers" as Athanasius, and entrusted their "heavenward aspirations" to the guidance of "the most venerable George," and who also exhorted the two Abyssinian sovereigns to send their bishop Frumentius (whom Athanasius had consecrated) to Alexandria, in order to be instructed by George in the true knowledge of the "Supreme God" (Ath. Apol. to Const. 30, 31). But, in fact, George was far from recommending his form of Christianity either to the orthodox or to the Pagans of Alexandria. "He was severe," says Sozomen, "to the adherents of Athanasius," not only forbidding the exercise of their worship, but "inflicting imprisonment and scourges on men and women after the fashion of a tyrant;" while, towards all alike, "he acted as if determined to strike terror, and wielded his authority with more violence than belonged to the episcopal rank and character." He was "hated by the magistrates for his supercilious and imperious demeanour, by the people for his tyranny" (Soz. ii. 10, 30). He stood well with Constantius, who was guided theologically by the Acacians, and whose ears were as "wide open" (so Ammianus phrases it) to accusations as the hands of his chamberlains were to bribes (see Greg. Orat. iii. 16). It was easy for the "pope" of Alexandria to embitter his sovereign (as Julian says he did, Ep. 10) against the Alexandrian community, to name several of its members as disobedient subjects, and to suggest that its grand public buildings ought by rights to pay tribute to the treasury (Ammianus, etc.).

Meantime, he shewed himself in the light of a grasping man of business, enriching himself by vexatious and ignoble monopolies, "buying up the nitre-works, the marshes of papyrus and reed, and the salt lakes, and even keeping in his own hands, not from humanity, but for profit," the management of funerals; so that it was not even to bury a corpse without employing those who let out biers under his direction (Epiphanius, Haer. lxxvi.). He shewed his anti-pagan zeal by arbitrary acts and insulting speeches; he procured the banishment of Zeno, a pagan physician in extensive practice (Julian, Ep. 45); he prevented the pagans from offering sacrifices and celebrating their national feasts (Soz. iv. 30); he brought Artemius, "duke" of Egypt, much given to the destruction of idols (Theodoret, iii. 18), with an armed force, into the very citadel of Alexandrian paganism, the superb temple of Serapis, which was forthwith stripped of images, votive offerings, and ornaments (Julian, l.c.; Soz. i. c.). He ought to have known the temper of that multifarious population, which had often been lashed into furious tumult by far less provocation than he recklessly gave. On the 1st day of Thot, the 29th of August, A.D. 358 ("the consulate of Tatianus and Cerealis," adds the Maffeian Fragment), the people broke into the church of St. Dionysius, where George was then residing; and it was with difficulty, and after hard fighting, that soldiers rescued him from their hands. On the 5th of Paophi, i.e. October 2, he was obliged to leave the city; and the "Athanasians" occupied the churches from October 11 to Dec. 24, when they were again ejected by Sebastian. On June 23, 358, —the year of the councils of Ariminum and Seleucia—an imperial secretary named Paul arrived with a mandate for the restoration of George, and punished many who had taken part against him. So says the Fragmentist; but his next statements involve a difficulty. He says that five months later, on the 30th of Athyr (= Nov. 26), George returned, but that this was in the year of the consuls Taurus and Florentius, which was A.D. 361, "3 years and 2 months," he adds, "after his flight:" and that this return was only "3 days" before the insurrection which proved fatal to him. There is evidently a confusion in this account. It is inconceivable that the imperial mandate should have been inoperative from June 23, 359, to November 26, 361. Probably George returned soon after he had quitted the Seleucian council, i.e. in the November of 359, and the "3 years and 2 months" represent the period between his flight and the final catastrophe. It was, perhaps, on his return at this time, if not after some previous visit to "the court," that as he passed by the splendid temple of the Genius or Fortune of Alexandria, he fixed his eyes on it with scornful hatred, and exclaimed in the hearing of the crowd that escorted him, "How long will this sepulchre stand?" (See Ammian. i. c.) This speech agrees well with the menace attributed by Ammianus to the reinstated bishop, that he would make many a man suffer for his exile. It would naturally strike "like a thunderbolt" ("velut fulmine," Ammian.) on pagan listeners, and would feed the vindictive wrath which was keeping its accounts and biding its time. That time came, not, as Ammianus thinks, after the emperor Julian had arrived at Antioch in 362, and had put to death Artemius, but as soon as the news of his accession had arrived at Alexandria, Nov. 30, 361. George was in the height of his pride and power: he had persecuted the pagans anew, and wounded them to the quick by carrying about in procession a number of skulls which had been found below the floor of a temple of Mithras, which had been granted to him by Constantius, and on the site of which he intended to build a church (Soc. iii. 2). He was also carrying on, with the assistance of a "count" named Diodorus, the still unfinished works of the great Caesarean church; and Diodorus had shorn the long curls of some boys by way of insult to paganism (Maff. Fragm., Ammian.). But now, the pagans were officially informed, there was an emperor who worshipped the gods; the gods, therefore, could at last be avenged. The shout arose, "Away with George!" and "in a moment," says the Fragmentist, they threw him into prison, and with him Diodorus, and Dracontius the master of the mint, who had overthrown a pagan altar, which he found standing there (see Ammianus). The captives were kept in irons until the morning of Chioiac 28 (Dec. 24). Then, as if "impatient," says Gibbon, "of the tedious forms of judicial proceedings," the pagan mob again assembled, dragged forth the prisoners with "horrible shouts" of triumph, beat them with fists and sticks (cf. Epiphanius, l. c.), "pulled their limbs this way and that," and utterly kicked the life out of them. As Julian, in his letter of remonstrance, expressed it, "the people actually tore a man in pieces, as if they had been dogs" (Ep. 10, see it in Soc. iii. 3). When the deed was done, they flung the mangled body of George on the back of a camel, which they led through every part of the city, while the two other corpses were drawn along with ropes. At last, at 1 P.M. they burned the remains on the shore, and cast the ashes into the sea, by way of preventing them from being honoured as martyrs' relics; the Paschal Chronicle adds that they were mingled with the carcasses of animals. Compare the Fragment with Ammianus, who adds that "the wretched men might have been defended by the Christians, had not all been equally embittered against George."

The murderers were all of them pagans, as we infer from Julian's letter: in spite of which, however, the Arian Philostorgius had the hardihood to say that the will of Athanasius was the true leader in the affair (συναρτηῖσαι τῆς πρὸς αὐτὸν, vii. 2). Some eighteen years afterwards, Gregory, preaching on the character of St. Athanasius, refers to the tragedy as well known. "You all know about that camel, and her strange burden, and the new elevation (τὸ καὶνὸν ὕψος), and the first, as I believe, and the only circuit (thus made round the city)—things even now brought up by way of menace to insolent men" (Orat. xxi. 26). George's death, says Epiphanius, would have placed him high among martyrs had he died "for the truth, for the confession of Christ." The Arians of course regarded him in this aspect: and Gibbon took an evident pleasure in representing "the renowned St. George of England," and, he might have added, the "Great Martyr" of the Eastern calendar, as the Alexandrian usurper "transformed" into a heroic soldier-saint. [GEORGIUS (43).] He adds in a note that in some of the spurious 'Acts of St. George,' still extant, we may yet distinguish the combat which St. George of Cappadocia sustained in the presence of Queen Alexandra against the magician Athanasius. He omits to say that in these Acts (which have been assigned to the 6th century, and are therefore much older than the mediaeval romance about a dragon and a princess) the Athanasius who comes forward to withstand St. George, and denounces his belief in a "crucified God," is converted by his miraculous powers, confesses Christ as "God Almighty," and is beheaded for his new faith (Acta SS. April, iii. 120, and app. p. xii.). However, this may have been a Catholic emendation of that "Passio" which pope Gelasius, at the end of the 5th century, reprobated in his famous decree, as "forged by heretics." But his words, as Gibbon admits, clearly suppose the existence of a true martyr named George, "known rather to God than to men" (Mansi, viii. 163). Bishop Milner, in his Historical

Inquiry into the Existence and Character of St. George (1792), shews that the saint was honoured in Gaul throughout the 6th century, and that an Asiatic church of St. George, known to have existed early in that century, was probably then ancient. "No supposition," he thinks, "is more natural than . . . that certain Arians, by corrupting the history of a celebrated orthodox martyr of the name of George, and artfully blending with it certain remote allusions to their champion of the same name, should endeavour to invest the latter with rays stolen from the former. Had not the name of George been previously borne by some favourite orthodox saint, the conduct of the Arian George would evidently have made it as odious in the church as that of Arius himself" (Inquiry, p. 50). Of the details of that saint's life and death, of his native country, of his date, we have no certain information. But that he existed at some time prior to that of his Alexandrian namesake has been the constant tradition of the Eastern Church; and Constantine is said to have founded the church that stood over his reputed grave near Lydda. The Chronicon Paschale, which mentions the murder of George of Alexandria, dates the martyr, whom it connects with St. Babylas, 259 years after the Ascension (i. 510, 546). Compare Geo. Cedrenus, i. 464, 523; but he dates St. George in the Diocletian persecution, and the Bollandists think he may have been the nameless Christian who, according to Eusebius, tore down the first edict of persecution (Eus. viii. 5). See also Baring-Gould, Lives of the Saints, April 23, on the inscription found by Burckhardt in a ruined church of St. George, referring its later portions to A.D. 365 or 367; and on another in a ruined church at Ezra in Syria, belonging to A.D. 346, and styling George a holy martyr. [W. B.]

GEORGIUS (5), an infamous favourite of a powerful lady at Doara in Cappadocia, whom she procured to be elevated to the bishopric of Doara, circ. 375. (Basil, Epist. 239 [10]; Le Quien, O. C. i. 417.) [E. V.]

GEORGIUS (6), the first bishop of Anicium (Le Puy) at some period before the 5th century. The legend is that he was sent from Rome by St. Peter in company with St. Fronto, and that he first exercised his ministry at Vetula in Vellay. The see of the diocese of Le Puy was originally at Vetula. This bishop was commemorated on Nov. 10. [EVODIUS (2).] (Tillemont, Mém. iv. 502; Gall. Christ. ii. 687.) [C. H.]

GEORGIUS (7), bishop of Pelusium. He is mentioned in the life of St. Saba written by Cyrillus Scythopolitanus (ap. Cotelier, Monach. Eccles. Græc. iii. 220 sq.), as having been consecrated by Zoilus of Alexandria. This fixes the period of his episcopate between A.D. 538 and 551, in which latter year Zoilus was deposed. (Le Quien, Or. Christ. ii. 534.) [J. de S.]

GEORGIUS (8), the name of four bishops attending the council of Constantinople in 553, their respective sees being—

Tiberias (Mansi, ix. 173 b, 191 c, 193 b, 202 c, 230 b, 297 d, 346 d, 368 a, 389 a) in Palestine (Le Quien, Or. Christ. iii. 708)

Ptolemais (Mansi, ix. 176 b, 392 c), but whether Ptolemais in Phoenicia, i.e. Acre, or Ptolemais Cyrenalca, Le Quien is uncertain, and places the bishop under both sees (O. C. ii. 621, 816);

Justinianopolis in Armenia (Mansi, ix. 192 d, called Gregorius at pp. 175 c, 391 d; O. C. i. 435);

Nova Justiniana Cypselitanorum (Mansi, ix. 175 c, 192 d, 391 c), the same as Cypselus on the Hebrus in Thrace (O. C. i. 1203). [J. de S.]

GEORGIUS (9), bishop of Pessinus in Galatia, and metropolitan, cir. A.D. 600. Pessinus was suffering from drought, and Theodorus Siceota, bishop of Anastasiopolis in the same province, was invited by George and the people to come and unite with them in a solemn supplication. From the church of St. Sophia the assembled citizens made a procession headed by the two prelates to the church of the Holy Angels beyond the walls, and on their return Theodorus celebrated the sacrament at St. Sophia's, when rain fell in torrents. (Vis. Theodori, cap. xi. § 49, in Boll. Acta SS. 22 Apr. iii. 52; Le Quien, Græc. Christ. i. 491.) [C. H.]

GEORGIUS (10) L, said to have been ninth bishop of Carpentras, between Odofridus and Petrus I. at the beginning of the 7th century. (Le Cointe, Ann. Eccl. Franc. an. 604 n. viii. tom. ii. 563; Gall. Christ. i. 897.) [S. A. B.]

GEORGIUS (11) II., patriarch of Alexandria, between Joannes Eleemosynarius and Cyrus. In the chronological table (rejected by Henschen, vid. Acta SS. Boll. Mart. iii. p. xxv. and Patrol. Gr. cviii. 1165) which accompanies the text of Theophanes, George's first year is placed under A.C. 611 (the Alexandrian system being employed), and the first year of his successor under A.C. 625, fourteen years being thus assigned to his patriarchate; but the text, omitting to notice the commencement, places its close in A.C. 621 (Theoph. Chronog. in Pat. Gr. cviii. 634, 679 B, 590). Nicephorus Patriarcha (Chronog. Brev. in Pat. Gr. c. 1054) gives him eleven years, but without dates. The annals (not very trustworthy) of Eutychius of Alexandria (pt. 2, p. 267) state that George began his rule in the thirteenth year of Heraclius (i.e. A.D. 622), and the first of the calif Omar, and that after four years, when the Moslem armies had overrun Palestine and were advancing on Egypt, he set sail for Constantinople and was succeeded by Cyrus. In another passage, however, this ecclialist places the retirement of George in the third year of Omar (Pat. Gr. cxi. 1095, 1122). Nearly all modern writers agree in making him die in 630 (as Baronius, Pagi, Le Quien, Clinton); but Clinton, believing there is authority for the fourteen years, dates his accession in 616, as does Guérin. Le Quien thinks there must have been some interregnum after John, owing to the deplorable condition of Alexandrian affairs, and he does not therefore date the accession. (Le Quien, Or. Chr. ii. 447; Baron. A. E. ann. 620, x. 630 tom. iii. and Pagi iii.; Clinton, F. R. ii. 547.) Baronius conjectures that George may have been the relative of his predecessor mentioned by Leontius; but Pagi remarks that Leontius makes the relative too young for a patriarch.

CHRON. BIOGR.—VOL. II.

Photius (cod. 96) describes at great length a life of Chrysostom, entitled τὰ περὶ τὸν Χρυσόστομον, written by a George bishop of Alexandria, whom he is unable to identify. He calls the style poor, and says the matter is culled from Palladius, Socrates, and others; concluding with the observation that the author appears οὐκ ὀλίγα παριστοπῶν, Schott taking this participle to mean "praeter historiae fidem narrare," but Lambecius limiting it to "tradere obiter." By general modern consent the writer is this patriarch. The life itself is extant in more than one manuscript; that in the imperial library of Vienna is described by Lambecius (Biblioth. Caesar. Vindob. t. viii. p. 578, num. 13, ed. Kollar). In 1557 a Latin version of it, by Godfridus Tilmannus, was published at Paris (Fabr. Bibl. Gr. viii. 457, ed. Harles) and may be seen in Surius (de Prob. Hist. SS. 27 Jan. i. 474). The Greek was edited, 1612, by Henry Savile in his edition of Chrysostom's works (vol. viii. p. 157). The editions of Chrysostom's works by Migne and Montfaucon omit the life by George. Leo Allatius remarks (De Georgiis, in Fabr. xii. 16) that Cyril of Alexandria, Theodoret, and John Moschus, in addition to Socrates and Palladius, are laid under contribution by George. Savile criticizes the life in the form of an "Admonitio" (printed in Pat. Gr. xlvii. p. xxv.). David Blondel in a searching chapter of his De la Primauté en l'Eglise, 1641, produces (pp. 1229 sqq.) numerous instances of George's corrupt copying of his predecessors besides a long list of his inventions. The reader may also consult Cave (Hist. Lit. i. 577), and especially Oudin (de Script. Eccl. i. 1599 sqq.), who gives an elaborate statement of the reasons which led him to attribute the Chronicon Paschale to this author. [C. H.]

GEORGIUS (12) L, patriarch of Antioch during the Saracen domination, residing at Constantinople. The chronology is very uncertain. Eutychius of Alexandria (Annal. pt. 2, pp. 323, 324, 348, in Patr. Gr. cxi. 1108 c, 1114 c) states that he was a Maronite, i.e. a Monothelite; that he succeeded Macedonius in the third year of the Calif Othman, i.e. in A.D. 645 or 646, and was appointed at Constantinople, where five years afterwards he died and was buried, having never visited Antioch; that he was succeeded by Macarius; and that he was anathematized with Macedonius and Macarius in the sixth general council, 680. In Pococke's Latin translation of Eutychius he is called Jarius and Chazjus. Constantius, in Neale's Patriarchs of Antioch (p. 167), gives him fifteen years, from A.D. 640. Le Quien (Or. Chr. ii. 741) places his appointment in 655. [C. H.]

GEORGIUS (13), seventh bishop of Agde, between Tigridius and Wilesindus, present at the eighth council of Toledo in A.D. 653. Some have identified him with St. Georgius archbishop of Vienne, but apparently without sufficient reason. (Mansi, x. 1222; Gall. Christ. vi. 668; xvi. 33.) [S. A. B.]

GEORGIUS (14), bishop of Syracuse, who received a letter from pope Vitalian in 668. (Mansi, xi. 19; Jaffé, Regest. Pont. 165.)

[A. H. D. A.]

GEORGIUS (15), bishop of Catania, present at the Roman synod, held under pope Agatho, in Oct. 679. (Hefele, § 290; Mansi, xi. 179.)

[A. H. D. A.]

GEORGIUS (16), patriarch of the Nestorians, a disciple of Jesujab, whom he succeeded, A.D. 660. When a young man he gave Beth-haba, his inheritance, to the monastery there established, and thus attracted the notice of Jesujab, then bishop of Nineveh, whom he afterwards accompanied to Adiabene. Jesujab, on becoming patriarch, appointed Georgius his successor in the latter see, and finally recommended him to the bishops as his successor in the patriarchate. Georgius bishop of Nisibis at first would not recognise the new patriarch; but when the latter visited him in his own city, the indignation of his flock compelled submission. Scarcely had the patriarch returned when Georgius bishop of Mesene [GEORGIUS (21)] rebelled against him. This necessitated another journey. The quarrel was adjusted by the good help of Raban Codahua, abbat of Beth-halé. After this the patriarch restored order among the Catarenses (Beth-qatorye), and then went home to his monastery. The literary labours of Ananjesu were undertaken at his request. He died at Hirta, after an episcopate of twenty years. Thomas Margensis eulogizes a poem by George, which begins Deus qui a saeculo est, qui in sempiternum bonus est, neque ex sua bonitate mutatur. His other works consisted of some orations, nineteen canons extant in an Arabic version, and a litany, translated by Schönfelder. (Assem. Bib. Or. iii. i. 149-153; Le Quien, Or. Chr. ii. 1123.)

[C. J. B.]

GEORGIUS (17), bishop of Nisibis, a Persian, contemporary with and an opponent of George patriarch of the Nestorians, and like him ordained by Jesujab. [GEORGIUS (16).] He was author of the hymn, "Praise to thy pity, Messiah our king, Son of God," &c. used in the Nestorian and Maronite offices. (Assem. Biblioth. Orient. iii. 1, 456.)

[C. J. B.]

GEORGIUS (18) II., patriarch of Antioch in the period of the Saracen domination between Thomas and Stephen III. He is frequently mentioned at the council of Constantinople in 680, being described as presbyter and monk, the apocrisiarius and representative of the bishop of Jerusalem (Mansi, xi. 211 c, 549 e, &c.). At the Trullan or Quinisext council of Constantinople, A.D. 692, his title is bishop of Antioch (Mansi, xi. 988 c). Eutychius of Alexandria (Annal. pt. 2, p. 365, in Patr. Gr. cxi. 1118) places his accession in the first year of the Calif Abdulmalech (i.e. A.D. 685), and assigns twenty-four years to his episcopate; Constantius, in Neale's Patriarchs of Antioch (p. 167), only five, from 690 to 695. (Le Quien, Or. Chr. ii. 743.)

[C. H.]

GEORGIUS (19) I., 44th bishop of Constantinople, patriarch and metropolitan for six years (678-683) during the interrupted episcopate of Theodorus I., and in the reign of the emperor Constantine III. Pogonatus. At the time of his elevation he was chancellor and treasurer of the church of the Deipara in the district Sphoracium. His patriarchate was remarkable for the 6th General Council, held at Constantinople in 680. Of the council an account is given in the Dictionary of Christian Antiquities. It remains here to point out the part taken by George, who was at this time a Monothelite. The first occurrence, Nov. 7, 680, was an appeal by the Roman legates to George and Macarius to account for the origin of certain novel expressions concerning the nature of Christ, which for forty-six years since the days of the patriarch Sergius had been troubling the churches. George and Macarius replied that they had learned these phrases from the oecumenical councils, from recognised fathers, and particularly from Sergius, Paul, Pyrrhus, and Peter who had in succession filled the chair of Constantinople, from pope Honorius, and from Cyrus of Alexandria. The emperor then allowed them to demonstrate their position, provided they adduced proofs only from general councils and recognised fathers. On this, Macarius asked the prince to order the warden of the charters of the church of Constantinople to bring the books of the councils from the Patriarchal Palace. The rest of the day was spent in reading the acts of Ephesus.

In the 7th session, Feb. 13, 681, the Roman legates begged Constantine to ask the patriarchs George and Macarius whether they agreed with the letters sent by pope Agatho and his council. The patriarchs asked for copies of them, that they might verify the quotations at leisure. The originals were carefully sealed up.

In the 8th session, March 7, came the recantation of George. He admitted that the quotations were genuine, and declared his agreement with Agatho. On this, bishop after bishop of his patriarchate came forward and made the same announcement. The patriarch then requested that the name of pope Vitalian should be replaced in the diptychs, and the assembly endorsed this ratification of peace.

In the 16th session, August 9, George made a request, which was supported by the bishops of his province, that the names of his four predecessors, Sergius, Pyrrhus, Paul, and Peter, should be excepted from the anathemas pronounced against the Monothelite leaders. But the council refusing to see any grounds for their exculpation, George declared that he yielded to the opinion of the majority, and anathemas were pronounced afresh on the four patriarchs of Constantinople, on Theodore of Pharan, Cyrus of Alexandria, Honorius of Rome, Macarius of Antioch, and all heretics.

In the 17th session, September 11, the declaration of faith was determined, and was read aloud by Agatho, reader and notary of the patriarch George. It declared for two natural wills and two operations in Jesus Christ. George signed after the signature of the Roman legates. The proceedings terminated with the composition of a synodal letter to pope Agatho. Before, however, the legates departed for Rome, news arrived of the pope's death, which took place in Jan. 682.

Nothing more is known of George, except that the see of Constantinople was vacant in 683, and that Theodore returned. George is commemorated as a saint by the Greeks on August 18th. (Theoph. Chronogr. §§ 300, 301, Patr. Graec. cviii. 723, 733, &c.; Pope Paul V.'s Concil. General. iii. 8, &c.; Bede, de Temp. Ratone, Patr. Lat. xc. p. 568; Pauze Diaconus, de

GEORGIUS (20), bishop of Tauranium or Taurianum (formerly a town of the Bruttii in Calabria, near the mouth of the Metaurus). He signed the synodal of Agatho at Rome in 680 (Mansi, xi. 302). [C. H.]

GEORGIUS (21), bishop and metropolitan of Mesene, a district of Mesopotamia at the junction of the Tigris and Euphrates represented by Bassora, cir. 650 (Le Quien, Or. Chr. ii. 1209). He was one of the monks and disciples of Jesujab III., created metropolitan by that patriarch on account of the wide extent of his jurisdiction (Thomas Margensis in Assemani, Bibl. Or. iii. 151). The opposition he offered to Jesujab's successor (ib. 152) is mentioned under GEORGIUS (16). [C. H.]

GEORGIUS (22), bishop of Agrigentum, who signed the synodal of Agatho at Rome in 680 (Mansi, xi. 306). Georgius is the reading of all the manuscripts, and there is no authority for Gregorius given by Baronius in the notes of his Roman Martyrology, and copied from him by others. See GREGORIUS (35) of Agrigentum. [C. H.]

GEORGIUS (23), the name of other bishops present at the councils of Constantinople in 680 and 692 (Trullan or Quinisext), one or both, viz. the bishops of—Abramiasus in Armenia, 692 (Mansi, xi. 1000 a; Arabiasus, Le Quien, Or. Ch. i. 450).

GEORGIUS (24), ST., thirty-seventh bishop of Vienne, between St. Bobolinus I. and St. Deodatus. He is mentioned in the Chronicon of Ado as a bishop of great virtue (Migne, Patr. Lat. cxiii. 117 d). There is some uncertainty as to his date. The authors of the Gallia Christiana (xvi. 33) quote an index to the effect that he died Nov. 2, 699, and was buried in the church of St. Peter, while the Necrologium of Vienne makes him contemporary with the emperor Anastasius II., who did not reign till A.D. 713. In Gams's list again he is placed earlier than either of these dates (p. 654). If he was identical with Georgius bishop of Agde, as has been conjectured, though without good ground, the earliest of the dates is the most probable.

GEORGIUS (25), bishop of "the Arabs," or of "Nations" (Syr. 'amms), according to Barhebraeus (Lib. Ethic. 4) a contemporary of Jacobus of Edessa and John of Damascus, cir. 710. (From Barhebr. Chron. we learn that these Arabs were Monophysites, who at last became Moslems, owing to the persecutions of the Eastern emperors.) Syrian writers ascribe many works to this Georgius. Assemani mentions two, viz. a commentary on the Scriptures, much quoted by Barhebraeus in his Store house of M. steries, and a dodecasyllabic poem, in twenty-four sections, called De Chronico (Syr. metul Kruniqon). It is a kind of sacred calendar, treating of the epact, the moveable feasts, the solar and lunar cycles, the months, and weeks, and other matters relating to the ecclesiastical reckoning. The poem was written, as the writer himself tells us, to vindicate the honour of the Syriac as against the Arabic muse. (Assem. Biblioth. Or. i. 494–5). Other works: an epistle to one Joshua, published in Lagarde's Analect.; and a Syriac version of Arist. περί ἐρμηνείας, Hoffm. de Hermeneuticis apud Syros Aristoteleis, Lips. 1869. [C. J. B.]

GEORGIUS (26), bishop of Sarug, identified by Matagne (Études Relig. Hist. et Lit. p. 151) with Georgius bishop of the Arabs. [GEORGIUS (25).] A letter by Mar Jacobus of Edessa on Syriac orthography, addressed to this Georgius, has been edited by Dr. Phillips (London, 1869), and by J. P. Martin (Jacobi episcopi Edess. epist. ad Georg. Sarug.: Paris, 1869). [C. J. B.]

GEORGIUS (27), bishop of Martyropolis (Maipheracta), in the province of Mesopotamia, on the river Nymphius, a tributary of the Tigris. This bishop originally presided over the see of Apamea, and was translated to Martyropolis by the emperor Philippicus in the first year of his reign, A.D. 711 (Theophanis Chronogr. A.M. 6204). He adhered to the orthodox faith according to the decisions of the council of Chalcedon, in behalf of which he wrote works that are quoted in the extant apologetic letter of Elias, a Jacobite bishop. He seems to have also been bishop of Tacritum, a town identified by Assemani with Martyropolis, but probably a separate bishopric lower down in Mesopotamia. Assemani wrongly assigns Georgius to the end of the 6th century. (Bibl. Orient. i. 465; Le Quien, O. C. ii. 1000.) [L. D.]

GEORGIUS (28), bishop of Portus. In Oct. 709, he followed pope Constantine in his journey to Constantinople, with Nicetas bishop of Silva Candida. (Vita Constantini in Liber Pontificalis, Migne, cxxviii. 949; Jaffé, Regest. Pont. 173.) In 721 he was present at the Roman council under Gregory II. (Mansi, xii. 265). [A. H. D. A.]

GEORGIUS (29), bishop of Nepi, present at the Roman synod under Gregory II., in 721. (Mansi, xii. 265; Hefele, § 330.) [A. H. D. A.]

GEORGIUS (30), archbishop of Salamis, the metropolis of Cyprus, a strong upholder of image worship, and consequently anathematized by name along with Germanus who had resigned the see of Constantinople, and John of Damascus, at the synod held (see Mansi, xii. 575) by Constantine Copronymus, A.D. 754, as recited in the sixth session of the second Nicene council, when this anathema was removed. He is here described as a meek man who endured the blows and insults of the heretics without retort. [GREGORIUS (44).] (Mansi, xiii. 356–7; Le Quien, O. C. ii. 1051.) [L. D.]

GEORGIUS (31), bishop of Sinigaglia (Senogallia), present at the Lateran synod under Stephen IV. in 769. (Mansi, xii. 715.) [A. H. D. A.]

GEORGIUS (32), bishop of Praeneste, who ordained the intruding pope Constantine subdeacon and deacon, June 28, 767. On the following 5th July, with Eustratius bishop of Alba and Ciconatus bishop of Porto, he consecrated Constantine pope. (Vita Stephani, iv. Liber Pontificalis, Migne, cxxviii. 1150; Jaffé, Regest. Pont. 198.) He also subscribed a letter of pope Paul I. in June 761, to the abbat John, about the privileges of the monastery of St. Stephen and St. Silvester in Rome. He is there called Gregory. (Pat. Lat. lxxxix. 1194; Mansi, xii. 649; Jaffé, 195.) [A. H. D. A.]

GEORGIUS (33), bishop of Ostia, who took part in important missions by the popes in the second half of the 8th century. In 756 he was sent by Stephen III. to Pippin with letters concerning the disasters inflicted by the Lombards (Cod. Carol. Jaffé, p. 47, 54). In 757, after the death of Aistulph, he was sent again to Pippin by Stephen III., and in 758 or 759 by Paul I. In 759 or 760 Georgius was commended by the pope to Pippin, and apparently remained for some time at Pippin's court. In 764 Paul wrote, specially permitting Pippin to retain him. In 767 pope Constantine II. wrote to Pippin, asking him to send Georgius back to Rome. (Cod. Carol. Jaffé, pp. 66, 77, 82, 84, 132.)

In 769 his name appears among the signatures to the Lateran synod concerning the election of popes and image-worship. (Mansi, xii. 714; Hefele, § 343.)

In 787 (according to Jaffé, Mon. Alc. p. 155, &c., in 786), Georgius (wrongly called Gregory by Spelman and others) wrote to pope Hadrian announcing what he had done, together with Theophylact bishop of Todi and the abbat Wighod, a legate of Charles the Great, during his mission to England.

Georgius landed in England in 786. He went first to the court of Offa, then to the court of Northumbria, where a synod was held (probably that of Pincanhale). He returned to Offa, where a synod of southern bishops was held, probably that of Chelsea (Haddan and Stubbs, Councils and Documents, vol. iii. p. 443, p. 445 note, and Legatine synods p. 447–462; also Jaffé, Monumenta Alcuina, p. 155–162). The acts of the southern synod are to be found in the letter of George, which appears to be incomplete. They are also alluded to in a later letter of pope Leo III. ann. 797 to Kenulf king of the Mercians. (Jaffé, Monum. Alc. p. 365.) [A. H. D. A.]

GEORGIUS (34), bishop of Antioch in Pisidia. He took part in the second Nicene council, which restored image-worship, A.D. 787 (Mansi, xiii. 137). When Leo V. (the Armenian) made a fresh attempt to crush out this form of worship in the East, Georgius refused to comply with his orders, and was driven into exile, where he died, c. A.D. 814. He is commemorated by the Greeks on April 18. (Le Quien, O. C. i. 1039; Basil. Mena in Migne, Patrol. Graec. cxvii.) [L. D.]

GEORGIUS (35), bishop of Trimuthus in Cyprus, taking part in the proceedings of the 7th general (second Nicene) council, A.D. 787. (Mansi, xiii. 144; Le Quien, O. C. ii. 1072.) [L. D.]

GEORGIUS (36), given by Ughelli as the first bishop of Vigilia (Veglia or Biseglia), and believed to have been Sergius bishop of Megyia, otherwise Bargyia. He attended the second council of Nicaea, A.D. 787. A Sergius is spoken of as having suffered martyrdom at Biseglia, but he does not appear to have been its bishop. (Mansi, xii. 1105 c, xiii. 147 b; Ughelli, Ital. Sacr. vii. 938; Sarnelli, Vesc. di Biseglia, p. 12.) [R. S. G.]

GEORGIUS (37), the name of several other bishops attending the council of Nicea in 787, viz. of—

Antioch in Pisidia (Mansi, xiii. 137 a, Gregorius in the Latin; Le Quien, Or. Chr. i. 1039).

Appia in Phrygia Pacatiana (M. xii. 1107 a, xiii. 148 c; O. C. i. 626).

Basilinopolis in Bithynia (M. xii. 1003 a; O. C. i. 626). [GREGORIUS (48).]

Briula or Priulla in Asia (M. xii. 1098 b, xiii. 141 c; O. C. i. 704).

Camuliana in Cappadocia Prima (M. xii. 1098 a; O. C. i. 393).

Gordus in Lydia (M. xii. 1102 d; O. C. i. 882). [GREGORIUS (48).]

Gibyra in Caria, not Libyra as M. xii. 1105 b, Latin; vide Gregorius (47) of Gibyra.

Midacum in Phrygia Salutaris (M. xii. 1107 b; O. C. i. 842).

Nissa or Nessa in Lycia (M. xiii. 145 e, not Gregorius as in the Latin at xii. 1103 e; O. C. i. 987). He is the only known bishop of this city.

Oenoanda in Lycia (M. xiii. 148 a, not Gregorius as in the Latin at xii. 1105 a; O. C. i. 990).

Peltae or Felti in Phrygia Pacatiana (M. xii. 1106 d, xiii. 148 c; O. C. i. 802).

Plotinopolis in Thrace (M. 1110 c, xiii. 149 b; O. C. i. 1186).

Thermae Basilicae in Sicily (M. xiii. 141 c; Pirri, Sicil. Sacr. i. 494).

[C. H.]

GEORGIUS (38) I., patriarch of Armenia (732-795) between Solomon and Joseph II. He was of the town of Aschdarag in the canton of Ankadzodn (Saint-Martin, Mém. sur l'Arm. i. 429; Le Quien, O. C. i. 1393). [C. H.]

GEORGIUS (39) (GREGORIUS, SERGIUS), patriarch of Jerusalem at the close of the 8th century and the commencement of the ninth. He had been the syncellus of his predecessor Eus (Vit. S. Steph. Sabait. in Boll. Act. Sanct. Jul. iii. 551 E). He appears to have been the patriarch who sent a monk to Charlemagne with relics from Palestine, A.D. 799. The king received the monk kindly and sent him back accompanied by Zacharias a presbyter of his court, carrying alms to Georgius for distribution in his patriarchate. On the return of Zacharias, Georgius sent with him two monks who carried the keys of the Holy Sepulchre and of "Calvary" to Charlemagne, "causa benedictionis" (Ann. Franc. ap. Du Chesne, Script. Franc. ii. 18, 41; Vit. Car. Magn. ib. 39, 79; Poet. Saxon. de Gest. Car. Magn. ib. 164; Eginhard. Annal. ib. 250, 251). Georgius is said to have occupied the patriarchate thirty-six years (Eutyck. Alex. Patr. Annal. in Migne, Patrol. Gr. cxi. 1125; Papebroch. Patriarch. Hierosol. in Boll. Acta SS. Mai. iii. Introd. p. xl.; Le Quien, Or. Chr. iii. 317). Baronius is mistaken in saying that the patriarch of Jerusalem, A.D. 795, was named Joannes (s.a. lxiv. Pagi, Crit. s.a. vii.; Le Quien, u.s.). [T. W. D.]

GEORGIUS (40), bishop of Amastris (Sesamus), on the coast of Paphlagonia, in the reign of Constantine VI. and Irene, and under the patriarchates of Tarasius and Nicephorus. His parents, Theodorus and Megetho, had been long childless before his birth, residing at Chromna near Amastris, where he was born. For some time he led a solitary life in a cave at the foot of a mountain called Agriosericia, and afterwards took up his abode in a monastery named Bonyssa, till, by the desire of the people of Amastris, he was almost forced away by Tarasius, patriarch of Constantinople, and consecrated their bishop, although Constantine VI. (c. A.D. 797) had fixed on some one else. When he had experienced some ill-treatment from his metropolitan of Gangra, he managed to have his see elevated to the rank of an archbishopric, so as to be subject only to the patriarchal throne of Constantinople. (Le Quien, O. C. i. 563.) He was a man of great sanctity of life, and was revered as a saint by the Greeks and Latins on Feb. 21 (Acta SS. Feb. iii. 268). Le Quien makes him follow Gregorius, who attended the council of Constantinople in 787, and suspects that they are both the same person. [GREGORIUS (48).] [L. D.]

GEORGIUS (41), (GREGORIUS), 20th bishop of Amiens, between Vitulfus and Jesse. He was one of the bishops who consecrated the churches of St. Saviour and St. Benedict in the monastery of St. Riquier (Centulense) in A.D. 798, and also thirteen altars in the church of St. Mary in the same year. (Vita S. Angilberti, cap. ii. Boll. Acta SS. Feb. iii. 99.) Some chronicles edited by Joseph Scaliger, after the chronicle of Eusebius, are attributed to him. (Gall. Christ. x. 1157.) [S. A. B.]

GEORGIUS (42), an obscure bishop of Mitylene in Lesbos (called "Episc. Melitenus," by Baronius, Annal. a. 735, iii., Pagi ii.). He is treated by the Bollandists (Acta SS. 7 Apr. i. 668-69), but there is much doubt as to his period and acts. According to Basil's Mnologium, April 7 and May 16, he was born of wealthy and pious parents, and his great virtue was in almsgiving. He was elected bishop of Mitylene, and is said to have been a great opponent of the Iconoclasts in the time of Leo III. the Isaurian (A.D. 717-41). But he is also said to have lived in the time of Leo V. the Armenian (A.D. 813-20), and the solution by Papebrochius, that his life may have extended to the times of both emperors, is impossible. [J. G.]

GEORGIUS (43), martyr, Ap. 23 (variously called Μεγαλομάρτυς, Bas. Men.; Τροπαιοφόρος. Sym. Metaph.; Ταξιδάρχης, Καλλίνικος, Böckh; by the Arabs, Abd Maaz; by the Turks, El Khoudan, Burckhardt; traditionally the patron saint of England), a military tribune and martyr under Diocletian at Nicomedia, A.D. 303.

He was a native of Cappadocia and of good birth, and akin to St. Nina the woman by whom the Iberians were converted in the reign of Constantine (Malan, Hist. of the Georgian Church, p. 32; Socr. i. 20). He entered the army as a centurion, and rose to be a military tribune. Some time before the outbreak of the great persecution, he accompanied his mother to Lydda, in Palestine, where she possessed property. As soon, however, as he heard of the publication of the first edict (Feb. 23, A.D. 303), he returned to Nicomedia, where, as some think, he was the celebrated person who tore down the imperial proclamation, and then suffered death by roasting over a slow fire (Euseb. H. E. viii. 5). [DIOCLETIAN.] They lay stress on a very doubtful argument, derived from his natalis, and suppose that the edict having been published on Good Friday, which fell that year on April 16, his trial, prolonged torture, and slow death filled up the time to April 23, which, as J. Assemani says (Kal. Eccles. Univ. t. vi. p. 284), has been unanimously fixed by all churches as the day of his martyrdom. But then, unfortunately for this argument, Lactantius tells us (De Mort. Persecut. xii. xiii.) that the edict which was torn down by the nameless Christian was published on Feb. 24 (cf., however, Acta SS. Boll. April. iii. 107, for a full statement of the argument. The Greeks on the contrary ascribe the destruction of the edict to a martyr named John). The earliest historical testimony to the existence and martyrdom of St. George comes from an inscription in a church at Ezer'a or Edhr'a, in Southern Syria, copied by Burckhardt and Porter, and discussed by Mr. Hogg in two papers read before the Royal Society of Literature, published in their Transactions, t. vi. p. 292, t. vii. p. 106. This inscription states that the building had been a heathen temple, but was dedicated as a church in honour of the great martyr St. George, in a year which Hogg, by an acute argument, fixes as A.D. 346. (For another view, however, which assigns the inscription to A.D. 499, see Böckh's Corp. Inscript. Graec. ed. Kirchhoff, t. iv. num. 8627.) His name occurs again in another inscription in the church of Shaka, twenty miles east of Ezer'a, which Hogg dates at A.D. 367. (Böckh. l. c. num. 8609, cf. 8630; for other instances of transformations of heathen temples into churches and hospitals in the 4th and 5th cent., see Böckh, l. c. 8645, 8647.) We next meet with St. George in the decrees of the council assembled at Rome by pope Gelasius, A.D. 494 or 496 (Hefele, Concil. i. 610, iii. 219, ed. Paris, 1869). This synod condemned the acts of St. George, together with those of Cyricus and Julitta, as corrupted by heretica, but expressly asserted that the saints themselves were real martyrs, and as such worthy of all reverence. (Cf. Pitra, Spicileg. Solesmen. iv. 391, for a repetition, three centuries later in the East, of this condemnation by the patriarch Nicephorus, in his Constitut. Ecclesiast.) After the period of Gelasius, the testimonies to his existence rapidly thicken, but decrease in value. Gregory of Tours in the 6th century mentions him as highly celebrated in France, while in the East his cultus became universally established (cf. Fleury, H. E. xxxiv. 46), and churches were erected in all directions in his honour, one of the most celebrated being that built probably by Justinian over his tomb at Lydda, whither his relics had been transferred after his martyrdom. This church still exists. (For an engraving of it, see Thomson's The Land and the Book, ii. 292; cf. Robinson's Biblical Researches, iii. 51-55, with Le Quien, Oriens Christian. iii. 1271, for full particulars of St. George's connexion with Lydda.) Another famous one is that of Thessalonica described in Texier and Pullan, Byzantine Architecture, pp. 132-142, where strong reasons are presented for assigning its erection to Constantine (cf. Procopius, de Aedif. iii. 4, ed. Boan).

(2) The Mediaeval Legends.—The condemnation of the acts of St. George by Gelasius gives us the clue to the source whence the legendary stories connected with him sprang. The Arians of the 5th century displayed great literary activity, availing themselves of every channel for diffusing their opinions. (Mai, Nov. Coll. t. iii. par. ii. pp. 238, 239.) They seem to have corrupted his acts for their own purposes. Their story is that he was arrested by Datianus, emperor, according to some, of Rome, according to others, of Persia, by whom he was in vain ordered to sacrifice to Apollo. He was then confronted with the magician Athanasius, who undertook to confound the saint. After various attempts the magician was converted and baptized, as well as the queen Alexandra. After many miracles and various tortures, St. George was beheaded. It is a strange fact that, notwithstanding the decrees of Rome and Constantinople, this Arian corruption became the basis of all the subsequent legends, and even found its way into the hymns of St. John Damascene in honour of St. George (Mai, Spicileg. Rom. t. ix. p. 729; Ceillier, xii. 89). The addition of a horse and a dragon to the story arose out of the imaginations of mediaeval writers improving upon the allegorical ideas of earlier times. The dragon evidently represents the devil, and was suggested by St. George's triumph over him at his martyrdom. A glance at Eusebius, Vita Constant. iii. 3, where we find the description of the picture in the imperial palace of Constantine triumphing over a dragon, will explain this. Accordingly we find that when the race of the Bagratides ascended the throne of Georgia at the end of the 6th century, they adopted St. George slaying the Dragon as their arms, in addition to other Scriptural and Christian subjects, David's sling and harp, Our Lord's coat, &c. (Malan, l. c. p. 15, 29). [GURAM.] The horse was added during the Frankish occupation of Constantinople as suitable, according to mediaeval ideas, to his rank and character as a military martyr. St. George was depicted on a horse as early as 1227, according to Nicephorus Gregoras (Hist. Byzant. viii. 5), where will be found a curious story concerning a picture in the imperial palace at Constantinople, of St. George mounted upon a horse, which was accustomed to neigh in the most violent style whenever an enemy was about to make a successful assault upon the city. The earliest trace we can now find of the full-grown legend of St. George and the dragon, and the king's daughter Sabra, whom he delivered, is in the Historia Lombardica, popularly called the Golden Legend, of Jacobus de Voragine, archbishop of Genoa, A.D. 1280, and in the breviary service for St. George's day, till revised by Pope Clement VIII. Thence it became the foundation of the story as old in Johnson's Historia of the Seven Champions of Christendom, and the old ballad of St. George and the Dragon, reprinted in the third volume of Percy's Reliques, many features of which Spenser reproduces in his Faery Queen. Busbecq in the 16th century found in the heart of Asia Minor a legend of the Turkish hero Chederles to whom were ascribed exploits similar to those of St. George (ep. 1, pp. 93, 95, ed. 1633). He also found the Georgian Christians venerating above every other image that of St. George on horseback, regarding him as having conquered the evil one (ep. 3. p. 209). [IBERIAN CHURCH.]

(3) Commerce with England.—St. George and his story were well known in England from the seventh century, most probably through the Roman missionaries sent by Gregory. In the end of the seventh century, Arculf, the early traveller, when returning to his bishopric in France, was carried northward to Iona, about A.D. 699, where he told the monks the story of St. George, whence, through Adamnan and Bede, it became widely known in Britain. [ARCULF; ADAMNAN.] In accordance with these facts, we find that St. George has a place in the Anglo-Saxon ritual of Durham assigned to the early part of the 9th century, published by the Surtees Society in A.D. 1940, while again, among the publications of the Percy Society, we have an Anglo-Saxon Passion of St. George, the work of Aelfric archbishop of York A.D. 1020–1051. (Passion of St. George, ed. Hardwick, in Percy Society's publications, A.D. 1850; in its preface is much interesting information on this point.) His special fame, however, in this country arose immediately out of the early Crusades. William of Malmesbury (Gesta Reg. Angl. ed. Sir T. D. Hardy, ii. 559) tells us that, when the Crusaders were hard pressed by the Saracens at the battle of Antioch, June 28, 1089, the soldiers were encouraged by seeing "the martyrs George and Demetrius hastily approaching from the mountainous districts, hurling darts against the enemy, but assisting the Franks" (cf. Gibbon, cap. lviii.; Michaud's Hist. of Crusades, i. 173, ed. London; on the military fame of St. Demetrius see Böckh, Corp. Inscrip. iv. 8642; Du Cange, Gloss. i. 974; Texier and Pullan, Byzantine Architecture, pp. 123–132). This timely apparition at the very crisis of the campaign led the Crusaders, among whom were numbered a large contingent of Normans, under Robert, son of William the Conqueror, to adopt St. George as their patron. During the campaigns of Richard I. in Palestine, St. George appeared to that king, so that he became a special favourite with the Normans and English. (Itinerar. of Richard I. in Chron. of Crusades, ed. Eoan, p. 239.) We therefore find in 1222 that a national council at Oxford ordered his feast to be kept as a lesser holiday throughout England. He was not, however, formally adopted as patron saint of England till the time of Edward III. That prince founded St. George's Chapel at Windsor in 1348. In 1349 he joined battle with the French near Calais, when, "moved by a sudden impulse," says Thomas of Walsingham, "he drew his sword with the exclamation, Ha! St. Edward, Ha! St. George, and routed the French" (cf. Smith's Student's Hume, cap. x. par. 8). From that time St. George replaced St. Edward the Confessor as patron of England. In 1350, according to some authorities, the order of the Garter was instituted under his patronage, and in 1415, according to the Constitutions of archbishop Chicheley, St. George's Day was made a major double feast, and ordered to be observed like Christmas Day. In the first prayer book of Edward VI. St. George's feast was a red letter day, and had a special epistle and gospel appointed. This was changed in the next revision and never restored. (Ashmole, Order of the Garter; Anstis, Register; Pott, Antiquities of Windsor and History of Order of Garter, A.D. 1749.) The same influence of the Crusades led to the adoption of St. George as their patron by the republic of Genoa, the kingdoms of Arragon and Valencia, and to the institutions of order of knighthood under his name all over Europe (cf. AA. SS. Boll. April. iii. 160). In northern Syria, again, St. George's day is even still observed by the Christians as a great festival (Lyde, Secret Sects of Northern Syria, London, 1853, p. 19).

(4) Controversy.—The consentient testimony of all Christendom attested the existence of St. George till the Reformation. Calvin first questioned it. In his Institutes, lib. iii. cap. 20, sec. 27, when arguing against invocation of saints, he ridiculed those who esteem Christ's intercession as of no value unless "accedant Georgius aut Hippolytus aut similes larvae," where, unfortunately for himself, he places Hippolytus in the class of ghosts or phantoms together with St. George. Dr. Reynolds, in the beginning of the 17th century, was the first to identify the orthodox martyr of Lydda with the Arian bishop of Alexandria [see further under GEORGIUS (4)]. Against him Dr. Heylin argued in an exhaustive treatise dedicated to king Charles I. (History of St. George of Cappadocia), where on pp. 164–166 will be found a very full list of all the authors who up to that date had referred to St. George, including a quotation from a reputed treatise by St. Ambrose, Liber Praefationum, on which, as not being now extant, we have laid no stress. The controversy was continued during the last century, when Pegge discussed before the London Society of Antiquaries (whose anniversary is held on St. George's Day) the theory that St. George was a mere allegory, and Mr. Byron's view that Gregory the Great was the real patron of England. Dr. Milner, in the last century, wrote a book in defence of the historical reality of St. George, provoked doubtless by Gibbon's well-known sneer in cap. xxiii. of his history. For further history of the controversy, see the exhaustive paper of Mr. Hogg already quoted, and an essay on St. George in Baring-Gould's Myths of the Middle Ages, where an ingenious attempt is made to account for the popularity of his cultus in the East by connecting it with the worship of Tammuz and Adonis, and with various other Eastern beliefs. (Mart. Vet. Rom., Mart. Adon., Mart. Usuard., which all fix his martyrdom at Diospolis in Persia (cf. Herod. ed. Rawlinson, i. 72, v. 49, vii. 72); Hogg, l.c., however, well suggests that Diospolis may be the Bithynian town of that name, which was in the Persian empire under Cyrus. Persia was a term of very vague meaning in the middle ages, specially owing to the frequent irruptions of the Persians into the decaying Eastern empire; Pasch. Chron. ed Bonn, p. 510. Sym. Metaphrast.; Magdeburg. Centur. cent. iv. cap. xii.; Ceillier, xi. 404, xii. 58, 89, 297; Alban-Butler, Lives of Saints, Malan, Hist. of the Georgian Church, pp. 28, 51, 54, 72.) [G. T. S.]

GEORGIUS (44), deacon, of whom Gregory Nazianzen entertained a high opinion for the services he had rendered to the church. Being harassed by some powerful man, Gregory circ. 383 recommended him to the protection of Asterius, assessor of the governor of Cappadocia (Greg. Naz. 126 ep. 150 al. 126). He is probably the same deacon whom Gregory accompanied to inquire into the charge against Euthalius of having violently ill-treated Philadelphius, and to bring him with him to answer for himself (ep. 149 al. 182). [EUTHALIUS (3).] He may also be the same in whose behalf Gregory wrote to Nectarius of Constantinople, begging him to help him to extricate himself from the troubles in which he was involved, and do what he could to gain some indulgence for him from the "Comes Domesticorum" (ep. 151 al. 226).

[E. V.]

GEORGIUS (45), a turbulent monk, who was troubling Cappadocia with his preaching and his writings A.D. 453; described by Leo the Great in a letter to Julian bishop of Cos as having rendered himself unworthy of the name and the profession of a monk by his attacks upon the faith. Leo expresses his surprise that Thalassius bishop of Caesarea had given him licence to preach, though still unordained, and commissions Julian, if he sees good, to write to Thalassius and remonstrate with him. "To preach," Leo asserts, "belongs to presbyters, not to monks" (Leo Magn. Epist. 118 [91]).

[E. V.]

GEORGIUS (46), solitary on Mons Malaenus in Laconia in the 5th or 6th century. The Bollandists give a compendium of his life from the Greek Menaea, but it offers nothing very tangible. He is said to have assumed the name of Georgius or Agricola on his baptism, as intending to cultivate his mental furrows (Boll. Acta SS. 4 Apr. i. 326).

[C. H.]

GEORGIUS (47), disciple of Jacobus of Sarug in Mesopotamia, fl. cir. 520, author of a metrical encomium on his master, beginning "Jesu! light at whose rising the whole world rejoices!" (Abbeloos, J. B. de Vita et Scriptis S. Jacobi Batn. Sarug. Lovan. 1867.) (Assem. Biblioth. Orient. i. 340.)

[C. J. B.]

GEORGIUS (48), presbyter and archimandrite of the monastery of Cyrus, present at the council of Constantinople in 536 (Mansi, viii. 909, the name here being Gregorius in the Latin, 989 D, 1012 B). [GREGORIUS (59).] [C. H.]

GEORGIUS (49), presbyter and hegumenus of Crana, under Photinus bishop of Chalcedon, present at the council of Constantinople in 536 (Mansi, viii. 1013 E).

[C. H.]

GEORGIUS (50), abbas inclusus, a monk of Palestine in the 6th century, whose story John Moschus heard from Anastasius an abbas of Scythopolis in Palestine. Anastasius going one night on his rounds to call up the monks to prayers, heard the old man George sobbing and wailing because of his dream. He thought he was standing by the throne of Christ where many thousand people were deprecating His anger, and He would not hear them. At last came a woman robed in purple, and interceded for the suppliants, but still Christ was inexorable. This was at the dawn of Holy Thursday, and on the following day, Good Friday, an earthquake overthrew the maritime cities of Palestine. (Joann. Mosch. Prat. Spir. cap. 50.) [C. H.]

GEORGIUS (51), presbyter of the church of SS. John and Paul at Rome attending the Roman council of 745 (Mansi, xii. 381). The presbyter of the same church in 721 was Gregorius, who may have been the same person, as the two names are frequently interchanged by the error of transcribers. [GREGORIUS (69).] This George is identified in other letters of the same date (Mansi, 374 E, 377 D, 379 B), from his order in the list, though his church is not mentioned. (See also Jaffé's Monum. Mogunt. 136, 141, 144, 147.) [C. H.]

GEORGIUS, presbyter and messenger of pope Gregory III. [GREGORIUS (68).]

GEORGIUS (52), a solitary of Mount Sinai, stated to have been the brother of St. John Climacus. (Daniel, Vit. Joan. Clim. in La Bigne, Max. Bibl. Pat. x. 388 c.) After living the life of an anchorite for seventy years, he was summoned by his brother to succeed him as abbat of the monastery of Sinai, a responsibility which filled him with apprehension. St. John Climacus, when dying, promised that if his prayers were of any avail with God, Georgius should be taken out of the world within a year; and he in fact died six months after his brother. (Joan. Mosch. Prat. Spir. cap. 127; Ceillier, Histoire des Auteurs Ecclés. xi. 678.) [L. G. S.]

GEORGIUS (53), a venerable Palestinian monk in the monastery of Theodosius bishop of Capitolias (in Palaestina Secunda, cir. A.D. 600, Le Quien, O. C. iii. 717). Theodosius, who spoke of him to John Moschus, had for twelve years observed that George was never troubled, although at that time sloth, negligence, luxury, and insubordination were rampant. No one like him could rein the eye, close the ear, control the tongue; he was as a sunbeam in the hearts of all the brethren. (Joan. Mosch. Prat. Spir. cap. 109.) [C. H.]

GEORGIUS (54), PISIDES, poet, deacon of the great church at Constantinople. Little is known of his life, which was probably uneventful. He lived at Constantinople during the reign of the emperor Heraclius, A.D. 610-641, and the patriarchate of Sergius, and was in high favour with both of them, undoubtedly on account of his poetic gifts. He is called by some authorities chartophylax (keeper of the archives), by others scenophylax (keeper of the sacred vessels), at the church of St. Sophia, and from certain expressions in his poem De Expeditione Persica (ii. 122, iii. 131), it appears that he accompanied Heraclius in some of his campaigns against the Persians. His works may be divided into two classes, (a) those relating to the history of his own times; (b) religious poems. Those that have come down to us of the first class are, (1) De Expeditione Persica, a poem in three hearings or declamations (ἀποδοσεις) narrating the expedition of Heraclius against Chosroes, A.D. 615; it is full of adulation, both of the piety and of the valour of the emperor, and applies to the Persians the verse of the 136th Psalm, "Blessed be he that taketh thy children and dasheth them against the stones" (i. 114); (2) Belum Avaricum, narrating the fruitless attack of the Avars on Constantinople, whilst the Persian army was encamped at Chalcedon; (3) Hymnus Acathistus, a hymn to the virgin to be sung standing, a thank-offering for the same defeat of the Avars; (4) In Sanctam Resurrectionem, where George exhorts Constantine, the son of Heraclius, to follow the example of his father; (5) Heraclius, a rapid review of the life of the emperor, written on the news of the death of Chosroes. Of the second class there are these: (1) Hexameron, the longest and most elaborate of George's works, dedicated to Sergius. It consists of 1910 lines, but is thought to be imperfect; (2) De Unitate Vitae, a short moral poem; (3) Contra Ezerum, against the Monophysite heresy, but ignoring Monothelitism, which was favoured by the patriarch; there is also a prose work, Vita S. Anastasii Martyris, a Persian who suffered martyrdom in Palestine when that country was under the dominion of Chosroes. Greek writers quote from other works of this author, of which fragments are alone extant. George composed in iambic metre, and his verses are correct and elegant; greatly admired by his contemporaries, he is a court poet, writing with an eye to his patrons, and profuse in his praises of them; his elegance often sinks into frigidity. He must be distinguished from George bishop of Nicomedia, who flourished at the end of the 9th century, with whom Cave wrongly identifies him. (Migne, Patrol. Graec. xcii. 1160-1754; Ceillier, xi. 653; Cave, Script. Eccl. Hist. i. 583; Allatus, de Georgis in Fabric. Bibl. x. 561-9.) [L. D.]

GEORGIUS (55), presbyter abbat, who enquired of St. Maximus concerning the mystery of Christ's person, in reference to the Monothelite controversy. Maximus addresses him as an unwearied student of holy Scripture, and one abstracted from all lower things in the contemplation of the spiritual. (S. Maxim. Conf. Opuscula, in La Bigne, Max. Bibl. Pat. tom. xii. p. 521.) [C. H.]

GEORGIUS (56), surnamed ARSA, a Paulinist, to whom Sergius patriarch of Constantinople wrote c. A.D. 620, asking for authorities on the Monothelite argument. (S. Maxim. Conf. Disput. cum Pyrrho in La Bigne, Max. Bibl. Pat. xii. 503 a.) [R. S. G.]

GEORGIUS (57), patricius of Africa, c. A.D. 647 (Maxim. Ep. 18; Migne, Patrol. Gr. xci. 584). [GREGORIUS (77).] [T. W. D.]

GEORGIUS (58), archimandrite of the monastery of St. Theodosius, thanked in a letter from pope Martin I. A.D. 649 (Jaffé, Reg. Pont. 162) for having supported Stephen bishop of Dorca, the oriental legate of the Roman see under the late pope. Martin exhorts him to yield a similar obedience to his own legate in the East, John bishop of Philadelphia. (Martin. ep. 8 in Pat. Lat. lxxxvii. 167, and Mansi, Conc. x. 819.) [C. H.]

GEORGIUS (59), presbyter and monk of the monastery of St. Renatus at Rome, present at the council of Constantinople, A.D. 680 (Mansi, xi. 616 d). He, or another of the same name, was legate of pope Agatho to the council (ib. 611). [C. H.]

GEORGIUS (60), of Nesra in Adiabene, also called Bar Sajada (Sayode), i.e. son of fishermen. He was archimandrite of Beth-haba, A.D. 690, in the patriarchate of Ananjesu. He wrote a treatise De Obedientiâ (di meshtamo'nutho). Thom. Marg. (Hist. Monast. lib. 2, cap. 20) says he will not write a life of Georgius, because that has been done by bishop David in chap. i. of the Little Paradise. In lib. 1, cap. 21, Marg. tells how Ananjesu sent some monks accused of heresy to Georgius, who found them not guilty. (Assem. Biblioth. Orient. iii. i. 217-218.) [C. J. B.]

GEORGIUS (61), a native of Scythopolis, presbyter of the great church of Constantinople, mentioned by Phocas bar Sergius of Edessa in the 8th century as having written in defence of the authenticity of the writings of Dionysius Areopagita. Some extracts from George's book are given by Phocas (W. Wright, Cat. of Syrian MSS. in the Brit. Mus. pt. ii. p. 495, col. 1). [T. W. D.]

GEORGIUS (62), deacon of Amastris in Paphlagonia, signing for his bishop Zoilus at the council of Constantinople in 692. (Mansi, xi. 1000 b.) [L. D.]

GEORGIUS (63), surnamed CLIDOPORUS (Κλειδοπορεύς), presbyter and logographus in the church of the Severians at Alexandria, late in the 7th century, who disputed with Anastasius Sinaita the priest and monk (Anastas. Sinait. Viae Dux, cap. 10 in Migne, Pat. Gr. lxxxix. 188). [T. W. D.]

GEORGIUS (64)—Oct. 21. Martyr at Jerusalem with sixty others, at the hands of the Saracens, A.D. 723. They were buried in the church of St. Stephen at Jerusalem. (Acta SS. Boll. Oct. ix. 360-362.) [G. T. S.]

GEORGIUS (65), surnamed LIMNIOTES—Aug. 24. A monk, and opponent of Leo the Isaurian in the iconoclastic controversy, A.D. 736. Like the rest of the monks, he was an enthusiastic supporter of the worship of images. He usually lived a very ascetic life beside a lake near Mount Olympus in Asia Minor, whence his surname. According to some, he was put to death; according to others, he was mutilated by the emperor for his opposition. (Bas. Menol.; Mart. Rom. ed. Baron.; Acta SS. Boll. Aug. iv. 841; Maimbourg, Hist. Iconoclast. t. i. l. 2, p. 108, ed. 1686.) [G. T. S.]

GEORGIUS (66), prior "scholae cantorum," at Rome, mentioned in a letter of pope Paul I. to Pippin, 763, as then dead and having been succeeded by Simeon. (Codex Carolinus, Jaffé, no. 41, ann. 758-67; Pat. Lat. lxxxix. 1187; Jaffé, Reg. Pontif. 196.) [A. H. D. A.]

rectly July 27, according to Baronius). He went to Jerusalem upon a pilgrimage, and on his return, bearing relics from the Holy City, he was killed by the Saracens at Cordova, together with Aurelius, Felix, Natalia, and Liliosa, some time in the 8th century. Usuardus fixes Oct. 20 as the day of the translation of his body into France, upon which point his authority may be completely trusted, as he was himself the agent in the removal. In the year 858 Usuardus was sent with another monk named Odilard by the abbey of St. Germain, near Paris, to look for the relics of St. Vincent at Valentia in Spain, a city which was then in ruins, owing to the ravages of the Saracens. They bore with them a commendatory letter from king Charles the Bald. They did not find the relics of Vincent, but discovered and bore away from Cordova the bodies of George the deacon, of Natalia or Natalius, and of Aurelius. On their return to France they found that the community of St. Germain had fled to a place in the diocese of Sens because the Normans had burned their monastery. They did not, therefore, return to Paris till 863, when Charles the Bald was so delighted with the relics that he ordered Usuardus to compile his famous Martyrology. (Mart. Usuard., Roman. ed. Baron.; Eulogii. lib. ii. Memoral. cap. 10; J. Bouillart. Prolegom. Mart. Usuard. in Migne's Patrol. Lat. vol. 123, 583–586; Ceillier, xii. 611.) [G. T. S.]

GEORGIUS (68) SYNOCELLUS, a monk of Constantinople towards the close of the 8th century, and author of a Chronographia or Chronology of the world, extending from the days of Adam to those of Diocletian, A.D. 285, when the further progress of the work seems to have been stopped by his death. He received the epithet Syncellus from the office held by him near the person of Tarasius patriarch of Constantinople. This office was that of a kind of privy councillor of the patriarch, an adviser in all his affairs (Du Cange, Glossarium, s. v. Syncellus).

Nothing is known of the birth or early history of George, but his writings, the honours received by him in later life, and the testimony of Theophanes of Constantinople, a contemporary writer and a continuator of his Chronographia, are sufficient to prove the high esteem in which he was held. Theophanes speaks of him as an illustrious and most learned man, who had examined with the greatest diligence the works of his predecessors, and had attained a success which had marked none of them. (Theophan. Chronogr. proem. p. 4 in Corp. Scr. Hist. Byz. Bonn.) This tribute of praise has not, however, been received without question by succeeding writers. Scaliger in particular, offended at some of George's depreciatory remarks on his favourite Eusebius, uttered too, it would seem, at a time when Syncellus was making large use of the very authority he was underrating, is very severe in his language of condemnation, styling him light and foolish and insane, and charging him with having obtained his whole history from the person whom he took it upon him to depreciate (Dissertatio by Bredovius, prefixed to the second volume of the works of Syncellus in the Corpus Script. II. B. p. 10). There seems to be but little foundation for these charges. That George but made use of Eusebius is unquestionable; he used all from whom he thought that he could gather materials for his work. Of these writers, such as Julius Africanus, and Alexander Polyhistor, he has preserved many fragments that would otherwise have been lost, and a large portion of the Chronicon of Eusebius has been from him restored to its true author.

The work of Syncellus has always been highly esteemed in the church, more especially for its preservation of passages from earlier writers, who would otherwise have been almost unknown. It is worth noticing that among the quotations given in it are a good many from the Apocryphal book of Enoch. The Chronographia, of which only one MS., in the National Library at Paris, is known, was first published by the Dominican Jacob Goar in the year 1652. The best edition now is that of Dindorf, in the Corpus Scriptorum Historiae Byzantinae, in two vols., with the Dissertatio of Bredovius and the Preface and Notes of Goar. [W. M.]

GEORGIUS (69)—Jan. 22, martyr. During the reign of Leo the Armenian, the pagan Bulgarians attacked Adrianople, seized Manuel the bishop, whom they at once martyred, with a large number of captives, clergy and laity. Tzocus, the Bulgarian prince, gathered together the captives, among whom was Georgius, and upon their refusal to abjure their faith put them all to death. (Bas. Menol.; Finlay, Hist. of Greece, ii. 114.) [G. T. S.]

GEORGIUS (70), the name of three begumeni of Greek monasteries, present at the council of Nicaea in 787, viz. of Domnica (Mansi, xiii. 153 c).

The Holy Theotokos (ib. 155 b).

Pega (ib. xiii. 1112 d, Gregorius in the Latin). [C. H.]

GEORGIUS (71), presbyter at the council of Nicaea, 787, representing the bishop of Cephallenia (Mansi, xiii. 145 b, Greek; Gregorius in the Latin). [C. H.]

GEORGIUS (72), a layman of Paspasus, sent to Gregory Nazianzen by his friend Theodorus bishop of Tyana, that he might convince him of the guilt he had involved himself in by refusing to be bound by an oath he had taken, on the ground that it had never been registered. Georgius had brought the matter into court, and seems to have gained his suit. Gregory succeeded in bringing him to repentance, and sent him back to Theodorus with the request that he would inflict suitable penance on him, regulating its length by his contrition (Greg. Naz. Epist. 219). Gregory's letter was read in the second council of Constantinople by Euphrantus, the bishop of Tyana, by whom Georgius was stated to have been the superior of a convent at Paspasus (Labbe, Concil. v. 477). Tillemont doubts the correctness of this statement (Mém. Eccl. ix. 570). [E. V.]

GEORGIUS (73), a prefect under the emperor Phocas. He was sent into Palestine, about 606, to compel the Jews to receive baptism, a course often pursued by the Byzantine emperors, and a notable instance of which occurred a century later, at the beginning of the reign of Leo the larian. [LEO III., ICONOCLASM.] (Finlay, Hist. of Greece, ii. 34.) As soon as he arrived at Jerusalem he assembled their chief men, and asked if they were the servants of the emperor. Upon receiving their assent he announced in the high-flown language of the imperial court, that "the Lord of the Earth had ordered them to receive baptism." After a pause, one of them, Yunus by name, answered, "We are willing to do anything save this." The prefect thereupon bared his ears violently, saying, "How dare slaves like you not obey your lord!" and ordered them at once to be baptized. (Dionysius Telmar, in Mai, Spici. Rom. x. 224; Assem. Bibl. Orient. i. 102.) [DIONYSIUS.] [G. T. S.]

GEPPAN, addressed together with Eoban, Tatvianus, Wigbert, "and all our brothers and sisters," by St. Boniface in a short letter, telling them of his prosperous voyage to Rome and joyful welcome by the pope, A.D. 738 (Bonif. Magunt. Ep. 42 in Migne, Patr. Lat. lxxxix. 741). [S. A. B.]

GERADUS, bishop of Bologna. [GERARDUS.]

GERAINT. [GERONTIUS.]

GERALDUS (1) (GARALT) of Mayo, abbat and bishop, March 13. A life of this saint taken from a MS. of the monastery of All Saints, in Lough Ree, and supposed to have been written by the monk Augustin Magraidin, is given by Colgan (Acta SS. 599 sq.) It is also given by the Bollandists (Acta SS. 13 Mart. n. 288) from MSS. in the Bodleian Library, but is cut up and presented with a running comment. (Hardy, Descript. Cat. i. pt. ii. 371, pt. ii. 797, gives the MS. and printed authorities: see also the article in O'Hanlon's Irish Saints, iii. 361 sq.) Unfortunately this life is almost entirely unworthy of credit, being full of anachronisms and fables. Geraldus is believed to have been of Saxon lineage and birth, and is generally supposed to have been one of those who accompanied Colman (Feb. 18) from Lindisfarne after the synod at Whitby [COLMAN (23)] in the year 664: but if so, he must have been young when he left Northumbria and settled with the other Saxons in Colman's new foundation at Mayo, unless, with some, we place his death at a very early date. He became abbat of the monastery of Mayo, but whether he was also bishop or not is a matter of dispute, depending in great measure upon the interpretation to be put upon the entry in the Annals of Ulster and Annals of Tighernach, at A.D. 731 and 732, and thus upon the date assigned to his death. It is not to be credited, as told in the Life of St. Gerald, that Adamnan (Sept. 23), abbat of Iona, who died A.D. 704, governed the church of Mayo for seven years after St. Gerald's death, and that therefore St. Gerald died at latest in the year 697, as accepted by Ussher and O'Connor. The Four Masters give his death in A.D. 726, but O'Donovan is very strongly in favour of the entry in the Annals of Ulster and Annals of Tighernach being read, "A.D. 732, the pontiff of Mayo of the Saxons, Gerald, dies," i.e. "Gerald, pontiff of Mayo of the Saxons, dies." This is the date usually received, but it is not free from doubt, as the reading varies so much from the usual idiom. He is also said to have been superior of a monastery at Elitheria or Kill-an-alithir, "the church of the pilgrim," and of another called Teach-Saxon, both in the diocese of Tuam, and probably dependencies of Mayo. His feast is usually observed on March 13, but March 10 and 12 are also named as his commemorations. (Lanigan, Ecol. Hist. Ir. iii. c. 19, § 7; Gen. &c., of Hy Fiachrach by O'Donovan, 138 sq. 452, 453; Four Mast. by O'Donovan, i. 324 n. b; Reeves, St. Adamaun, liii. liv.; Ussher, Brit. Ecol. Ant. vi., Ind.
